if he did but ſhew himſelfe before it. Wherupon he departed from Eubœa, and comming into the gulfe of Patras, landed foure thouſand footmen vnder the leading of Barbaricus, and two hundred horſemen, of whom one Nicholaus Ragius was Captaine. Barbaricus marchiug toward Patras, was come within a mile of the city; when many of the horſemen, and of the vnruly mariners, diſorderly ſcattering abroad, neglected the intended ſeruice, and ſought after pillage all about the countrey. The Turks garriſons taking this opportunity, ſet vpon them F with their horſemen, and ſo eaſily ouerthrew them, being ſcattered and out of order. At the firſt encounter, Barbaricus himſelfe was ſlaine; Ragius Captaine of the horſemen was taken, and aliue empailed vpon a ſharp ſtake. Of all them that were landed, ſcarce a thouſand were left, who ſaued their liues by flying vnto the gallies. With this ouerthrow Victor the Venetian admirall was greatly diſcomforted, yet hauing conceiued ſome hope of better ſucceſſe, in few daies after attempted again to haue taken Patras, but with like hap as before : for hauing loſt G a thouſand of his men about the city, and the reſt glad to take their flight to the fleet, he was conſtrained with great diſhonor to depart thence. And ſo full of ſorrow and heauines returning into Eubœa, oppreſſed with melancholy he there ſuddenly died.

The Venetians deceiued of the great hope they had conceiued of the general preparation made againſt the Turks, and much troubled with the hard proceeding of their wars againſt ſo mighty an enemy ; by their Embaſſadors ſolicited Matthias, not long before choſen King of Hungary, to join in league with them, and to take vp arms againſt the Common Enemie; offering preſently to furniſh him with a great ſum of money , beſides a large yearly penſion for the better maintenance of thoſe wars. For which he ſhould to his power by land defend all their Territory betwixt the Rhetian Alps and the Adriatique, againſt the inuaſion of the H Turk.

This Matthias (ſyrnamed Coruinus) was the yonger ſon of the moſt famous Captaine Io. Huniades, whoſe elder brother Vladiſlaus, a gentleman of ſuch courage as might well ſhew whoſe ſon he was, being not able to diſgeſt the injuries and diſgraces don vnto him and his brother, by Vlricus County of Cilie, and vncle to Ladiſlaus the yong king of Hungary and Bohemia, for the deſpight hee alwaies bare vnto their father Huniades; ſlew the ſame Vlricus at Alba-Regalis, euen in the Kings court. Which injury the yong King was glad for the preſent to wink at, and alſo to grant him pardon ; as hauing taken away the man whoſe immoderat power wel ſtood not with the Kings ſafety : but indeed fearing the citiſens of Alba, & the men of war, who exceedingly fauored the ſons of Huniades for their fathers ſake. For all that, I Ladiſlaus returning into Bohemia, cauſed both the ſons of Huniades vpon the ſudden to be apprehended, and moſt cruelly executed, Vladiſlaus, being then about twenty ſix years old. Matthias the yonger brother was kept in priſon , expecting nothing els but to be partaker of his brothers hard fortune; as vndoubtedly he had, had not Ladiſlaus the yong King vpon the ſudden, as he was vpon the top of his mariage with Magdalen the French Kings daughter, by vntimely death bin taken away. After whoſe death, the Hungarians for the loue they bare vnto the remembrance of Huniades, by a military election choſe this Matthias his yongeſt ſon, then priſoner at Prague, to be their King. Wherof Pogebrache (who after the death of Ladiſlaus, of an old gouernor, had made himſelf the yong King of Bohemia) hauing ſpeedy intelligence, as he was ſitting at ſupper, ſent for Matthias his priſoner, and when he was come, commanded K him to ſit down at the vpperend of the table : wherat the yong gentleman, being then but about 18 years of age, and ſore abaſhed, began to craue pardon. But when the King would needs haue it ſo, and that he was ſet, to quiet his troubled thoughts, hee willed him to bee of good cheer, for that he had good news to tel him. Good news (ſaid he) if it would pleaſe your Majeſty to grant me liberty. Yea that (ſaid the King) and more too; and then ſaluting him by the name of the King of Hungary, brake vnto him the whole matter, how that he was by the general conſent of the Hungarians choſen their King. And ſo in few dayes after, married to him his daughter : which done, he furniſhed him with all things fit for his eſtate, and royally accompanied him into Hungary, where hee was with great ioy and triumph receiued of the Hungarians; ouer whom he afterwards glorioſly reigned for the ſpace of 38 years. In which L time he notably inlarged the kingdom of Hungary, and became a far greater terror vnto the Turks, than euer was his father Huniades. And therwithall (which is not to be accounted in the leaſt part of his praiſes) was alwaies a great fauorer and furtherer of good letters and ingenious deuiſes.

Matthias of a priſoner choſen K. of Hungary.

But to return again to our purpoſe. Matthias hauing wel conſidered of that the Venetians had requeſted ; anſwered them, That they had many times before in like caſe refuſed to giue aid to the Hungarian kings his predeceſſors : yea and that more was , thought it a thing not reaſonable, that any ſuch thing ſhould be requeſted at their hands, foraſmuch as they then receiued no harm from the Turk, but were in league and amity with him: ſo that the Hungarian Kings wanting their help, had many times receiued greater loſſe from the Turk than other- M wiſe they ſhould haue don, if they had bin by them aided. Yet for all that, he was content to forget all ſuch vnkindnes, and to grant them what they had requeſted ; promiſing the next Spring to inuade the Turks Dominion, and according to their requeſt to take into his protection all their Territory betwixt the Rhetian Alps and the Adriatique. Which thing hee

A moſt honorably performed; for with the firſt of Spring he paſſed ouer Danubius at Belgrade with a puiſſant army, and raſed the forts which the Turks had built therabout; and ſo entring into Seruia, layd all the Country waſt before him: and afterwards laden with ſpoil returned home, carrying away with him twenty thouſand Captiues. Neither ſo reſted hee, but with great good fortune maintained great wars with Mahomet during all the time of his reigne, and afterward with his ſon Bajazet alſo; wherein he moſt commonly returned with victorie: So that it is of him as truely as briefly written, That no Chriſtian King or Chiefetaine did more often or with greater fortune fight againſt the Turkiſh Nation, or had of them greater victories.

Mahomet deliuered of the great fear he had before conceiued, of the general preparation of B the Chriſtian princes againſt him, determined now to work his will vpon ſuch as were neereſt vnto him, and afterward not to forget them that were farther off. The proceeding of Scanderbeg, with the late ouerthrow of Seremet with his army in Epirus, ſtuck in his ſtomacke: in reuenge wherof, he now ſent Balabanus Badera a moſt valiant Captaine, with fifteen thouſand horſmen and three thouſand foot to inuade Epirus. This Balabanus was an Epirot borne, a Churles ſon of that country; who being of a boy taken captiue by the Turks, as he was keeping his fathers cattel, and of long time brought vp in ſeruitude amongſt them, framing himſelf vnto their religion and manners, after long ſeruice got the credit of a good common ſoldier. But when as at the taking of Conſtantinople it was his fortune to be the firſt man of the Turks army that gained the top of the walls, and entred into the City; he was for that piece C of ſeruice euer afterwards of Mahomet greatly eſteemed: and beſides his other great preferments, now ſent Generall of his Army into Epirus. Who as ſoon as he was come to Alchria, (a City vpon the frontiers of that Countrey) ſent many rich preſents vnto Scanderbeg, making ſhew as if he had bin deſirous peaceably to lie vpon the borders committed to his charge, without further purpoſe to trouble his Country: yet indeed waiting for nothing more than ſome notable opportunitie, ſuddenly to do him the greateſt miſchief he could. But Scanderbeg well ſeeing into the malice of the man, rejected his feigned friendſhip and gifts, and in deriſion ſent him a ſpade, a mattock, a flail, with other ſuch inſtruments belonging vnto Huſbandry; willing him to take in hand thoſe tools, and to follow his fathers courſe of life, and to leaue the conducting of Armies vnto men of greater skill and better place. Which diſ D grace Balabanus tooke in exceeding euill part; purpoſing with himſelfe, if euer it lay in his power, to be therof ſharply reuenged. Wherfore knowing that Scanderbeg with a ſmal power lay not far off vpon the borders of his Kingdom, hee determined ſuddenly in the night to ſet vpon him before he was aware of his comming, and ſo if it were poſſible to ouerthrow him. But Scanderbeg hauing knowlege therof by his Scouts, ſet forward in good order to haue met him. When Balabanus perceiuing that he was diſcouered, ſtaid vpon the way, and incamped within two miles of Scanderbeg, who had then in his army but four thouſand horſemen, and and one thouſand and fiue hundred foot, but all choiſe men, and moſt expert ſouldiers, and then lay in a large pleaſant Vally called Valchal; at the farther end wherof Balabanus lay alſo incamped, neer vnto a rough and wooddy hill which incloſed that part of the vally. Whilſt E both Armies thus lay within view one of another, Scanderbeg well conſidering the ground the Enemy had taken, and that it was like he would offer him battel, with cheerfull ſpeeches encouraged his ſouldiers: ſtreightly charging them vpon pain of his diſpleaſure, That if the Enemy vpon the fortune of the battell ſhould chance to fly or to retyre, they ſhould not in any caſe purſue them farther than the ſtreights of the hil wherby the enemy lay. Gheſſing too truly, that he would in ſo conuenient a place leaue part of his Army in ambuſh, as a ſure refuge to truſt vnto, whatſoeuer ſhould befall. When he had thus encouraged and inſtructed his ſouldiers, he roſe with his Army, and in good order retyred vnto the riſing of an hill, which was a good way behind the place where he before lay, of purpoſe to haue the aduantage of the ground, if the Enemy ſhould follow to giue him battell. Balabanus ſeeing him F retyre, and the ſmall number of his army, thought verily that he had fled for fear: and therefore to ſtay him who meant nothing leſſe than to flie, ſet forward in great haſt. The Turkes thinking vpon ſo great aduantage to haue found no great reſiſtance, followed after Scanderbeg as if they had had him in chaſe; and by that time they were come vnto the place where hee ſtayd, were by their haſt greatly diſordered and out of aray. Scanderbeg his old truſty ſouldiers ers nothing diſmayed with the haſty comming and hideous clamour of the Turks, receiued G them with great courage; ſo that there began a fierce battell, with much ſlaughter on both ſides, which for a good while ſtood doubtfull. Yet ſuch was the inuincible courage of Scan- derbegs reſolute ſoldiers, that the Turks (who as then fought in great diſorder) were at laſt put to flight, and with much ſlaughter chaſed vnto the ſtreights of the mountain, where Scander- beg had before commanded his men to ſtay. But certain of his beſt and principall Captains forgetting what he had ſaid to them, and led on (whether with the heat and fury of the battel, or rather with inevitable deſtiny, is hard to ſay) vnaduiſedly purſued the enemy into thoſe Streights, wherof they were by Scanderbeg before warned, and charged that they ſhould not enter: where they were on euery ſide beſet by their enemies, ariſing out of an ambuſh; and after they had a long time deſperatly fought as wild beaſts incloſed with Hunters, at the laſt H oppreſſed with multitude, were together taken and brought to Balabanus, by whom they were forthwith ſent to Mahomet to Conſtantinople. Who as ſoon as he heard of their taking, is reported with great rejoicing to haue ſaid, Now am I ſure that the ſtrength of Scanderbeg is broken. The names of the principal men which were there taken, was Moſes Golemus of Di-bra, the greateſt Captain of Epirus next vnto Scanderbeg himſelf; Giuriza Vladerius, Scander- beg his Kinſman; Muſachius, Scanderbeg his Nephew by his ſiſter Angelina; Ginius Muſachius, Ioannes Perlatus, who valiantly defended Sfetigrade againſt Amurath; Nicolaus Beriſius, Geor- gius Chucca, and Ginius Maneſius: wherof euery one of them was able to haue conducted a great Army, and might worthily haue bin accounted amongſt the greateſt Captaines of that Age. The taking of theſe worthy men brought ſuch a generall ſorrow and heauineſſe vpon I Epirus, that the victory was nothing accounted of, euery man lamenting the loſſe of ſuch notable Leaders. Scanderbeg carefull of their deliuerance, preſently ſent an Embaſſadour vnto Mahomet, requeſting that he might redeem his priſoners, either by exchanging of others for them, or els for ſuch ranſom as it ſhould pleaſe him to ſet down. But hee knowing them to be Scanderbeg his beſt Captains, would neither exchange them for others, nor grant that they ſhould be ranſomed for any gold. But after he had vſed them with all the deſpight that hee could imagin, cauſed them all by little and little to be ſlain quicke; in which miſerable torment they liued fifteen dayes, and ſo died. Scanderbeg hearing therof, was therwith rather incouraged than any way diſcouraged; and in reuenge thereof, with fire and ſword entred into the Turks Dominions, ſparing nothing that hee could either burn, or poſſibly by any other K means deſtroy.

*Moſes & other worthy Captaines cruelly

Mahomet glad of the taking of theſe notable men (although they were bought with the liues of many of his people) commended Balabanus highly, as the only man who knew how to fight againſt Scanderbeg: and in reward of his good ſeruice ſent him diuers rich gifts, with commandment to repair again his Army, & to proceed in his wars ſo happily begun. Which thing Balabanus with all diligence performed. Yet truſting more to his policie than to his ſtrength, lying at Alchria, ſent again diuers rich preſents to Scanderbeg, as deſirous to liue in peace by him; but ſeeking indeed to bring him into ſecuritie, & ſo ſuddenly (if it were poſſible) to intrap him. Which thing Scanderbeg well perceiuing, rejected his feigned friendſhip together with his preſents, as ſent from a baſe peſant. Whereupon Balabanus entred into a L new deuice, and by ſecret means with great rewards corrupted Scanderbegs ſcouts, whereof ſome were Balabanus his kinſmen, though it were to Scanderbeg vnknown. By which practiſe he had in the night vpon the ſudden oppreſſed Scanderbeg, lying incamped at Oronychium, if Scanderbeg himſelfe (who commonly ſpent moſt part of the night in carefull watch) going about the Camp, had not in the ſilence of the night a far off perceiued the comming of the enemy by the noiſe of his horſes; and therupon with wonderfull celeritie putting his army in ſuch order as he beſt could, was ready to receiue him, and at laſt after a great fight put him to flight; and hauing him in chaſe, ſlew moſt part of his army, Balabanus himſelf with a ſmal remnant hardly eſcaping.

Now when Mahomet vnderſtood that Balabanus was ouerthrowne, and his Army loſt, M he was in doubt whether to ſend another Generall, or els to proue again the fortune of the old. But after he had wel conſidered, that Balabanus was a right valiant Captain, and one that well knew the Countrey of Epirus, and withall a mortall enemy vnto Scanderbeg, he reſolued wholly to ſtay vpon him, and not to ſend any other. So committing to his charge fourteene thouſand

A thouſand horſmen and three thouſand foot, ſent him again to inuade Epirus: and the more to encourage him, promiſed to make him King of that country, if he could ſubdue Scanderbeg.
Balabanus with his army comming to Alchria, and ſtill in vaine plotting how he might circumuent his wary enemy; after his wonted manner ſent diuers preſents to Scanderbeg, which he ſtill ſcornefully refuſed. Three months he lay ſtill at Alchria, with nothing more troubled than with his own thoughts: but finding nothing that pleaſed himſelfe, he determined to aduenture by plaine force to ſubdue him. And vpon that reſolution marched with all his army into the great plains neere vnto Sfetigrade, whither Scanderbeg came with his army alſo, which then conſiſted of eight thouſand horſmen and fifteen hundred foot; with which ſmall power he refuſed not to joyne battell with Balabanus, being in number two to one. But after they B were come to handy blows, to haue ſeene Scanderbeg his men fight, a man would haue thought them rather to haue beene raging Lyons than men, they ſo furiouſly aſſailed their enemies, without regard of perill or danger, as men nothing afraid to die. Scanderbeg with great skill gouerned that battell, carefully prouiding for euery danger: himſelfe valiantly fighting in the head of this battell, but not without care of the reſt, ſtill ſending in ſpeedy reliefe where moſt need was, and bringing in freſh ſupplies in ſtead of them that were wounded or ſlaine, performed all the parts of a moſt worthy chiefetaine and valiant ſoldier: where moſt perill was, there was he ſtreight, and at his preſence danger fled, as if victory had attended vpon him. But whileſt he thus fought in the midſt of his enemies, his horſe fortuned to be ſlaine vnder him, and falling downe with him, ſore bruiſed one of his armes, whereof he complained long time C after. The Turks ſeeing him downe, preſſed on fiercely to haue ſlaine him: but he was quickly reſcued by his own ſouldiers and remounted. And forthwith encountering with one Suliman, a great commander in the Turks army, ſlew him in fight hand to hand: whereupon ſuch a terrour fell vpon the Turks, that they began to retire, and after a while to betake themſelues to plaine flight. Scanderbeg purſuing them with ſuch execution, that of that great army few eſcaped with Balabanus to carry newes home.

The battell of Sfetigrade betwixt Balabanus and Scanderbeg.

Balabanus now thrice vanquiſhed by Scanderbeg, and in the laſt battell hauing loſt what he could looſe, except he ſhould haue loſt himſelfe, returned to Mahomet at Conſtantinople, of whom he was ſharply rebuked for the great ouerthrowes he had ſo often receiued. At which time Balabanus at firſt gaue place to the Kings fury; but afterward when the heat was ouer, he D with a large diſcourſe cunningly excuſed himſelfe, imputing all theſe miſhaps vnto the appointment of God, and the fortune of war: and in the end told Mahomet plainly, That it was but in vaine to ſend ſuch ſmall armies into Epirus. But if it would pleaſe him at once to ſend two valiant captaines with a puiſſant and ſtrong army, who diuiding the ſame betwixt them, & entering at one time into diuers parts of Epirus, might ſpoile the country before them, and encloſe Scanderbeg betwixt them, if he ſhould aduenture to giue either of them battell; being before reſolued neither of them to offer him battell, or yet to accept of the ſame being by him offered, except the other were alſo at hand: and ſo by mutuall conſent to vndertake him, but neuer ſingle. By which courſe he promiſed vnto him an eaſie and aſſured victory: for as much as it were impoſſible for any man ſo beſet, and as it were on euery ſide coupt vp with his enemies, E either to eſcape or yet to make any great reſiſtance. This perſwaſion of Balabanus ſo well fitted the Tyrants humor, that he appointed Balabanus himſelfe to be the man to put his own deuiſe in execution: giuing him commiſſion to leauy ſuch an army as he ſhould think ſufficient for the performance of that ſeruice: and withall to aſſociat vnto himſelfe for his companion which ſoeuer of his captaines he pleaſed. Balabanus according to his commiſſion, tooke muſters of the men of war, and made choice of forty thouſand good ſouldiers, and choſe one Iacup Arnauth (otherwiſe called Iames the Epirot, becauſe he was alſo borne in Epirus, a valiant captaine) to be his companion: whom he ſent with ſixteene thouſand ſoldiers by the way of Theſſalia and Grecia into Epirus, commanding him in no caſe to joine battel with Scanderbeg, vntill he himſelfe were alſo come into the country with the other part of the army. And F ſo ſetting both forward, Balabanus taking the neerer way through Thracia and Macedonia, came firſt into Epirus with twenty thouſand horſemen and foure thouſand foot, and encamped in the vally of Valchall. Scanderbeg both by his eſpials and letters from his ſecret friends in the Turks court, hauing certaine intelligence of all Balabanus his intent and purpoſe, had in readineſſe againſt his comming a ſtrong army of eight thouſand horſemen and foure thouſand ſand foot,all choiſe ſoldiers. And now hearing that he was come into Epirus,and incamped in G Valchaal,ſent out three eſpials to diſcouer in what order he lay: one of which ſpies was Balabanus his kinſman (but not ſo knowne to Scanderbeg) by whoſe perſuaſion the other two when they had taken ful view of Balabanus his army,and ſhould haue returned to Scanderbeg to haue giuen intelligence of that they had ſeene, like falſe traitors went ouer to Balabanus, and diſcouered vnto him all that they knew concerning Scanderbeg: hoping thereby to receiue ſome great reward,as their fellow had before borne them in hand. Scanderbeg maruelling that his eſpials returned not againe as they were appointed, and doubting that they had bin by the enemy intercepted, and vſing many times in matters of ſuch importance to truſt himſelfe beſt; preſently went out with fiue luſty ſoldiers, and rid forth to diſcouer the maner of the enemies lying. Balabanus like a crafty fox, miſtruſting that Scanderbeg deceiued of his firſt ſpies would H for like purpoſe ſend forth others, laied certain horſmen in ſecret ambuſh in diuers places, to intercept them if it were poſſible. Theſe horſmen lay not ſo couert,but that they were in good time deſcried by Scanderbeg and his followers (who with Argus eies, pried into euery buſh and thicket as they went) before he was altogether fallen into their danger: and yet but ſo that he came to handy ſtroks,where Scanderbeg and his followers oppreſſed with multitude,were glad to fly as faſt as they could into the next wood,the Turks horſmen following them at the heels.

It fortuned that as they were flying,a great old tree was fallen croſſe the way,which Scanderbeg putting ſpurs to his horſe,leapt ouer with one of his men after him; the other foure not able to get ouer, turned backe vpon the Turks, and there fighting were ſlaine. One of the Turks which ſo hardly purſued Scanderbeg being wel mounted,forced his horſe to leape the tree,and I ſtill followed after Scanderbeg: who looking backe and ſeeing bnt one, turned vpon him and ſlew him: the other Turks hauing ſlaine foure of Scanderbegs men which could not get ouer the tree,returned. And Scanderbeg accompanied but with one of his followers, came backe againe to his campe;and there with all ſpeed put his army in readineſſe to go againſt Balabanus before the comming of his companion, with the other part of his army. Vpon which reſolution,after he had with cheerfull perſuaſions encouraged his ſouldiers, and filled their minds with hope of victory, he ſet forward, and came with great ſpeed vnto the valley of Valchaal where Balabanus lay. Scanderbeg had diuided his army into foure ſquadrons; whereof Tanuſius had the leading of one, Zacharias Groppa of another, the third was committed to Peieus Emanuel,and Scanderbeg himſelfe conducted the fourth. So ſetting forward, he ſent before certaine K companies of harquebuſiers, and archers, to prouoke the enemy and to draw him forth vnto battel. Balabanus alſo ſhewed himſelf with his army in ſeemly order before his tents,but there ſtood faſt and would not ſtir,expecting continually the comming of his fellow. Which Scanderbeg perceiuing, and that he ſought but to dally out the time, and as one vnwilling to fight had againe retired his army into the ſafety of his trenches; drew neerer and neerer vnto him, continually skirmiſhing with ſuch as he ſent out,daring him to the field,& brauing him vnto his trenches,in ſuch ſort,as if he would haue forced the ſame,and by ſtrong hand haue ſet him out thence: wherat the Turks fretted and chafed exceedingly, inſomuch that they were ready to riſe againſt their Generall,becauſe he would not lead them forth to battell,but ſuffer them to be ſo diſgraced. Balabanus mindfull of that he had promiſed to Mahomet his great lord and L maſter, did what he might to haue deferred time; but when he ſaw that his fellow came not, and that he could no longer delay the matter;being ſo continually aſſailed & braued by Scanderbegs ſouldiers, that his Turks therewith prouoked, were ready oftentimes to haue iſſued out without his direction,and now no remedy but that he muſt needs fight, placed his men in good order, and ſo went out of his trenches to giue battell, himſelfe leading the left wing thereof:where betwixt him and Scanderbeg was made a fierce fight, many falling on both ſides.
But Scanderbeg ſtrengthned with the old gariſon of Croia,and the moſt expert ſoldiers of Dibra, preuailed vpon the Turks & forced them to giue ground,yet ſtill keeping their order. The fight was ſo great in this part of the battell,that in other places they ſtood almoſt ſtill as lookers on,expecting the doubtful fortune of their Generals:which thing Scanderbeg perceiuing, M drew certaine troups out of the right wing, whereas he ſaw was leaſt danger, which ſpeedily fetching a compaſſe about, charged the ſide of the enemies army; and againe withdrawing themſelues, and with wonderfull celerity wheeling about, ſet vpon the backe of them that fought in the left wing: ſo that the Turks there fiercely charged both before and behind, by

A them of Scanderbeg his army, fell in other places with a great ſlaughter. Balabanus with exceeding courage gainſtood his enemies, ſo long as there was any hope left: but when he ſaw the fortune of Scanderbeg to preuaile, and all about him to become deſperat, he made ſhift for himſelfe, and fled out of the battell as faſt as he could. The reſt of the army being in other places before troubled and diſordred, fled alſo, ſome one way, ſome another, euery man as his fortune led him. Some few that followed Balabanus eſcaped: the reſt were for moſt part either ſlaine or taken priſoners.

Scanderbeg had ſcarcely well breathed himſelfe after this victory, and diuided the ſpoyle amongſt his ſouldiers, but that newes was brought to him in Poſt from the lady Mamiza his ſiſter, then lying at Petrella, That Iacuppe Arnauth was by the way of Belgrade come into Epi- B rus with an army of ſixteene thouſand horſemen, burning and deſtroying the country before him, and then lay incamped in the plaines of Tyranna the leſſe. When Scanderbeg to proue the minds of his ſouldiers, had cheerefully imparted vnto them ſuch newes, as was like to be the beginning of new labour and perill; they were therewith nothing diſmaied, but ready to follow him with ſuch cheerefulneſſe of countenance and mind, as if they ſhould haue gone to ſome great feaſt or banquet; reckoning of them, but as of the remnant of a diſcomfited army. This cheerefulneſſe of his ſouldiers, Scanderbeg tooke as an aſſured token of his good ſucceſſe; and hauing all things in readineſſe, preſently ſet forward, and in ſhort time came to the place where the enemy lay. Iacuppe hearing of his comming, remoued his campe into a corner of the plaine Tyranna, neere vnto a little hill, as a place of more ſafety for his army to lie in. C Scanderbeg hauing taken the Plaine, incamped his army in the ſame place from whence Iacuppe was but a little before departed, where he reſted one whole day. The next morning, to terrifie his enemies (who as yet had not heard of the ouerthrow of Balabanus) he cauſed diuers of the Turks heads which were ſlaine in the late battell (which he had brought for that purpoſe) to be caſt before the trenches of the enemy; and withall, diuers of them which were taken priſoners, to be ſhowne: which Iacuppe beholding, in great deſpaire ſaid, I ſee the euill hap of Mahomet. Immediatly after, Scanderbeg ſent forth 500 horſemen to skirmiſh with the Turks, commanding them, ſo ſoone as they were charged by the enemies to retire, if haply they might ſo be drawne into battell. Which fell out accordingly: for Iacuppe now ſeeing his fellow was not to be looked for, and willing alſo without further delay to try his fortune, came D readily into the field, and began a fierce battell: which endured not long; for Scanderbeg perceiuing in what part of the army Iacuppe was, bent his greateſt force that way, and ſingling him out, with his owne hand ſlew him. Wherewith the Turks being diſcouraged, forthwith betooke themſelues to flight, and in flying, were for moſt part ſlaine or taken. Thoſe which eſcaped the preſent fury of the ſword, ſtragling thorow the country by thicke woods and blind waies, were by the country people either ſlaine or taken priſoners. In theſe two battels were ſlaine of the Turks 24000, and 6000 taken. And of Scanderbeg his men were loſt about a thouſand. Scanderbeg and his ſoldiers were ſo weary of the ſlaughter of the Turks, that when it was told him the next day, That Balabanus was fled but with one cornet of horſemen, and might eaſily be ſurpriſed if he were well purſued; he ſaid, O let ſome of our enemies liue to report E their owne ſlaughter, and our victory. After that Scanderbeg had in this ſort vanquiſhed theſe great captaines, he preſently entred into the frontiers of the Turks dominions, and roaming vp and downe at his pleaſure without reſiſtance, made hauocke of all that came in his way: and after returning to Croia with victory, brake vp his army, and gaue his ſoldiers leaue to depart euery man to his owne dwelling.

1465 Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Mahomet had with great rewards procured two Turks to vndertake to kill Scanderbeg. Theſe traitors came vnto Scanderbeg as fugitiues, making ſuch ſhew of the deteſtation both of Mahomet his tyrannicall gouernment, and vaine ſuperſtition, that they were both of Scanderbeg and others, reputed to be indeed the men, they deſired to be accounted: and ſo after they had learned the principles of the Chriſtian religion, were by F their owne deſire baptiſed. But treaſon againſt Princes whom God hath in his moſt mighty protection, cannot be long couered; much leſſe, without his great ſufferance performed. So fortuned it, that theſe two falſe diſſembling traitors, expecting nothing but opportunity to performe their diueliſh deuice, vpon ſome occaſion fell at variance betwixt themſelues, and in their heat let ſome ſuch words fall, as being taken vp by ſome there preſent, drew them both into ſuſpition: and thereupon being ſtreitly examined, it was at laſt by them confeſſed, That they were ſent by Mahomet, of purpoſe to haue ſlaine Scanderbeg: for which their treaſon they were both preſently executed; as they had right well deſerued. When Mahomet vnderſtood that Balabanus was ouercome, Iacup ſlaine, and both their armies almoſt quite deſtroyed, he after his impatient manner fell into a great rage, and became as a man almoſt franticke: and afterwards calling together his great Baſſa's, reſolued by their aduice, not to ſend any more Generals againſt Scanderbeg, but to go himſelfe in perſon, with ſuch an army as ſhould at once make an end of his wars in Epirus for euer. Hereupon commiſſions were directed thorow all his kingdome, and an army raiſed of two hundred thouſand men. Whereof Scanderbeg hauing certaine aduertiſements, fortified all his cities and ſtrong holds, eſpecially the city of Croia; vpon the fortune whereof depended the whole ſtate of his kingdome. Into this city he put a ſtrong garriſon of his moſt valiant and faithfull ſoldiers, and thorowly furniſht the ſame with all things neceſſary for the enduring of a long ſiege: and left one Balthazar Perduci (a graue and worthy captaine) Gouernour thereof. With like care he prouided for the ſafety of his other cities, and tooke order that the country people were either receiued into the ſtrong towns, or elſe conueied into other places of refuge, and left nothing abroad in the country for the Turks to prey vpon; as he had in like caſe done long before, at the comming of old Amurath to the ſiege of Croia, as is before in his life declared.

By that time that Scanderbeg had ſet all things in order, his old friend Balabanus with fourescore thouſand horſemen (the forerunners of Mahomet his army) was entred into Epirus, and ranging ouer the country two daies, came and ſate downe before Croia: vpon whom the Gouernor at his firſt comming made many braue ſallies. In few daies after came Mahomet with his huge army, and there incamped alſo: who at his firſt comming ſummoned the city, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto him, vpon ſuch vnreaſonable conditions as it pleaſed himſelfe, (as the manner of the Turke is:) whereunto the worthy Gouernor returned him no other anſwer, than by continuall thundring ſhot into his campe. Whereupon Mahomet cauſed ſuch ordnance as he had to be planted for battery; and commanded other new to be caſt, of ſuch mettall as he had for that purpoſe brought in maſſe: all which, he did rather to ſtrike a terrour into the minds of the defendants, than for any great hope he had of taking the city by force: knowing by his owne experience, that it was a place almoſt impregnable. Whileſt Mahomet was thus buſied, and little or nothing preuailed, Scanderbeg lying abroad in the woods and mountains, with a ſmall army of moſt valiant and couragious ſoldiers, continually cut off the forragers of Mahomets army, and ſuch as brought in victuall or neceſſaries for his campe: and many times in the night ſuddenly brake into one quarter or other of the Turks great campe, with great ſlaughter, and with continuall alarmes neuer ſuffered them to reſt in quiet. Mahomet ſeeing his army to decreaſe dayly, and no hope of winning the city but by famine, which would require a long ſiege: and fearing alſo to make that ſame place againe famous by ſome notable miſchance which might happen vnto himſelfe vnder the wals of Croia, as had before vnto his father Amurath; determined to returne himſelfe to Conſtantinople, and to leaue Balabanus with a great part of his army to continue the ſiege. Vpon which determination, he committed the charge and ordering of the whole matter for the continuing of the ſiege, to Balabanus, ioyning vnto him eight of his moſt expert captaines; yet ſo, as that they ſhould be all at Balabanus his command. And ſo leauing with him three and twenty thouſand of his beſt ſouldiers, and with euery one of the other eight Captaines ſeuen thouſand mo, departed himſelfe with the reſt of his army from Croia, towards Conſtantinople. But by the way as he went he tooke from Scanderbeg certaine ſmall forts, and with faire promiſes corrupting the Gouernor of a place called Chidna, wherein eight thouſand of Scanderbeg his ſoldiers lay, had the ſame deliuered into his power, vpon his faith before giuen, That all the ſoldiers with the reſt of the people ſhould in ſafety depart thence. But after the tyrant had them in his power, without regard of faith or promiſe, he cauſed them all moſt cruelly to be cut in pieces, ſparing neither man, woman, nor child, to the great griefe and weakning of Scanderbeg, who had not at any time before receiued ſo great a loſſe. And after he had ſo raged, he in great melancholy returned vnto Conſtantinople.

Scanderbeg diſdaining to haue his chiefe city beſieged by Balabanus, (ſometime one of the baſeſt of his fathers ſubiects) and yet finding himſelfe vnable to relieue the ſame, for as much

A as the ſouldiers were with continuall wars ſore waſted, and his wary enemies lay ſo encamped, as that they were not but by a ſtrong army to be remoued, ſent vnto the Venetians and other the confederat princes of Albania,Illyria,and Dalmatia,praying of them aid now at his need againſt that enemy,which preuailing againſt him,would forthwith ſet vpon them. All which princes promiſed forthwith to ſend their ſuccours. At the ſame time alſo he paſſed ouer into Italy ſecretly,and diſguiſed in ſimple attire,came to Rome, to craue aid of Paulus the ſecond of that name,then great Biſhop: by whom he was honourably entertained, but obtained nothing of that he came for; ſo cold was his deuotion: onely at his departure he gaue vnto Innetrio, Scanderbeg his treaſurer,a poore almes of three thouſand duckats. —

Scanderbeg returning into Epirus, found all ſuch aid ready as was promiſed from the confederat B Princes,but eſpecially from the Venetians,which was for moſt part drawne out of their garriſons of Scutari, Driuaſto, Alyſſa, and Dirrachium: ſo that he had in few daies in his army thirteene thouſand foure hundred choice ſouldiers. With this ſtrength he marched towards Croia: but vnderſtanding by the way,that Ionima was within a daies journy, comming with a new ſupply to his brother Balabanus, he drew out certaine troups of his beſt horſemen; and coaſting ouer the country in the night,ſuddenly came vpon the Turks, and put them to flight: where amongſt others, Ionima himſelfe, with his ſonne Hedar, were taken priſoners; whom he ſhewed the next day in bonds to Balabanus. This exploit ſo happily performed, he with all ſpeed returned to his army: and ſo marching to Croia, by plaine force draue the Turks from the mountaine Cruina, their greateſt ſtrength, and neereſt to the city of Croia.
C Which thing when Balabanus ſaw, he with certaine troups of horſemen rid euen to the gates of the city, perſuading the defendants to yeeld the city, making them in the name of his maſter ſuch offers and promiſes as he thought might moſt moue them. But they nothing regarding his words, but rather inſenced with his preſumption, ſallied out vpon him, and inforced him to retire:but he therewith enraged,and halfe mad for anger,came vpon them with a freſh charge, thinking by plaine force to haue driuen them backe into the city. In which skirmiſh he was by one Georgius Alexius,with a bullet, ſhot quite thorow the throat; and feeling himſelfe mortally wounded,ſetting ſpurres to his horſe,ran as faſt as he could to his campe, where he preſently fell downe from his horſe and died. The Turks diſcouraged with the death of their General,& the comming of Scanderbeg,roſe the ſame night, & with great ſilence retired D themſelues vnto the plain of Tiranna,about eight miles from Croia.Scanderbeg the next morning entring the forſaken tents of the Turks,found therin great ſtore of corne and other victuals; which he cauſed to be forthwith conueied into the city, & in triumph followed after himſelfe, to the great joy and comfort of his late beſieged ſubjects: whom he highly commended for their fidelity, and bountifully rewarded according to their deſerts. The ſame day he ſent certaine companies of ſouldiers to take the ſtreit paſſages whereby the Turks muſt needs paſſe in their returne out of Epirus; which when the Turks vnderſtood, they ſent two meſſengers to Scanderbeg (who ſeemed to be men of good account in the army) offering in the name of the reſt of the captaines and commanders, to deliuer vnto him their horſes and armes, ſo that they might in ſafety depart with their liues. Which their requeſt Scanderbeg propounding E to his counſellors & captains, was by them diuerſly diſgeſted. In concluſion they receiued this anſwer from Scanderbeg himſelfe, That as they came into his country, without his commandment,ſo ſhould they not by his leaue depart thence. The Turks receiuing this ſhort anſwer by their meſſengers, & conſidering that they muſt needs in that bare country in ſhort time periſh, either with famin or with the ſword; the ſame night departed from Tiranna, and in the dead time of the night entring the aforeſaid ſtreits,by plain force deſperatly brake thorow and eſcaped, but not without their great loſſe: for whoſe eſcape the common ſouldiers murmured grieuouſly againſt Scanderbeg,and were not without much ado appeaſed. In ſhort time after,Scanderbeg recouered all ſuch places as Mahomet had before taken from him,and put to ſword the ſoldiers he had left for the keeping of the ſame; which done,he brake vp his army, F retaining only two thouſand horſmen & a thouſand foot for the defence of his frontiers.

Scanderbeg ſurpriſeth Ionima the brother of Balabanus, and Hedar his ſonne.

The Turkiſh tyrant hearing of the euil ſucceſſe of his affaires in Epirus,as that his Generall 1466 was ſlaine, Croia relieued,his army diſcomfited,and all that he had done, brought to nought; fretted thereat exceedingly,and was therewith ſo much grieued,that he could not for a ſeaſon eat or drink,or take reſt,his diſcontented thoughts ſo much troubled him. In the end,to remedy the matter, he reſolued the next Spring to go again in perſon himſelfe with a moſt puiſſant G army into Epirus; and ſo if it were poſſible, to make a full conqueſt thereof: of which his purpoſe Scanderbeg vnderſtanding, prouided for his comming, as he had in former time. The Spring being come, Mahomet according to his former reſolution, with a mighty army entred into Epirus, and there with exceeding labour and charge, firſt repaired or rather re-edified the old ruines of the city of Valmes, wherein he left a ſtrong garriſon, of purpoſe to trouble that part of the country. From thence he marched to Dirrachium (now called Durazzo, but of old time Epidamnum) a city vpon the ſea coaſt; then in the poſſeſſion of the Venetians, famous for many things in the time of the Roman Empire, but eſpecially for the flight of the Roman Se-nat thither, and their entertainment there in the time of the ciuil wars betwixt Caſar and Pom- peius. This city Mahomet thought to haue taken vnprouided, & ſo vpon the ſudden to haue car- H ried it; but was therein much deceiued, finding it ſtrongly fortified and manned both by the Venetians and Scanderbeg. Where when he had there ſpent ſome time, and to his great loſſe in vain attempted the city, he riſe vpon the ſudden: and retiring into Epirus, came and ſat down againe before Croia, of purpoſe by his ſudden comming to haue terrified the citizens: and vainly perſuaded, that he had left Scanderbeg in Dirrachium, for that in the aſſailing therof he had diſcouered many of Scanderbegs men, and thereby ſuppoſed him to haue been there alſo; the greateſt cauſe why he ſo ſuddenly riſe and came to Croia. At his firſt comming he offered great rewards and large priuiledges vnto the citiſens, if they would forthwith yeeld vp their city; otherwiſe he threatned vnto them all the calamities of warre, vowing neuer to depart thence before he had it: whereunto he receiued no other anſwer out of the city than was ſent I him by the mouth of the cannon, or brought him by many moſt braue ſallies. Scanderbeg in the mean while continually moleſting his campe, and euery night falling into one quarter or another thereof. Mahomet taught by experience, to what ſmall purpoſe it would be for him to lie there long, riſe with his army, and marched againe to the ſea ſide, to a place now called the head of Redon vpon the gulfe of Venice, not far from Dirrachium, where Scanderbeg had begun to build a new city called Chiurill, not yet finiſhed: which Mahomet in deſpight of the man, raſed downe to the ground. After that, hearing that many of the Epirots were retired into the mountaines, he went to ſeeke them out, and was with great loſſe by thoſe mountaine people repulſed: Scanderbeg ſtill following them at the heeles, and awaiting all opportunities, dayly cut off part of his army. So that at laſt the tyrant deſpairing of any good to be done in that K expedition, was glad to depart out of Epirus, hauing atchieued nothing worth his comming, and ſo, full of diſcontentment and melancholy returned vnto Conſtantinople.

After all theſe great troubles, Scanderbeg rid ouer moſt part of Epirus, to view the ſtate of his kingdome, and ſo at laſt came to Lyſſa (a city of the Venetians, which he had alwaies ſpecially liked) there to confer with the Venetian legat and other the confederat princes, of matters concerning their ſtate in generall, as his manner was: but more particularly, how they might take the city of Valmes, which Mahomet had the laſt yere built in the ſeignory of Ary- annites Comynat, and much troubled that part of Epirus. But whileſt he lay there, he fel ſicke of a feauer, which daily ſo increaſed vpon him, that he became ſicke euen vnto death: and now perceiuing his end to draw nigh, ſent for his wife and ſon, with the princes and lords his confe- L derats, & the embaſſadors of the Venetians, into his bedchamber. Where after he had at large with greater pain notably diſcourſed of his troubleſome life led among them, than he had before paſſed the ſame, and carefully forewarned them of the dangers like to enſue, he earneſtly exhorted them to continue in vnity & concord, and valiantly to ſtand in defence of their religion, country, and liberty. And afterwards turning his ſpeech to his wife and his ſon, commended them both with his kingdome to the tuition of the Venetians: who by the articles of the confederation betwixt him and them, were in honor bound to protect his ſon and kingdome, during the time of his minority, and afterwards peaceably to place him in the ſame. In fine, he willed his wife after his death to paſſe ouer with her ſonne into Apulia, where they might in ſafety and quiet liue vpon ſuch poſſeſſions as he there held by the gift of King Ferdinand. And M ſo after he had with moſt feruent praier commended his ſoule into the hands of Almighty The death of Scanderbeg.

God, departed in peace the 17 day of Ianuary, in the yeare of our Lord 1466, when he had liued about 63 yeares, and thereof reigned about 24. His death was worthily lamented of all Chriſtian Princes, but eſpecially of the Venetians and Princes of Albania, who had now loſt their

A their moſt carefull watchman and inuincible champion: the ſorrow of his ſubjects is not to be expreſſed, euery man bewailing him, as the only ſtay of the common-weale, and as if with him they had loſt all their hope. His dead body was with the generall lamentation of all men roially buried in the cathedrall church of S. Nicholas at Lyſſa: where it reſted in peace, vntill that about nine yeares after, the Turks comming to the ſiege of Scodra, by the way tooke the city of Lyſſa, and there with great deuotion digged vp his bones, reckoning it in ſome part of their happineſſe, if they might but ſee or touch the ſame: and ſuch as could get any part thereof, were it neuer ſo little, cauſed the ſame to be ſet, ſome in ſiluer, ſome in gold, to hang about their necks, or weare vpon their bodies; perſuading themſelues by the wearing thereof to be partakers of ſuch good ſortune and hap as had Scanderbeg himſelfe whileſt he liued:
B which is not vnaptly by Gabriel Fairnus of Cremona, thus in verſe expreſſed.

Scanderbeg buried at Lyſſa.

The body of Scanderbeg digged vp by the Turkes, and of them greatly honoured.

Turcarum clades, Othomanni nominis horror, Epiri tutela, illo jacuere ſepulchro:
Quo quondam inuicti cubuerunt oſſa Georgi.
Nunc & membra viri, & diſſectum in fruſtra ſepulchrum Interijt, ſparſi manes, conciſa vaguntur Oſſa, nec in gelida nunc ſaltem morte quieſcunt.

Namque vt is aſſertum toties cum laude paternum Imperium, exacta moriens ætate reliquit : Illicet immanes tenuerunt omnia Turcæ.
Tum clari Herois venerati nobile buſtum,

Sic quæ alijs tumulum virtus parat, abſtulit illi : Atque eadem diro venerandum præbuit hoſti.

In Engliſh thus :

The bloudy bane of faithleſſe Turks, and terrour of that name, Epirus ſtrong defence and guard, lay buried there with fame :
Within that tombe wherein long ſince, Great Caſtriotus lay ;
But now thoſe limbes and tombe defac'd, are carried quite away.
The remnants of that worthy wight out of his graue were torne ;
And being dead, could find no reſt, but were for Iewels worne.
For after he, farre ſpent with age, gaue place to fatall doome, And left his fathers kingdome, got and kept with great renowne ; Forthwith the cruell Turks preuail'd, and all things there poſſeſt :
Who worſhipping his ſtately tombe, and place of quiet reſt, Dig'd vp his bones, and brake the tombe wherein he did remaine :
And glad was he that could thereof ſome little part obtaine.
As if in them ſome martiall force, or vertue great had beene :
Or fortune rare, ſuch as before in him was liuing ſeene.
So vertue, which to others giues a ſepulture and graue, Bereft it him, yet for'ſt his foe in honour it to haue.

Mathias King of Hungary, taketh the kingdome of Boſna from the Turks.

Moſt part of the times of thoſe wars betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, the Venetians by ſea and the Hungarians by land, kept the Turks ſtrongly buſied. Mathias Coruinus King of Hungary (according to his promiſe made vnto the Venetians) entered in the kindome of Boſna, I where by force he ouerthrew the ſtrong forts which the Turks had built for the defence of their frontiers, and manfully draue them out before him vntill he came to Iaziga (of ſome called Iaitze) the chiefe city of Boſna, which he at length tooke : and following the courſe of his victory, ſcarcely ſuffered the Turks to breath, vntill he had by force wreſted all that kingdome out of their hands. Wherewith Mahomet being exceedingly grieued, in great fury came with a ſtrong army into Boſna, and laid hard ſiege to Iaziga, which was by the Chriſtians right valiantly defended, vntill Mathias with a puiſſant army came to the reliefe thereof : who ſo troubled the Turks campe with continuall skirmiſhes on the one ſide, and they of the towne with deſperat ſallies on the other ; that at length the proud Turke was driuen to ſuch extremity, that he was glad ſecretly to ſteale away by night with all his army into Seruia; and L for haſt to leaue behind him both his tents and great ordnance, which (the Turks Hiſtories report) he cauſed to be caſt into the riuer, becauſe it ſhould not come into the hands of the Chriſtians. Mathias after he had thus valiantly put to flight his enemies, & relieued the city, followed the Turks into Seruia, and tooke part of that country alſo, which together with Boſna he vnited to the kingdome of Hungary. In theſe warres, Mahomet had ſuch proofe of the force and power of Mathias and the Hungarians, that for a good while after he had no great ſtomacke to prouoke them farther : for why, the name of Mathias was now become vnto the Turks no leſſe dreadfull, than was ſometime the name of his father the valiant Huniades.

The Venetians at the ſame time alſo with their gallies ſcoured the ſeas, & landing their men ſometime in one place, ſometime in another, did great harme in many places of the Turks dominion neere vnto the ſea coaſt. M Amongſt other their Generals at diuers times ſent from that ſtate, one Nicholas Canalis ſucceeding Lauretanus (whom we haue before ſpoken of) as ſoone as he had receiued his charge, came with his fleet into the bay of Salonichi, and landing his men, burnt diuers townes and villages alongſt the ſea ſide : And afterwards returning into Peloponeſus, A poneſus, he fortified the towne of Legoſticium in the gulfe of Patras; which worke the Turks with their often skirmiſhes laboured to haue hindred, but in deſpight of all they could do, it was brought to perfection, and a ſtrong garriſon therein left for the defence thereof; which done, he returned againe to Eubœa. Shortly after, he with the ſame fleet put to ſea againe; and ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Macedonia and Thracia, ſurpriſed the city of Ænus which ſtandeth vpon the mouth of the riuer Meritza, called in antient time Hebrus, vpon which riuer the femous city Hadrianople, and Philippopolis are alſo ſcituate. Canalis after he had taken the ſpoyle of the City, returned to his Gallies, carrying away with him two thouſand captiues into Eubœa. At the ſame time alſo, the Venetians giuing aid vnto Nicholas Duchaine againſt his brother Alexius, then at variance for the principality of Zadrima, neere vnto the B riuer of Drino in Epirus, gaue a great ouerthrow to the Turks which came in the quarrell of Alexius.

1470 Mahomet not a little offended with the harmes done vnto him by the Venetians, and perceiuing that the Iſland of Eubœa (now called Nigroponte) was for the commodious ſcituation and ſtrength thereof, the chiefe place from whence they wrought him all theſe wrongs, and whither they afterwards retired againe, as vnto a moſt ſure place of refuge; determined with himſelfe at once to be euen with them for all, and to imploy his whole forces both by ſea and land for the gaining of that place. This Iſland of Eubœa is about an hundred miles in length, and lieth ouer againſt that part of Græcia which was of old called Bæotia, from whence it is ſeparated with a narrow ſtreit of the ſea: it aboundeth with corne, wine, oyle, fruit, and wood C fit for ſhipping. The chiefe city therof, was in antient time called Chalcide, and of latter time Nigroponte, by which name alſo the whole Iſland was knowne: albeit the Turks now call it, Egribos; a populous, rich, and ſtrong city; ſo fortified with wals and Bulwarkes, that (in moſt mens jugements) it ſeemed a place impregnable. Vnto this ſtrong city, Mahomet reſolued to lay ſiege; knowing well, that vpon the fortune thereof depended the ſtate of the whole Iſland. Wherfore he aſſembled a mighty army, and made great preparation both by ſea and land: and when all things were in readineſſe, ſent Mahomet (the great Baſſa of the court) with a fleet of three hundred gallies, and certaine other ſmall veſſels well furniſhed with ſouldiers, mariners, and all things neceſſary by ſea into Eubœa: and with a great army marched himſelfe by land through Achaia, vntill he came ouer againſt the city of Chalcis. The Venetian Admirall hearing D of the comming of the Turks fleet, ſet forward to haue met them neere vnto the ſtreits of Helleſpontus: but after he had by his eſpials deſcried the great number of the enemies fleet, finding himſelfe too weak, ſhaped his courſe to the Iſland of Sciros. The Baſſa comming out of the ſtreits of Helleſpontus, couered the ſea with his fleet, & holding on his intended courſe, without let came to Eubœa: where at the firſt landing, he tooke Stora and Baſilicon, two ſmal townes, which he raſed to the ground, and from thence went directly to Chalcis. As ſoone as this great fleet was there arriued, Mahomet cauſed a great bridge to be made of his ſmaller veſſels ouer the ſtreit betwixt Achaia and Eubœa: whereby he paſſed all his army, and ſo belaied the city round both by ſea and land. And after he had planted his battery, began moſt furiouſly to ſhake the wals: wherein he had in ſhort time made faire breaches, and the ſooner, for E that one Thomas of Liburnia (chiefe canonier of the city) before corrupted by the Turks, by ſignes agreed vpon, gaue them certaine knowledge in what places the wals were weakeſt: whereby they ſo aptly planted their battery, as if they had taken view on the inſide of the wals. Which foule treaſon was at length perceiued, and the traitor therefore worthily executed. Yet little preuailed the tyrant thereby; for ſuch was the induſtry of the defendants, that whatſoeuer he had by the fury of his great ordnance beat downe by day, that, they with reſtleſſe labor repaired again by night. Thus was the ſiege continued thirty daies, in which ſpace many a ſharpe aſſault was giuen by the Turks, to their great loſſe; and the city ſtill valiantly defended by the Chriſtians. At length the Venetian Admiral (to the great comfort of the beſieged) came with his fleet within view of the city, making ſemblant as if he would haue giuen F the Turks battell. Whereupon it is reported, that Mahomet was about to haue raiſed his ſiege, and haue got himſelfe ouer into the maine, for feare the Venetians ſhould with their gallies haue broken the bridge, and ſo haue ſhut him vp into that Iſland: which thing it was thought the Admiral might haue done to his great praiſe, if he would as a couragious chiefetaine haue aduentured the matter, as he was earneſtly requeſted by the captaines of euery priuate gally; Chalcis the chiefe city of Eubœa beſieged by the Turks.

Treaſon in the city.

who generally grieued to ſee him ſo great a commander, to let ſlip ſo faire an opportunity. But he fearing to come any neerer, came to an anchor and moued not, neither gaue any ſigne of comfort or reliefe to the beſieged. Which thing the Turkiſh King quickly perceiuing, and therewith encouraged: hauing now in diuers places beaten downe the wals, and made them ſaultable, brought on his men to the breaches, promiſing them the ſpoile of the city, with many other great rewards and high preferments according to their particular deſerts, whereof he ſaid, he would himſelfe be an eie-witnes. Hereupon the Turks gaue a moſt fierce and furious aſſault; which the defendants with inuincible courage receiued, and made ſuch ſlaughter of them, that the ditches were filled, & the breaches made vp with the bodies of the dead Turks. But ſuch was the number of that populous army (the greateſt ſtrength of the Turks) that the liuing little felt the loſſe of the dead: Mahomet continually ſending in new ſupplies of freſh men, in ſtead of them that were ſlaine or wounded: ſo that one could no ſooner fall, but two or three ſtept vp in his roome, and ſo ſucceſſiuely, as if new men had ſprung out of the bodies of the dead. Twiſe they had euen won the breaches, and were both times with wonderfull ſlaughter beaten out againe. This deadly and dreadfull aſſault was maintained a whole day and a night without intermiſſion. At length the defendants being for the moſt part ſlaine or wounded, and the reſt wearied with long fight, and vnable to defend the towne now aſſaulted almoſt round, retired from the breaches into the market place, and there like reſolute men, ſold their liues at a deere price vnto the Turks. Amongſt the ſlaine Chriſtians, were found the dead bodies of many notable women, who ſeeing the ruine of the city, choſe rather to die with their friends in defence thereof, than aliue to fall into the hands of their barbarous enemies.

Chalcis taken by the Turks.

Mahomet being now become Lord of the city, and hauing loſt forty thouſand of his Turks in that ſiege, in reuenge thereof cauſed all the men that were found in the city aliue, to be put to moſt cruell death, eſpecially the Italians, vpon whom he ſhewed his tyranny with moſt exquiſit and horrible torments. Paulus Ericus Gouernor of the city, with a few others, who with him were fled into the caſtle, without reſiſtance deliuered the ſame vnto him, vpon his faithfull promiſe, that they might in ſafety depart: but after that he had got them into his power, the perfidious tyrant without regard, commanded them all to be cruelly murthered. The Gouernors daughter a maiden of incomparable beauty, was amongſt the reſt taken priſoner, and for her rare perfection, by them that tooke her preſented to Mahomet as the mirror of beauty: The barbarous tyrant greedy of ſo faire a prey, ſought firſt by flattering words and faire perſuaſion, to induce her to conſent to his deſire: but when he could not ſo preuaile, he fell into another vaine, and began to ſhew himſelfe in his owne nature, threatning her with death, torture, and force, worſe than death it ſelfe, if ſhe would not otherwiſe yeeld vnto his appetite. Whereunto the conſtant virgin (worthy eternall fame) anſwered ſo reſolutely, and ſo contrary to the tyrants expectation, that he being therewith enraged, commanded her to be preſently ſlaine. The horrible and monſtrous cruelty, with the filthy outrages by that beaſtly and barbarous people committed, at the taking of that city, paſſeth all credit. Chalcis thus won, the reſt of that fruitfull Iſland without further reſiſtance yeelded vnto the Turkiſh ſlauery, vnder which it yet groaneth. This calamity happened vnto the Venetian ſtate, or rather (to ſay truly) to the generall hurt of the Chriſtian common-weale, in the yeare of our redemption, 1470.

The fruitfull Iſland of Eubœa taken by the Turks.

Canalis the Venetian Admirall, who all the time of the ſiege, had in the ſight of the City lien at anchor as a looker on, fearing now that the city was loſt, to be ſet vpon by the Turks fleet, hoiſed ſaile, and laded with diſhonour returned in haſte vnto Venice, where he was by the commandement of the Senat committed to priſon, and afterward with all his family exiled to Vtinum.

Shortly after, when Mahomet was departed with his army out of Eubœa, and his fleet returned to Conſtantinople: the Venetians with their gallies, attempted to haue vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed the city, a little before loſt. But Mahomet had therein left ſo ſtrong a garriſon, that when the Venetians had landed their men, they were againe enforced to retire to their gallies, and to forſake their Iſland.

Chalcis thus loſt, with all the Iſland of Eubœa, the Venetians choſe Petrus Mocenicus, a valiant and diſcreet gentleman, Admirall of their fleet, in ſtead of Canalis: and by their embaſſadours ſolicited Sixtus the fourth of that name, then Biſhop of Rome, and Ferdinand King

A of Naples, with Lewis king of Cyprus, and the grand maſter of the Rhodes, to joyne their forces together with theirs againſt the great and common enemy: which thing all the aforeſaid Chriſtian princes promiſed them to do. And the more to intangle the Turke, they at the ſame time ſent Caterinus Zenus their Embaſſadour with rich preſents vnto Alymbeius Vſun-Caſſanes, the great king of Perſia, to incite him on that ſide againſt the Turke: in which negotiation Zenus ſo well behaued himſelfe, that the next yeare following, that great king tooke vp armes againſt Mahomet, and had with him mortall wars, as ſhall be in conuenient place hereafter declared.
Mahomet not ignorant of the proceedings of the Venetians, and that they did what they might to ſtir vp as many enemies as they could, and to bring him (if it were poſſible) into hatred with the whole world: and well knowing how much he had offended the minds of the B Chriſtian princes with the cruelty he had of late vſed againſt them of Chalcis, thought it not beſt as then further to prouoke them, and ſo happily to bring all at once about his eares; but for a ſeaſon to lie ſtill at Conſtantinople, as if he had been deſirous now to liue in peace, not meaning further harme: hoping thereby, that although he concluded no peace with any of them (which indeed he was not deſirous of) yet that tract of time might mittigat the hanousnes of the fact, and coole the heat of their diſpleaſure; whereby it came to paſſe as he wiſhed; that nothing worth the ſpeaking of was that yere attempted againſt him: and becauſe the Perſian king was the man of whom he ſtood moſt in doubt, he ſought by his Embaſſadors to pacifie him, and to withdraw him from the league of the Chriſtians: requeſting him, if it were for nothing els but for the community of the Mahometan religion, wherein they well agreed, C and were thereby the profeſſed enemies of the Chriſtians, to withdraw his hand, and in their cauſe to ceaſe to take vp armes: vrging now (for that it ſo ſtood with his purpoſe) the zeale of religion, whereas otherwiſe he regarded (as was thought) no religion at all. But Zenus the Venetian Embaſſadour lying continually in the Perſian court, ſo wrought the matter with Vſun-Caſſanes, that he told the Turks Embaſſador plainly, That he could not nor would not longer endure the manifeſt injury and wrong done vnto him by the Turkiſh King: and farther, that he had made a faithfull league with the Chriſtian Princes, and therefore would to the vttermoſt of his power make it knowne vnto the world, that he would effectually performe what thing ſoeuer he had promiſed: and ſo diſmiſſed them, now no leſſe diſcontented than were before the Perſian Embaſſadours at ſuch time as they returned from the Turks court, hauing D obtained nothing they then requeſted concerning the Emperour of Trapezond.

The Venetians aided by King Ferdinand, the Biſhop of Rome, and the great maſter of the Rhodes, doe the Turks great harme all alongſt the coaſt of the leſſer Aſia.

The yeare following, Mocenicus the Venetian Admirall with his fleet arriued in the Iſle of Lesbos, where he did great harme. From thence he paſſed the bay of Adramittium into the leſſer Aſia, and ſore ſpoiled the country about Pergamus. After that he landed again at Cnidus vpon the coaſt of Caria, where he tooke a great booty: and ſo hauing done the Turks exceeding much hrme in Aſia all alongſt the ſea coaſt oppoſite to Græcia, he returned laden with ſpoile towards Peloponeſus. In his returne about the promontory of Malea, vpon the coaſt of Peloponeſns, he met with Richaienſis comming vnto him with 17 gallies from King Ferdinand: by whom he was certified, that the great Biſhops fleet was ready to come forth alſo. After mutual gratulation, as the maner at ſea is, the Admirals joyning their fleets in one, E landed at Methone, now called Modon, then a city of the Venetians in Peloponeſus: where after they had well refreſhed their ſoldiers, and taken in freſh victuals, they put to ſea againe; and ſailing through the Iſlands, landed in Aſia, where they were at their firſt landing encountered by the country Turks, whom at laſt they put to flight, and by the ſpace of foure daies tooke what pillage they could in the country: where the ſouldiers found great ſtore of rich booty, eſpecially of Turky carpets, which are there made in great abundance. From thence they ſailed to Halicarnaſus, which is part of Caria (where ſometime ſtood the ſtately tombe which Queene Artemeſia built for her husband Mauſolus, accounted amongſt the wonders of the world) where they tooke a wonderfull ſpoile. There came vnto them Nicholas Biſhop of Modruſſa, with twenty gallies ſent from the great Biſhop: whom the other two Generals F welcomed with great joy. At the ſame time alſo came thither two gallies from the great maſter of the Rhodes. With this fleet of eighty fiue gallies, they ſailed to the Iſle of Samos ouer againſt Epheſus (ſometime a place of great fame, but then altogether deſolate and vnpeopled) there to conſult for their further proceedings in thoſe warres. Looſing from Samos, they tooke their courſe alongſt the ſea coaſt of Aſia, and landed at Attalia, the chiefe city of Pamphilia, a place of great traffique: where they found in the ſubburbs of the city great G ſtore of many rich commodities, brought thither out of Ægypt and Syria; whereof they took what pleaſed them, and burnt the reſt together with the ſubburbs. Vnto the city it ſelfe they began to lay ſiege, but perceiuing that it was not without great loſſe of their men to be taken, they departed thence: and running all alongſt the coaſt of Pamphilia, burnt and deſtroied what came in their way, and ſo returned backe againe to Rhodes: where they met an Embaſſadour from Vſun-Caſſanes the Perſian King, to the Biſhop and the Venetians, for great ordnance; whereof that ſo mighty a Prince was altogether vnfurniſhed. Of this Embaſſadour they vnderſtood that Vſun-Coſſanes was entered into league with the Chriſtian Princes, and now buſie in making preparation againſt the Turke. At which time Mahomet requited the Venetians with no leſſe harme in Epirus and Dalmatia, than they had done to him in Aſia: for now that H Scanderbeg was dead, the Turks mightily preuailed vpon the weake Princes of Epirus and Albania, with the countries adjoyning. The Chriſtian fleet departing from the Rhodes, landed in the countty of Myndians, a part of Caria, and with great ſpoile returned to the Iſland of Naxos, one of the Cyclades: from whence King Ferdinand his gallies returned home, laded with much rich ſpoile: for now the yeare was far ſpent. Yet after the departure of the Kings gallies, Mocenicus with the Legat returned backe again into Aſia, and there landing their men tooke the famous city of Smyrna in Ionia, and when they had taken the ſpoile thereof, ſet it on fire. At which time alſo they did great harme about Claxomene, not farre from Smyrna. So Winter drawing now faſt on, they returned, laded with the rich ſpoiles of Aſia; the Legat into Italy, and Mocenicus into Methone. I

Mahomet no leſſe troubleſom vnto the Mahometane Princes than to the Chriſtians.

The inſatiable deſire of Soueraignty, whereunto the Turkiſh King was naturally inclined, had continually armed him, not onely againſt the Chriſtian Princes, but againſt others alſo euen of their owne ſuperſtition: making no great difference betwixt the one and the other, if ſo he might extend his dominion. He had long before vnder the pretence of a friendly parley craftily circumuented the King of Myſia, a country in Aſia, and hauing got him within his danger, cruelly put him to death, and by force ſubdued his kingdome, left not one of the kings bloud aliue. After that, he inuaded Cilicia, which the Turks call Caramania, where the two young brethren, Pyramet and Caſſambet reigned, and draue them both out of Cilicia: of whom Pyramet the elder, fled for refuge to Vſun-Caſſanes; Caſſambet the younger aſſiſted by his old friends, ſought by force of armes to recouer againe his inheritance wrongfully by the Turks K poſſeſſed, and was beſieging certaine townes vpon the ſea coaſt, which being taken from the Turks would eaſily draw all the reſt of the kingdome after them. Mocenicus the Venetian Admirall being now with the firſt of the Spring come vpon the coaſt of Cilicia, at the requeſt of Caſſambet, landed certaine companies of his men vnder the leading of Victor Superantius, and certaine pieces of great artillery, wherewith he ſo battered the wals of Sichinum, that he enforced the Turks therein to yeeld vp the city: which he deliuered to Caſſambet. In like maner he tooke the city of Corycus, which he alſo reſtored to Caſſambet. At laſt he laied ſiege to Seleucia, which ſtandeth vpon the riuer Orontes, and was built by King Seleucus, one of the ſucceſſors of Alexander the Great, diſtant from the ſea about fiue miles: the Gouernor of this city diſcouraged with the ſight of the great artillery, deliuered the city to the Venetian captaine, L who by the appointment of the Admirall reſtored the ſame to Caſſambet. Who by this means brought againe into his kingdome, gaue great thanks vnto the Admirall, promiſing both for himſelfe and for his brother to be alwaies friends vnto the Venetians. Mocenicus departing from Cilicia, landed his men in Lycia, and harried that country alongſt the ſea coaſt. And this Mocenicus ſailed into Cyprus, to appeaſe a great inſurrection there raiſed againſt the Queene, who was by her huſband at his death left to the protection of the Venetians: which rebellion when he had well quieted, hearing that Triadanus Grittus, was by the decree of the Senat appointed Admirall, and already come into Peloponeſus, he with as much ſpeed as he could haſted thither, to giue vp his charge, and ſo to returne home againe to Venice.

About this time the great Perſian King Vſun Caſſanes began to make war vpon the Turkiſh M emperor Mahomet, for the better vnderſtanding whereof, it ſhall not be from our purpoſe briefly to ſhew by what means this Vſun-Caſſanes of a ſmall Prince aſpired to the kingdome of Perſia, and ſo in ſhort time grew to that greatneſſe, that he was juſtly accounted amongſt the greateſt monarchs of the world then liuing; as appeareth by theſe warres betwixt him and the great

A Turkiſh Emperour Mahomet. This Vſun-Caſſanes of whom we now ſpeake, was the ſonne of that Tachretin, who with other poore Princes was driuen into exile by the violence of Bajazet the firſt, great grandfather to this Mahomet the Great, Emperour of the Turks, and was againe reſtored by great Tamerlane, as is before declared in the life of Bajazet. By the death of Tachretin, his ſon Vſun-Caſſanes (of ſome called alſo Aſymbeius) obtained that ſmall territory, which his father had in Armenia: nothing anſwering vnto the greatneſſe of his conceits. Wherefore not contented with ſuch poſſeſſions as was from his father deſcended vnto him, hee began to ſhoulder for more roome, with ſuch weake Princes his neighbors as he thought he might beſt deale withall; wringing one prouince from this Prince, another from that, and thruſting ſome others quite out of all that they had: and in ſhort time ſo inlarged his dominion, that he had B got into his hands a great part of Armenia, and was reputed both for a mighty and fortunate Prince. Inſomuch that Calo Ioannes, then Emperor of Trapezond (whoſe power altogether anſwered not to the greatnes of his ſtile, being for moſt part ſhut vp within the bounds of Pontus, and fearing the greatneſſe of the Turkiſh Emperour Mahomet, whoſe name began then to grow dreadfull vnto his neighbor Princes) gaue to him his onely daughter Deſpina in marriage, by ſuch allyance to ſtrengthen himſelf againſt the Turkiſh tyrant, if need ſhould require.
At which marriage it was agreed, That Vſun-Caſſanes ſhould in the right of his wife enioy all the kingdome of Pontus, after the death of Calo Ioannes her father, and of David his brother: and that Deſpina ſhould ſo long as ſhe liued haue the free exerciſe of her Chriſtian Religion.
By this woman, Vſun Caſſanes had a daughter called Martha, whom I willingly remember, for C that ſhe was the mother of Hyſmael, afterwards the great king of Perſia, commonly called Hyſmael the Sophy; of whom more ſhall be ſaid hereafter in the life of Selymus. Vſun-Caſſanes honoured with this marriage, and ſtrengthened with this new allyance, ceaſed not, after his wonted manner, dayly to incroch vpon his neighbor Princes: and proceeded ſo far, that at length he began to lay hand vpon a part of Armenia, which was then part of the Dominion of the Perſian King. ZenZa (whom ſome call Ztokies, which was indeed the name of his father) reigning then in Perſia, by his Embaſſadors admoniſhed, and in ſort commanded Vſun-Caſſanes to hold himſelfe content with his owne, or at leaſt, with that he had alreadie wrongfully taken from others, & not to preſume to come within the bounds of his dominion, threatning otherwiſe to take him as an enemy to his ſtate, and to turne his forces vpon him. With which em-D baſſage Vſun-Caſſanes being much offended, gaue the embaſſadors no entertainment, but commanded them with ſpeed to get them out of his Kingdome, and to tell their Maſter, That he would ſhortly himſelfe in perſon come and debate the matter with him face to face. With which proud anſwer from ſo meane a Prince the Perſian King moued, leuied ſuch an army for the inuading of him, as was thought to haue been ſufficient to haue ſubdued a farre greater Prince: and ſo appointed, ſet forward toward Armenia. Vſun-Caſſanes much inferiour to this great King in wealth, and number of men, but not in haughtines of minde, and valiantnes of courage, ſtayd not to expect the comming of ſo puiſſant an enemy, but full of hope ſet forward to meet him, and by great journies ſought to come vpon him before he could haue any knowledge of his comming: yet had he then in his army ſcarcely one man to ten, but al armed E with couragious hearts, & conducted by a moſt fortunat chieftaine which feared nothing. So holding on his way, at length he met with the great army of the Perſians, with whom he preſently ioined battell: and after a long and cruell fight ouerthrew them in the plaine field, with ſuch a ſlaughter as might well haue weakned the forces of a right great kingdome. The great king more inraged then diſcouraged with his ouerthrow, raiſed a far greater army than before the very ſtrength of his kingdome: reſoluing now, not to ſend any more his lieutenants, but to go in perſon himſelfe againſt ſo deſperat an enemy. All things being in readineſſe, he ſet forward, and at length met with the Armenian Prince, whom he found as ready to giue battell as he was at the firſt. So being both deſirous to try their fortune, they ioyned battel; wherein the Perſians were againe diſcomfited and put to flight; and moe of them ſlain in that battell, than F were brought into the field in the firſt army. ZenZes the Perſian king was there ſlain with Vſun Caſſanes his owne hand, & Cariaſaphus his ſon taken priſoner: whom the Armenian prince vſed with the greateſt honor could be deuiſed, giuing vnto him the honor and title due to the Perſian king, taking to himſelfe the bare name of the protector of the Perſian ſtate: which he did onely to pleaſe the Perſians, and to keep them quiet vntill he had got ſome more aſſured poſſeſſion of that kingdome. But after he had in the two former battels broken their greateſt ſtrength, and then vnder the colour of a peaceable gouernor got into his power the regall city of Tauris, with the reſt of the cities & ſtrong places of that great kingdome, and that all men had him now in great reuerence and admiration for his great vertues; he ſecretly diſpatched out of the way the poore titular King his priſoner, (the laſt of the poſterity of the mighty Tamerlane) and tooke vpon himſelfe the higheſt place, which admitteth no partner. Whileſt this reſtles Prince was thus tumbling in the world, and not yet well ſetled in his new gotten kingdom, Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperor, no leſſe ambitious than himſelfe, had ſcornfully reiected the Embaſſadors and Preſents which Vſun-Caſſanes had ſent; and hauing ſhamefully put to death Dauid the Emperor of Trapezond, his allyance, had conuerted all the kingdom of Pontus (which Vſun-Caſſanes of right claimed as his wifes dowry) into the form of a prouince, and ſo vnited it vnto the Turkiſh empire. Which ſo manifeſt a wrong, Vſun-Caſſanes in the newnes of his ſo late atchieued greatneſſe, durſt not aduenture to addreſſe: but after that he was ſurely ſeated, and had with the courſe of time ouercome all dangers at home, being dayly prickt forward with the remembrance of the former iniuries (ſtill ſuggeſted by the importunity of his wife Deſpina, and the ſolicitation of the Venetians, to whom he had by ſolemn promiſe bound himſelfe) he determined now to take the matter in hand, and to try his forces vpon his proud enemy the Turkiſh Emperour. Hereupon he raiſed a great army, and being well appointed of all things neceſſary, paſſing through Armenia toward Pontus, neere vnto the riuer Euphrates was encountred by Muſtapha (Mahomets eldeſt ſon, a yong Prince of great hope) and Amurath the great Baſſa of Romania, whom Mahomet (fearing ſuch a matter) had ſent before with a ſtrong army out of Europe, to ioine with ſuch forces as Muſtapha had already raiſed in Aſia, ſo to withſtand the inuaſion of the Perſian. Theſe two great Commanders Muſtapha & Amurath ioyning battell with Vſun-Caſſanes, were by him in the plain field ouerthrown; where Amurath the great Baſſa himſelfe, with thirty thouſand Turks were ſlain; Muſtapha with the reſt of the army by ſhamefull flight ſauing themſelues.

Now when Mahomet vnderſtood that Amurath was ſlaine, and his army diſcomfited, he was therewith exceedingly troubled: but purpoſing to be thereof reuenged, gaue order into all parts of his dominions for the leuying of his new forces; ſo that at the time by him appointed, was aſſembled a great and mighty army of 320000 men. Vſun-Caſſanes in like maner was in the field with an army, nothing in number inferior vnto his enemy. Theſe two Mahometan Kings, drawing after them their huge armies, met together neer the mountaines of Armenia, where at the firſt encounter, one of the Turks great Baſſa's was ſlaine, with 40000 Turks: with which hard beginning the proud tyrant was ſo daunted, that he could hardly be perſuaded to proue his fortune any further, but contenting himſelfe with that loſſe, was about to haue retired; and had vndoubtedly ſo don, if ſome of his moſt expert and valiant captains which might be bold with him, had not ſharply reproued him, that hauing ſo populous an army as ſcarcely felt that ſmall loſſe, he ſhould once thinke of returning without victory. With which their comfortable perſuaſions he was againe encouraged to giue battell. Yet for his more ſafetie he withdrew his army into a ſtreit betwixt two mountaines, and with his carriages fortified the front thereof, as with a trench: behind which carriages he placed his great ordnance, and on the either ſide his archers. The Perſians, as men of great valour, and thereto encouraged with their former victories, came on as men fearing no perill, to haue charged the Turks euen in their ſtrength; preſenting their whole army before they were aware, into the mouth of the Turks Artillery; which ſuddenly diſcharged amongſt the thickeſt of them, brake their ranks, and tooke away a number of them. Beſides that, the Perſian horſes terrified with the vnacquainting and thundring report of the great ordnance, were not to be ruled by their riders, but ſtarting back, ran ſome one way, ſome another, as if they had felt neither bit nor rider. Which their confuſion Mahomet perceiuing, preſently tooke hold of the occaſion offred, and with his horſmen fiercely charged them, being now by themſelues intangled and out of order. Neuertheleſſe the Perſians made great reſiſtance, and ſlew many of the Turks: but ſtill fighting confuſedly and out of order, they were at the laſt inforced to fly: in which flight a great number of them were ſlaine, and their tents alſo taken. Zeinal, Vſun Caſſanes his eldeſt ſonne, labouring to ſtay the flight of the Perſians, was ſlaine with a ſmall ſhot. So the honour of the day remained with the Turks: yet had they no great cauſe to brag of their winnings, hauing

A loſt in that battell forty thouſand ſouldiers:whereas of the Perſians fell not aboue ten thouſand. Mahomet containing himſelfe with this deare bought victory,returned homewards : and Vſun-Caſſanes leauing another of his ſons with his army for the defence of Armenia,returned likewiſe to Tauris. But whilſt the Chriſtian Princes were in their greateſt expectation,what might be the euent of theſe wars betwixt theſe two mighty Mahometan kings,they vpon the ſudden concluded a peace, and confirmed the ſame with new affinity, excluding the Chriſtians quite out of the ſame. This laſt battell betwixt Mahomet and Vſun Caſſanes, was fought in the yeare of our Lord 1474. about foure yeres before the death of Vſun-Caſſanes,who died the fifth of Ianuary, in the yeare 1478.

In the time of theſe wars died the noble Muſtapha, Mahomet his eldeſt ſonne,at Iconium,hauing ſpent himſelf with reuelling among his paragons;or as ſome write, commanded to die, B by his father,vpon this occaſion. This youthfull Prince vpon a time comming to the court to ſee his father(or as they terme it, to kiſſe his hand)became amorous of the wife of Achmetes Baſſa,a Lady of incomparable beauty, and daughter to Iſaac Baſſa,the chiefe man in the Turkiſh empire,next vnto Mahomet himſelfe: but finding no means to compaſſe her in whom his ſoule liued,he awaited a time when as ſhe (after the manner of the Turks) went to bathe her ſelfe,and there as he found her all diſroabed, ſhamefully forced her, without regard either of his own honor,or of hers. Of this ſo foule an outrage, Achmets her huſband, with his cloathes and hat all rent for madnes, came and grieuouſly complained to Mahomet,crauing vengeance for the ſame. Vnto whom Mahomet againe replyed, Art not thou thy ſelfe my ſlaue ? and if my ſon C Muſtapha haue knowne thy wife, is ſhe not my bondſlaue he hath to doe withall ? Ceaſe therefore thus to complaine,and hold thy ſelfe therewith content. Neuertheleſſe he in ſecret ſharply reproued his ſon for ſo hainous and diſhonorable a fact by him committed,and commanded him to goe out of his ſight : and as he was of a ſeuere nature, cauſed him within a few dayes after to be ſecretly ſtrangled. Neuertheleſſe,the wrong done to the Baſſa, ſunke ſo deep into his haughty mind,as that he would neuer admit excuſe therfore,but put away his wife, the ground of the implacable hatred betwixt him and the great Baſſa Iſaac his father in law,and in fine, the very cauſe of his vtter deſtruction,as is afterward declared in the life of Bajazet.

Mahomet deliuered of his greateſt feare, by the peace he had lately concluded with Vſun-Caſſanes the Perſian king,was now at good leiſure to imploy all his forces againſt the Chriſtians. D And bearing a deadly hatred againſt the Princes of Epirus and Albania,with a wonderfull deſire to extend his empire vpon the Ionian & Adriatick, that he might from thence but look toward Italy,which he began now to long after,he determined with himſelfe firſt to ſubdue thoſe countries, as ſtanding in his way, both for the inuaſion of Italy, and of the territories of the Venetians. And foraſmuch as the ſtrong city of Scodra(otherwiſe called Scutary) then in the poſſeſſion of the Venetians,for the commodious ſcituation therof ſeemed to giue him the beſt entrance into the countries of Albania, Epirus, Dalmatia, and to ſuch cities as the Venetians held alongſt the ſea coaſt, he reſolued there to begin his wars.

This city was of great ſtrength,as well for the naturall ſcituation thereof, as for the ſtrong fortifications therin made by the hand of man:which thing Mahomet was not ignorant of,but E preſuming of his owne ſtrength and power, vainly perſuaded himſelfe, that no place was now able long to hold out againſt him. Wherefore hauing prepared all things fit for the beſieging thereof,he ſent Solyman Baſſa an Eunuch(whom he made his lieutenant generall in Europe,in the place of Amurath Baſſa,before ſlain by Vſun-Caſſanes) with 80000 ſoldiers to beſiege Scodra. This great Baſſa according to his charge came,and with great pomp incamped round about the city,the fiue and twentieth of May. Shortly after hauing planted his battery,he began moſt furiouſly to ſhake the wals, and ceaſed not by all meanes he could deuiſe, to trouble the defendants:and when he had by force of the cannon don what he could, gaue diuers ſharp aſſaults vnto the City, but was ſtill with great loſſe valiantly repulſed by them of the City. Long it were to declare, how often,and in what terrible manner that warlike Baſſa Mahomet, F his chiefe captaine,attempted to haue woon the city : as alſo to ſhew how they of Scodra, directed by their worthy Gouernor Antonius Lauretanus,valiantly defended themſelues and their City : nothing was omitted that the enemy could do or deuiſe for the gaining thereof, but all his deuices and attempts were ſo met withal by the defendants,that they ſerued him to no other purpoſe but to the deſtruction of his people. ſeſſion of that kingdome. But after he had in the two former battels broken their greateſt ſtrength,and then vnder the colour of a peaceable gouernor got into his power the regall city of Tauris,with the reſt of the cities & ſtrong places of that great kingdome,and that all men had him now in great reuerence and admiration for his great vertues ; he ſecretly diſpatched out of the way the poore titular King his priſoner,(the laſt of the poſterity of the mighty Tamerlane) and tooke vpon himſelfe the higheſt place,which admitteth no partner. Whileſt this reſtles Prince was thus tumbling in the world, and not yet well ſetled in his new gotten kingdom,Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperor,no leſſe ambitious than himſelfe,had ſcornfully reiected the Embaſſadors and Preſents which Vſun-Caſſanes had ſent ; and hauing ſhamefully put to death Dauid the Emperor of Trapezond,his allyance, had conuerted all the kingdom of Pontus(which Vſun-Caſſanes of right claimed as his wiues dowry) into the form of a prouince,and ſo vnited it vnto the Turkiſh empire. Which ſo manifeſt a wrong,Vſun-Caſſanes in the newnes of his ſo late atchieued greatneſſe,durſt not aduenture to addreſſe:but after that he was ſurely ſeated,and had with the courſe of time ouercome all dangers at home,being dayly prickt forward with the remembrance of the former iniuries (ſtill ſuggeſted by the importunity of his wife Deſpina,and the ſolicitation of the Venetians,to whom he had by ſolemn promiſe bound himſelfe)he determined now to take the matter in hand, and to try his forces vpon his proud enemy the Turkiſh Emperour. Hereupon he raiſed a great army,and being well appointed of all things neceſſary,paſſing through Armenia toward Pontus,neere vnto the riuer Euphrates was encountred by Muſtapha(Mahomets eldeſt ſon,a yong Prince of great hope)and Amurath the great Baſſa of Romania, whom Mahomet (fearing ſuch a matter) had ſent before with a ſtrong army out of Europe,to ioine with ſuch forces as Muſtapha had already raiſed in Aſia,ſo to withſtand the inuaſion of the Perſian. Theſe two great Commanders Muſtapha & Amurath ioyning battell with Vſun-Caſſanes,were by him in the plain field ouerthrown;where Amurath the great Baſſa himſelfe,with thirty thouſand Turks were ſlain;Muſtapha with the reſt of the army by ſhamefull flight ſauing themſelues.

Now when Mahomet vnderſtood that Amurath was ſlaine,and his army diſcomfited,he was therewith exceedingly troubled: but purpoſing to be thereof reuenged, gaue order into all parts of his dominions for the leuying of his new forces ; ſo that at the time by him appointed,was aſſembled a great and mighty army of 320000 men.Vſun-Caſſanes in like maner was in the field with an army,nothing in number inferior vnto his enemy. Theſe two Mahometan Kings,drawing after them their huge armies, met together neer the mountaines of Armenia, where at the firſt encounter,one of the Turks great Baſſa's was ſlaine,with 40000 Turks:with which hard beginning the proud tyrant was ſo daunted, that he could hardly be perſuaded to proue his fortune any further,but contenting himſelfe with that loſſe,was about to haue retired,and had vndoubtedly ſo don,if ſome of his moſt expert and valiant captains which might be bold with him,had not ſharply reproued him,that hauing ſo populous an army as ſcarcely felt that ſmall loſſe, he ſhould once thinke of returning without victory. With which their comfortable perſuaſions he was againe encouraged to giue battell. Yet for his more ſafetie he withdrew his army into a ſtreit betwixt two mountaines, and with his carriages fortified the front thereof, as with a trench: behind which carriages he placed his great ordnance, and on the either ſide his archers. The Perſians, as men of great valour, and thereto encouraged with their former victories,came on as men fearing no perill,to haue charged the Turks euen in their ſtrength ; preſenting their whole army before they were aware,into the mouth of the Turks Artillery;which ſuddenly diſcharged amongſt the thickeſt of them,brake their ranks, and tooke away a number of them. Beſides that, the Perſian horſes terrified with the vnacquainting and thundring report of the great ordnance,were not to be ruled by their riders,but ſtarting back,ran ſome one way,ſome another,as if they had felt neither bit nor rider. Which their confuſion Mahomet perceiuing,preſently tooke hold of the occaſion offred,and with his horſmen fiercely charged them,being now by themſelues intangled and out of order. Neuertheleſſe the Perſians made great reſiſtance, and ſlew many of the Turks: but ſtill fighting confuſedly and out of order,they were at the laſt inforced to fly:in which flight a great number of them were ſlaine, and their tents alſo taken. Zeinal, Vſun Caſſanes his eldeſt ſonne, labouring to ſtay the flight of the Perſians, was ſlaine with a ſmall ſhot. So the honour of the day remained with the Turks: yet had they no great cauſe to brag of their winnings, hauing loſt in that battell forty thouſand ſouldiers: whereas of the Perſians fell not aboue ten thouſand. Mahomet containing himſelfe with this deare bought victory, returned homewards: and Vſun-Caſſanes leauing another of his ſons with his army for the defence of Armenia, returned likewiſe to Tauris. But whilſt the Chriſtian Princes were in their greateſt expectation, what might be the euent of theſe wars betwixt theſe two mighty Mahometan kings, they vpon the ſudden concluded a peace, and confirmed the ſame with new affinity, excluding the Chriſtians quite out of the ſame. This laſt battell betwixt Mahomet and Vſun Caſſanes, was fought in the yeare of our Lord 1474. about foure yeres before the death of Vſun-Caſſanes, who died the fifth of Ianuary, in the yeare 1478.

In the time of theſe wars died the noble Muſtapha, Mahomet his eldeſt ſonne, at Iconium, hauing ſpent himſelf with reuelling among his paragons; or as ſome write, commanded to die, by his father, vpon this occaſion. This youthfull Prince vpon a time comming to the court to ſee his father (or as they terme it, to kiſſe his hand) became amorous of the wife of Achmetes Baſſa, a Lady of incomparable beauty, and daughter to Iſaac Baſſa, the chiefe man in the Turkiſh empire, next vnto Mahomet himſelfe: but finding no means to compaſſe her in whom his ſoule liued, he awaited a time when as ſhe (after the manner of the Turks) went to bathe her ſelfe, and there as he found her all diſroabed, ſhamefully forced her, without regard either of his own honor, or of hers. Of this ſo foule an outrage, Achmets her husband, with his cloathes and hat all rent for madnes, came and grieuouſly complained to Mahomet, crauing vengeance for the ſame. Vnto whom Mahomet againe replyed, Art not thou thy ſelfe my ſlaue ?. and if my ſon Muſtapha haue knowne thy wife, is ſhe not my bondſlaue he hath to doe withall ? Ceaſe therefore thus to complaine, and hold thy ſelfe therewith content. Neuertheleſſe he in ſecret ſharply reproued his ſon for ſo hainous and diſhonorable a fact by him committed, and commanded him to goe out of his ſight: and as he was of a ſeuere nature, cauſed him within a few dayes after to be ſecretly ſtrangled. Neuertheleſſe, the wrong done to the Baſſa, ſunke ſo deep into his haughty mind, as that he would neuer admit excuſe therfore, but put away his wife, the ground of the implacable hatred betwixt him and the great Baſſa Iſaac his father in law; and in fine, the very cauſe of his vtter deſtruction, as is afterward declared in the life of Bajazet.

Mahomet deliuered of his greateſt feare, by the peace he had lately concluded with Vſun-Caſſanes the Perſian king, was now at good leiſure to imploy all his forces againſt the Chriſtians. And bearing a deadly hatred againſt the Princes of Epirus and Albania, with a wonderfull deſire to extend his empire vpon the Ionian & Adriatick, that he might from thence but look toward Italy, which he began now to long after, he determined with himſelfe firſt to ſubdue thoſe countries, as ſtanding in his way, both for the inuaſion of Italy, and of the territories of the Venetians. And foraſmuch as the ſtrong city of Scodra (otherwiſe called Scutary) then in the poſſeſſion of the Venetians, for the commodious ſcituation thereof ſeemed to giue him the beſt entrance into the countries of Albania, Epirus, Dalmatia, and to ſuch cities as the Venetians held alongſt the ſea coaſt, he reſolued there to begin his wars.

This city was of great ſtrength, as well for the naturall ſcituation thereof, as for the ſtrong fortifications therin made by the hand of man: which thing Mahomet was not ignorant of, but preſuming of his owne ſtrength and power, vainly perſuaded himſelfe, that no place was now able long to hold out againſt him. Wherefore hauing prepared all things fit for the beſieging thereof, he ſent Solyman Baſſa an Eunuch (whom he made his lieutenant generall in Europe, in the place of Amurath Baſſa, before ſlain by Vſun-Caſſanes) with 80000 ſoldiers to beſiege Scodra. This great Baſſa according to his charge came, and with great pomp incamped round about the city, the fiue and twentieth of May. Shortly after hauing planted his battery, he began moſt furiouſly to ſhake the wals, and ceaſed not by all meanes he could deuiſe, to trouble the defendants: and when he had by force of the cannon don what he could, gaue diuers ſharp aſſaults vnto the City, but was ſtill with great loſſe valiantly repulſed by them of the City. Long it were to declare, how often, and in what terrible manner that warlike Baſſa Mahomet, his chiefe captaine, attempted to haue woon the city: as alſo to ſhew how they of Scodra, directed by their worthy Gouernor Antonius Lauretanus, valiantly defended themſelues and their City: nothing was omitted that the enemy could do or deuiſe for the gaining thereof; but all his deuices and attempts were ſo met withal by the defendants, that they ſerued him to no other purpoſe but to the deſtruction of his people. Whileſt the Baſſa thus lay at the ſiege of

Scodra, Mocenicus hauing receiued ſuch commandment from the Senat, came and ioined himſelfe to Grittus the new Admirall, who then lay with his fleet in the mouth of Boliana, a great riuer running out of the lake whereupon the city of Scodra ſtandeth. Theſe two great Commanders being met together, were both as one man, and with a wonderfull conſent did what they might for the furtherance of the common good, a thing not common: firſt they put ſtrong garriſons, with all things neceſſary, into Colchinum, Lyſſa, Dirrhachium, and other cities of their ſeigniory vpon the ſea coaſt. After that, they went vp the riuer Boliana with certain gallies, and came within ſight of Scodra, and there by fires in the night, and other tokens of comfort, encouraged the defendants, as with an aſſured promiſe of reliefe: which thing it grieued the Turks to behold, who therfore went about to haue ſhut in thoſe ſame gallies with a great chaine drawn croſſe the riuer, where it was narroweſt betwixt them and the ſea: but in doing thereof, the Venetians out of their gallies ſlew 500 of the Turks, and wounded diuers others, and ſo returned again to ſea. It was afterward attempted by the aforeſaid Admirals, if a new ſupply might haue been put into the city: but the enemy had ſo beſet the ſame, that it was not poſſible to be done. In the meane time, Matthias King of Hungary (receiuing a great yerely portion of the Venetians for the defence of their countries againſt the Turke) hearing that Scodra was beſieged, began to make ſuch ſpoyle in the Turks dominions, bordring vpon him, that Mahomet was glad to call home the great Baſſa from the ſiege of Scodra, to defend his own frontiers. So the Baſſa after he had lien three months with his great army at the ſiege, and loſt 14000 of his men, wherof the greateſt part died of ſicknes taken by long lying in the rotten mooriſh ground neere vnto the riuer, by commandment from his Maſter, roſe with his army and departed. The Venetians alſo, which lay all that while thereabout in their gallies, were toucht with the ſame contagion: Triadanus Grittus died thereof, and Mocenicus the other Admirall fell thereof dangerouſly ſicke, but being ſomewhat recouered, returned home, and was ſhortly after for his good ſeruice choſen Duke of Venice, Marcellus the old Duke being then dead. With this diſhonor taken at Scodra Mahomet was ſo diſcontented, that he appointed a yearely fee vnto one, to put him in mind dayly of the ſiege of Scodra.

The ſame yeare that this great Baſſa Solyman had in vain beſieged Scodra, he was afterward ſent with a great army into Valachia, where he was ſo intangled in the woods and fens, by Stephanus the Vayuod, that he loſt all his army, and with much ado eſcaped himſelf, by the wonderfull ſwiftneſſe of a mare whereon he rid.

1476 The yeare following, which was the yeare 1476, Mahomet ſent out a great fleet to ſea, vnder the conduct of Geduces Achmetes, his chiefe counſellor and man of war, (whoſe very name was dreadful in all places where he came) in hope to haue by treaſon ſurpriſed the Iſland of Crete: but that plot was in good time by the Venetians perceiued, the traitors executed, and he of his purpoſe diſappointed. Whereupon he changed his former purpoſe for Crete, and ſent the ſame Achmetes with his fleet into the Euxine (or as the Turks call it, the black ſea) to beſiege the rich city of Caffa. This city was in antient time called Theodoſia, ſcituate in the country of Taurica Cherſoneſus, faſt by the ſea ſide, and had of long time bin in poſſeſſion of the Genowaies, and was a place of exceeding great trade, vntill that this great Emperor Mahomet hauing taken Conſtantinople, and falling out with the Venetians, had by his ſtrong caſtles built vpon the ſtreits of Helleſpontus and Boſphorus, taken away both the traffique of Merchants into thoſe ſeas, and all poſſible meanes for the Genowaies to ſend ſuccor to that city: yet it is credibly reported, That one valiant Captaine vndertooke to carry his companie (in number not aboue one hundred and fifty men) by land from Genoa to Caffa, not much leſſe than two thouſand miles, and worthily performed what he had vndertaken. Achmetes comming thither with his fleet, incloſed the city both by ſea and land: which diuided in it ſelfe by reaſon of the diuers diſpoſition of the Inhabitants, being of diuers Nations, ſome Genowaies, ſome Greeks, ſome Armenians, but moſt Tartars, could not long hold out, but was in ſhort time giuen vp to the Baſſa, vpon condition, That the Genoway Merchants, who were there both in number many, and exceeding rich, might in ſafetie depart thence with their wealth. Which promiſe the Baſſa performed not; but when he was poſſeſſed of the city, ſent ſuch as he thought good, to Conſtantinople, and commanded the reſt vpon paine of death, not to depart thence, or to conuey away from thence any part of their ſubſtance. In ſhort time after, the whole countrey of Taurica Cherſoneſus yeelded vnto the Turkiſh obeiſance. At which time alſo the Tartar Princes, namely the Precopenſes and Deſtenſes, terrified with the greatnes of the Turke, cowardly yeelded themſelues as tributaries vnto him; euer ſince which time they haue liued a moſt ſeruile and troubleſom life, ſubiect to euery command of the Othoman Emperor; for whom they haue done great ſeruice many times in their wars, againſt the Perſians, the Polonians, the Hungarians, Tranſyluanians, and Germanes, as in the proces of this Hiſtory well appeareth; and as the aforeſaid nations their neighbors, with others alſo further off, haue euen of late to their great loſſe felt.

1477 Although the Venetians had in theſe late wars loſt the great and fertile Iſland of Eubœa, with the ſtrong city of Chalcis, the ſureſt harbor for their gallies; yet held they ſtill diuers ſtrong towns and commodious hauens by the ſea coaſt, both within Peloponeſus & without; as Methone, Corone, Tenarus, Naupactum, & others: which ſtanding as it were in the boſom of his empire, Mahomet ſore longed after. And therefore to ſatisfie his ambitious deſire, ſent Solyman (the great Baſſa of Europe) with a ſtrong fleet into Peloponeſus. Who entring the gulfe of Corinth, at his firſt comming layd ſiege to Naupactum, now called Lepanto, a city ſtanding in the gulfe of Corinth, in the countrey of Ozolæ neer vnto Locris, ouer againſt Peloponeſus. Antonius Lauretanus (for his late good ſeruice done in defending of Scodra, made Admiral for the Venetians) came with ſpeed to Naupactum, and in deſpight of the enemy ſo furniſhed the city both with men and whatſoeuer elſe was needfull, that the Baſſa now out of hope to win the city, roſe vpon the ſudden with his army, and in a great fury departed, after he had lien there foure months. In this fret returning towards Conſtantinople, he put certain companies of his men to ſhore in the Iſland of Lemnos, in hope to haue vpon the ſudden surpriſed the City of Coccinum: but as they were about to haue entred, they were contrary to their expectation, manfully reſiſted by ſuch Chriſtians as by chance were next the gate: where the notable courage of Marulla (a maiden of that city) was much commended; who ſeeing her father ſlain in the gate, tooke vp the weapons that lay by him, and like a fierce Amazon notably reuenged his death, deſperatly fighting in defence of her countrey, with thoſe few which were there at the firſt; and ſo kept the Turks out, vntill the reſt of the citiſens (moued with the alarme) came to the gate, and forced them, not without ſome loſſe, to retyre again to their gallies. Not long after, Lauretanus came thither with his fleet: but before his comming, the Baſſa was departed thence for Conſtantinople, hauing in this expedition don nothing that was expected at his hands.

Mahomet after the death of Scanderbeg ceaſed not from time to time by one of his great captains or other to inuade Epirus, and the other parts of Albania; aed ſo gaining ſomtime one part, and ſomtime another, had ſubdued moſt part thereof. And about this time his army lay at the ſiege of Croia: for reliefe wherof, the Venetians (in whoſe protection it was) ſent Franciſcus Contarenus, a noble gentleman, their lieutenant, with ſuch forces as were ſufficient for the raiſing of the ſiege. He finding the Turks in the plaine of Tyranna, gaue them battell; which a great while ſtood doubtful: at length victory inclining to the Venetians, the Turks began to flie; after whom the Venetians made no great purſuit, but contented to haue put them to flight, took their tents, with ſuch forts as they had raiſed againſt the City. Thus whileſt the Venetians thinke themſelues in ſure poſſeſſion of the victory, & out of feare of their enemies, they were through their own too much ſecurity, by and by themſelues ouerthrown: For whilſt the common ſouldiers hauing their minds more ſet vpon the ſpoyle, than vpon the purſuit of the enemy (the battell as yet ſcarce ended) ſcatter themſelues, and the captaines were conſulting, whether they ſhould lodge that night (which began then to approch) in the enemies tents, or not; in the midſt of their conſultation, the Turks hauing perceiued their diſorder, ſuddenly returned againe vpon them, and without great reſiſtance ouerthrew them, and put them to flight. In which flight a thouſand of them fell, amongſt whom Contarenus the Generall, and diuers others of good place and calling, were ſlain alſo. This ouerthrow the Venetians tooke a great deale better than that which ſhortly after followed in the confines of Italy, at the riuer of Sontium.

Mahomet hauing conquered a great part of Albania, and dayly incroaching vpon the Chriſtians, made diuers incurſions into the countries of Dalmatia, Hiſtria, and Carniola; yea, and ſomtimes went ſo far, that he and his Turks entred into the prouince of Friuli, called in antient time, Forum Iulij, a part of the Venetian ſeigniory, and ſo carried away with them many priſoners,with much ſpoyle. For remedy whereof, the Venetians with exceeding charge and wonderful labour fortified alongſt the riuer of Sontium,from Goritia,to the fens of Aquilea, the ſpace of twelue miles,and there built two Forts,wherin they continually kept ſtrong garriſons for the defence of the country. Wherby the countrey people thinking themſelues now in ſafety,began to fall into ſecurity(the dangerous ſicknes of all common weales)neglecting by their carefull watch to foreſee a far off the enemies comming, as they had before vſed. It fortuned at this time, that Aſa-Beg (whom ſome call Marbecke) one of the Turks great Captaines, vpon the ſudden when no ſuch thing was feared, came and ſhewed himſelfe in an euening vpon the further ſide of the riuer Sontium,with 1000 horſmen:vpon the ſight of whom, an alarm was raiſed in both forts,and euery man put himſelfe in readines,as if he ſhould euen preſently haue ioyned battel:but it was ſo nigh night,as that nothing could then be done;yet the Venetian garriſons ioyning themſelues together,watcht all that night in arms. There was at that time in both thoſe forts,3000 horſmen,and ſome few companies of footmen,all vnder the command of Hieronimus Nowel County of Verona:a famous Captaine of that time: who with the reſt of the captains reſolued if they could, to keep the Turks from paſſing the riuer; if not,then to giue them battell. Marbecke, Generall of the Turks army, taking good view of the place, in the night time ſecretly conueyed a thouſand of his beſt ſouldiers ouer the riuer, foure miles off,in ſuch a place as the Venetians feared leſt,deeming it impoſſible for any man, there to haue paſſed ouer. Theſe men he appointed to lie in ambuſh behind a great hill, in ſight,not far from the other ſide of the riuer,& vpon a ſigne giuen,preſently to diſcouer themſelues,and charge the enemy. The next morning very early,he ſent certaine troups of his readieſt horſemen ouer the riuer, which by offring to skirmiſh with the Venetians, might draw them into the field,and then as men in doubt whither to fight or to fly,to tole them on to the place where the ambuſh lay. The Venetians had diuided themſelues into three battalions; whereof the Generall himſelfe had the leading of the firſt, who ſeeing theſe diſordred troups comming to skirmiſh with him,encountred them fiercely, & eaſily put them to flight(being ſo determined before)and in that flight earneſtly purſued them;eſpecially the Counties ſon,a valiant yong gentleman,who with others like himſelfe, thought by that days good ſeruice to gain vnto themſelues great honour. When the Turks General ſaw that the Venetians following the chaſe, were gone a great way from the riuer, he forthwith paſſed ouer with the reſt of his army,and followed the Venetians at the heels:which the Turks which before fled,now beholding,turned again vpon their fierce enemies,and valiantly withſtood them. At which very inſtant the other Turks vpon ſigne giuen ariſing out of ambuſh, came down from the hill Licinis,with ſuch violence and clamour,that the Venetians therewith diſcouraged,would haue fled if they could haue told which way:but they were on euery ſide ſo beſet,that there was no way left for them to eſcape; but were there all ſlaine, except ſome few which yeelded themſelues, and ſo were ſaued. The other two battalions of the Venetians, diſcouraged with the ſlaughter of the firſt,fled incontinently,and in flying were many of them ſlain. In this battell the County himſelfe,with his ſon,and many other notable gentlemen,and halfe the horſmen were loſt. The Turks incouraged with this victory, the next day ſpoyled all the countrey of Friuli,betwixt the riuers of Sontium, (otherwiſe called Liſonzo) and Tiliauentum, and cruelly burnt all the country before them;ſo that at once 100 country villages were to be ſeen on a light fire together, which ſtood ſo thick,that it ſeemed as if one continuall fire had wholly couered all the face of the countrey. The barbarous Turks laden with the ſpoyle of that rich countrey, and driuing before them great numbers of miſerable captiues, as if they had been flocks of ſheep, returned to Sontium. But when they had paſſed the riuer, and had trauelled homeward one days iourney,and all men thought they had now bin quite gon, they ſuddenly returned back again, and poſting through the countrey they had before ſpoyled, came to the riuer of Tiliauentum,which they deſperatly paſſed, and did no leſſe harme on that ſide the riuer,than they had before on the other: and ſo carrying away with them what they pleaſed, returned by the ſame way they came, hauing filled all that part of Italy with terror and feare. This ouerthrow of Sontium the Venetians account among the greateſt loſſes which they receiued from the Turks in all theſe their long wars.

The Turks ſhew themſelues at the riuer of Sontium.

The countrey of Friuli ſpoyled by the Turks.

1478 The next yeare about harueſt the Turks came againe with a far greater power: and paſſing the riuer of Sontium,came before the forts of Gradiſca,where Carolus Fortebrachius lay with a ſtrong

A ſtrong garriſon of the Venetians, offring him skirmiſh, ſo to haue drawne him into the field. But the wary captain conſidering the great ſtrength of the enemy, and the loſſe receiued the yeare before, would not be drawne out of his ſtrength, but ſtood vpon his guard, expecting to take the enemy at ſome more aduantage: which thing the Turks fearing, durſt not diſperſe themſelues abroad for the ſpoyle of the countrey, leauing ſo ſtrong a garriſon of the enemies behind them. And therfore when they had gone about forty miles into the countrey, they turned their courſe vp into the mountaines (which are part of the Alps) towards Germany, and there grieuouſly ſpoyled the mountainy people; ſtrangely paſſing through thoſe abrupt and high mountains with their horſes, where men could hardly either go or ſtand on foot without ſomething to ſtay vpon. And ſo when they had done what harme they could, taking a great compaſſe about, returned home another way.

Vid. Marinum Barletium de expug. Scodrenſi.

B Mahomet remembring the ſhamefull repulſe he had about foure yeres before receiued at Scodra, and hauing the name of that city dayly ſounding in his eares, determined now once again to gage his whole forces vpon the winning thereof, and ſo to giue peace to his ambitious deſires. And becauſe he would not again be diſhonored with that he purpoſed to take in hand he gaue out order into all parts of his dominions, both in Europe & Aſia, for the aſſembling of his beſt ſoldiers and men of war. Now when all things were in readines, and ſuch an army aſſembled as he ſeldome or neuer had a ſtronger; firſt he ſent forth Aly-Beg (Warden of the frontiers of his kingdome alongſt the riuer Danubius) with eighty thouſand of the ſouldiers called Achanzij, towards Scodra. Theſe Achanzij are horſmen, which for their good ſeruice, according to their deſerts, haue certain lands giuen them by the king to liue vpon during their C liues; for which they are of duty bound to ſerue vpon their owne charge, as the forerunners of the Turke his army, whenſoeuer he goeth to beſiege any place: theſe be they which firſt enter into the enemies countrey, burning and ſpoyling what they can, vntill they come to the place appointed: and haue this priuiledge, That ſo ſoon as all the army is come vnto the place to be beſieged, they may then at their pleaſure either depart or ſtay.

The Gouernor of Scodra vnderſtanding both by common fame and certaine intelligence, of the Turks deſignes, with al care & diligence fortified the town, labouring continually both night and day at the rampiers, as if the enemy had bin already preſent; and plentifully prouided all things neceſſary for the induring of a long ſiege. The aged and vnneceſſary people he D ſent out of the city into other places of more ſafety farther off; in whoſe ſtead he took in great numbers of ſtrong and able men which dwelt in the country round about: among whom were many mariners taken out of the gallies, and other men of like quality, which got their liuing vpon the riuer and lake of Scodra, luſty bodies enured to hardneſſe, who in the long ſiege following did great ſeruice.

Whilſt this preparation was making in Scodra, behold, the mountaines a far off Northward from the city, began to ſhine with many great fires, and all the country was couered with thicke ſmoake, which euery houre ſeemed to draw neerer and neerer; when within ſhort time after, the poore country people (which as yet were not all fled) with ſuch traſh as they could wel carry, came running for life all ouer the country to the ſtrong cities vpon the ſea ſide, crying out that the Turks were come. E

The next day, which was the fourteenth of May, Aly-Beg with his eighty thouſand Achanzij, came into the ſuburbs of the city, and there incamped; ſo that none could goe in or out of the gates: which was not the leſt part of his charge. To him, by the commandment of Mahomet, had Scander-Beg gouernor of Boſna, and Malcotius with ſeuen thouſand horſemen ioined themſelues vpon the way. Of this Malcotius it is reported (as was of Auguſtus) that the maieſty of his countenance, with the reſplendant beames iſſuing out of his eyes (as if it had bin the rayes of the Sun) were of ſuch piercing brightnes, that no man was able with immooued and fixed eye long to behold the ſame. Theſe horſmen (the forerunners, as I ſaid, of Mahomets great army) the Chriſtians much troubled, with often ſallies and ſhot, out of the town, and ſlew many of them F with little or no loſſe vnto themſelues.

When Aly-Beg had thus lien before the city ten daies, came Taut Gaiola the great Baſſa of Conſtantinople with fiue and twenty thouſand ſouldiers, and about twelue thouſand camels, for moſt part laden with mettall in maſſe, for to make great Ordnance of, and other neceſſaries for the camp. The Baſſaes great and ſtately Tent of purple colour, was pitched vpon the top of an high hill called the Baſſaes hill, becauſe in that place Solyman Baſſa had lien in the former ſiege about foure yeres before: the Baſſa's army lay incamped betwixt the ſame hil and the towne. This Taut Gaiola was borne in Epirus of baſe parentage, and was from thence by the Turks carried away young to Conſtantinople; where for his ſharpneſſe of wit and rare actiuity, he grew into ſuch fauor, firſt with Mahomet, and afterward with Bajazet his ſonne, that he was by them promoted to the greateſt places of honour, next vnto themſelues: wherein he became ſo popular, & had ſo poſſeſſed the hearts of the people, that it was ſuſpected of ſome he would haue aſpired to the Turkiſh Empire himſelfe. Preſently after the comming of this great Baſſa, workmen were ſet a work about the caſting of the great ordnance, and making readie of other things for the ſiege. The Chriſtians alſo were no leſſe buſie about their fortifications, the Gouernor appointing to euery man his charge, and which part of the wall to defend: yet keeping continually in the market place certain companies (with the enſignes of S. Marke and S. Stephen) to ſerue as freſh ſupplies, as need or occaſion ſhould require. Whilſt the great ordnance was in caſting, the Baſſa cauſed a great bridge of timber to be made ouer the riuer, that ſo he might at his pleaſure paſſe ouer his men, and command both ſides of the riuer. The Chriſtians in the mean time with vigilant eie ſo attending the Turks, that none of them could ſtir within ſhot, but he was forthwith ſet off and ſlaine.

The thirteenth of Iune, Muſtapha the Beglerbeg or Viceroy of Aſia (commonly called the great Baſſa of Natolia) came alſo in great pompe to the ſiege with thirty thouſand ſouldiers brought out of Aſia: perſonable men, but not counted ſo good ſoldiers as they of Europe: for it is a common ſaying among the Turks, That the men of Europe, and the horſes of Aſia do beſt ſeruice. This great Baſſa was honorably met and welcommed by the other great Baſſa of Conſtantinople, and was quartered vpon another ſide of the city, where his rich pauilion (all of Green) was pitcht in a vineyard about a mile from the town. Muſtapha to proue the courage of his ſouldiers, propounded a reward to which ſoeuer of them, as durſt aduenture but to goe and touch the wals of the city: vpon which occaſion, two of his ſoldiers paſſing well mounted, attempted to haue performed that enterpriſe. But making what haſt they could poſſibly, they were both ſlain from the wall, and one of their bodies recouered by certaine valiant ſouldiers which ſallyed out of the towne, and his head being cut off, was vpon a launce ſet vpon the wals for the Turks to behold.

The fifteenth of Iune, 5600 Ianizaries came into the camp, with foure white enſignes: at whoſe comming all the ſouldiers of both the Baſſa's camps gaue a wonderfull ſhout, and welcomed them with great ioy. Theſe are the great Turks guard and beſt ſouldiers, in whom the greateſt ſtrength of his kingdom conſiſteth, and are called the ſons of the great Sultan. After whoſe comming, Mahomet himſelfe was daily expected. Three dayes after, came two other great men, attended vpon with a number of followers, who by their countenance, and the great reuerence done vnto them by the reſt of the Turks, ſeemed to be men of great place and authority: theſe men deſired, that they might with ſafety ſpeake with the Gouernour of the City, and the reſt of the Captaines, to deliuer vnto them ſuch a meſſage, as they had for their good (as they ſaid) brought vnto them from Mahomet. Which their requeſt being granted, the elder of them, after he had with many glorious words ſet forth the power of his Maſter, and what he had done to other great Cities, with their Princes; and further ſhewed into what danger they were like to fall, if they ſhould long ſtand vpon their defence: he began to perſuade them to yeeld vp the City, aſſuring them of all kind vſage, with many rich rewards from the great Emperor; whereas otherwiſe, they were to expect nothing but extreme miſery and moſt ſhameful death. Wherunto anſwer was in the name of them all giuen by the mouth of Petrus Pagnanus, a graue and worthy citiſen, That they were not afraid of the greatneſſe of Mahomet, or of any thing he had done, or could doe: and that he ſhould find it hard to inforce them, but impoſſible to perſuade them to deliuer their city: and therefore that he might at his pleaſure vſe his forces againſt men fully reſolued rather to yeeld vnto nature her laſt due, than to hearken to any compoſition: and in concluſion told them, that if they ſhould at any time after make any ſuch motion, they ſhould not expect any other anſwer than from the mouth of the Canon. With which ſhort anſwer theſe great men departed, not a little diſcontented.

At this ſame time the ſtrong city of Croia (which the worthy Sanderbeg had liuing ſo honorably defended, and dying had left it with his kingdome, in the protection and poſſeſſion of the

A the Venetians) hauing holden out a yeres ſiege, after that all the kingdome of Epirus & moſt part of Albania was loſt, for lack of victuals was yeelded vp vnto the Turke, vpon condition, That the hungerſtarued defendants (who then ſeemed rather ghoſts than men) might at their pleaſure in ſafety depart: which agreement the faithleſſe Turke brake, and without mercy put them all to the ſword. This heauy news was deliuered to them of Scodra, by certain Chriſtians in the Turks camp: wherewith they were much grieued, but nothing at all diſcouraged.

Whiles the Turks thus lay at the ſiege, the watermen, of whom a great number liued vpon the great lake of Scodra (being in circuit about an hundred miles) came many times downe the riuer by night, and did much harme in the Turks camp: for remedy whereof, they were inforced to build certain ſmall gallies to keep them in, who for all that, many times ſtole ſecretly vpon them, and much troubled them.

B The two and twentieth of Iune, the Turks mounted two great peeces of ordnance vpon the top of the hill wheron the Baſſa lay; whereof the one carried a bullet, made of an hard kind of round ſtone, of three hundred pound weight, & the other a bullet of foure hundred, wherwith they began to batter the towne foure daies: after that, they placed a third peece of Artillery at the foot of the ſame hil; which deliuered a bullet of foure hundred pound weight: and the next day they planted a fourth peece, greater than the reſt, about the middle of the ſame hil; which caried a ſhot of ſix hundred and fifty pound weight. In this while, eight thouſand of the Turks ſoldiers, called Aſapi (which are known from the Ianizaries by their red caps, whereas the Ianizaries weare white) came into the camp. And ſhortly after came Mahomet himſelfe with all his army to the riuer of Drimon, whither the two great Baſſaes of Aſia and Conſtantinople C went with great pomp and triumph to meet him.

The ſecond of Iuly, Mahomet with all his army before the riſing of the Sunne came to the campe before Scodra: where after he had well viewed the ſcituation thereof, he is reported to haue ſaid, O what a faire and ſtately place hath the Eagle choſen out for her ſelfe to build her neaſt, and to hatch her young ones in. Diuers rich pauilions were ſet vp for Mahomet himſelfe, but one far greater than the reſt, diſtant from them about a flight ſhot, which was the place wherein he held his councell; the other were for his owne priuat vſe. Round about theſe his tents, lay the Ianizaries incamped, a good diſtance off; yet ſo cloſe one to another, as if it had bin a perpetuall rampire or ſtrong trench, whereinto was but one entrance, continually garded with a moſt D ſtrong guard. Round about the Ianizaries lay all the reſt of the army encamped: ſo that al the countrey as farre as a man could ſee was couered, and white with tents, much like as when the ground in Winter is couered ouer with a deepe ſnow: and ſtill more people reſorted to the campe dayly; ſo that it was deemed by men of great experience, that Mahomet had then in his army of all ſorts of people, about 350000 men, all gaping to deuoure that poor city: a ſight of it ſelfe ſufficient to haue danted the courage of right valiant men: but what can be terrible to them that feare not to die? Againſt this terror of the enemy, the defendants were notably encouraged by the comfortable perſuaſions and exhortations of one Bartholomeus, a Preacher, (ſometimes one of the worthy Scanderbegs ſouldiers) who afterwards giuing himſelfe to the ſtudy of diuinity, became a zealous Preacher, and in this ſiege did notably comfort the Chri- E ſtian defendants againſt the terror of ſo great an army of miſcreants. Al this while the battery was ſtill maintained; and the fifth of Iuly the Turks mounted two other great peeces, wherof the one was like vnto the former before mounted, but the other placed vpon the middle of the Baſſa's mount, was of an incredible greatnes, diſcharging a ſhot of twelue hundred pound weight, and was called the Princes peece, in whoſe name it was with much cunning and induſtry made: with which huge peece, the Turks euen from the beginning of the ſiege had threatned the beſieged, willing them to expect the comming of the Princes peece. The next day they planted vpon the ſame mount a ſeuenth peece, which carried a ſhot of fiue hundred and fifty pound weight: from which time they battered the city with the aforeſaid ſeuen great peeces, and ceaſed not oftentimes by night out of their great mortar peeces, to caſt great bals F of wild fire into the city, ſo to haue ſet it on fire: wherby diuers of the citizens were inforced to vncouer their houſes couered with ſhingle, and by men appointed for that purpoſe, to watch the fall of ſuch fire-workes, and ſo to quench the ſame: which they ſo carefully looked to, as that the deuiſe of the enemy took no effect at all. At the ſame time alſo the Turks out of their ſhort mortar peeces, caſt huge great ſtones of incredible weight, which falling from hie, did moſt terribly cruſh in peeces whatſoeuer thing they light vpon, wherewith the defendants were wonderfully troubled. In few dayes after, the enemy mounted three other great peeces, whereof one was greater than that was called the Princes, and carried a bullet of thirteen hundred weight; from which time they dayly battered the city with ten ſuch peeces, as the like hath ſeldome times bin heard of: and the arrows fell ſo thick into the city, as if it had bin continuall ſhowres of haile, ſo that no man could well goe or ſtir in the ſtreets without hurt. Yet in the middeſt of all theſe dangers the Chriſtians valiantly defended the city, and with their deadly ſhot from the wals and mounts exceedingly anoyed the enemy. The eleuenth of Iuly the Turks mounted another great peece like vnto the former, vpon the Baſſa's mount, and the ſame day battered the wals with a hundred ſeuenty eight ſhot of this huge artillery.

Mahomet hauing by the fury of his great ordnance, beaten down a great part of the wall, and that now nothing ſtood in his way but ſuch ſimple repaires as the defendants had made of timber & planks, with earth caſt in betwixt, was in good hope in ſhort time to becom maſter of the towne: and therefore ſent certain companies of his Ianizaries and other ſoldiers (which he with continual ſupplies of freſh men ſtil relieued) to aſſault the breaches, ſo if it were poſſible to enter the towne, or at leaſtwiſe to burn ſuch fortifications of timber as the defendants had made. But that which ſeemed vnto him at firſt ſo eaſie, he found in execution full of difficulty and danger: for the Turks approaching the breach, found there reſolute men, a ſurer defence than any wall: whoſe valiant courage ſerued in-ſtead of a ſtrong bulwarke. So whilſt the Turks deſperatly ſtriue in the face of the breach either to enter or to ſet fire vpon the new fortifications made for moſt part of timber, and the defendants with no leſſe reſolution do what they may to the vtmoſt to repulſe them, many were on both ſides ſlaine, but eſpecially of the aſſailants. Which Mahomet well perceiuing, and that by that manner of aſſault he gained nothing but notable loſſe and ſpoyle of his beſt men, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and his battery to be againe forthwith renewed; euery day ſhaking the wall with 160 or 180 moſt terrible great ſhot, and one day with 194, the greateſt battery that he made in one day during that ſiege.

After this great battell, the tyrant cauſed a freſh aſſault to be giuen, but with little or rather worſe ſucceſſe than before: for though diuers of the defendants, and among them, ſome of good place, as Franciſcus Patauinus, Franciſcus Scorbaro, two Italian captains, and ſome other of the better ſort of the citizens were there ſlain with the great ſhot, wherof the enemy that day diſcharged into the breaches 193, yet were they with greater loſſe inforced againe to retire, and with ſhame to giue ouer the aſſault.

Notwithſtanding this repulſe, Mahomet continuing his batterie with no leſſe fury than before, ſtill ſought by force of his artillery to open a way into the city: and the third day after the former aſſault, gaue a more furious and deſperat attempt vnto the city than before, inſomuch that the Turkes were in the breaches come to handy ſtrokes with the Chriſtians, and there made a moſt cruell and deadly fight; wherein many fell on both ſides, but of the Turks moſt; yet were there many of the Chriſtians alſo ſlaine, eſpecially with the Turks great ordnance. It was a right ruthfull ſight to haue ſeen the rampiers at the great gate of the city beaten down flat to the ground, and to lie ful of the rent bodies of the Chriſtians; at which place the enemy ſo preuailed, that he was euen now ready to haue entred; for the Turks ſo furiouſly aſſailed the defendants, and the murthering ſhot from the Baſſa's mount fell ſo thicke and ſo terribly into the breach, beſide the infinit number of arrows, that there was ſcarce any of the Chriſtians which defended that place, but they were either ſlain or grieuouſly wounded. But when all ſeemed now moſt deſperat and forlorn, and the greedy enemy euen ready to deuoure his prey, a new ſupply of luſty ſouldiers well armed, came couragiouſly to the breach, and as Lyons encountring the enemy, draue him down again, and ſo inforced him with great loſſe to retire. Mahomet grieued with this repulſe, in his fury cauſed 173 great ſhot to be diſcharged into the city, and afterwards ſending for his great Baſſa's, and other his principall men of war, declared vnto them his mind, as followeth:

I thinke none of you are ignorant (right worthy ſoldiers) that now it is the third month ſince this city hath by vs bin moſt ſtreitly beſieged, and with all manner of Artillery and engines of war impugned, aſſaulted, and on euery ſide aſſailed, the wals thereof vtterly ſubuerted, and the bulwarkes layd flat with

A the ground, and (as you ſee) as good as raſed: beſides that, ſo oft as we haue ſet fire vpon their fortreſſes, ſo often we haue prouoked them of Scodra to fight, and haue alſo much vexed them with aſſaults. Laſt of all, as you know, we haue left nothing vnproued, nothing vnattempted, which could be deuiſed, the eaſilier to ouercome them, being wearied, worne out, and their ſtrength ſpent. Wherefore (in mine opinion) the matter is not longer to be put off or delayed, but euen to morrow before the enemy can recouer his ſtrength or repaire his breaches, let vs incloſe the city round, and giue them a general and terrible aſſault: and therfore euery one of you make your ſelues ready, and exhort your ſouldiers in the camp, that they euery one of them to morrow with the dawning of the day come forth armed and well appointed for the winning of the city. Now will I proue and know them that are worthy of my pay. Thou the Baſſa of Conſtantinople, with thy ſquadrons and certain companies of the Ianizaries our faithfull guard giue charge vnto the breach: B in the mean time, let the Baſſa of Aſia with his power aſſault the other parts of the city: let euery man make ready and bring with him what ſo is needfull for this generall aſſault; my mind giueth mee, that to morrow before this time we ſhall win the city: for who is there can reſiſt vs? The town (as you ſee) is bared both of wall and all other defence: the bulwarkes and ditches are laid euen, and an eaſie way for vs to come vnto it: the citizens themſelues weary with ſo many fights and aſſaults, faint and want ſtrength: whereas we are ſtill freſh and luſty: they in number few, we almoſt innumerable: beſides that, we farre paſſe them in the force of our artillery, wherewith many of them ſhall periſh in the defending of the breaches. Who then can gainſay, but that they of Scodra are already our priſoners? Where, vpon ſuch as remaine aliue, I will at my pleaſure vſe the law of armes and captiuity. On therefore couragious hearts without further delay. Is not the very name of Scodra hatefull vnto vs? For which of you doth not with great diſdaine call to C remembrance the death of your parents, or brethren, or friends, or companions, cruelly ſlaine vnder theſe wals? Can you digeſt your hatred againſt them of Scodra? And ſo many ſlaughters of your friends, by them made? But to forget elder times, and the harms receiued from them long ſince, let vs but look vpon our late ſlaughters and wounds as it were yet bleeding: it is not yet full foure yeres ſince that we made war with theſe men of Scodra, wherein ſo many thouſands of our people fell, that their ſlaughter is yet almoſt obiects to our eyes, and their bloud crauing reuenge. This very hill whereon we ſtand, and the ſtones yet ſeeme beſprinckled and polluted with their bloud. Wherefore haſte you as men of courage: Take vp armes, valiantly mount the hill, aſſault the town, and reuenge your old iniuries. Glut your ſelues to the full in the effuſion of the Chriſtian bloud, whereunto our lawes do ſo much exhort vs, and doe what you may with force and ſword, that not one of them of Scodra be left aliue: which you may eaſily bring to paſſe, hauing D all things therunto needfull: for there is nothing to withſtand you, nothing wanting for the gaining of the victory. All things are prepared, all things are ready: an eaſie matter it is for a ſtrong man to ouercome the weake and feeble, that wanteth ſtrength, as do they.

This ſpeech of the barbarous tyrant, was receiued with great applauſe and good liking of the hearers: and now was Scodra to be with all might and main aſſaulted, and not a man there left aliue. Herupon proclamation was made throughout the camp, That euery man vpon pain of death ſhould be ready againſt the appointed time: and the great captains and commanders of the army, departing from Mahomet, went vp to the top of the hill whereon the Baſſa lay, and from thence taking view of the city, & laying their heads together, conſulted how they might E beſt giue the aſſault. The defendants on the other ſide alwaies expecting their enemies houering ouer their heads, left nothing vndone that they could poſſibly deuiſe, for the defence of themſelues and the city. Now vpon the top of the Baſſaes mount, was a royall pauilion erected, richly couered with purple, from whence the proud tyrant might plainly behold all the aſſault, who with the dawning of the day (being the 22 of Iuly) entring the ſame, the Turks who in the couert of the night had conueied themſelues as neere vnto the wals as they could, vpon the ſignall of battell giuen by a tire of ordnance diſcharged from the Baſſaes mount, ſuddenly ran to the breaches as thicke as Bees, in hope by their ſudden approch to haue taken the Chriſtians at ſome aduantage, wherin they were much deceiued. For they alwaies doubting ſuch a matter, and carefully obſeruing the leaſt motion of the enemy, were alwaies in F readines to meet with their attempts: ſo that the Turks deſperatly ſtriuing to gain the breaches, and the Chriſtians valiantly defending the ſame, there was in diuers places begun a moſt cruell and mortall fight: but eſpecially neere vnto the great gate, where the fury of the cannon had made the wals moſt ſaultable. There the enemy was come to fight hand to hand, and pre-uailing vpon the defendants, had ſet vp one of the Turks enſignes vpon the top of the rampiers; G which Mahomet beholding, reioyced exceedingly, thinking the city now as good as taken.

But the Chriſtians ſeeing the danger, ſpeedily repaired thither with new ſupplies, & by plain force draue the enemy out againe, and beat him from the rampiers. Vpon them alſo that were comming vp, they caſt downe peeces of timber, great ſtones, wildfire, pots of lime, and ſuch other things as might moſt annoy them: as for ſhot, none fell in vaine by reaſon of the wonderfull multitude of the Turks, who ſtood ſo thicke, that a man could hardly haue caſt downe a grain of muſtard ſeed from the wal but it muſt needs haue light vpon ſome of them: by which means the Turks were notably repulſed, their enſigne pluckt down, and they inforced to retire from the wals. Which ſudden alteration Mahomet perceiuing, fell into a great rage, and forthwith commanded his great ordnance, with greater fury than euer, to be diſcharged into the H breach: and with great words commanded the two chiefe Baſſaes which ſtood by him vpon the mount, to go preſently downe and inforce the ſouldiers which were already retired, to returne again to the aſſault. Theſe great commanders ſeeing the tyrant in ſuch a fret, forthwith deſcended from the hil, and where perſuaſion would not ſerue, with their drawn ſwords inforced the ſoldiers to returne back again to the aſſault. The Turks knowing that they were now in the eye of their King, and in the preſence of their greateſt commanders, ſtriue with might and main to win the rampiers: for in that place, the wals of the city were beaten downe to the ground, ſhaken before this aſſault with 2539 ſhot of the cannon or other peeces of no leſſe A moſt terrible aſſault. force. The Chriſtians likewiſe in defence of themſelues and their city, with inuincible courage oppoſed themſelues againſt the Turks: ſo that a more deſperat fight than there was hardly I euer to be ſeen, deſperat men with deſperat hand aſſailing one another: and the more to increaſe the terrour of the day, the thundring ſhot, with the clamour of men, and noiſe of the inſtrumens of war, was ſo great, as if heauen and earth ſhould haue preſently fallen together; and arrowes falling into the city as if it had bin ſhowres of raine, oftentimes darkned the light of the day. In this dreadfull fight many of the defendants were ſlain; but of the Turks, twenty to one. Neer vnto that gate, where this terrible aſſault was giuen, were certain loupes hewne out of the maine rocke, which flanked the ditch all alongſt that ſide of the city, out of which the Chriſtians with their murdering ſhot made lanes amongſt their enemies, and ſlew them without number. For all that, the mighty Baſſaes and great captains, one while by perſuaſion, another while by threatning, ſtill forced them forward, & if any turned back, preſently ſlew him: K ſo that the Turks ſeeing no leſſe danger in retiring than in fighting againſt the enemy, like deſperat men thruſt forward by heaps, and were ſlain without number. Yet ſtill preſſing on ſo long as life laſted, and others ſtepping forward in ſtead of them that were ſlaine, they began againe to preuaile vpon the defendants (who in that place were for moſt part either ſlaine or hurt) and againe recouered the top of the rampiers, and there aduanced the Turks enſignes.
Then began the tyrant to lift vp his head, making ſure account that the city was now his own.
But as the common ſaying is, he that reckoneth without his hoſt, muſt reckon twiſe, ſo chanced it to Mahomet. For the companies, from the beginning of the ſiege left in the market place ready for all euents, and oftentimes wiſhing for ſome occaſion wherein to ſhew themſelues; being now in good time aduertiſed of the imminent danger, came with ſpeed to the place of L the aſſault before the Turks had taken good footing; and there valiantly encountring them, ſlew a great number of them, and forced the reſt from the rampiers; and plucking downe their enſignes before ſet vp, in ſtead of them placed their own. With which repulſe the Turks were ſo diſmaied, that they quite forſooke the aſſault, and in deſpight of their imperious commanders, not expecting any ſigne of retrait, in haſt retired to the campe. Mahomet fallen from ſo great an hope, and grieued aboue meaſure with this ſhamefull repulſe, returned into his pauillion fretting and fuming as a man halfe mad, where two dayes he tormented himſelfe with his own paſſions, not admitting any man to his preſence. The Chriſtians afterwards took the ſpoyle of the dead Turks, and cutting off diuers of their heads, ſet them vp vpon poles round about the city, to the terror of their fellows. In this aſſault were 12000 of the Turks ſlain, and M Twelue thouſand Turkes ſlaine in the laſt aſſault. many mo wounded. Of the Chriſtians were loſt 400: and of them that came to the breach, eſcaped none, but he was wounded more or leſſe.

After that Mahomet had two daies digeſted the laſt repulſe, the ſhame wherof grieued him more than the loſſe it ſelfe; he ſent for both the great Baſſaes of Conſtantinople and Aſia, and

A and other two of his chiefe Counſellors, with whom he reſolued to giue another aſſault, and thereon to gage his whole forces: for they were all of opinion with him, That the defendants were ſo weakned & waſted with the former aſſault, that they could not poſſibly hold out another. Whereupon ſtraight commandment was giuen through the camp, that euery man without exception ſhould be ready to go to the aſſault whenſoeuer they were called vpon: and the more to incourage the ſoldiers, great rewards and preferments were promiſed to them which in time of the aſſault ſhould performe any ſpeciall peece of ſeruice. The firſt appearance of the new Moone (which the Turks worſhip with great deuotion) was the time that Mahomet had appointed for this generall aſſault: in the mean time he ſpared not to poure out his fury againſt the wals and rampiers of the towne, by the mouth of the cannon. The Chriſtian defendants B on the other ſide, firſt by hearty prayer commended themſelues and their City to the protection of the Almighty, and afterwards with reſtleſſe labour and no ſmall perill, ſpeedily repaired and new fortified whatſoeuer the fury of the Artillery had ouerthrowne or ſhaken; omitting nothing that could be done or deuiſed for the defence of themſelues and their city. Now as ſoon as the new Moone began to ſhew her ſelfe, the Mahometan Prieſts going about the army, gaue the ſoldiers knowledge thereof (as their maner is) by ſinging of a ſong in manner of a proceſſion; whereunto the whole army anſwered with a ſhort reſponde, but with ſuch a terrible noiſe as was wonderfull to heare; and at the ſame time bowing themſelues to the ground, ſaluted the Moon with great ſuperſtition. All their fond ceremonies performed, they began to draw nigh the city ſo thicke, and in number ſo many, that all the ground for the ſpace C of a mile round about Scodra, was thick couered with men. The Chriſtians expecting euery houre to be aſſailed, were ready vpon the wals and rampiers of the City, to repulſe the enemie: but eſpecially at the great gate where moſt danger was feared, for that the Turks with their great ordnance had made that place of all others moſt ſaultable. Here Iacobus Moneta a noble captain, with his brother Moncinus a valiant gentleman, tooke vpon them to receiue the firſt aſſault, which is commonly of all others moſt terrible: for the Turks vſe in their aſſaults to giue three attempts, whereof the firſt is moſt furious and dangerous, as performed by their beſt ſouldiers: the other two are of leſſe force; but if they faile in all three, they forſake the enterpriſe as men diſcouraged. Whileſt both the aſſailants and defendants ſtood thus in readines, the one as it were facing the other a great part of the night, Mahomet before day went D vp to the top of the Baſſa's mount, from whence he had before beholden the former aſſault: at whoſe comming there were preſently 11 canons diſcharged, and 12 ſmaller pieces (the ſignall appointed for the aſſault.) The Turks vpon this ſigne giuen, with exceeding tumult and moſt hideous outcry (as their manner is) began to aſſaile the City round, and with ſuch wonderfull agility of body and courage mounted the rampiers at the great gate, that they had there as it were in a trice ſet vp one of their enſignes, which wrs forthwith pluckt vp by Moneta, and the Turks with great ſlaughter driuen down, where many of them were ſlain with ſtones, timber, fire, and ſuch other things caſt down vpon them; beſide a great number ſlain or wounded with ſhot, arrows, and darts, whereof none fell to the ground in vain, by reaſon that the Turks ſtood ſo thicke, that they violently preſſed one another forward, in ſuch ſort, that the formoſt could E by no meanes ſhun any danger, were it neuer ſo great or terrible. In this ſort the aſſault was with great ſlaughter of the Turks continued vntill it was day, they ſtriuing to win the breach, and the Chriſtians moſt valiantly defending the ſame. Moneta himſelfe in this fight receiued diuers wounds, and was twice beaten down to the ground; yet ſtill recouering himſelfe, incouraged his ſoldiers, and worthily repulſed the enemy. Mahomet ſeeing his ſoldiers beaten from the breach, cauſed a tyre of his great Ordnance to be diſcharged vpon the Chriſtians which ſtood therein thick for the defence therof, by force whereof many of them were rent in pieces, and the reſt ſore diſmayed: which the Turks quickly perceiuing, and therewith incouraged came on againe with a freſh charge, forcing themſelues to the vtmoſt to haue entred. But the valiant captain nothing diſcouraged either with the loſſe of them that were ſlain, or the dan- F ger of himſelfe, valiantly withſtood the furious enemy, and maintained the place till new ſupplies came to relieue him, & departed not thence, nor ſuffred any man to depart, til the aſſault was ended. Many were ſlain on both ſides; yet nothing troubled the defendants ſo much as the great ordnance, which being diſcharged from the Baſſa's mount, into the breach, when as the Turks were driuen back, ſlew many of the Chriſtians, leauing the breach almoſt cleere: ſo gi-uing occaſion for the Turks to haue entred,had not other couragious ſoldiers ſtept vp in ſtead of them that were ſlain,who manfully repulſed the enemy. The tyrant from the mount ſeeing the inuincible courage of the defendants, was therewith exceedingly troubled: but fully reſolued now or neuer to haue it,commanded all his forces to be drawne from all other parts of the city,to the great gate,there to renew the aſſault;ſtreitly charging his captains,neuer to return thence vntill they had taken the city. Hereupon the greateſt part of that huge army was forthwith in the ſight of himſelfe brought to the appointed place,and there gaue a ſharp and cruel aſſault at the breach,with ſuch deſperat fury,that in ſhort time they had ſlain moſt of the defendants there preſent,and aduanced diuers of their enſignes vpon the top of the rampiers. Which Mahomet beholding from the Mount,rejoiced exceedingly,making ſure account,that the city was now his own: but by that time he had well conceiued this hope,new ſupplies of freſh and couragious men(of purpoſe reſerued for all euents)came to the place of danger,and with great reſolution encountring the wearied Turks, draue them backe, cleared the breach, and ouerthrew the enſignes. Which ſo ſudden an alteration in the breach,wrought no leſſe alteration in the proud tyrants mind, his hope was turned into deſpaire, and his joy into choler: inſomuch that in his fury he commanded all the great artillery to be at once diſcharged into the breach, whereby many of his forward and couragious ſouldiers were ſlaine together with the defendants. At the ſame time the great commanders & captains knowing themſelues to be in the eie of their imperious lord and maſter,with their drawne ſwords forced the poore ſoldiers again forward to the breach; and the more to encourage them,aduentured themſelues alſo among them: whereby the fight became more fierce and terrible than before. Many of the Turks were there ſlaine; yet ſuch was the force and multitude of them which ſtill ſtept vp in their place, and bullets and arrowes flew ſo thicke, that the defendants oppreſſed with multitude,and ouerwhelmed with ſhot, were hardly able longer to maintain the place, being for moſt part either ſlain or wounded. Wherupon a great cry ran vpon the ſudden thorow the city, that euery man without exception ſhould forthwith repaire to the breach. Which was with ſuch cheerfulnes done,that in leſſe time than was to haue bin thought,a wonderfull multitude of all ſorts of people was there met together, encouraging one another againſt the preſent danger; who all as men reſolued to lay downe their liues in defence of their country, valiantly encountred the Turks vpon the top of the rampiers, and ſo hardly laid vnto them, that notwithſtanding their great number,they began now again to wauer and ſhrinke back. Which thing the tyrant perceiuing from the mount,in great rage commanded his canoniers,as faſt as they could to diſcharge the great ordnance into the breach, without regard of his owne men, ſo that together with them he might alſo kil ſome of the Chriſtians:and withall imperiouſly commanded his captaines, with all their force and power to maintaine the aſſault,threatning them with moſt horrible death, if they returned without victory. Hereupon the aſſault was againe renewed,euery man (in ſhew at leaſt) ſet downe there to doe his laſt deuoire. But the great ordnance ſtill playing vpon the breach,ſlew many of the Turks as well as of the Chriſtians. Thrice the great ſhot fell amongſt the Turks themſelues,and rent in ſunder a great number of them which was formoſt, to the great diſcouragement of the reſt: whereof the tyrant had ſmall regard,ſo that together with them he might alſo diminiſh the number of the defendants. Neuertheleſſe, ſuch was the deſperat fury of the enemy, that the city was in no ſmall danger to haue been preſently taken, had not freſh ſupplies come from other parts of the city which they were appointed vnto; who with great courage reſiſted the enemy. Yet the Turks far exceeding in number(and freſh men continually ſtepping vp in ſtead of them which lay by heaps vnder their feet,and ſerued them in ſtead of ſteps to get vp to the rampiers) maintained a long and terrible fight: at which time the great ordnance alſo ſore annoyed the defendants, ſo that with one ſhot (whereby the greatneſſe of the harmes done at other times may be gathered)eighteene of the Chriſtian defendants were ſlaine. As for arrowes,they flew as thicke as haile into the city, ſo that they obſcured the light of the day, and lay in moſt places of the ſtreet a ſpan thicke: ſo that for the ſpace of a moneth after, the inhabitants vſed no other fuell to burne, but Turkiſh arrowes. It was a ruthfull ſight, to haue ſeene the bodies of the valiant Chriſtians rent in ſunder with the great ſhot, and pieces of them cleauing vpon euery wall thereabout, euery ſtreet was ſtained with their bloud, the great ordnance continually thundred, Churches and houſes came ratling downe, yea, the heauy countenance of the

The aſſault renewed againe fiercely by the Turks.

A woefull ſight.

A air it ſelf ſeemed to bewail the miſery of the poor Chriſtians: beſides, the noiſe of trumpets, drums, and other inſtruments of War, with the horrible cry of the helliſh Turks was ſo great and hideous, that it ſeemed as if heauen and earth ſhould haue gon together: nothing was to be heard but the very terrour of the ear, nothing to be ſeen but death, and the inſtruments of death. And in this extremity a great cry ran through the City, That without preſent help all would be loſt at the great gate: wherupon not only they which were whole (which were the feweſt in number) but they alſo which lay wounded or ſick in their beds, chering themſelues vp, with weapons in their hands ran with ſpeed to the place where the danger was, chuſing rather there to die, than to be ſlain in their beds. Thus whilſt the Chriſtians of all ſorts, and from all parts of the city ran deſperatly to the gate, the Turks were on euery ſide hardly preſſed, B and in great number ſlain: yet freſh men ſtil comming vp, as if they had ſprung out of the earth, the deadly fight was by them ſtil maintained; for the Turks on the one ſide for fear of the tyrant, laboured with might and main to win the City: and the Chriſtians on the other, knowing no hope left for them if they ſhould be ouercome, with no leſſe reſolution defended the ſame. In this obſtinacy of minds many fel on both ſides; ſomtime the Turks ſeemed to haue the better, and were ſtraitway by the Chriſtians put to the worſe. Which maner of mortal fight with doubtful euent was continued moſt part of that day; vntil that at length many being on both parts ſlain, and the reſt for the moſt part ſore wounded and hurt, the fury of the aſſault began to aſſwage: for the Turks now weary of that long and deadly fight, and fainting with their wounds, had no great ſtomack to mount vp the rampiers, where they ſaw no hope C to preuail, but all things threatning preſent death. Mahomet beholding the wonderful ſlaughter of his men, and that hauing don what was poſſible, they now fought as men diſcouraged; and in diſpair of victory himſelf, cauſed a retreit to be ſounded: which the Turks no ſooner heard, but that they left the aſſault, and without order ran to their Tents as men half feared out of their wits.

Of this victory the Chriſtians (as they had good reaſon) reioiced greatly; yet was this ioy mingled with much ſorow and heauines, for the loſſe of ſuch worthy men as were ſlain in that aſſault, many of whoſe bodies they were glad to gather vp by piece-meale, ſome here, ſome there, ſome cleauing on this wal, and ſome on that, which they, as the time would giue leaue, honorably buried with the reſt of the ſlain. At which time alſo they with all diligence & ex- D pedition repaired their breaches, and put all things in ſuch readineſſe as if they ſhould haue preſently receiued a freſh aſſault.

Mahomet wonderfully grieued with the ſhameful diſhonor and great loſſe he had receiued at the laſt aſſault, repented himſelf that euer he had taken the matter in hand, wiſhing that he had neuer heard of the name of Scodra: and in his choler and frantick rage moſt horribly blaſphemed againſt God; moſt wickedly ſaying, That it were enough for him to haue care of heauenly things, and not to croſſe him in his earthly actions: in which fury hee deſcended from the mount, and got him into his Tent, where he again tormented himſelf with his melancholy paſſions by the ſpace of two daies, wherin he would neither be ſpoke withall, or admit any man to his preſence. Vpon the third day he called a general Councel of his comman- E ders and beſt ſouldiers, and therupon openly before them all ſaid, That hee was determined to giue the enemy a freſh aſſault, for that being weakned with ſo many aſſaults, hee could not poſſibly be able to hold out another; and therefore he hoped for an eaſie victory. But he had no ſooner ſo ſayd, but all they that heard him, cried out with one voice to the contrary, ſaying that it was not by any means to bee attempted; foraſmuch as his beſt ſouldiers were already ſlain, and the greater part of them that were left, either ſore wounded, or brought vnto that weaknes, that they were not able to do any more ſeruice: and that therefore it were better for them to kil one another, or els himſelf to kill them one by one, than to expoſe them to bee ſhamefully butchered by the Chriſtians. In this diuerſitie of opinions, Achmetes Baſſa the great Champion of the Turks (a man reuerend and of great authority, for his birth, yeares, F and rare experience in martiall affaires, and one by whom Mahomet had done great matters) ſtanding vp, with pleaſing ſpeech calmed his furious mind, and with ſubſtantial reaſons perſuaded him to deſiſt from that his intended purpoſe, and take another ſurer courſe, in manner following.

Your great valor and worthy praiſes, inuincible Emperor (ſaid he) who is able to expreſſe? the greatnes wherof the mind of man cannot conceiue, and my dul ſpirit but wonder at: my tongue faltreth to ſpeak of them, neither would this time ſerue ſo much as to recount them. It is of all men deemed a thing of great honor (moſt dread Soueraign) when a Prince hath receiued a kingdom from his Aunceſtors, to be able in ſafety to keep and defend the ſame: greater than this is it, honourably to increaſe and augment it ſo left: but of a ſmall thing, by worthy proweſſe to bring it to the higheſt type of worldly honour, is of all other earthly things the greateſt. Which moſt rare excellencie all men worthily aſcribe to your perfection and felicitie: and I, of all others, can therof bring the moſt aſſured teſtimony, who haue often heard it of myne Anceſtors (which followed the Othoman Princes out of Aſia into Europ) that your worthy predeceſſors at their firſt comming into Europ (without offence be it ſaid) poſſeſſed but a corner therof. To whom you afterward by diuine appointment ſucceeding, haue added ſo many prouinces, kingdoms, and empires, as were tedious to rehearſe them. For who can worthily expreſſe, how you haue in Europe ſubdued Conſtantinople, the Imperial city of the Eaſt empire, with all Thracia, Achaia, Grecia, Peloponeſus, Bœotia, Thebes, and the noble city of Athens, the mother and nurſe of all good learning. The empire of Trapezond, with the Emperor therof, is by you ouerthrown: The kingdoms of Servia and Boſna, with the princes of Peloponeſus are by you gloriouſly vanquiſhed. You haue at your command twelue Kingdoms in Aſia the leſſer; Pontus, Bythinia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Caria, Lydia, Phrygia, Nicomedia, and Nicea, with the famous city of Pruſa. Beſide theſe, Ionia, Doris, Smyrna, Colophon, Epheſus, Miletum, Halicarnaſſus, Pergamus, with the country of Taurica, are vnder your ſubiection. The great countrey of Armenia hath felt your force: the Iſlands of Lesbos, Chios, and Eubœa are parts of your empire. What ſhould I ſpeak of infinit people and nations by you moſt victoriouſly vanquiſhed? This may ſuffice for all, That you haue gained from the Chriſtians twenty prouinces, and two hundred great cities. For it were too long to rehearſe the Mahometan Kings and princes by you alſo vanquiſhed: In all your expeditions all things haue yet giuen place to your fortune. The antient monuments may now ceaſe to extoll the praiſes of Cæſar, Scipio, Pyrrhus, Hannibal, and other Chieftains of Rome and forrein nations: for why, they are all inferior to you both for victories and countries ſubdued. The Othoman Family is vndoubtedly fatall for ſoueraignty; all the world ſhall in ſhort time come vnder your gouernment, and all Nations ſhal ſerue you. As for this town of Scodra, let it not ſo much grieue you worldly things (you know) do oftentimes deceiue our expectation; in them fortune beareth great ſway. Yet for this matter quiet your ſelf; for I dare gage my faith vnto your Imperial Maieſty, that I will in ſhort time find meanes that this City ſhall ſtand at your deuotion. Did not I of late bring into your ſubiection the impregnable city of Croia, which you ſo much deſired? But wheras you would now again forthwith attempt to win it by aſſault, I therin craue your pardon, in that I cannot be of your opinion, but muſt needs think far otherwiſe: for, to attempt War, and to be ouerthrown, is an eaſie matter for euery one to do; but to vanquiſh the enemy, and to carry away the victory, that right few men know. He that conſulteth of ſuch great and weighty matters ought to be free both from fury and deſire, both euill Counſellors. The Chriſtians of Scodra are not in my opinion to be again aſſaulted, for in ſo doing you ſhall but loſe your labor. For if you could not ſubdue them, your Army being then freſh and ſtrong, how ſhall you now ouercome them with much fewer, and they wounded, weake, and feeble? I haue viewed the whole camp, and ſearched euery tent; and found no place, no tent, yea ſcarſly any cabin without groaning, ſighing, weeping, or wailing: in all places was heauines, ſorow, mourning, and death it ſelf: for in the laſt aſſault you loſt aboue 30000 of your beſt ſouldiers: many mo are grieuouſly wounded and maimed; none, but he carieth about him ſome ſigne that he was there: few or none there bee that dare again mount the hill to giue a freſh aſſault, they are all ſo afraid and diſcouraged. Whom when I demanded, how ſo great a fear was come vpon them, and what was the cauſe they had ſo loſt their wonted courage? They anſwered me, That it was the look, euen the very look of them of Scodra, whoſe eies ſeemed vnto them to burn and ſparkle with fire: their ſtern and terrible countenances (ſaid they) haue ſtrook this terror into vs. Wherfore I think it not good to giue a freſh aſſault with men ſo diſmaied; but rather to vſe policie and delay againſt ſuch reſolute enemies. This city of Scodra is the eie and head of all this prouince, which the Venetians haue notably fortified, and planted with ſtore of ordnance and all things els neceſſary for defence therof; but eſpecially with moſt valiant ſoldiers, of purpoſe choſen out of many of their garriſons for the defence of this City. You haue not now to do with the weak and effeminat people of Aſia, but with the hard and rough people of Epirus. And you know (moſt mighty emperor) the ſtrength & courage

A of this Nation: it is now thirty years that you haue made war againſt this people, and haue not yet altogether ſubdued them; and how dangerous and chargeable this war hath bin vnto you, who knoweth not. It is now ſix moneths ſince we came firſt before this city; we haue intrenched our ſelues round about it, wee haue day and night layd hard ſiege to it, we haue battered it of long with 11 canons; I ſpeak not of other ſmall pieces or engins of war, with other kinds of ſhot and fire-workes, and whatſoeuer els wee could deuiſe.
We haue many times to our coſt aſſaulted it; what could be don by force, ſtrength, or multitude of valiant men, is already don in the former aſſaults: Nothing hath bin left vnattempted, no policy, no direction hath wanted in your leaders, neither courage in your ſoldiers. What ſhould I count the innumerable great ſhot, or ſpeak of our arrows and darts, deliuered into the city as ſhoures of hail? Did all this, or any thing elſe we could do, any thing terrifie theſe defendants? Were they not, nay are they not ſtill ready with great aſſurance B and courage at all aſſays to incounter vs? You take a wrong courſe, by force to conſtrain them: they haue taken vpon them the defence of this place, and are not thence to be remoued; there ſhall you bee ſure ſtill to find them either aliue or dead; and what account they make of their liues, you ſee, they wil ſel them vnto vs dear for their country, and prefer an honorable death before a ſeruile life. Wherfore againſt men ſo ſet down, policie is to be vſed; and them whom we cannot by force ſubdue, let vs by delay and time ouercome.
If you will win Scodra, block it vp, build ſtrong forts in places conuenient round about it, & furniſh them with good ſoldiers, make a bridge ouer Boliana, with a ſtrong caſtle on either ſide, to ſtop the paſſage:
which don, beſiege the other weaker cities of the Venetians, which are as it were the limbes of Scodra, and ſubdue the country round about; which will be no hard matter for you to do, being maſter of the field. So muſt Scodra at length of neceſſity yeeld vnto you, as of late did Croia, inforced therunto by famin. Thus C may you in ſafety without ſlaughter of your people, come to the full of your deſires.

The wholſom counſel of the Baſſa ſo well pleaſed Mahomet himſelf and the reſt there preſent, that the aſſault was layd aſide, and preſently order taken for the ſpeedy execution of that which was ſo wel by him plotted. Whereupon the Baſſa of Conſtantinople with his forces was ſent to Zabiache, a city in the borders of Dalmatia, ſtanding vpon the lake of Scutari, not far from Aſcriuium, which in few days was yeelded vnto him. The Baſſa poſſeſſed of the city, thruſt out all the inhabitants, and leauing therin a garriſon of the Turks, returned againe to the camp at Scodra. At the ſame time the great Baſſa of Aſia was alſo ſent by Mahomet againſt Driuaſto, a city alſo of the Venetians; which hauing beſieged and ſore battered by the D ſpace of ſixteen daies, the great tyrant came thither in perſon himſelf, and the next day after his comming took the city without any great reſiſtance. Such as he found vpon the walls he put to the ſword; of the reſt hee tooke three hundred away with him to the camp at Scodra, and there in the face of the city cauſed them all to be cruelly ſlain, of purpoſe ſo to terrify the defendants. The next day after, he ſent the great Baſſa of Conſtantinople to Lyſſa, called alſo Aleſſa, a city of the Venetians, ſcituated vpon the riuer Drinus, about thirty miles from Scodra.
The Baſſa comming thither found the city deſolate (for the citiſens hearing of his comming, were for fear before fled, for which cauſe he ſet the city on fire. Here the Turks digged vp the bones of the worthy prince Scanderbeg, for the ſuperſtitious opinion they had of the vertue of them; and happy was hee that could get any little part therof to ſet in gold or other E jewell, as a thing of great price, as is before declared. All theſe things thus done, Mahomet committed the direction of all things concerning the ſiege vnto the diſcretion of Achmetes; by whoſe perſuaſion he left a great power for continuing of the ſiege, departing thence himſelf, with forty thouſand ſoldiers, for Conſtantinople; curſing and banning by the way all the country of Epirus, with all the inhabitants therin, and euery part therof, their Corn, their cattel, and whatſoeuer els was fruitfull: but aboue all other things, the City of Scodra, with all that therin was, for that he had neuer receiued greater diſhonour and loſſe than he had don there.

Lyſſa taken by the Turks, and Scanderbeg his bones dig'd vp by them, & had in great reuerence.

After his departure, which was about the ſeuenth of September, the two great Baſſa's of Conſtantinople and Aſia, according to order before taken, built a great bridge ouer the riuer F Boliana, and on either ſide a ſtrong Caſtle, to the intent that no relief ſhould that way bee brought into the city. Which work when they had brought to perfection, and furniſhed both caſtles with garriſons, ordnance, and all things neceſſary, they left Achmetes Baſſa with forty thouſand ſoldiers to continue the ſiege, and returned themſelues, the one to Conſtantinople, the other into Aſia. The wary and politique Baſſa mindfull of the charge he had taken vpon G him, took ſuch order, that no relief could poſſibly be brought vnto the city either by land or water: and ſo lying ſtill before it a long time, hee brought it into ſuch a diſtres and want of all things, that the poor Chriſtians were fain to eat all maner of vnclean and lothſom things; horſes were dainty meat: yea, they were glad to eat dogs, cats, rats, and the ſkins of beaſts ſod. It excelleth all credit, to tell at what exceeding price a little mouſe was ſould, or puddings made of dogs guts. All theſe bare ſhifts and extremities the poor Chriſtians were content to endure euen to the laſt gaſp, rather than to yeeld themſelues into the hands of their merciles enemies.

Whilſt Scodra thus lay in the ſuds, the Venetians weary of the long and chargeable War they had to their great loſſe now maintained againſt ſo mighty an enemy by the ſpace of ſixteen H years, and hauing no means to relieue their diſtreſſed ſubjects in Scodra, thought it beſt to proue if they could procure a peace from the tyrant. For which purpoſe they ſent Benedictus Triuiſanus, a graue Senator, and a man of great experience, to Conſtantinople, who ſo wel vſed the matter, that after long debating to and fro, at length a peace was concluded: whereof the chief capitulations were, That the Venetians ſhould deliuer to Mahomet the city of Scodra, the Iſland of Lemnos, and the ſtrong caſtle of Tenarus in Peloponeſus, and pay him yearly eight thouſand ducats; that they might freely after their wonted maner traffique into the Euxine by the ſtreits of Helleſpontus and Boſphorus Thracius, and other parts of his dominions. Concerning the citiſens of Scodra, it was compriſed in the ſame peace, That it ſhould be at their own choiſe, either to liue there ſtil vnder the gouernment of the Turkiſh emperor, I or els at their pleaſure to depart in ſafety with their goods whither they would. Triuiſanus hauing in this maner concluded a peace, in his return homeward, the fourth of April found the Venetian Admiral riding at anchor in the mouth of Boliana. From whence they both by letters certified the gouernor and citiſens of Scodra, in what manner the peace was concluded with the Turk, and what prouiſion was therin made for them. Vpon receit of which Letters, the Gouernor calling the Citiſens together, declared vnto them how the caſe ſtood, & there with them entred into conſultation vpon this hard queſtion, Whether they would remaine there ſtil in their natiue country, vnder the Turkiſh tyranny; or forſaking the ſame, liue among other Chriſtians in perpetual exile? But after that the matter had bin throughly debated, and many reaſons on both parts alledged; at length it was by general conſent concluded, that they K ſhould all forſake the city & the houſe of bondage, as dangerous both to ſoul and bodie, and liue as it ſhould pleaſe God, amongſt other Chriſtians. So the Turks giuing pledges for the ſafe departure of them of Scodra, they all at an appointed day with bag and baggage came out of the city, and were by the Venetians carefully tranſported into other parts of their territory in Italy, where they liued in peace. The Turks (who had now beſieged the City the ſpace of a whole year) after the departure of the Chriſtians entered the City with great joy and triumph; which place with many others therabout, hath euer ſince, to the great ruth of all Chriſtendom, remained in the poſſeſſion of the faithles infidels. Thus was the ſtrong city of Scodra loſt, and the long wars ended betwixt Mahomet and the Venetians; which hapned in the year 1478. L

Scodra yeelded to the Turks.

1480. Mahomet now at peace with the Venetians, ſent the ſame Achmetes Baſſa (by whom hee had but a little before taken in Scodra) with his fleet of Gallies againſt one Leonard, who was Prince of Neritus, Zacynthus, and Cephalenia, Iſlands neer vnto Peloponeſus. Where the Baſſa arriuing, eaſily took the ſame Iſlands; the poor Prince for ſafegard of his life beeing glad to fly into Italy with his Wife and treaſure, to King Ferdinand, whoſe nigh kinſwoman he had maried.

About the ſame time, Alis Beg ſyrnamed Michael Ogli, Iſa Beg the ſon of Caſſanes, and Balis Beg ſyrnamed Malcozogli (men of great account amongſt the Turks, and moſt honorably deſcended) entred into Tranſyluania with a great army of an hundred thouſand men, & brought ſuch a generall fear vpon the Countrey, that Stephanus Batore the Vayuod was glad with all M ſpeed to fly vnto Matthias King of Hungary, to declare vnto him the danger of his Country, and to craue his aid. Matthias at the ſame time lay ſick of the gout: neuertheleſſe hee tooke ſuch order by his Captaines, Stephanus Cherepetrus and Paulus Kiniſius County of Temeſware, that the Turks were incountred not far from Alba Iulia, and there in a great and bloudy battel defeated: wherin Iſa one of their chief captains were ſlain, with 30000 Turks mo. Neither was this victory gained by the Chriſtians without loſſe, Bator the Vayuod himſelfe beeing ſore wounded, and eight thouſand men ſlain.

Mahomet longeth after the Rhodes.

Mahomet in his ambitious humor had long time deſired to haue in his ſubjection the Iſland of the Rhodes. For why, it grieued him that ſo ſmall an Iſland ſhould lie ſo neer his great dominions in Aſia, holden by a few Chriſtians, to the great trouble of his merchants trading in the Mediterranian, beſide many other harms daily from thence receiued, and to haue no feeling of his greatnes. But foraſmuch as the winning of that place was thought to be a matter of great difficulty, and in former times vnfortunatly attempted by ſome of the Mahometan princes, he purpoſed now with good aduice to take this matter in hand. Wherfore calling together his graue counſellors and moſt expert men of war, after hee had declared vnto them the manifold injuries receiued from them of the Rhodes, he required their opinion, whether it were beſt to attempt the winning of that Iſland or no? Some forward men perſuaded him to reuenge thoſe injuries don by thoſe Chriſtians, and to ſubdue that Iſland, which for the neernes to Caria, might of right be accounted as part of his dominion; and not to forbear that enterpriſe for fear of repulſe, foraſmuch as he was able to bring more men to aſſail it, than were ſtones in the wal about it. Others better aduiſed declared the ſtrength of the Iſland, with the valor of the defendants; men alwaies brought vp in arms, and as it were choſen out of all parts of Chriſtendom; ſo that it was (as they ſaid) like to proue a matter of more difficultie than was by ſome ſuppoſed; whereof ſome of the Mahometan princes had to their no ſmall diſhonor already made ſufficient trial; alledging further, That that ſmal Iſland which ſcarſly appeared in the ſea, was not of that worth, as that he ſhould theron gage his honour, with the liues of ſo many good men and moſt valiant ſouldiers as might ſerue to conquer a kingdome. For all that, Mahomet prickt forward with the ſpurs of ambition, and continuall ſolicitation of Anthonius Meligalus a fugitiue Knight of the Rhodes, reſolued to follow the counſell of them who perſuaded the war. This Meligalus was a Knight of the Order, who when he had prodigally conſumed his ſubſtance (which was great) with two others, Demetrius and Sophonius, men of his own qualitie and diſpoſition, fled vnto the Turkiſh Emperor, preſenting vnto him a perfect plot of the City, with all the ſtrength both of it and the Iſle wherein it ſtood, and which way he might with moſt eaſe win it. In which ſeruice they frankly offer to ſpend their liues; but hoping indeed by ſuch foul treachery to repair their broken eſtate. All things being now in readineſſe, Mahomet appointed Meſithes Palæologus one of his chief Baſſa's (the neer kinſman of Conſtantinus Palæologus the laſt Emperor of Conſtantinople) General in that expedition; committing to his charge the whole managing of that ſo great an action. Meſithes imbarking his army, in number eighty thouſand, and throughly furniſhed with all things neceſſary for the ſiege, ſet forward from Conſtantinople, and with a pleaſant gale of wind ſailed alongſt the coaſt of Aſia the leſſe, towards the Rhodes: where by the way he called vnto him Demetrius (one of the fugitiue Knights) to learne of him the beſt meanes for the ſafe landing of his army. As for the arch traitor Meligalus, and chief author of this War, he was fallen ſick vpon the way; and in the extremity of his ſicknes growing both troubleſom and lothſom vnto the Turkes that were with him in the ſame Galley, was by the mariners throwne ouerboord aliue, crying out in vain for help, no man vouchſafing to haue any compaſſion vpon him: and thus ſwallowed vp of the ſea, hee receiued in the midſt of the waues the guerdon of his trechery.

At this time Peter Damboys a Frenchman, an Avergnois, a man of ſingular gouernment, was Great Maſter of the Rhodes; whoſe vigilancie was ſuch, that commonly once in eight daies he had certain intelligence what great matters paſſed in the Turks Court: and therewith of ſuch deep judgment, that he was ſeldom or neuer ouertaken or deceiued with falſe aduertiſements. This carefull Grand Maſter was not ignorant of all theſe great preparations, nor of the comming of the Baſſa: and therfore had before ſtrongly fortified the City, and ſo ſtored the ſame with all things needful, as might wel haue ſerued for many years ſiege; but eſpecially with ſuch ſhot and pouder, that it was deemed (as indeed it was) an eſpecial means whereby the city was afterwards preſerued. At the ſame time, many valiant and noble Gentlemen hearing of the Turks deſignes, repaired thither out of Italy, France, Spain, Germany & other places of Chriſtendom, cheerfully to aduenture their liues both in defence of the place & of the Chriſtian religion, againſt the common enemy of Chriſtianity. The great Maſter taking a generall view of all the forces he had, to oppoſe againſt ſo puiſſant an enemy, found that he had in the city ſixteen thouſand able men; in which number were reckoned many Iewes and other men of ſeruile condition; who in the ſiege following did right good ſeruice. The great Baſſa conducted by the falſe traitor Demetrius, ſafely landed both his Army and Artellery in the Iſland the 22 day of Iune, not far from the city. At which time the Great Maſter conſidering that the ſafety of the City conſiſted more in the liuely valour of the defendants, than in the ſtrength of the dead walls or other warlike prouiſion; thought it requiſit as a part of his duty, by cheerefull perſuaſions to incourage them, valiantly to withſtand the force of their enemies. And therfore calling them all together, ſpake vnto them as followeth: G H

The Great Maſters oration to the reſt of the Knights & ſoldiers, to incourage them valiantly to withſtand the Turks

At length (valiant ſoldiers and Fellowes in Arms) we ſee the Turks our mortall enemies (as wee were before aduertiſed, as well by Letters from our friends, as by common Fame) breathing after our deſtruction: in readineſſe to deſtroy our Churches, our Oratories, our Altars, our Religion, and whatſoeuer els we account ſacred or religious; ſeeking the ruin of this noble City, and the cruell death of vs all; gaping at once, to deuour our liues, our wealth, our hope, with all our former honour. And truly as I cannot deny, but that the chance of War is doubtfull, and the euent therof vncertain: So when I conſider your valiant courage and cheerfulneſſe of mind, I preſently conceiue a moſt aſſured hope of victory. They haue entred into Arms againſt vs, not ſo much for any deſert of ours, or vpon any other quarrell; as for the vnſatiable deſire of rule, and the great deſpight they bear againſt vs and the Chriſtian Religion. But to withſtand their fury, and to fruſtrat their deſignes, we want neither weapons nor artillery, nor prouiſion for many years. We haue a moſt ſtrong garriſon of French-men, Spaniards, Germaines, Engliſh, and others, the very chiualry of all Chriſtendom: and that which more is, Chriſt Ieſus our Captain and Generall, by whoſe power we ſhall (no doubt) eaſily repulſe the vain force of our moſt graceleſſe and wicked Enemie. The care we haue for the defence of the Chriſtian faith, wherunto we are by ſpeciall profeſſion bound, will animate and incourage vs againſt them, which ſeek for nothing more, than to extend their wicked and groſſe ſuperſtition, to the great diſhonor of God, and of his ſon Chriſt Ieſus. Beſides that, we are warlike Frenchmen, Italians, Germans, and other worthy Chriſtians: they are of Caria, Lydia, Capadocia, and the other delicat countries of Aſia, effeminat perſons brought vp to pleaſure. I ſay it not to draw you into any manifeſt or inevitable danger, neither to feed you with vain hope, or to fill your eares with windy words: but this I promiſe and aſſure you of, that if this ſiege ſhall continue long, hither will come ſuch ſtrong aid out of France, Italy, and Spain, as will ſerue not only to raiſe the ſiege, but to recouer again the Empires of Conſtantinople and Trapezond. Then ſhall our Enemies ſee no good end of their counſells, but all their deuiſes ſo confounded as that they ſhall hardly be able by ſpeedy flight to ſaue themſelues. But ſuppoſe the hardeſt ſhould happen, which I fear not; would not any man account his life moſt happily and honourably ſpent in defence of a good conſcience, and the quarrell of Chriſt Ieſus? Truly my great years and courſe of life, now almoſt ſpent in defence of the Chriſtian Religion (as I euer deſired) doth call me forth, as one ſo aſſured of that good layd vp for me in heauen by Chriſt Ieſus, (whoſe battell we are to fight) that I no whit fear my enemies force or future chance; which for all that, I haue as far as I could, and to the vttermoſt of my power ſo prouided for, as that we ſhall not (I hope) bee therwith ouerwhelmed. Be you therfore of good cheer and comfort (as I know you are) and ſhew your ſelues valiant and couragious, which reſteth wholly in your ſelues: and as for all the reſt, time and our diſcretion ſhall well prouide, I doubt not. I K L

The valiant men and worthy ſoldiers, reſting vpon the aſſurance of their aged gouernor, departed euery man to his charge, full of hope and courage. Now had the Baſſa landed his great army, and ſent Demetrius the traiterous knight, Meligalus his companion, with certain troupes of horſmen, and ſome foot, to view the ground, where he might beſt incampe with his Army. Demetrius in great pride riding about the City, was knowne by Anthony Damboyſe the Great Maſters brother; by whoſe leaue he ſallied out with a troup of gallant horſmen, and skirmiſhed with them. But the Turks being far moe in number, caſt about to haue incloſed them: which Anthony perceiuing, turned vpon them that were comming behind him, and that with M ſuch force, that he ſlew or wounded moſt part of them. In this hot ſkirmiſh, Demetrius hauing his horſe ſlain vnder him, and himſelf ouerthrown, was there trodden to death vnder the horſes feet; an end too good for ſo falſe a traitor. Muratius a French Knight, vnaduiſedly deſpoyling his dead body, was by the Turks ſlain, and his head preſented vnto the Baſſa in ſtead of Demetrius.

The Baſſa approching the city, at his firſt comming took a great orchard, which the Great Maſter had ſtrongly intrenched, and therin placed certain companies of ſouldiers, with ſome ſmall pieces of ordnance: which place if it could haue bin kept, might fitly haue ſerued the defendants to haue at their pleaſure ſallied out vpon the enemy. But they which were appointed to the keeping therof, either terrified with the ſight of ſo great an Army, or els doubting to be able to hold it againſt ſo great a power, abandoned it by night, and retired into the city, leauing the great ordnance behind them for haſt. In this place the Baſſa, by the counſell of George Frapain (a Chriſtian fugitiue of the Rhodes, and now Maſter of his Ordnance) began to plant his battery, and from thence to batter the tower called Nicolea, or S. Nicolas Tower, diſtant from the city 300 paces: but againſt this place Damboyſe had ſo aptly mounted two great Baſilisks, that he made him glad quickly to forſake the ſame: yet finding no other place more conuenient for his purpoſe, ſhortly after neer to the ſame place he planted his batterie again, of far greater force than before; wherin, beſide the ordnance of greateſt charge, hee had three hundred ſmaller pieces for battery: wherwith at the firſt he did ſmal harm, for that this George Frapain repenting himſelf (as was thought) of his foul treaſon, beſtowed the ſhot to ſmall purpoſe; for which cauſe the Baſſa began to haue him in diſtruſt: which Frapain perceiuing, fled by night again vnto the Rhodes, and diſcouered vnto the great Maſter al the ſecrets of the Turks camp. The Turks continuing the battery, had ſore ſhaken the aforeſaid Tower called S. Nicolas, and beaten down ſome part therof; which the Chriſtians with great induſtry ſpeedily repaired in beſt ſort they could, for all that the Turks gaue therunto a fierce aſſault by the ſpace of ſix hours, forcing themſelues to the vtmoſt to haue taken it: but perceiuing that it preuailed them nothing, they retyred, hauing loſt eight hundred of their men, with many others drowned in the ſea, of whom the number was not knowne, and a thouſand others ſore wounded.

Meſithes diſappointed of his former purpoſe, bent his artillery againſt the walls of the city, and with continual battery had made a fair breach: but Damboyſe foreſeeing the danger, had with great labor caſt vp ſuch rampiers, with a countermure before the breach, that the Baſſa durſt not in any caſe aduenture to enter the breach he had made. For performance of this ſo neceſſary a work, the captains themſelues refuſed not to put to their helping hands: by whoſe example all the reſt of the people who were able to do any thing, being moued, willingly imploied their labor vntil the work was fully finiſhed.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing, Caly Baſſa the yonger (a great Courtier) was ſent from Mahomet, to ſee with what ſucces the ſiege went forward. Vpon whoſe ariuall it was giuen out through all the Turks camp, That Mahomet was in perſon himſelf comming to the ſiege with 100000 men, and 150 pieces of great ordnance. Theſe news (of purpoſe deuiſed to the terror of the defendants) being blown out of the camp into the city, ſtruck an exceeding great fear into the minds of ſome of the defendants, and ſo diſcouraged the Spaniards, with their nigh neighbors that came from Nauar, that they began openly to reaſon in their conuenticles, that it was not poſſible for the city to be defended againſt ſuch a power; and therfore after an inſolent maner deſired leaue to be gon, to the great diſcouragement of the reſt. The Great Maſter vnderſtanding of their doings, ſent for theſe mutinous Spaniards, and after he had ſharply reproued them both of diſorder and cowardiſe, promiſed to ſhip them away forthwith out of the Iſle; ſaying, That hee doubted not, right wel to defend the City againſt the greateſt power of the Turks, without the help of ſuch baſe minded cowards. In the mean time he commanded them to ſurceaſe from their mutinous talk, threatening otherwiſe to make them examples, what it was ſo much to forget themſelues. But theſe Spaniards ſhortly after, better conſidering of the matter, and what a diſhonor it would be both to themſelues and their Nation, if they ſhould ſo diſhonourably be ſent away; repenting themſelues of that they had don, came and craued pardon of the Great Maſter: and to redeem their fault, in all ſallies and ſeruices during that ſiege, ſhewed themſelues moſt valiant and forward men. Neuertheleſs, the Great Maſter would neuer afterwards truſt them in any ſeruice alone. The Baſſa attempting much, and preuailing little, thought it would much further his deſignes, if hee could by any means take the Great Maſter out of the way, by whoſe carefull policie he ſaw all his deuiſes were ſtil countermanded. Wherfore to bring this his purpoſe to paſſe, he practiſed by the means of one Ianus a Dalmatian to poiſon him. This Ianus hauing conceiued this treaſon from the Baſſa, was receiued into the city of the Rhodes, as a Chriſtian fugitiue fled from the Turks; where he acquainted himſelfe with one Pythius an Epirot, of great familiarity with Marius Philelphus, of late Secretary vnto Damboys, but as then out of fauour and in diſgrace, for that he was partaker with the Spaniards in the late mutiny. Ianus by the meanes of this Pythius, whom he had now throughly corrupted, ſought after Philelphus, who then as he right wel knew, liued diſcontented, as a fit inſtrument whereby to worke this wicked treaſon; for that he was well acquainted with the cooks and butlers, and other ſeruitors in the great Maſters houſe, and himſelf yet there very conuerſant alſo. Pythius preſuming vpon his old acquaintance and familiarity with Philelphus, and waiting vpon his melancholy humour, began to perſuade him to reuenge the diſgrace he liued in, and withall to ſhew him the means how to do it, by poyſoning of the Great Maſter; which might (as he ſaid) fall out to his greater good than he was yet aware of. Philelphus making ſemblant as if he had not diſliked the motion, was deſirous to know of him what further benefit might thereby ariſe to him more than reuenge. To whom Pythius forthwith ſhewed the Baſſa's letters to Ianus, wherby hee aſſured him, That whatſoeuer he ſhould promiſe vnto any man for the furtherance of the practiſe, he would to the full perform the ſame. Philelphus hauing got full vnderſtanding of the treaſon, preſently diſcouered the ſame vnto Damboys: by whoſe commandment Ianus and Pythius were ſtraightwayes apprehended, and being examined, confeſſed the whole treaſon. For the which Ianus loſt his head; and Pythius (as he had well deſerued) was ſhamefully hanged. Philelphus for his fidelitie was pardoned his former error, and again receiued into the Great Maſters fauor.

The Baſſa vnderſtanding that the treaſon was diſcouered, and the traitors executed, was much grieued therat. Neuertheles he ceaſed not with his continual battery to ſhake the city, but eſpecially the caſtle of S. Nicolas, for the aſſailing whereof hee made wonderfull preparation. Among other things he had framed a great bridge, ſtaied with ſtrong ropes and cables, ouer a fret of the ſea, betwixt the place of his battery & the ſame tower, wheron 6 men might march abreſt; in which deuice he repoſed great hope. But as the Turks were making faſt this bridge, and had, as they thought, brought the worke to a good perfection; Geruaſe Rogers an Engliſhman, of great courage, and very skilfull in ſea matters, found meanes by night to cut and break in ſunder all the ropes and cables wherwith the bridge was ſtaid: which now looſe, was by the violence of the ſea quickly caried away, and the Turkes diſappointed of their purpoſe. For which good ſeruice he was by the Great Maſter honorably rewarded, and of him in publique audience highly commended.

Yet was the furious battery of the Baſſa ſtill maintained, and a new bridge framed vpon ſmall boats and lighters, faſt moored with cables and anchors, and diuers pieces of great ordnance placed in fuſts and gallies. So that the tower was at one time battered both by ſea and land, the defendants aſſailed with ſmall ſhot and arrows innumerable, and the Tower at the ſame inſtant deſperatly aſſailed. But Damboyſe had ſo placed his great Ordnance, that with the force therof the bridge was broken in ſunder, four great fuſts ſunke, with great ſtore both of men and ordnance: the defendants alſo in the Tower, with ſhot, timber, ſtones, and other ſuch like things prouided for that purpoſe, grieuouſly ouerwhelmed the Turks that were ſcaling the wals, & beat them down with great ſlaughter. This hot aſſault was deſperatly maintained by the Turks, from three a clock in the morning till ten: when the Baſſa ſeeing no hope to preuail, gaue ouer the aſſault, hauing loſt therin aboue 2500 men; whoſe dead bodies ſhortly after driuen on ſhore, were ſpoiled by the Chriſtians. The ſame night two mercinary ſoldiers of Crete, going about to haue fled vnto the enemy, were apprehended and put to death; and George Frapain, who in the beginning of the ſiege fled from the Turks, now againe vehemently ſuſpected of treaſon, was executed alſo.

Thus neither force nor treaſon preuailing, the Baſſa becauſe he would leaue nothing vnproued that might better his cauſe, ſent certain meſſengers to the Great Maſter, offering to him

A in the name of the Turkiſh Emperour,great rewards,with many honorable preferments, if he would yeeld vp the city, which he could not (as they would haue perſuaded him) long hold againſt ſo mighty an enemy : wiſhing him now in his declining eſtate not to refuſe ſuch honorable and princely offers, for feare he were afterwards conſtrained to accept of far worſe, or els through his deſperat wilfulneſſe plunge himſelfe and his people into ſuch extreme perill, as ſhould be impoſſible for him or them to find any way out of. Wherunto the Great Maſter in briefe anſwered, That he would not willingly in his ſure eſtate vſe the counſell of his enemy : neither in his greateſt diſtreſſe refuſe cheerefully to yeeld his life vnto Almighty God,to whom he did owe it; and that with far better will than to yeeld vp the city vpon any conditions, beare they neuer ſo faire a ſhew of honor or profit. The meſſengers perceiuing his conſtant reſolution, rather to die than to yeeld B his city,began(according to inſtructions before giuen them by the Baſſa)to temper with him another way,and to perſuade him to yeeld vnto the mighty Emperour ſome ſmall yearely tribute or other homage,as an acknowledgement of his greatneſſe, and ſo to liue as his friend in peace. But the Great Maſter knowing by the wofull examples of others,that in that ſmall requeſt lay included the beginning of the Turkiſh thraldome and ſlauery; vtterly refuſed to pay him the leaſt tribute,or to do him the leaſt homage that could be deuiſed. With which anſwer the meſſengers returned,hauing obtained nothing of that they were ſent for.

The reſolute anſwer of the Great Maſter.

The reſolute anſwer of the Great Maſter, reported by the aforeſaid meſſengers vnto the Baſſa,troubled him exceedingly ; for though he had ſmall hope by force to win the city, yet he was alwaies in hope vntill now,at his pleaſure, to forſake the ſiege with ſome ſuch reaſonable C compoſitions as might ſtand with his honor.But ſith nothing remained now,but by plain force to conſtraine his enemies, he reſolued for the ſafegard of his honor, in that extremity to vſe that extreme remedy : wherefore beſide the great pieces of battery he had already planted againſt the wals, he mounted diuers ſmaller pieces much higher, thereby the more to annoy the defendants, by beating downe their churches and high built houſes. His ordnance thus placed, he battered the city day and night for the ſpace of foure daies together without intermiſſion:during which time,the Chriſtians out of the city ſpared not, liberally to beſtow their ſhot among the enemies alſo : ſo that the aire ſeemed to grow thicke, and the light of the day to be darkned with ſmoake of the great ordnance ; and the great ſhot came ſo thicke into the city,that the fearefull women and children were glad to ſhroud themſelues from the D danger thereof,in cellars and caues vnder ground. So long continued this great battery, that at length the ſtrength of the wall gaue place to the fury of the cannon, & a faire breach was laid open for the enemy to enter : which was no ſooner made, but that with the firſt ſhew thereof the Turks gaue thereunto a deſperat aſſault ; and preuailing by reaſon of their multitude,had vpon the ſudden recouered the top of the wals,and there ſet vp ſome of their enſignes : but the Chriſtians ſpeedily comming in on euery ſide to the defence of the breach, they were againe quickly repulſed & beaten down into the ditches,out of which moſt of them neuer riſe more.
At which time the Turks in another place with their ſcaling ladders had gained the top of the wals, and there aduanced their enſignes alſo, and were now fiue hundred of them entred the city and come into the ſtreet called the Iew-ſtreet : where they were encountered by the E Great Maſter and his followers,and all ſlain that were already entered,and their enſignes that ſtood vpon the wals thrown down. The reſt yet ſcaling the wals, and ignorant of the fortune of their fellowes, were likewiſe beaten from the wals, and with wonderfull ſlaughter rejected.
So that the Baſſa not able longer to endure the ſlaughter of his men, being in both places repulſed, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded,and left the aſſault;wherein he had loſt of his moſt forward men about fiue thouſand,with ſmal loſſe of the Chriſtians. In this aſſault,the Great Maſter himſelfe receiued fiue wounds, whereof one vnder his right pap was thought to haue been deadly : which yet afterward was very well cured with the reſt.

A faire breach made by force of the Turks battery.

After that the Baſſa had by the ſpace of three months to ſmal purpoſe ſpent all his forces and deuices vpon the city, he began to doubt whether it were better for him to raiſe his ſiege, and F depart,or to tarry & expect ſome better fortune,which in al his former actions had ſeemed almoſt to haue waited vpon him;to forſake the ſiege,was diſhonorable ; and to continue it without hope,preſented no leſſe danger. Beſides that,in the former aſſaults he had already loſt nine thouſand of his beſt ſouldiers, and all the reſt of his army were filled with heauineſſe and deſpaire, to heare the wofull ſighing and groaning of their fellows,of whom fifteen thouſand lay diſperſed in the campe, ſore wounded, and ready many of them to giue vp the ghoſt: and alſo but euen a little before, two great ſhips ſent from Ferdinand king of Naples with men and munition, were in deſpight of all the Turks gallies ſafely arriued at the Rhodes, to the great ioy and incouragement of the beſieged, & no leſſe diſcontentment of the Turks. Whilſt the Baſſa was thus deliberating what courſe to take, a rumor was raiſed in the camp, That the Chriſtian Princes were comming with great power to relieue the towne with which news the whole army was exceedingly troubled, whereupon he raiſed his ſiege. Some others ſay, that Mahomet hearing of the euill ſucceſſe of his army in the Iſland of the Rhodes, with the difficulty of the ſiege, and now ready to go in perſon himſelfe againſt the Sultan of Ægypt, ſent for the Baſſa; and that ſo the ſiege was raiſed. Howſoeuer it was, the Baſſa before his departure cauſed all the vines and trees growing in that part of the Iſland, to be cut down and ſpoyled: and ſo after he had poured forth his fury vpon the ſenceles creatures, which he could not according to his deſire exerciſe vpon the people, again imbarked his army, and with ſhame departed, the ſeuenteenth of Auguſt.

At the ſame time that the Rhodes was thus beſieged, Mahomet ſent his old and moſt expert captain Achmetes Baſſa, with a great fleet and a ſtrong army to make an entrance into Italy (for no kingdome was ſo ſtrong, which the ambitious tyrant in the pride of his heart thought not he might now command) and hauing long before conquered Conſtantinople, otherwiſe called new Rome, was ſtill dreaming (I wot not what) of the conqueſt of old Rome alſo. The miſchieuous Baſſa according to his Great maſters deſignes, imbarked his army at Vallona (otherwiſe called Aulona) a ſea town in the borders of Macedonia; and from thence paſſing directly ouer that narrow ſea, which is in bredth about 60 miles, landed his men in that rich and fertile part of Italy, called in antent time Apulia (now Puglia) neer to the old and famous city of Hydruntum, at this called Otranto: whereas ſoon as this warlike Baſſa had landed his forces, he forraged all that rich country along the ſea coaſt, and took ſuch infinit ſpoyle as might well haue ſatisfied the greedy deſire both of himſelfe and of his hungry ſouldiers: all which rich booty he cauſed to be conueyed into his gallies. So when he had at his pleaſure ranged vp and down the country by the ſpace of fourteen daies: and ſaw that none made head againſt him, he layd ſiege to Otranto, the chiefe city of that country, and as it were the key of that part of Italy: and hauing with ſuch ordnance as he took out of his gallies, made a breach, eaſily entred the ſame, and ſo without any great loſſe took the city. A thing not greatly to be maruelled at, foraſmuch as it was but weakly manned, and more weakly defended, by men altogether liuing in ſecurity in the midſt of their wealth and pleaſure. The Archbiſhop, with Zurlo the Gouernour, and the chiefe men of the city, for ſafeguard of their liues fled into the great Cathedrall Church, as into a Sanctuary; where they were all together moſt miſerably ſlain. The reſt of the citiſens, whoſe hard fortune it was to eſcape the ſword (as people reſerued to moe miſery) were afterward ſhipt ouer into Græcia, and there ſold for ſlaues. The landing of the Turks in Apulia, with the taking of Otranto, brought a general feare vpon all Italy, inſomuch that Sextus Quartus, then the great Biſhop of Rome, forgetting all things ſaue himſelfe, was about to haue forſaken the city for feare. Now after the Turks had at their pleaſure ranſackt Otranto, Achmetes cauſed the ſame to be ſtrongly fortified (as the ſure footing of the Turks in Italy) and victualled for eighteen months, and there leauing eight thouſand of his beſt ſoldidiers in garriſon, returned himſelfe with the reſt to Vallona, and ſo by land to Conſtantinople to know his great Maſters further pleaſure: but purpoſing with himſelfe, with the firſt of the next ſpring to haue returned with greater forces again to Italy, for the proſecuting of his former victory. Which if he had don, it was greatly to haue bin feared, that all that goodly country, ſomtime miſtreſſe of the World, but then and yet alſo rent in ſunder by the diſcord and ambition of the Chriſtian Princes, had in ſhort time become a prey vnto the barbarous Turk for euer.

Achmetes landeth his army in Apulia neer to Otranto, and ſpoyleth the country.

Otranto taken by the Turks.

But whilſt the great Baſſa (in his life time the great ſcourge of Chriſtendome) thus proudly plotteth the ruine and deſtruction of faire Italy: God, in whoſe hands the hearts of Kings are, put an hook in the great tyrants noſe, and led him quite another way. For at the ſame time the Caramanian King, aided by the Perſian and the Sultan of Ægypt, had in a great battell ouerthrowne Bajazet (Mahomets eldeſt ſonne then liuing) and ſlain moſt part of his army: in reuenge whereof, Mahomet with great expedition raiſed a great and puiſſant army, and taking

A Achmetes with him as his chiefe man of war, rejecting the wars of Italy vnto a more conuenient time, paſſed ouer into Aſia: where vpon the way, about a daies journy ſhort of Nicomedia a city of Bithynia, at a place called Geiuiſin he fell ſicke, and there for the ſpace of three daies grieuouſly tormented with an extreme paine in his belly (which ſome ſuppoſed to be the colicke) died; but being indeed as moſt men thought poyſoned; when he had liued about 52 yeares, and thereof reigned 31, in the yeare of our Lord 1481. His body was afterwards magnificently buried in a chappell neere vnto the great Mahometan temple, which he himſelfe firſt built at Conſtantinople.

Mahomet dieth at Geiuiſin in Bythinia, not without ſuſpition of poyſon.

He is buried at Conſtantinople.

The deſcription of Mahomet.

The death of this mighty man (who liuing troubled a great part of the World) was not much more lamented by thoſe that were neereſt vnto him, (who euer liuing in feare of his B cruelty, hated him deadly) than of his enemies, who euer in doubt of his greatneſſe, were glad to heare of his end. He was of ſtature but low, and nothing anſwerable to the height of his mind, ſquare ſet, and ſtrong limmed, not inferior in ſtrength (when he was young) vnto any in his fathers Court, but to Scanderbeg only: his complexion was Tartar-like, ſallow and melancholy, as were moſt of his anceſtors the Othoman Kings; his looke and countenance ſterne, with his eies piercing, hollow, and a little ſunke as it were into his head, and his noſe ſo high and crooked, that it almoſt touched his vpper lip. To be briefe, his countenance was altogether ſuch, as if Nature had with moſt cunning hand therein depainted and moſt curiouſly ſet forth to view the inward diſpoſition and qualities of his mind, which were on both parts notable. He was of a very ſharpe and apprehenſiue wit, learned, as amongſt that nation, C eſpecially in Aſtronomy, and could ſpeake the Greeke, Latine, Arabicke, Chaldee, and Perſian Tongues. He delighted much in regarding of Hiſtories, and the liues of worthy men, eſpecially the liues of Alexander the Great, and of Iulius Cæſar, whom he propoſed to himſelfe as examples to follow. He was of an exceeding courage, and thereto very fortunate; a ſeuere puniſher of injuſtice, in them eſpecially to whom he had committed the adminiſtration of juſtice. Men that excelled in any quality, he greatly fauoured and honourably entertained: as he did Gentill Bellin a Painter of Venice, whom he purpoſely cauſed to come from thence, to Conſtantinople, to draw the liuely counterfeit of himſelfe, for which he moſt honourably rewarded him. He ſo ſeuerely puniſhed theft, as that in his time all the waies were ſafe, and a theefe ſcarcely to be heard of. But theſe good parts were in him obſcured with moſt D horrible and notorious vices: for why, he was altogether irreligious, and of all others moſt perfidious, ambitious aboue meaſure, and in nothing more delighted, than in bloud: in ſo much that it is probably gathred, that he was in his time the death of eight hundred thouſand men: craft, couetouſneſſe, and diſſimulation, were in him accounted for tollerable faults, in compariſon of his greater vices. In his loue was no aſſurance, and his leaſt diſpleaſure was death: ſo that he liued feared of all men, and died lamented of none. He had iſſue three ſonnes, Muſtapha (dead before him, as is before declared) Bajazet, and Gemes, or rather Zemes, of ſome called Zizimus, competitor of the Empire with his eldeſt brother; whom he exceedingly troubled in the beginning of his reigne, ſo that he could not well attend any other thing but him: which opportunity (by God himſelfe no doubt offered for the ſafegard of Italy) Alphonſus E Duke of Calabria (King Ferdinand his eldeſt ſonne) taking hold vpon, with all the power he could make in Italy, beſieged the Turks in Otranto; with whom he had many ſharpe skirmiſhes, wherein he loſt diuers of his great Captaines and Commanders, as the County Iulio de Aquaina, Loys de Capua, and the County Iulio de Piſa, with others, and was ſtill by the ſtrong garriſon of the Turks put to the worſe; vntill ſuch time as being ſtrengthened with aid out of Spaine and Portugall, (but eſpecially with certaine companies of moſt valiant ſouldiers ſent from Matthias Coruinus out of Hungary, whoſe forces the Turks moſt feared) he began to cut them ſhort, and ſtreitly beſieged the city both by ſea and land: vntill at length the beſieged Turks hearing of the death of the great Emperour, and now hardly preſſed with the dangers of a ſtreit ſiege, no longer expecting the returne of Achmetes their Generall, (then F ready to haue come to their reſcue with fiue and twenty thouſand ſouldiers) yeelded vp the city vnto the Duke, vpon compoſition before made, That they might with bag and baggage in ſafety depart thence: which they did, after they had to the great terrour of all Italy holden that ſtrong city by the ſpace of a yeare. And ſo was that rich Countrey rather by the mercy of God (in taking away the great Tyrant) preſerued, than by the ſtrength or policy of the

The ſonnes of Mahomet; Muſtapha, Baiazet, and Zemes.

Otranto yeelded vp to the Turks vpō compoſitiō.

Inhabitants, which was then in great danger to haue for euer giuen place vnto the power of G the great tyrant, had he longer liued; yea, and after his death, to the power of Bajazet his ſon, had he not by domeſticall troubles beene inforced to turne himſelfe another way, and as it were to neglect in time to relieue his diſtreſſed garriſon in Otranto, as ſhall hereafter be declared.

BAIAZETHES II TVRCARVM IMPERATOR SECVNDVS: FLORVIT AN° 1481

Phil. Lonicer. Tur. Hiſt.li.1.

Arma manu quatiunt fratres hoſtilia regnum, Hinc Bajazethes, Zizimus inde petit.
Bajazethes rerum potitur, Rhodon, inde Quiritum Zizimus extrema mœnia ſorte petit.
Suſtinet & bello, varias & pace, procellas, Bajazethes fœlix & miſer, inter opes.
Iam ſenio tremulus, fert bella domeſtica, regno, Agnato ejectus, dira venena bibit.

Like earth borne brethren, Bajazet and Zizimus in armes, Seeke for the Turkiſh Empire great, the one by th'others harmes.
Vntill that Bajazet preuail'd, and Zizimus was faine To fly to Rhodes, from thence to Rome, whereas he caught his baine.
Great ſtormes endured Bajazet in peace and bloudy broyles:
A man both happy and accurſt, amongſt his richeſt ſpoyles.
But now forworne with trembling age, and ciuill diſcords new,
Thruſt from his Empire by his ſonne, died poyſoned by a Iew.

THE LIFE OF BAIAZET, SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND SECOND EMPEROR OF THE TVRKES.

Diſſentiõ among the Turkes about the ſucceſsion.

VPon the death of Mahomet the late Emperor, great troubles began to ariſe about the ſucceſsion in the Turkiſh empire; ſome of the Baſſa's and great captaines ſeeking to place Bajazet, the eldeſt ſon of Mahomet, in the Empire; and others with no leſſe deuotion labouring to C preſerre Zemes, or Gemes, otherwiſe called Zizimus, Bajazet his younger brother. By occaſion whereof there aroſe two great and mighty factions, which in few daies grew to ſuch heat, that many great tumults and hot skirmiſhes were made in the imperiall city, betwixt the fauourits of both factions, and great ſlaughter committed. In theſe broiles the proud Ianizaries for an old grudge ſlew Mahomethes one of the foure great Baſſa's, a man by whoſe graue counſell moſt of the weighty affaires of the Turkiſh empire had been managed during the reigne of the late Emperour: and proceeding further in their accuſtomed inſolency, ſpoiled all the Chriſtians and Iewes which dwelt amongſt them, of all their wealth and ſubſtance; at which time the rich merchants and citiſens of Conſtantinople D which were naturall Turks themſelues, eſcaped not their rauenous hands, but became vnto them a prey and ſpoyle alſo. The other three Baſſa's of the court, Iſaac, Meſithes, and Achmetes, (lately returned from the winning of Hydruntum in Italy) although they ſecretly maligned and enuied one at the greatneſſe of another, yet to appeaſe theſe ſo dangerous troubles, and to aſſure their owne eſtates, joyned hands together, and by their great authority, and multitude of followers and fauourits, found meanes that Corcutus (one of the younger ſonnes of Bajazet, a young Prince of eighteene yeres old) was as it were by the generall conſent of the Nobility and ſouldiers ſaluted Emperour, and with great triumph and ſolemnity placed in the Imperiall ſeat. In whoſe name, the aforeſaid Baſſa's at their pleaſure diſpoſed of all things, little or nothing regarding either Bajazet or Zemes, then both abſent, the one at Amaſia, and the other E at Iconium in Lycaonia. For the jealous Turkiſh Kings neuer ſuffer their ſonnes to liue in court neere vnto them, after they be growne to yeres of diſcretion; but ſend them to gouerne their prouinces far off: where they are alſo vnder the command of the Emperors lieutenants generall in Aſia or Europe, and may not depart from their charge without great danger, not ſo much as to viſit their father, without expreſſe leaue and commandement. So jealous are thoſe Tyrants, yea, euen of their owne ſonnes.

Bajazet commeth to Conſtantinople.

Bajazet and Zemes hearing of the death of their father, and of the troubles in the imperial city, haſted thitherward with all ſpeed, where Bajazet being the neerer, firſt arriued: but finding the Empire already poſſeſſed by Corcutus his younger ſon, and himſelfe excluded, he in griefe of his heart poured forth moſt grieuous complaints before God and man, calling heauen and F earth to witneſſe of the great wrong and injury done vnto him by the proud Baſſa's. And what by tears and humble obteſtations, what by great gifts and greater promiſes, but moſt of all by the earneſt labor and ſolicitation of Cherſeogles Viceroy of Grecia, and the Aga or captaine of the Ianizaries, both his ſons in law, preuailed ſo much with the great Baſſa's & ſoldiers of the court, that Corcutus being of a mild and courteous diſpoſition, ouercome by their intreaty and the reuerence of his father, reſigned vnto him the imperiall gouernment, which he preſently C tooke vpon him with the generall good liking of the people, and made Corcutus Gouernor of Lycia, Caria, and Ionia, with the pleaſant and rich countries thereabouts; allowing him a great yerely penſion for the better maintenance of his eſtate, with promiſe alſo of the empire after his deceaſe: and ſo ſent him away to his charge, where he moſt pleaſantly liued during the reigne of his father Bajazet, giuing himſelſe wholly to the ſtudy of Philoſophy, which made that he was afterwards leſſe fauoured of the Ianizaries and other men of war.

Zemes riſeth againſt his brother Bajazet.

Zemes thus preuented by his elder brother, and vnderſtanding by his friends how all things ſtood at Conſtantinople, and that Bajazet was already poſſeſſed of the empire; returning with great ſpeed, raiſed a puiſſant army in the countries which were vnder his command, and marching through the heart of Aſia the leſſe, by the way as he went, tooke into his poſſeſſion ſuch H cities and ſtrong places as he thought beſt; and ſo entring into Bithynia, tooke the great city of Pruſa, the antient ſeat of the Othoman Kings. Purpoſing in himſelfe, that as Bajazet had ſhut him out of Europe, ſo he would alſo in requitall thereof exclude him out of that part of the Turkiſh empire which is beyond Helleſpontus in Aſia, & to make himſelf lord therof. Wherin fortune at the firſt ſeemed vnto him moſt fauourable, all the people whereſoeuer he came yeelded vnto him obedience as vnto their Prince and Soueraigne: ſo that in ſhort time he ſeemed both vnto himſelfe and to others, in ſtrong poſſeſſion of that part of the Empire.

Bajazet goeth againſt Zemes.

Of theſe his proceedings Bajazet hauing intelligence, and perceiuing the greater part of his empire now in danger to be loſt, and doubting further, that Zemes his ambitious mind would hardly reſt therewith long contented; for remedy of ſo great a miſchiefe leuied a ſtrong and I puiſſant army, wherewith he paſſed ouer into Aſia, and come to Neapolis a City of Anatolia, neere whereunto Zemes lay with his army ſtrongly incamped. As Bajazet was vpon the way againſt his brother, Achmetes the great Baſſa (in the confeſſion of all men the beſt man of war and moſt expert Captaine amongſt the Turks, and of all others moſt entirely beloued of the Ianizaries) came, and vnarmed preſented himſelfe vpon his knees before Bajazet, his ſword hanging at his ſaddle bow: to the admiration of many, who could not but wonder to ſee ſo worthy a Chieftaine of ſo great place in time of ſeruice, without any apparant cauſe, in ſuch humble manner to appeare before his Soueraigne, as if he had had nothing to do with armes. It chanced many yeares before, in the mortall warres betwixt Mahomet the late and great Emperour of the Turks, and Aſſymbeius Vſun-Caſſanes the King of Perſia, that Bajazet hauing the K leading of the right wing of his fathers Army, had not martialled it in ſo good order as was to Mahomet his good liking: for which cauſe he commanded this Achmetes to goe and ſet that part of the battell in better order. Which his Soueraignes command whiles he moſt skilfully performed, Bajazet taking it in euill part, as tending to his owne diſgrace, in great choler threatened the Baſſa, to finde a time when he would be reuenged vpon him. But hee being a man of great ſpirit, and one that durſt both do and ſay much, perceiuing his meaning, bid him doe what pleaſed him; and laying his hand vpon his ſword, ſolemnly vowed, That whenſoeuer he came to command as Emperour, he would neuer weare ſword in field: the remembrance whereof was the cauſe that he then came in manner aforeſaid, ready to ſerue if he were thereto commanded, or otherwiſe to endure what ſo his Princes pleaſure was. Bajazet L perceiuing that the vnkindeneſſe ſo long before conceiued, was not yet digeſted, in token of grace ſtretched out to him his ſcepter, and taking him vp, commanded him to girt his ſword vnto his ſide, and not to remember that which he had long before both forgiuen and forgotten. And knowing right well that he was a moſt valiant and expert captaine, made him Generall of his army, to the great contentment of the Ianizaries and the reſt of the army; who ſo ſoone as they ſaw him, gaue out diuers great ſhouts for joy, as if victory had moſt aſſuredly attended vpon him. Achmetes taking vpon him the charge, came and incamped ſo neere as he could to Zemes, and ſo lay by the ſpace of ten daies: during which time, many ſharpe skirmiſhes were made with diuers fortune; ſometime the one ſide preuailing, and ſometime the other. At length the matter was brought to a generall battell; wherein after a long and M cruell fight, and great ſlaughter on both ſides, the fortune of Bajazet, conducted by the policy of Achmetes, preuailed againſt Zemes. Who ſeeing his Army ouerthrowne, betooke himſelfe to flight, and came to Iconium: in which flight many of Zemes his followers were taken priſoners; whom Bajazet would haue pardoned and enlarged, but that by the perſua-

Achmetes made Generall of Bajazet his army.

A ſion of Achmetes he changed his mind, and to the terrour of others ſuffered them all to be put to the ſword.

Zemes flieth into Syria.

Zemes doubting after this ouerthrow to fall into his brothers hands, and finding no means to make head againe: when he had ſtaied three daies at Iconium, cauſed his treaſure, plate, jewels, and other things of great value and light carriage to be truſſed vp, and taking with him his mother and his two yong children, a ſonne and a daughter, accompanied with a ſmall retinue, fled into Syria; then part of the dominion of Caytbeius, commonly called the great Sultan of Ægypt and Syria. It was not long after the departure of Zemes from Iconium, but that Bajazet came thither with his army, to haue ſurpriſed him: but vnderſtanding of his flight, hee tooke order for the peaceable gouernment of that part of his Empire. And ſo hauing ſuppreſ- B ſed that dangerous rebellion, and againe reduced that troubled part of his Empire to his obeiſance, returned with victory to Conſtantinople.

The diſtreſſed Prince Zemes trauelling through Syria, came at length to Ieruſalem: where he ſtayed a good ſpace, deuoutly viſiting the monuments of that moſt antient and famous city. From thence he trauelled into Ægypt; where at his firſt entrance into the country, he was met by diuers of the greateſt nobility of that kingdome, ſent from the great Sultan, by whom he was honourably conducted to Caire, and there preſented to Caytbeius, of whom he was graciouſly welcommed: vnto whom after due reuerence done, he declared the cauſe of his comming, as followeth:

Zemes his ſpeech to Caytbeius, Sultan of Ægypt.

C If it were not to me certainely knowne (moſt victorious) that you are not ignorant either who I am, or from whence deſcended, or with what injury enforced, after long and painefull trauell I am here arriued; it would much concerne me to vſe another manner of beginning of my ſpeech, and with greater proteſtation of words to ſeeke your gracious fauour. But foraſmuch as all theſe things are vnto your moſt royall Majeſty ſufficiently knowne, as I do well perceiue in this, that your infinite clemency hath entertained me with farre greater kindeneſſe, than I in ſuch my aduerſe fortune durſt wiſh for, much leſſe requeſt: Now nothing remaineth for me to ſay, more than juſtly to complaine vnto your inuincible Majeſty, of the wrong and iniury done vnto me by Bajazet, whom I may more juſtly tearme my cruell enemy than kinde brother. For he not contented to haue taken vnto himſelfe my fathers Empire by great tumult and ſlaughter, hath with all hoſtility and force of armes perſecuted me his brother, excluded out of the Impe- D riall City, and then liuing in Bythinia, troubleſome neither to him, nor any of his people, and neuer reſted vntill he had chaſed me out of the bounds of my fathers Empire. Neither hath the jealous deſire of Soueraignty (whereof my father whileſt he liued, had him alwaies in diſtruſt) ſo much moued him vnto this ſo cruell fact, as a certaine vnnaturall cruelty towards all his kindred in generall, and mortall hatred againſt me his brother in particular: for he which is already poſſeſſed of the Empire. and doth with all hoſtility perſecute a priuate perſon, ſubject and expoſed to his injury, that man thirſteth not after Soueraignty, but after bloud; neither deſireth he to conquer, but to kill. And whereas after my fathers death great troubles aroſe in Conſtantinople, and many bloudy skirmiſhes were fought betwixt the fauourites of both of vs, it cannot with any truth be laied to my charge, as done by mine aduiſe or counſell, I being at the ſame time ſo farre from thence. Neither am I juſtly to be blamed, if that after my fathers de- E parture I put my ſelfe vpon the way towards Conſtantinople, eſpecially being ſent for thither by many my good friends, men of great marke and quality: but his fortune preuailing, I gaue place, and leſt my comming to the Imperiall City might haue beene the occaſion of new troubles, I returned aſide into Bythinia, and ſo to Pruſa, with purpoſe there to haue reſted in quiet, if my brother would haue giuen me leaue. But ſo farre was he from that, to ſuffer me there to reſt, as that I was by him moſt cruelly aſſailed as an open enemy: and had I not by ſpeedy flight withdrawne my ſelfe from the imminent danger, and departed quite out of my fathers kingdome, I muſt haue yeelded my ſelfe, my bloud, and life, as a ſacrifice into his cruell hands. Neither is he to me ſo mortall an enemy, or thirſteth after my life ſo much for feare, as for very hatred and malice: for what is there in me to feare? Verily nothing: Conſtantinople is his, the fauour of the great Chiefetaines and men of warre is his, the treaſure and regall riches are all his; wherefore he F hateth his brother, but feareth him not. He will ſway all things alone, he will haue all that belongeth to the Othoman family alone, and he, yea, none but he, muſt liue alone. Xerxes was a mighty King, and yet in that great and large Kingdome he not onely preſerued his brethren in ſafety, but had them alſo in great honour and eſtimation. What did Alexander the Great? Who not onely tooke pleaſure in his brother, but had him alſo as a companion of his moſt glorious expedition : and many other famous G Kings of forreine Nations, and of our owne family, haue ruled both more ſafely, and better ſtrengthened, with the counſell and aid of their moſt louing brethren, rather than with others. But Bajazet is of a farre other minde, reputing violence and hautineſſe of heart to be his greateſt and ſureſt defence : herein his fierce nature delighteth, more than in the lawfull courſe of nature, juſtice, and equity ; he had rather haue his brother his enemy than his friend, and to driue him into exile, than to make him partaker of his counſels. But I beſeech thee moſt puiſſant Monarch, the faithfull keeper and maintainer of our Law and Religion, by the ſacred reliques of our great Prophet Mahomet, which thou haſt at Ieruſa- lem and Mecha, ſuffer me not, a Kings ſonne, to liue in baniſhment and exile, poore and miſerable, a ſcorne of his brothers cruelty, farre from home, farre from his country and Kingdome ; but regarding the Law of the great Prophet, lift vp the aflicted and oppreſſed, and by the great authority which you H haue, bridle domeſticall wrong ; or if that will not take place, reuenge it with thy ſword, and ſuffer not our Empire, with ſo great trauell founded, by the cruelty or folly of one wilfull man to be ouerthrowne : which ſhould be no more grieuous and lamentable to vs, than dangerous to your moſt high eſtate, and all other Kings and Princes of our Religion. For you of your ſelfe vnderſtand right well, what deadly enemies the Chriſtian Princes are vnto the Turks : and do you thinke that if any great warre (which I wiſh not) ſhould ariſe of this our diſcord, that they would long reſt in quiet, and as idle beholders ſtand looking on vntill it were of it ſelfe appeaſed? Or rather hauing ſuch an opportunity preſented, would not with might and maine ſuddenly inuade our Kingdome, before ſhaken with ciuile warres, and ſeeke the vtter ruine and deſtruction of the ſame? Which their deſire if that hatefull people could bring to paſſe (which thing Mahomet turne vpon themſelues) my minde abhorreth to thinke how farre that miſ- I chiefe would runne : For the Othoman family once rooted out, there is none of our Religion, (your Majeſty onely excepted) which is able to withſtand their power : wherefore you muſt then ſtand for your ſelfe and all the reſt, you alone muſt withſtand the force of the Chriſtians, you muſt maintaine that warre with much loſſe, and greater charge, and moſt vncertaine ſucceſſe. Wherefore, inuincible Monarch, I moſt humbly beſeech thee, that pittying our eſtate, whiles the matter is yet whole, and remedy is yet to be had, to deale with Bajazet by your Embaſſadours, That though he will not receiue me his bro- ther as partner of the Empire, yet at leaſt to admit me into ſome ſmall part of my fathers Kingdome : Let him raigne and rule, let all things be at his command ; let it be lawfull for me poore man but to liue in reſt and quiet ſomewhere, poſſeſſing but ſo much as may ſuffice me honeſtly to leade a priuate life. Which thing if he ſhall refuſe to grant, although he neither feare the Lawes of God or man, yet as I haue at Ieru- K ſalem, ſo will I alſo ſhortly at Mecha (if by your leaue I may) complaine vnto the great Prophet, of the injuries done vnto me by my cruell and vnnaturall brother ; and afterwards make proofe of your compaſſion towards me, all which I hope ſhall much auaile. But if (which I would not) I ſhall proue all theſe things in vaine, ſith deſperation enforceth men to all extremities, I will goe with fire, ſword, and ſlaugh-ter, by ſecret and open force, by right and wrong ; and hated, will vex my hatefull brother by all manner of miſchiefe, by all manner of reuenge. Neither will I make an end of confounding of all, vntill I be either receiued into part of the Empire, or elſe together with my life leaue thoſe deſperate and loſt things for him alone to enjoy. For I deeme it much better, quickly to die, than with diſgrace and infamy to protract a lingring loathed life.

The great Sultan in courteous manner comforted the diſtreſſed prince, willing him to be of L good cheere, and patiently to beare his preſent hap: foraſmuch as it became a man borne in ſo high fortune, not to be diſcouraged with any miſchance, or diſmaid if things fell out otherwiſe than he looked for: commending him withall, for that he ſaw in him no leſſe courage than might well haue becommed his better eſtate ; and willing him to liue ſtill in hope, promiſed to do what in him lay, to reconcile him to his brother, and to perſuade him that he might be receiued into ſome part of the kingdome : and to that purpoſe ſhortly after diſpatched away an honorable embaſſage to Bajazet. Zemes in the meane while, by the ſame Sultans leaue, vpon a ſuperſtitious deuotion trauelled into Arabia, to viſit the temple of Mahomet at Mecha, and his ſepulchre at Medina. Vpon his return to Caire, the Embaſſadors before ſent, returned al- M ſo, but not hauing obtained any thing they deſired : for Bajazet would not giue eare to any agreement, but ſeemed altogether to contemne and deſpiſe his brother. Wherfore Zemes more vpon ſtomacke & deſire of reuenge, than for any hope he had of the Empire, determined with Caytbeius the Ægyptian Sultan ſendeth embaſſadours to Bajazet.

A himſelfe, to make open war vpon him; repoſing ſome good hope in his ſecret friends, and in the reuolt of ſome of the great captaines, who diſcontented with the gouernment of Bajazet, ſecretly wiſhed for his returne.

Whileſt he was thus plotting theſe weighty matters, a meſſenger with letters came fitly from the King of Caramania, offering with all the power he could make, to joyne with him, if he would take vp armes againſt his brother. This poore titular King then liued in Armenia, and being able by his friends to make ſome good force, was in hope by joyning with Zemes, to recouer ſome part of the Caramanian Kingdome, from whence his father was not many yeres before driuen by the force of the late Turkiſh Emperour Mahomet the Great, Bajazet his father. It is hard to ſay, whither of theſe diſtreſſed and exiled Princes gaue the greater B encouragement to the other, to take this deſperate war in hand, being both together far vnable by all the friends they could make, to encounter with the great power of Bajazet. But what is ſo dangerous or deſperat, which aſpiring minds will not attempt in hope of a Kingdome? whoſe brightneſſe ſo dazeleth their eies, that they can ſee nothing but it.

Hereupon Zemes hauing receiued great gifts of the Ægyptian Sultan, with promiſe of aid, departed from Caire (the Sultan earneſtly perſuading him to the contrary) and as it was before appointed, met with the Caramanian King vpon the borders of Aſia the leſſer: where they concluded to joyne together ſuch forces as they had, and to inuade Bajazet. Which they accordingly did: for raiſing all the power they could, they entred into Cilicia, (now called Caramania) and joyning their armies together, incamped betweene Iconium and Larenda. C Neither did Bajazet in time of ſo great a danger ſit ſtill; not ſo much fearing his brothers power, as the reuolting of his captaines [illegible]ouldiers, whom he knew either to loue, or at leaſt not to hate the young Prince his brother. Wherefore he raiſed a great army, and ſent Achmetes (the great wan of war) before with the one part thereof, himſelfe following after with a far greater ſtrength: for at that time he had vnder his enſignes two hundred thouſand men.

As he was marching with this great army, a rumor was raiſed in the campe, That ſome of his chiefe captains had conſpired to betray him into the hands of his brother, and that many of the ſouldiers ſecretly fauouring Zemes, would vpon the joyning of the battell forſake him, and take part with his brother. Which report ſo troubled Bajazet, that he ſtood in doubt what to doe, or whom to truſt: but knowing that nothing winneth the heart of the common ſoldier D more, than the Generals bounty, he forthwith cauſed a wonderfull maſſe of mony to be diuided amongſt the captaines and ſoldiers, loding their minds with ample promiſes of far greater rewards, for their fidelity and valour to be ſhewed in that preſent ſeruice. Hauing thus aſſured himſelfe of the wauering minds of his ſouldiers, he began to draw neere to Iconium, where his enemies lay incamped: and by gloſing letters and flattering meſſengers made ſhew openly, as if he had beene very deſirous to come to ſome good agreement with them, but ſecretly went about to ſtop all the ſtreits and paſſages, in ſuch manner as that it ſhould not be poſſible for them againe to retyre backe into Syria: for he doubted nothing more, but leaſt they being few in number, and in ſtrength far vnequall vnto him, would not vpon ſo great diſaduantage hazard the fortune of a battell, but retyre themſelues into Syria, and ſo to his E exceeding trouble and infinite charge protract that war.

Zemes perceiuing his brothers ſubtill drift, and ſeeing no ſuch reuolt as he had hoped for, and as had before by letters to him bin promiſed; and weighing with reaſon his owne weake forces, retyred in good time vnto the ſtreits of the mountain Amanus, which diuideth Cilicia from Syria. Here, deſpairing of all good ſucceſſe in the enterpriſe he had taken in hand, he perſuaded the Caramanian King his confederate to giue place vnto the time, and to reſerue himſelfe vnto his better fortune: and ſo breaking vp his army, with a few of his followers came down to the ſea coaſt of Cilicia; where he hired a tall ſhip to attend in readineſſe, that if any ſudden danger ſhould ariſe, he might go aboord, and ſo ſaue himſelfe by ſea. In the mean time he ſent a meſſenger vnto Damboys Great Maſter of the Rhodes, certifying him, That for as F much as he had no place of ſafety left amongſt his owne people, wherein he might ſhroud himſelf from the fury of his brother, ſtill ſeeking after his life, he would vpon his ſafe conduct come to him into the Iſland of the Rhodes. Which his requeſt the Great Maſter eaſily granted, deeming the flight of ſo great a Prince from the Turke, to be a thing much profitable to the Chriſtian Commonweale: and thereupon he preſently ſent forth certaine gallies to fetch him him from the troubleſom coaſt of Cilicia. But before theſe gallies were come, Zemes was inforced by the ſudden acces of his enemies, for the auoiding of preſent danger, to go aboord G on that ſhip which hee had prouidently before prepared to be in readineſſe for ſuch purpoſe. And hauing put a little from the ſhore, ſhot back again an arrow with letters made faſt vnto it, directed vnto his brother Baiazet, containing as followeth:

Zemes his Letters to his brother Bajazets

Thou knoweſt (moſt vnkind and cruell brother) that I fly not vnto the Chriſtians, the mortal Enemies of the Othoman family, for hatred of my religion and nation; but inforced therunto by thy iniurious dealing, and dangerous practiſes which thou inceſſantly attempteſt againſt me, yea euen in my extreame miſerie. But this aſſured hope I carry with me, that the time will come when as thou the authour of ſo great wrong, or thy children, ſhall receiue the iuſt guerdon of this thy preſent tyrannie againſt mee thy brother. H

It is reported, That when Baiazet had read theſe letters, he was ſo troubled in mind, that for certaine daies he gaue himſelfe wholly to mourning and heauines, and would in no wiſe be comforted: inſomuch that he was brought into the campe by the Baſſaes, as a man halfe diſtraught of his wits, ſhunning for a ſeaſon all mens ſpeech and company.

Zemes flieth to the Rhodes.

Zemes ſailing to the Rhodes, was there honorably receiued of the Great Maſter, and all the reſt of the knights of the Order: to whom in their publick aſſembly three days after, he openly declared the cauſes of the diſcord betwixt his brother and him; alledging for colour of his rebellion, That although Bajazet were his elder brother, yet that he was born whilſt his father yet liued in priuat eſtate, vnder ſubiection and command, long before he poſſeſſed the Kingdome, and ſo no Kings ſon: whereas he himſelfe was the firſt born of his father, being an Emperour, and ſo not heire of his fathers priuat fortu [illegible] es was Bajazets) but of his greateſt honor I and empire; and yet not of ſuch an haughty mind, but that he could haue bin content to haue given place to his brother, ſo that he could haue bin contented likewiſe to haue granted him ſome ſmall portion of the empire, wherin he might ſafely haue liued as a poor prince, and his brother: but that ſuch was his pride, as that hee would not vouchſafe to ſuffer him to liue ſo much as a poor priuat life in any corner of ſo large an empire, and was therefore by his vnnaturall and tyrannous dealing inforced to craue aid of the Chriſtian princes; of whom forſomuch as he had alwaies heard much honor, he was in good hope to find ſuccor and reliefe in that his diſtreſſed eſtate; proteſting vnto God and the world, That if euer it ſhould bee his good fortune by their means and help to obtain the empire, he would neuer be vnmindfull of K ſo great a benefit, but to make with them a perpetual and inuiolable peace, and ſo to reſt their faſt friend for euer. The great Maſter on the other ſide comforting him with cheerfull ſpeeches, promiſed to keep him in ſafety from the fury of his brother, and further to commend his cauſe to the other Kings and Princes of Chriſtendom.

The deſcription of Zemes.

This exiled prince Zemes was about the age of 28 years when he came to the Rhodes; of ſtature tal, ſomwhat corpulent and wel limb'd, gray eyed, but looking ſomwhat aſquint; hook noſed, and in the middle riſing, in ſuch maner as the Perſians commend in their Kings; of colour brown, ſpare of ſpeech, and by nature cholerick; a great feeder, ſo that he ſeemed rather to deuour his meat, than to eat it; much delighted in ſwimming, & to lie abroad in the night; penſiue and melancholy, which men imputed to his great cares, neuer merry but in the com- L pany of the grand Maſter: a religious obſeruer of the ſuperſtition from which he could neuer be withdrawn during the long time he liued in exile: learned as among the Turks, ſo that hee wrot the hiſtory of his fathers life. But leauing him in ſafe keeping with the grand Maſter of the Rhodes, let vs again return to the courſe of our hiſtory.

Baiazet hauing now the ſecond time chaſed away his brother, after he had wel quieted that part of his troubled kingdom in Aſia, returned againe to Conſtantinople, carefully attending when ſome new motion ſhould be made by his brother to his further diſquiet. But when hee vnderſtood that he was with the Great Maſter of the Rhodes, he ſent certain of his Baſſa's (amongſt whom Achmetes the great ſouldier is reported to haue bin one) vnto the Great Maſter, requeſting him to deliuer vp Zemes, offering for him a wonderful ſum of money. Which M diſhonourable requeſt when it could by no means be obtained, the ſaid Embaſſadours in the name of their maſter concluded a peace very commodious for the Rhodians; wherin among other things it was agreed, That the Great Maſter ſhould keep Zemes in ſafe cuſtody, ſo that hee ſhould no more trouble the Turkiſh Empire: in conſideration whereof, and for his honourable

A notable vſage, Bajazet ſhould yearely pay vnto the Great Maſter thirty thouſand duckats the firſt of Auguſt, which was afterward accordingly paied.

It fortuned that whileſt Achmetes the great Baſſa (emploied in matters abroad) was abſent from the court, Bajazet diſcourſing with the other Baſſaes his graue counſellors, vpon his late expedition into Aſia againſt his brother, ſeemed to be highly offended with the vntruſtineſſe and doubtfull faith of ſome of his greateſt captains and ſoldiers; yet vpon whom he might iuſtly lay the blame, he well knew not, although it ſeemed by his talke, he ſhould ſomewhat diſtruſt the great captaine Achmetes. Hereupon Iſaac the moſt antient Baſſa of the court, and of greateſt authority next vnto Bajazet himſelfe (whoſe daughter, a lady of exceeding beauty, Achmetes had long before married, but doubting that ſhe had yeelded her honour to the B wanton luſt of Muſtapha the eldeſt ſon of Mahomet the late Emperour, had put her from him, and would by no means be reconciled; for which cauſe there was a ſecret hatred euer after betwixt thoſe two great Baſſaes) perceiuing the Emperors diſcontented and ſuſpitious humour, and deſiring nothing more than the deſtruction of Achmetes, took hold vpon this opportunity, and by all meanes he could deuiſe, encreaſed the ſuſpition of the treaſon, which had already too much poſſeſſed the jealous Emperor: ſometimes craftily imagining intelligence to haue paſſed betwixt Zemes and Achmetes; and forthwith amplifying his power and authority, which (as he ſaid) was ſo great with the Ianizaries and ſoldiers of the court, that they by reaſon of his often imployments, were wholly at his deuotion; ſo that he might at his pleaſure do more in Zemes his quarrell, than ſhould ſtand for the ſafety of Bajazet; a matter well to be conſidered C of, and alſo carefully preuented. For remedy of which dangers, it was thought neceſſary, that Achmetes at his returne to court, ſhould be taken away and ſlaine.

Achmetes fearing nothing leſſe than that which was contriued againſt him, came after his wonted manner to the court; and was with the other great Baſſaes inuited to a ſolemne ſupper which Bajazet had commanded to be prepared, to ſolace himſelfe after his trauels (as it was giuen out) with his chiefe Baſſaes. To this royall ſupper came Achmetes with the reſt of the bidden gueſts, miſtruſting nothing, and was there ſumptuouſly feaſted by Bajazet: who to make his gueſts the merrier, dranke wine plentifully himſelfe, cauſing them alſo to drinke in like manner; ſo that they were full of wine: a thing vtterly forbidden by their law, yet dayly more and more vſed, eſpecially by their great men in their feaſts. Supper now ended, and the D night far ſpent, Bajazet in token that they were welcome, and ſtood in his good grace, cauſed certaine rich robes of pleaſing colours to be brought forth, and to be caſt vpon euery of his gueſts one, giuing beſides vnto euery one of them a faire guilt boule full of gold. But vpon Achmetes was caſt a gowne of blacke veluet, which among the Turks may well be called the mantle of death, being ſo ſure a token of the Emperors heauy indignation, as that it is death for any man once to open his mouth, or to intreat for him vpon whom it is by the Emperours commandement ſo caſt. Achmetes ſeeing himſelfe now vnder the ſhadow of death, and knowing it but vaine to intreat for mercy, as he was a man of great ſpirit, brake forth and ſaid, Oh cachpogly (which is as much as to ſay, thou ſonne of a whore) ſith thou intendedſt ſo much cruelty againſt me, why didſt thou not put it in execution before thou hadſt inforced me to drink E this impure and forbidden wine? and ſo caſting his eies vpon the ground ſat ſtill. The other Baſſa's hauing leaue to depart, giuing thanks to the Emperor, and crauing pardon for their exceeſſe, kiſſed the ground at his feet and ſo departed: with whom Achmetes offered to haue gone out alſo, but was forthwith commanded to ſit ſtill, for that the Emperour had to talke with him in ſecret. The Baſſa's were no ſooner departed, but the terrible executioners of Bajazet his wrath ſtept in, and laid hands vpon Achmetes to haue ſlaine him; when one of the Eunuchs in greateſt fauor with the tyrant, ſtanding by, aduiſed him not to be too haſty in executing of ſo great a man, ſo entirely beloued of his beſt ſouldiers and men of war, but rather to ſtay his execution for a while to ſee how the matter would be digeſted; and in the meane time by torture to wreſt it out from him what might be got, to make it in ſome ſort appeare, that he died F for his due deſert. Hereupon Bajazet deferred his execution to a further time, and cauſed him there preſently to be ſtript, and carried away to be tortured.

Amongſt other gallants of the court which attended the comming out of the great Baſſaes whom they followed, was one of Achmetes his ſons, a gentleman of great hope; who miſſing his father among the reſt, began preſently to miſtruſt that all went not wel; & ſpeedily running from one of the Baſſaes to another, with much ado learned the hard eſtate of his father: whereof he was alſo at the ſame inſtant aduertiſed by a ſecret friend neere about BajaZet. Hereupon this yong gentleman began forthwith piteouſly to lament his fathers miſhap, and to exclaim againſt the cruelty of Bajazet; called on the Ianizaries for aid, putting them in remembrance of his fathers great and manifold deſerts towards them, together with his imminent danger: and ſo running vp and downe the city in the dead time of the night, had in ſhort time raiſed vp all the Ianizaries in armes: who vnderſtanding of the danger of their antient commander, who they generally loued and honored as their father, came running by heaps from all parts of the city vnto the court gate, there with terrible exclamations doubling and redoubling their Bre, Bre, (which barbarous word they commonly vſe in expreſſing their greateſt diſcontentment and fury) & did indeed ſo furiouſly beat at the court gate, that Bajazet fearing leaſt they ſhould breake in by violence, cauſed the outer gate to be ſet open, and ſhewing himſelfe from aboue out of a yron window, demanded of them the cauſe of that tumult and vprore. To whom they inſolently anſwered, That they would by and by teach him as a drunkard, a beaſt, and a raſcall, to vſe his great place and calling with more ſobriety and diſcretion: and among many other opprobrious words wherewith they ſhamefully loded him, they called him oftentimes by the name of Bengi, Bengi (that is to ſay, Batchelor or Scholler) which amongſt thoſe martiall men, contemners of all learning, is accounted a word of no ſmall reproch and diſgrace. And after they had in moſt deſpightfull manner thus reuiled him, they proudly commanded him forthwith to deliuer Achmetes vnto them, or elſe to take that ſhould enſue thereof. Bajazet terrified with this inſolency of the Ianizaries, and fearing ſome ſudden violence to be offred, commanded Achmetes to be without delay deliuered vnto them: which was done in ſuch haſt, that he was brought forth before them almoſt naked, bare legged, and bare headed, bearing in his body the manifeſt markes of his hard vſage. The Ianizaries receiuing him with great rejoycing, ſupplied his want of apparell with ſuch habiliments, as they for that purpoſe vpon the ſudden tooke from Bajazets minions: and ſo taking him vpon their ſhoulders, with great joy carried him out of the court, ſtill crying vnto him, How he did, and how he felt himſelfe? And ſo guarded him home, ready no doubt to haue ſlaine Bajazet and rifled the court, if he would haue but ſaid the word. But he yet loyall, laboured with good words to appeaſe that tumult, and to pacifie the fury: excuſing that which Bajazet had done againſt him, to haue been done only to correct him, for that happily he had forgotten ſome part of obedience and duty. Neuertheleſſe, hereupon remained no ſmall heart burning betwixt Bajazet and the Ianizaries for a long time after: yet Bajazet for feare of them reconciled himſelfe to Achmetes, and in open ſhew had him in greater honour than before, promoting him euen vnto the higheſt degrees of honor, howbeit he inwardly hated him to death. And the more by the continuall inſtigation of the old Baſſa Iſaac: by whoſe perſuaſion, when it was thought that all had been forgotten, he was by Bajazets commandement as he ſat at ſupper in the court, thruſt through the body and ſlaine. This was the miſerable end of Achmetes, the great champion of the Turks, and one of the greateſt enemies of Chriſtendome that euer liued in the Turkiſh court: for by him, Mahomet ſubuerted the Empire of Trapezond, tooke the great city of Caffa (called in antient time Theodoſia) with all the countrey of Taurica Cherſoneſus, the impregnable city of Croia, with all the kingdome of Epirus, the ſtrong city of Scodra, and a great part of Dalmatia, and laſt of all Otranto, to the terror of all Italy: by him alſo, BajaZet vanquiſhed and put to flight his brother Zemes, as is before declared. In reward of which good ſeruices, he was by the tyrant (vpon a meere ſuſpition) thus cruelly and ſhamefully murthered. About this time alſo, Caigubus (Zemes his ſonne) then but a childe, was by the commandement of Bajazet his vncle, ſtrangled, in the new tower of Conſtantinople.

Bajazet for feare deliuereth Achmetes to the Ianizaries.

Achmetes ſlaine.

Bajazet now grieuouſly offended with the pride and late inſolency of the Ianizaries, cauſed ſecret inquiry to be made, of them which were the authors of thoſe late ſtirs; & finding them to be the officers of their companies, and ſpecially thoſe which had before ſlain Mahomet Baſſa the great polititian, immediatly after the death of Mahomet the late Emperor, at which time they had alſo raiſed great tumults, and done much harme in the city; he vnder color of preferment, ſent away thoſe authors of ſedition into diuers parts of his Empire, appointing vnto them (as vnto old ſoldiers and men of good deſert) certaine lands and reuenues for their maintenance and preferment. But as ſoone as they were departed, he by ſecret letters commanded

A the gouernors and magiſtrats in thoſe places wherunto they were ſent,ſuddenly to apprehend them,and as traitors put them to death; which was accordingly done. The Ianizaries of the court and about Conſtantinople,hearing what had hapned to their fellowes,became wonderfull diſcontented, and began to mutine in diuers places of the city, vttering ſpeeches againſt the Emperour full of deſpight and reuenge. Which thing when Bajazet vnderſtood,and had well conſidered the late danger he was in,together with the intollerable pride and inſolencie of thoſe his maſterfull ſlaues; he ſecretly purpoſed in himſelfe for curing of ſo dangerous a diſeaſe,to vſe a moſt deſperat remedy: which was, ſuddenly to kill and deſtroy all the Ianizaries, eſpecially thoſe which were belonging to the court, or about Conſtantinople. This his purpoſe he imparted to diuers of his greateſt Baſſaes,charging them vpon paine of his heauy B diſpleaſure not to diſcloſe it:and for the execution therof,had ſent for great numbers of thoſe ſoldiers,which are called Acanzij,who are among the Turks reputed for the beſt ſort of common ſouldiers. Moſt of all the Baſſa's to whom he had imparted this his cruell deuiſe,much diſliked thereof,as too full of perill and danger: yet ſeeing him fully reſolued for the performance therof,would not,or durſt not ſay any thing to the contrary. Only Alis & Iſhender Baſſa (both diſcended of the honorable family of Michael Ogli) diſſuaded him from attempting any ſuch thing:alledging firſt,that the Ianizaries were in number many,ſoldiers of great courage and experience,reſolute men,and ſuch as would ſell their liues deare:Then,admitting that he ſhould kill all them about the court and in Conſtantinople; yet foraſmuch as all his ſtrong towns and caſtles,eſpecially in the frontiers and chiefe places of his dominions, were C poſſeſſed and holden by ſtrong garriſons of other Ianizaries, fellows & friends of theſe (who would vndoubtedly take vp arms in defence of themſelues,and reuenge of their dead friends) it were a thing very like to endanger himſelfe,together with the whole ſtate of his empire,beſide the great diſhonour which would grow vnto himſelfe thereby for euer.

Bajazet purpoſeth to deſtroy the Ianizaries.

This ſo dangerous an exploit,wherin the hands of ſo many were to be vſed, was not kept ſo ſecret, but that the vigilant and wily Ianizaries had got an inckling therof;and therupon began dayly more & more to ſuſpect the matter,both by the often and ſecret repaire of the great men to the court, more then they had before ſeen, & alſo by the vnwonted multitude of thoſe Acanzij,which were dayly brought vnto the imperial city by great troups. Wherfore fearing to be ſuddenly ſurpriſed,they banded themſelues together,and openly ſtood vpon their gard: D and by chance lighting vpon Alis Beg as he came from the court,(who was indeed their beſt friend) after their barbarous manner,with many opprobrious & contumelious words,demanded of him,if he were not one of them who had conſpired their deſtruction:and without more ado had preſently ſlain him,had he not (as a wel ſpoken man) with great proteſtations & oths perſuaded them, that he neuer conſented to any ſuch thing, or that they needed to feare any ſuch thing from him: and ſo with much ado rid himſelfe out of their hands.

Bajazet ſeeing his purpoſe diſcouered,and that he could not without great bloudſhed, and danger both to his eſtate and perſon,worke his will vpon the Ianizaries; by the counſell and aduice of them that ſaw further into the matter, to colour his former intention, commanded by open proclamation, That the Ianizaries and other his men of war (of whom he had a great E power now aſſembled at Conſtantinople) to be in readineſſe againſt a certain prefixed day, to go with him into Moldauia,as if he had raiſed that power for that purpoſe only. But when the time was come that he ſhould ſet forward,the Ianizaries put themſelues in order of battel by themſelues, and would in no wiſe ioyne themſelues with the reſt of the army, or receiue the Emperor into the midſt of their ranks,as they had alwaies before accuſtomed; but furiouſly ſhaking their weapons at him,told him plainly, that he had ſought their deſtruction, and bid him therefore if he thought it ſo good,to ſet his executioners to worke vpon them, whom he ſhould find both ready and able to defend themſelues. To pacify their fury, Bajazet was glad to giue them good words,and to vſe al the means he could (by his great Baſſa's and other captains which were able to do any thing with them) to perſuade them to be quiet;ſwearing vnto F them by the holy ſoule of his father (a ſolemne oath amongſt the Turks) that he would not harme or wrong the meaneſt of them. So with much ado they were at length appeaſed, and receiued Bajazet into the midſt of them, as their wonted manner was.

This dangerous tumult ſo quieted, Bajazet ſet forward, and paſſing ouer Danubius, entred into Moldauia, where he firſt layd ſiege to a ſtrong town ſtanding vpon the Euxine ſea,called of the Turks Kele, but in antient time Achilleia, which was at length deliuered vnto him by compoſition. From thence he went to Ac-Girmen, otherwiſe called Aſprocaſtron, which after a months ſiege was alſo deliuered by compoſition: which two ſtrong places ſo woon, he returned again to Conſtantinople.

Many great Princes ſue to the Maſter of the Rhodes for Zemes.

Many great Princes deſirous of Zemes, labored by their embaſſadors to haue obtained him of the Great Maſter of the Rhodes: firſt Bajazet his brother, fearing leſt he ſhould at one time or other again break forth vpon him, or els ſet vp by the Chriſtian Princes, trouble his eſtate, offred great ſums of money to haue had him deliuered into his hands: and Charles the French king purpoſing the conqueſt of Naples, (which he in few yeres after performed) and after that to haue inuaded Grecia, thought Zemes a moſt fit inſtrument for the furtherance of thoſe his high deſigns, and was therfore wonderfull deſirous to haue had him. Matthias alſo K. of Hungary (a fortunat Warriour againſt the Turke) perſuaded that the hauing of him might be vnto him a great furtherance in the courſe of his victories, ſought by all the meanes he could to haue obtained him. At which time alſo Innocentius the eight of that name, B. of Rome, no leſſe deſirous than the reſt, to haue in his keeping ſo great a pledge of peace and war (the bridle of the Turks fury, together with the large penſion he was ſure to receiue yearely from Bajazet for the ſafe cuſtody of him) ſo wrought the matter by Lyonel Biſhop of Concordia, his cunning Legat, that the Great Maſter, fearing on the one ſide to be conſtrained by the great power of Bajazet, to grant that he had ſo often refuſed, and now ſo earneſtly ſolicited on the other ſide by the Biſhop, cauſed Zemes to be deliuered to him at Rome in the yeare 1488: for which doing he was by the Biſhop honoured with the honour and title of a Cardinall. So Zemes to the great profit of the Biſhop (who receiued from Bajazet a yerely penſion of forty thouſand duckats) remained in ſafe cuſtody at Rome all the time of Innocentius, and alſo of Alexander the ſixth his ſucceſſor: vntill that the French King Charles the eight, paſſing through the heart of Italy with a ſtrong army againſt Alphonſus king of Naples, in the yere 1495, and making his way through the city of Rome, ſo terrified the great Biſhop (who altogether fauoured & furthered the title of Alphonſus) that he was glad to yeeld to ſuch articles and conditions as pleaſed the king: and among the reſt, to giue in hoſtage vnto the king his graceleſſe ſon Cæſar Borgia Valentinus, and alſo to deliuer to him Zemes his honourable priſoner, as ſhall be afterwards in place conuenient at large declared.

In the beginning of Bajazet his reigne, whileſt he was buſied againſt his brother Zemes in Aſia, Iohn Caſtriot the ſon of Scanderbeg, aided by the Venetians, after he had fortunatly ouerthrowne the Turke in a battell neere vnto Croia, recouered a great part of Epirus out of their poſſeſſion. At which time alſo Iohn Chernouich a Chriſtian Prince of Albania, caſting off the Turkiſh yoke impoſed vpon him by the late Emperor Mahomet, ſuddenly took vp armes, and by the help of the Venetians valiantly repulſed the enemies out of that part of Albania; and ſo troubled Bajazet, that he was glad to ſuffer him peaceably to inioy all that he had by force recouered, and further to content himſelfe with a ſmall tribute for the reſt.

Bajazet inuadeth Caramania.

Bajazet highly offended with Abraham (whom ſome call Pyramet) the King of Caramania, for aiding his brother Zemes againſt him; in reuenge thereof raiſed a great army both in Europe and Aſia, and marching alongſt Aſia the leſſe, through the countries of Phrygia, Myſia, Caria, Lydia, and Pamphilia, entered at length into Caramania. But the king of Caramania, hearing before of his comming, and knowing himſelf too weak too meet him in field, fortified the ſtrong Cities and places of his Kingdome, and retyred with his army into the ſtreits of the mountain Taurus, where it parteth Cilicia from Syria; wherein he was in more ſafety than in any of his ſtrongeſt holds. Bajazet finding no way to come to him, ſpent moſt part of the Summer in ſpoyling of the open country: but perceiuing his enemies could not ſo be drawn into the field, he layd ſiege vnto the famous city of Tarſus, being the chiefe City of the champaine part of Cilicia (the natiue place of S. Paul the Apoſtle) and in ſhort time ſo battered the wals of his City with his great ordance, that he had made them ſaultable. The Citiſens conſidering the danger they were in, offered to deliuer vp their City, their liberty, liues, and goods reſerued. Of which their offer Bajazet accepted, and moſt honourably performed his promiſe for their ſafety; not permitting any of his ſouldiers to enter the City, more than ſuch as muſt needs for the guard of his perſon, and ſafe keeping of the City. And foraſmuch as Winter began now to grow faſt on, he diſperſed his ſouldiers into the Countrey Tarſus in Cilicia yeelded to Bajazet.

trey villages round about, not ſuffering the countrey people to til or ſow their land, or to do any thing els which might turne to their profit or good, whereby they were inforced to yeeld themſelues wholly to his deuotion. The Caramanian King ſeeing his people dayly fall from him, & fearing to be at length forſaken of his ſoldiers alſo, in this his diſtres obtained aid both of men and mony from Caytbeius the great Sultan of Ægypt, and ſo withal the power he could make, tooke the field, with the firſt of the next Spring, fully reſolued to try the fortune of a battel, although in ſtrength and power he knew himſelf much inferior to his puiſſant enemy.

Bajazet glad to ſee his enemy ſo forward, ſpeedily aſſembled his army, and without delay offered him battell: which the Caramanian King refuſed not. So between them was begun a fierce and terrible fight; which by the skilfull conduct of the leaders, and exceeding courage of the ſouldiers, was maintained the whole day with doubtfull victory and great ſlaughter on both ſides, new ſupplies ſtill comming on in ſtead of them which were ſlaine. The day declining, the Caramanian King (whoſe fatall deſtiny had now appointed him vnto his laſt work) ſeeing his wearied ſoldiers rather ouerlaid with multitude, than vanquiſhed by force, to begin to giue ground to their enemies; couragiouſly thruſt forward with his guard and other valiant ſoldiers about him, with ſuch fury, that he brake into the midſt of his enemies battaile; where being known, he was forthwith enuironed by the Turks, and ſo hardly charged on euery ſide, that hauing his horſe ſlain vnder him, he was inforced to fight on foot; where after he had with his owne hand ſlain diuers of his enemies, he fell down dead in the midſt of them. His ſoldiers diſcouraged with his death, turned their backs & fled, and in flying were for the moſt part either ſlain or taken priſoners. After this victory, Bajazet ſpeedily ouerran all that large countrey, and without reſiſtance in ſhort time brought vnder his obeyſance all the countrey of Cilicia.

There was at that time in that part of Cilicia which is called Trachea, and lieth toward the ſea ſide, an antient Mahometan Prince who had vnder his command moſt part of that countrey, with the famous and populous city of Scandeloro, the chiefe place of his reſiance. This prince had of long time liued betwixt the Chriſtian kings & the kings of Caramania, as neuter, ſtill fearing the greater, but indeed louing neither: and had till then chiefly maintained his ſtate by the allyance he and his anceſtors continually held with the Kings of Cyprus and the grand maſters of the Rhodes. Againſt this poore prince, the only one now left in Aſia the leſſe, not ſubiect to the Turkiſh kings, began Bajazet now to turn his forces; purpoſing before he proceeded any further, to make a full conqueſt of the leſſer Aſia, and ſo to make all ſure behind him. Of which his purpoſe the Prince hauing knowledge, and wiſely weighing his own ſmall power to withſtand ſo puiſſant an enemy, offred by his Embaſſadors to deliuer to Bajazet his chief city of Scandeloro, with all the reſt of his territory in Cilcia, vpon condition, that Bajazet ſhould giue vnto him other poſſeſſions for it, in ſome other part of Aſia the leſſer, to the like value. Which his offer Bajazet accepted, and ſo became lord of all the ſea coaſt, from the ſtreits of Boſphorus, to the confines of Syria.

After he had thus conquered Cilicia, with a great part of the mountain Taurus, he deſcended into Armenia the leſſe, and in ſhort time brought vnder his ſubiection ſo much of that country, as alſo of Cappadocia, as was ſomtime belonging to the Caramanian Kings. When Bajazet had thus ſlain the Caramanian King, and ſubdued that moſt antient kingdome of the Turks, which had long and many times mightily contended with the glory and power of the Othoman Kings, he left Muſtapha, one of his great Baſſaes, at Iconium, with his Aſian army, to keep in obedience thoſe new woon countries: and as a triumphant conquerour returned himſelfe to Conſtantinople, where he was of his ſubiects ioyfully receiued.

After that Bajazet had thus inlarged his Empire with the kingdom of Caramania, and was now become an vnwelcome neighbour vnto the great Sultan of Ægypt and Syria; he began to ſwell in diſdain againſt that mighty Prince, for that he had giuen aid againſt him, firſt vnto his brother Zemes, and after that to the Caramanian King in theſe late wars: of which wrong purpoſing to be reuenged, he ſhortly after appointed one Caragoſa Baſſa his lieutenant in Aſia, with Iſkender another of his great Captaines, with a ſtrong army to inuade Syria, then part of the great Sultans Kingdome. Theſe two great commanders well appointed for the purpoſe, when they were come to the vttermoſt parts of Cilicia, the new bounds of Bajazets Empire, were then to paſſe by the confines of Aladeules his Kingdome, before they could paſſe the great mountaine Taurus to come into Syria. This Aladules commanded as king ouer the rude G and fierce people which dwelt alongſt that great and rough mountaine, and was then in league with the Sultan. He hearing of the approach of the Turks army, with a great number of his mountain people lay in ambuſh in the ſtreits whereby the Turks muſt needs paſſe, of purpoſe to intercept them. Iſhender marching in the vantguard with a great number of the voluntary ſouldiers called Acanzij, as the manner of the Turks is, and fearing nothing leſſe, than to be ſet vpon by the mountain King, before he was aware was come into the midſt of his enemies, and was by them ſo fiercely charged on euery ſide for their places of aduantage, that he there loſt moſt part of his men, and forſaken of the reſt, which ſought by flight to ſaue themſelues, he with his two ſons and others were taken priſoners. Michael-Beg the eldeſt of the two, being faſt bound, was ſlain by one of Aladules his followers, whoſe brother he had ſlain in that skirmiſh: H his head being cut off, was by the commandment of Aladules carried to his father Iſhender, the more to grieue him: who diſdainfully willed the meſſenger not to ſhew it vnto him, but to bid his maſter eat it if he would. With which anſwer Aladules was exceedingly mooued; neuertheleſſe pittying the old mans miſery, he ſhortly after ſet Iaxis-Beg the yonger brother at liberty: but Iſhender himſelfe he ſent priſoner to Caitbeius the great Sultan at Caire, where he remained in priſon fiue yeres after. Caragoſes the Baſſa diſcouraged with the loſſe of ſo great a man, retyred with his army backe againe into Cilicia, and from thence aduertiſed Bajazet what had hapned, by whom he was commanded to return to Conſtantinople, as a man vnfit for ſo great an enterpriſe.

Achmetes being diſcomfited is taken priſoner, and ſent to Caire.

The next Spring following, Bajazet conſtant in his former reſolution for the inuaſion of Siria, I ſent Achmetes another of his Baſſa's, with a far greater army than had Caragoſes, againſt the Sultan: who was no ſooner come to the further part of Cilicia, but he was there at a place, called of the Turks, Tzucur Oua, encountred by the Ægyptians & Arabians, and there in a great battell ouerthrowne; wherein he himſelfe fighting moſt valiantly, loſt two of his fingers, and being taken priſoner was ſent to Caire.

Bajazet with this ouerthrow rather inſenced than diſcouraged, made great preparation the next yere againſt the Sultan both by ſea and land, ſuch as he had not before at any time made.
And when all things were now in readines, ſent Alis Baſſa (of ſome called Calibeus) and Cherſeogles his ſonne in law, two notable captains, with a great and puiſſant army by land, againſt the Ægyptian Sultan: at which time he requeſted of the Venetians, with whom he was then in K league, That he might by their good leaue, as occaſion required, refreſh his fleet (then ready to put to ſea for the inuaſion of Syria, as he ſaid) in their Iſland of Cyprus. Which his requeſt was by the generall conſent of the Senat denied, as a thing tending to the great danger of their State: yet wiſely doubting leſt Bajazet taking that deniall in euill part, ſhould ſeeke to haue that by force, which he could not obtain by requeſt, they preſently ſent Franciſco Priuolo their Admirall, to ſea with thirty gallies for the defence of that Iſland. He hearing that one fleet of the Turks gallies, lately come out of Helleſpontus, lay houering at the Iſland of Sciros, expecting a far greater from the coaſt of Ionia; and carefully conſidering how ſecret and ſudden the Turkiſh deſignements were, although it was giuen out that al this great preparation was made againſt the Sultan: yet to prouide that they ſhould not ſuddenly ſurpriſe the Iſle L he ſpeedily ſent ſundry companies of ſoldiers, eſpecially archers, out of Creta into Cyprus, for the better defence thereof; but ſtayed himſelfe with his fleet at the Iſland of Naxos, that ſo at hand he might be the readier to withſtand whatſoeuer the Turks intended. But when he vnderſtood that all their fleet was met, and now ſet forward, he hoyſed ſayle, & held his courſe directly for Cyprus. In the meane time the Turkiſh fleet ſayling alongſt the coaſt of Lycia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia, kept on their courſe vntil they came vpon the coaſt of Syria: by which time Calibeus and Cherſeogles were come with a mighty army into Cilicia, neer to the mountaine Taurus.

Caitbeius the Ægyptian Sultan hauing before had certain intelligence of the great preparation that Bajazet had made againſt him, had before ſent Vsbeg a moſt valiant and politick captaine, M with a ſtrong army of his Mamalukes and other his moſt expert ſouldiers into Syria, to be ready at all times to withſtand the Turks. This worthy Chieftaine vnderſtanding of the comming of the Turks army, thought it greater policy, to carry the calamities which alwayes wait vpon great armies, into the enemies country, than to receiue it into his own boſom. And

A therfore although he knew himſelfe for number to be far inferior to his enemies, yet ſupplying that want with the valor, courage, and aſſured confidence he had repoſed in the approued and inuincible force of his Mamalukes, he expected not the comming of the enemy into Syria, but paſſing ouer the mountain Amanus, and ſo deſcending into Cilicia, met him not far from Tarſus, in the ſame place (as it was thought) where Alexander the great had long before in a great battel vanquiſhed Darius.

A long and terrible battell betwixt the Turks and the Mamalukes.

Theſe two puiſſant armies come from far out of diuers parts of the world, the one to meet the other, were no ſooner come together, but that with like cheerfulnes they joined battell; and that with ſuch violence and fury, that the earth ſeemed to tremble vnder their feet, and a moſt preſent deſtruction threatned vnto them all: which terrible and cruel fight was B maintained all that day, with doubtful victory, and exceeding ſlaughter on both ſides; the politique Generals with new ſupplies of freſh ſoldiers continually relieuing the moſt diſtreſſed parts of their battels; and they likewiſe as men prodigall of their liues, reſolutely offering themſelues to all dangers. When this moſt dreadful fight had in this ſort endured the whole day, and many thouſands of valiant men of late aliue, lay now dead vpon the gronnd, the approaching night brake off the battel, and both the armies ſore wearied and weakned (but eſpecially the Turks) retyred to their camps, where they reſted that night.

But the Egyptians comming to their camp, found all their Cariages with their prouiſion of victuals and other neceſſaries quite taken away and gon. Which thing (as ſome write) the bordering people of the country (for moſt part liuing vpon robery) had don in time of the C battel, to pleaſe the Turks: or as ſome others report, they which had the charge therof, terrified with the greatnes of the Turks army, and doubtfulnes of the battel, fled away, & taking their way alongſt the ſea ſide, fled into the hands of the Turkes which were put on ſhore out of the gallies, and ſo were of them ſpoiled. Howſoeuer it was (for in ſo great vncertainty I dare not affirm) certain it is, that the Egyptians were ſore troubled with the loſſe of their prouiſion, fearing that if they ſhould now ſtay longer in the Country, they ſhould forthwith be driuen to great extremities for want of neceſſaries. Wherfore when they had euil reſted that night, the next day early in the morning they preſented themſelues in order of battel before their enemies, brauing them into the field, and daring them battel. The Turks diſdaining to ſee any prouder in field than themſelues, after they had in good order ranged their battels, ſet forward D with enſignes diſplaid againſt their proud enemies. There began a moſt terrible bloudy battel, fought with ſuch deſperat reſolution, as if they had ſolemnly vowed, either to ouercome, or die in the place where they ſtood. A man would haue ſaid that the former daies fury had bin but a play in compariſon of this: many valiant ſouldiers with their dead bodies couered the ſame ground wheron they liuing ſtood, when they receiued the firſt incounter of their Enemies. Of both thoſe great armies none were ſeen to giue ground, or once look backe; the Turks Ianizaries & the Egiptians Mamalukes (the vndoubted ſtrength of the greateſt Mahometan Monarchs, ſoldiers for their valor much feared, & through the world renowned) there buckled together, and ſtanding foot to foot, ſpent the vttermoſt of their forces one vpon another; as if they would in that battel haue made it known vnto the world, which of them were E to be accounted the beſt ſoldiers. Whilſt victory ſtood thus doubtfull, and the day was now far ſpent, Vsbeg the Egyptian General, with fifteen thouſand valiant horſmen (whom hee had reſerued for that purpoſe) gaue a freſh aſſault vpon the Turks ſquadrons, with ſuch force, that they had much ado to keep their order, and began now to giue ground: which was by and by made good again by other freſh men ſpeedily brought on by the Baſſa's. Then became the battel more fierce than before, euery man ſtriuing to the vtmoſt of his power to ſel his life to his enemies as dear as he could. In which maner of fight all the reſt of the day was ſpent, vntill that after the going down of the Sun, the darknes of the night comming faſt on, they were glad for lacke of light to breake off the battell, and to retyre themſelues into their camps, not knowing as yet who had got the better.

F The Turks Baſſa's taking view of the army, and finding that of an hundred thouſand fighting men, which they brought into the field, there was ſcarce a third part left, and moſt of them alſo maimed or hurt; & doubting to be ſet vpon again the next morning by their reſolute enemies, fled away ſecretly the ſame night, leauing behind them for haſt their tents well ſtored with victuals and all other things needfull. The Ægyptians alſo hauing loſt one half of their army (which was at the firſt ſeuenty thouſand) and wanting their neceſſary prouiſions, were retyred alſo the ſame night into the mountaine Taurus, not knowing any thing of the flight of the Turks. And ſome of the ſouldiers paſſing quite ouer the mountaine without ſtay, into Syria, raiſed a report all ouer the countrey as they went, That the Sultans army was ouerthrown, and that the Turks had got the victory: ſo vncertaine was the true knowledge of the euent of that battel, euen to them that were preſent therein. The Ægyptians lying that night vpon the ſide of the mountaine, had ſpeedy intelligence from Aladules, of the flight of the Turks: which being alſo confirmed by his eſpials to be true, he preſently came downe from the mountaine, and entred into the Turks campe, where he found plenty of victuals and of all other things needfull for the refreſhing of his army.

Aladules the mountain king, with the people called Varſacide, by whoſe confines the Turks muſt needs in their returne paſſe, robbed and ſlew many of them in their diſordred flight; and had ſo ſtopped the paſſages, that they were in flying ouertaken by the Mamalukes, and ſlaine with ſo great a ſlaughter, that of all that great army of the Turks few remained aliue to carry news home. Calibeius and Cherſeogles the Baſſaes, were in that flight both taken priſoners, and afterwards preſented to Caytbeius the Sultan, at Caire, with eighteen enſignes of the Turks Sanzacks, which are great men amongſt them, hauing euery one of them the regiment and command of ſome one prouince or other, and are in degree next vnto the Baſſaes.

Neither was the fortune of Bajazet his nauie at ſea, better than that of his army at land: for as it lay at rode vpon the coaſt of Syria at the mouth of the riuer Orontes, which runneth by the famous city of Antioch, his gallies were by tempeſt and rage of the ſea put from their anchors, and in the ſight of their enemies ſwallowed vp of the ſea, or elſe driuen vpon the maine, and there with the ſurges of the ſea beaten in pieces. Bajazet not a little troubled with theſe loſſes both by ſea and land, at length with much ado, by his Embaſſadors concluded a peace with the Sultan, vnto whom he reſtored all ſuch places as he had before taken from him: for which the Sultan deliuered vnto him Calibeius, Cherſeogles, Achmetes, and Iſbender, with all the reſt of the Turks priſoners, which he had in great number in his keeping.

Shortly after this peace was concluded betwixt theſe two great and mighty Princes, Caytbeius the Sultan died: who of a Circaſſian ſlaue, by many degrees of honour, and by the fauor of the Mamalukes his fellowes, obtained the rich Kingdome of Ægypt, which he right worthily gouerned to his immortall praiſe by the ſpace of two and twenty yeares; commanding at one time the great and rich countrey of Ægypt, with all Affricke, as farre as Cyrene, Weſtward; and Iudea, with a great part of Arabia, and all Syria, vnto the great and famous riuer Euphrates, Eaſtward. In the latter end of his reigne he (ouercome with the importunitie of his wife Dultibe, an Arabian borne, a woman of a haughty ſpirit) ioyned his ſonne Mahomethes, a yong man of about foure and twenty yeares old, with him in the fellowſhip of his kingdome; that ſo poſſeſſed of it his father yet liuing, he might the better inioy it after his death. Contrary to the cuſtome of the Mamulukes, who of long time had not vſed to haue their king by ſucceſſion, but by their free election. Who grudging to be thus defrauded of their wonted choice, immediatly after the death of Caytbeius ſlew Mahomethes his ſon; and in a few months after, foure moe, who one after another without their good liking had aſpired vnto the Kingdome; neither could they be contented, vntill ſuch time as that they had according to their wonted cuſtome ſet vp a Sultan of their owne choice.

About the ſame time that the aforeſaid peace was concluded betwixt the two great Mahometane Princes, Bajazet and Caytbeius, Charles the French King was making great preparation againſt Alphonſus king of Naples; giuing it out, That after he had recouered that kingdom, he would forthwith from thence inuade the Turks dominions in Grecia. Which great attempt the haughty King was induced to take in hand, by the perſuaſion of diuers of his Nobilitie, but eſpecially by the ſolicitation of Lodouicus Sfortia Duke of Millan: wherby the whole ſtate of Italy was in ſhort time after ſore ſhaken, and Sfortia himſelfe, Author of theſe troubles, at laſt carried away by the French, miſerably ended his dayes as a priſoner in France. Alphonſus the Neapolitan King doubting the greatneſſe of the French King his enemy, entered into a confederation with certaine of the States of Italy, againſt the French, but eſpecially with Alexander the ſixt then Biſhop of Rome: for the better aſſurance whereof, hee gaue his

A his baſe daughter in marriage to Godfrey Borgia, the Biſhops ſon, and made him Prince of Carinula: his other ſon Francis he entertained alſo in great pay to ſerue him in his wars. And by his Embaſſadour Pandonius Camillus, lately returned out of France, gaue Bajazet to vnderſtand, what the French King had purpoſed againſt them both, requeſting him to aid him with ſix thouſand horſemen and as many foot againſt their common enemy, promiſing to giue them honourable entertainment during thoſe wars. And to further the matter, Alexander the great Biſhop ſent George Bucciarde, a Ligurian, ſkilfull in the Turkiſh language, Embaſſador to Bajazet, to declare vnto him with what great preparation, both by ſea and land, the young French King (deſirous of honour and the enlargement of his kingdome) was about to inuade Naples; and then, with what great power (after he had diſpatched his warres in Italy) he purpoſed to B paſſe ouer into Græcia; and that he had to that end earneſtly trauelled with him to haue Zemes his brother deliuered into his hands, whom he deſired to vſe as a moſt fit inſtrument for the troubling of his ſtate and Empire, by reaſon of his many friends: yet that his Holineſſe hauing the French in diſtruſt as a proud and ambitious people, as alſo carefull for the danger of the city of Rome, and of the ſtate of Italy in generall) had entered into a confederation with Alphonſus King of Naples, with their vnited forces to withſtand that proud nation, both by ſea and land, wanting nothing more for the accompliſhment therof, than mony: by which means only, Bajazet might (as he ſaid) prouide for the ſafety of his kingdome in Græcia, if he would put to his helping hand, to furniſh them with mony for the entertainment of ſouldiers: foraſmuch as the city of Rome, and the kingdome of Naples, were the ſureſt wals of that ſide of C the Othoman Empire; if he not altogether refuſing the charge, would not ſpare for a little coſt to maintaine the war rather in that forreine country, than to receiue it, brought home to his owne doore: concluding, That it were much more commodious and eaſie with his treaſures to repreſſe his enemy in a ſtrange country a far off, than by dint of ſword and plaine battell in his owne. A thing by experience well knowne, That they which haue neglected and ſet at nought remote dangers, for ſparing of charge, haue afterwards bin inforced with greater danger to receiue the ſame into their own boſomes, when as they were become deſperat and paſt remedy. Bajazet, who both by his eſpials and often letters and Embaſſadors from Alphonſus, knew all this to be true, gaue great thanks to the Biſhop by his Embaſſador, for that he ſitting in ſo high place, did ſo friendly and in ſo good time admoniſh him, both a ſtranger and of a D contrary religion, of things of ſo great conſequence: yet for anſwer, he willed him to returne again vnto his maſter with one Daucius his Embaſſador, who ſhould carry with him both mony and other his ſecret reſolutions concerning thoſe matters. Among other things giuen him in charge, was an Epiſtle written in Greek, wherin the barbarous king with great cunning perſuaded the Biſhop to poiſon Zemes his brother, as a man of a religion altogether contrary to his: for indeed of him alone for his great vertues Bajazet ſtood in feare and doubt, leaſt hee ſhould by ſome chance eſcape out of priſon to the troubling of his ſtate. For the performance of this his requeſt, he promiſed faithfully to pay vnto the Biſhop, two hundred thouſand duckats, and neuer after ſo long as he liued to take vp armes againſt the Chriſtians. Otherwiſe than had his father Mahomet, and his grandfather Amurath done, who both as deadly enemies E vnto the name of Chriſtians, neuer ceaſed by continuall wars to worke their woe.

Alphonſus king of Naples, and Alexander Biſhop of Rome craue aid of Bajazet againſt Charles the French King.

Baiazet ſendeth Dautius his embaſſador to Alexander Biſhop of Rome.

But George the Biſhops embaſſador, and Dautius, trauelling towards Italy, and hauing now happily paſſed the Adriatike, as they were about to haue landed at Ancona were borded by Io. Rouereus, brother to Iulianus the Cardinall (a man of great account in thoſe quarters) and cleane quit of their treaſure and whatſoeuer elſe they had aboord. Rouereus pretending for the defence of the fact, That the Biſhop did owe him a great ſum of mony, due vnto him for his good ſeruice done in the time of Innocentius his predeceſſor, for which he now paied himſelfe.
Neither could the Biſhop, much troubled with that injury, euer after recouer one part thereof, although he threatned vengeance with fire and ſword, and alſo ſought for recompence of the Venetians, whom it concerned to ſaue the Turks harmeleſſe in thoſe ſeas: for why, Rouereus F bearing himſelfe vpon the French, which were now vpon comming, whoſe faction he followed, kept the mony, and ſet at nought the Biſhops thundering curſes and vain threats. Dautius himſelfe, Bajazets Embaſſadour being ſet on ſhore, was glad to goe on foot to Ancona; and ſo from thence paſſing vp the riuer Padus, came to Franciſcus Gonzaga, duke of Mantua, of whom (for the antient friendſhip betwixt him and Bajazet) he was courteouſly entertained and furniſhed both with money and apparell, and ſo ſpoiled returned into Grecia, to carry newes vnto his maſter how he ſped.

When Bajazet vnderſtood by Dautius, the euill ſucceſſe he had in his laſt iourny, he forthwith ſent Muſtapha one of the Baſſaes of the court, vnto the great Biſhop Alexander, with like inſtructions as he had before giuen to Dautius: who with better hap arriued in Italy, and came to Rome in ſafety; where he forgot no part of that was giuen him in charge by his great Maſter. But amongſt many other things, the life of Zemes was that he moſt ſought for at the Biſhops haads.

1435 At the ſame time, which was in the yeare 1435, the French King Charles the eight of that name, paſſing through the heart of Italy with a ſtrong army againſt Alphonſus King of Naples; and taking his way without leaue through the city of Rome, ſo terrified Alexander the Biſhop who (as we haue before ſaid) altogether fauoured, and as much as in him lay, furthered the cauſe of Alphonſus; that he was glad to yeeld to all ſuch articles and conditions as it pleaſed him then to demand: not purpoſing in himſelfe at all the performance of any of thoſe things, which for feare he had with great ſolemnity promiſed, as the ſequel of the matter afterwards declared. Amongſt other things, he was enforced to giue vnto the king his graceleſſe ſon Caſar Borgia Valentinus (then one of the Cardinals) in hoſtage, for the performance of the other of his promiſes. Which diſgrace the crafty old Biſhop ſought to couer, by gracing his ſon with the title of the Legat: and with him he was alſo inforced to deliuer Zemes the Turke, Bajazets brother, his honourable priſoner; who to the great profit of the Biſhop and his predeceſſor, had remained in ſafe cuſtody at Rome about the ſpace of ſeuen yeares.

Zemes dieth, poiſoned by Alexander Biſhop of Rome.

But Zemes within three daies after he was deliuered to the French, died at Caieta, being before his deliuerance poiſoned (as it was thought) with a pouder of wonderfull whiteneſſe and pleaſant taſt; whoſe power was not preſently to kill, but by little and little diſpercing the force therof, did in ſhort time bring moſt aſſured death: which pleaſant poyſon, Alexander the Biſhop, skilfull in that practiſe (corrupted by Bajazets gold, and enuying ſo great a good vnto the French) had cauſed to be cunningly mingled with the Sugar wherewith Zemes vſed to temper the water which he commonly dranke. His dead body was not long after ſent to Bajazet, by Muſtapha his Embaſſador, who to the great contentment of his maſter, had thus contriued his death with the Biſhop. Not long after, this dead body ſo far brought, was by the appointment of Bajazet, honorably interred among his anceſtors at Pruſa. Caſar Borgia alſo the Biſhops ſon, a little before giuen in hoſtage vnto the French King, deceiuing his keepers at Velitras, returned againe to

Rome before the French King was come to Naples. This wicked impe come of an euill ſtrain, not worth the remembrance but by way of deteſtation (the very monſter of nature, if a man ſhould well conſider the courſe of his whole life) ſhortly after his eſcape, enuying at the honor of Candianus his brother, who then was Generall ouer the Biſhop his fathers forces, which were at that time great: when he had one time merily ſupped with his ſaid brother, with their mother Vannotia, traiterouſly cauſed him to be vnawares murdred in the ſtreets as he was going home, and his dead body to be caſt into the riuer of Tiber. Then caſting off his prieſtly habit with his Cardinals robes, he took vpon him the leading of his fathers army in his brothers ſtead, and gaue himſelfe wholly to martiall affaires; a vocation beſt fitting his fierce & bloudy diſpoſition: and with exceeding prodigality, wherewith he exhauſted his fathers coffers and the treaſures of the church, bound faſt vnto him deſperat ruffians and ſoldiers (eſpecially Spaniards, his fathers country men) ſuch as he knew fitteſt to ſerue for the execution of his moſt horrible deuiſes. Which manner of his proceedings, although they were ſuch as all good men deteſted, yet did the old hipocrit his father wink therat, fearing (as it was thought) to be murdered of the viper, himſelfe, when it ſhould ſerue for his purpoſe. Now when he had thus ſtrengthned himſelf, and that he was become a terror to all the nobility of Rome and the ſeigniories thereabout, he by the deuice and help of his father (who deſired nothing more than to make him great) firſt draue the moſt honourable family of the Columnij out of the city, and afterwards out of Latium: and by moſt execrable trechery, poyſoned or killed the honorable perſonages of the great houſes of the Vrſini & Cajetani, taking to himſelf their lands & poſſeſſions. With like cruelty he ſtrangled at one time four noblemen of the Camartes: & draue Guido Feltrius out of Vrbin. He took the city of Piſarum from Io. Sfortia, who with much difficulty eſcaped his bloudy hands: and draue the Malateſtaes out of Ariminum. The great lady Catherine

A rine Sfortia he thruſt out of Forum Liuij and Forum Cornelij, and ſhamefully led her in triumph through Rome. And neuer ſatisfied with bloud, which he without meaſure ſhed, he took the city of Fauentia from Aſtor Manfredus, a young gentleman of rare perfection: whom after the beaſtly tyrant had moſt horribly abuſed againſt nature, he cauſed to be cruelly ſtrangled, and his dead body to be caſt into Tiber. Hauing thus filled the meaſure of his iniquity, and as a fretting canker, hauing either deuoured or driuen into exile moſt part of the Roman nobility, and purpoſing by the ſupportation of his father, to make himſelfe Lord and Soueraign both of the City, and of all Latium, in the pride of his thoughts he was by the hand of the moſt Higheſt attached and caſt down, and that by ſuch means as he leaſt feared: for being with his father at a ſolemne ſupper in the Vaticane, of purpoſe prepared for the deſtruction of B certain rich Cardinals and ſome other honorable citiſens, they were both poyſoned by the fatall error of one of the waiters, who miſtaking of a flaggon, gaue the poiſoned wine to the accurſed Biſhop and his ſon, which was prepared for the gueſts; whereof the old Biſhop in few dayes after died. But his ſonne who had drunk the ſame more delaid with water, although he died not of long time after, yet preſently fell into ſuch an extreme ſickneſſe, that he was not able to help himſelfe, or to command his deſperat followers, wherof he had great ſtore: but lying ſicke, in ſhort time ſaw himſelfe of them forſaken, and two of his enemies, Pius the third, and Iulius the ſecond, one after another ſitting in his fathers place. Of which two, Pius enioyed that pontificall dignity but ſixteen dayes: and Iulius ſucceeding him, cauſed this Cæſar Borgia (who of right had deſerued a thouſand deaths) to be ſhut vp in the caſtle called Moles Adriani, C from whence he ſet him at liberty vpon the deliuery of certaine ſtrong holds which were yet holden by his garriſons. After he had thus rid himſelfe out of Iulius the Biſhops hands, he fled to Oſtia, and ſo by ſea to Naples: where he was by the commandment of Ferdinand king of Spain, apprehended by Gonſaluus the Great, and tranſported into Spaine, for feare leaſt he, being of a moſt troubleſome nature, and much reſorted vnto by his old fauorits, ſhould raiſe ſome new ſtirs in Italy. He was no ſooner arriued in Spain, but he was caſt into priſon in the caſtle of Medina, where after he had lien three yeres he deceiued his keepers, and with a rope which he had gotten, let himſelfe down from an high tower of the caſtle: and ſo eſcaping, fled to the king of Nauarre, whom he afterwards ſerued in his wars, and was in an hot skirmiſh againſt the kings enemies (wherin he had obtained the victory) ſlain with a ſmall ſhot. Vnworthy D after ſo many horrible villanies, to haue ended his days ſo honorably. His dead body was found ſtript, and ſo brought to the king vpon a bad beaſt, as if it had bin a dead calf all naked; which was by his commandment honourably buried at Pamphilona.

The death of Cæſar Borgia.

But to return again from whence we haue ſomthing too long with this troubleſome body gone aſtray. The French King hauing thus loſt both his great hoſtages, Zemes the Turke by death, and the Cardinall Borgia by eſcape, held on his iourney towards Naples, and with wonderfull ſucceſſe preuailed as he went, all places yeelding to him without any great reſiſtance.
Alphonſus ſeeing himſelfe deſtitute of ſuch aid as he had in vaine requeſted both of the Turkiſh Emperour and of the Venetians, and now almoſt beſet with his mighty enemy, to whom ſo many ſtrong places had in ſhorter time bin deliuered than any man had before imagined; E and withall conſidering with himſelfe, how that he had loſt the hearts of his ſubiects (the ſtrongeſt defence of Princes) for that moſt of the Nobility, and eſpecially the Neapolitanes, hated him for his too much ſeuerity in puniſhing the offenders in the late rebellion, wherein the Princes of Sarne and Salerne were chiefe; and the common people were no leſſe offended with the grieuous and heauy exactions, required of them for the maintenance of theſe wars, inſomuch that their murmuring ſpeeches came oftentimes to his own hearing; as oftentimes it fals out, That the hatred of the ſubiects againſt their Princes, which hath for feare of long time bin diſſembled during their proſperity, more franckly and fiercely breaketh out in their declining eſtate: for theſe cauſes, Alphonſus fearing to be forſaken of his people, as a man in deſpaire, with abundance of tears openly in the ſight of all the Neapolitans, reſigned his kingdome F of Naples to his ſon Ferdinand, when as he had as yet ſcarcely reigned one whole yeare after the death of Ferdinand his father: and with foure gallies paſſed ouer to Mazerea, a city of Cilicia. His ſon Ferdinand a Prince of rare perfection and ſingularly graced with all the vertues of true nobility, and thereto dearly beloued of all the people, was to the wonderfull contentment of the Neapolitans with great ioy & acclamations ſaluted King, and ſo hauing performed

The French King inuadeth Naples.

formed all the ceremonies belonging to his coronation, returned preſently to his army. By G this time the French King with all his forces was entred farre into the kingdome of Naples; and hauing taken by aſſault certaine cities which truſted too much to their owne ſtrength, ſtrucke ſuch a generall terror into the minds of the Neapolitanes, that they thought no place now ſtrong ynough to abide his batteries, or power ſufficient to encounter his forces. Ferdinand the yong king with his army had taken the ſtreits of the forreſt of S. Germane, thereby to impeach the further paſſage of the French King. But whilſt he was there buſied, he was ſuddenly aduertiſed, that Fabritius Columna with a great power of Frenchmen had by the Appenines broken into Campania, and ſo was marching towards him: wherefore doubting to be ſhut vp betwixt two ſtrong armies of the enemies, he retired ſpeedily to Capua, a ſtrong city ſcituat vpon the riuer Vulturnus; purpoſing there by meanes of that deepe riuer, to ſtay the H French from paſſing farther. But whilſt he lay there, news was brought to him, that all the city of Naples was in an vprore, and that the citiſens were all vp in armes, as men in doubt which way to turn themſelues. Ferdinand not a little troubled with theſe bad news, commended the charge of his army and the defence of the City of Capua to his chiefe Captains, and rid himſelfe in poſt back againe to Naples.

Ferdinand departeth from Capua to pacifie an vprore at Naples.

It is a ſtrange thing to tell, what a ſudden alteration enſued vpon his arriuall there: for ſuddenly all the tumult was appeaſed, euery man laid down his arms, and welcommed him with a generall gratulation: for he was a man of a great and inuincible courage, and of ſo comely a perſonage, as might eaſily win the hearts of his ſubiects; inſomuch, that when he earneſtly requeſted them, that they would not traiterouſly betray him to his barbarous & cruell enemies, I being their naturall King, or rather their brother borne and brought vp amongſt them: they all with one conſent anſwered, That they would ſpend their liues and goods in his quarrell, ſo long as he ſhould keep his army whole, & defend the city of Capua: but if it ſhould ſo chance that the Aragonians ſhould be ouerthrown, or els for feare abandon that city, and the French King, as victor, to approch the city of Naples, he ſhould do both againſt reaſon and equity, if by exacting fidelity and allegiance of his ſubiects, apprehended with ſo iuſt a feare, he ſhould ſo expoſe that noble city with the fruitfull countrey thereabout, to be ſpoyled and deſtroyed by a mercileſſe and cruell enemy. Whilſt Ferdinand was thus buſied in appeaſing and confirming his wauering ſubiects at Naples, the French king had taken diuers cities, and was come before Capua. The citiſens of Capua, although they were alwaies well affected to the Arogonian K kings, yet ſeeing the French King as a moſt violent tempeſt to beare downe all before him, began now to conſult amongſt themſelues of yeelding vp the city; whereunto they were the more prickt forward, by the ſudden reuolt of the great captaine Triuultius with his followers; 5 as alſo by the departure of Virginius and Petilianus, two great and famous commanders, who ſeeing themſelues forſaken of Triuultius, fled with their companies vnto the city of Nola.
In this diſcomfiture of King Ferdinands army, the Frenchmen had entred into the ſuburbs of the city: which thing Gothfredus and Gaſpar (two valiant Germane captaines) beholding, ſallied with their companies out of the city, of purpoſe to abate the pride of the French, and to confirme the doubtfull citiſens. Theſe worthy Captains, when they had with exceeding valour repulſed the French, and thought to haue againe returned into the city, could not be ſuffered L to enter, but were by the citiſens ſhut out of the gate, in danger to haue had their throats cut by the enemy. In which perplexity they were glad vpon their knees to intreat the cowardly citiſens ſtanding vpon the wals, not in ſuch traiterous manner to betray their friends ready in their defence to beſtow their liues: and with much intreating, at length obtained of thoſe heartleſſe men, that they might by ten and ten in a company be receiued in at one gate of the city, and ſo put out at another, fartheſt from the danger of the enemy: in which ſort when they had paſſed through the City, they took the way towards Naples: and vpon the way met with the King at Auerſa, vnto whom they declared all that had happened in his abſence at Capua: who although he ſaw his army diſperſed, and all things now deſperat, yet went he on forward, and came to the very gates of Capua, and there called vpon diuers of the chiefe men of the M City, requiring to be let in. But when he ſaw there was none to giue him anſwer, and an enſigne of the French King diſplayed vpon the wall, in token that the city was become French, he returned to Naples: where he found the gates now ſhut againſt him, and all the citiſens vp againe in armes, and not willing to receiue any of the ſouldiers which came from Capua,

A more than the King himſelfe; for flying fame preuenting his return, had filled euery corner of the city with report, That all the chiefe captains of his army were either gone ouer to the enemy, or els for ſafegard of their liues fled: That the whole army was broken vp, and Capua yeelded to the French. Wherefore the Neapolitans framing their fancies according to the condition of the time, began now alſo to fawne vpon the good fortune of the French, and to haue King Ferdinand in contempt: which he well perceiuing, and fetching a compaſſe farther off from the city, came to the caſtle, wherinto he was receiued with his followers by his faithfull captains therein before left. But prouidently foreſeeing that he could not there long ſtay, but that he ſhould be beſieged by his enemies both by ſea and land, he commended the keeping of that peece to Alphonſus D'aualus, a moſt valiant captaine, and departed himſelfe with twenty gallies wel appointed vnto Ænaria, an Iſland not far from Naples, hauing in it a commodious B harbor and a ſtrong caſtle: where fortune, neuer firme but in miſery, ſeemed again to deride the poore remainder of his honor: for comming thither, the Captain of the caſtle, vnworthily named Iuſtus, forgetting his duty towards his ſoueraigne, of whom he had before receiued many extraordinary fauors, moſt traiterouſly now in his ſo hard diſtreſſe ſhut the gates of the caſtle againſt him at his landing, and vnkindly refuſed to receiue him. With which vnexpected ingratitude, the poore King was wonderfully perplexed and almoſt abaſhed: yet with earneſt intreaty and ample commemoration of the benefits and preferments which both his father and himſelfe had in times paſt beſtowed vpon him, he preuailed ſo much with this vnthankfull man, that he was content to receiue him into the caſtle, ſo that he would come but himſelfe alone: of which his offer, when no more could be got, the king ſeemed to accept. So the captain C hauing opned a port to receiue him in, was in the very entrance thereof ſuddenly ſtabd to the heart with a dagger by king Ferdinand and ſlain in the midſt of his armed ſoldiers: which was don with ſuch a countenance & maieſty, that the warders with the weapons in their hands, diſmaid with his look, forthwith at his commandment opned the gate, and receiued him in with all his followers. Whereby it appeareth, That in the countenance of Princes reſteth a certain diuine Majeſty, in al fortunes aboue the common courſe of nature: which is of power to daunt the hearts of moſt diſloyall traytors in the performance of their vnnaturall treaſons. The next day after the departure of king Ferdinand from the caſtle of Naples, Charles the French King was receiued into the city, with ſuch pomp, triumph, and acclamation of the Neapolitans, as D if they had euen then by the benefit of that forraine King, bin reſtored to perfect liberty, and deliuered out of ſome long and hard bondage. Shortly after, the caſtle of Naples, with all the ſtrong places thereabout were yeelded to the French, and Embaſſadors ſent from all the princes and people of that Kingdome, yeelding themſelues into the power of the French King.
Then Ferdinand ſeeing all loſt and gone, departed from Ænaria, where he lay expecting the euent of his hard fortune, and ſailed into Sicilia. Thus the houſe of Arragon in leſſe than fiue moneths, loſt the Kingdome of Naples, about 63 yeares after that it was firſt taken from the French by Alphonſus the elder, this Ferdinand his great grandfather.

A moſt reſolued act of King Ferdinand.

Charles the French King receiued into Naples.

The report of the great preparation made by the French for this war, had long before filled the eares of them which dwelt in any part of the Turks dominions in Europe; but when they E ſaw the French enſignes diſplayed vpon the wals of the Caſtles and ſtrong townes along the coaſt of Calabria and Salerne, ſuch a ſudden feare fell vpon the Turks garriſons alongſt the coaſt of Epirus and Macedonia on the other ſide of the Adriatick, ouer againſt that part of Italy, that many of them forſook their charge: the Chriſtians in thoſe places, as alſo in Grecia and Peloponeſus, beginning then to lift vp their heads in hope of their deliuerance, & to make the beſt preparation they could to ioyne with the French againſt the Turks: but eſpecially the rough and wild people inhabiting the high mountaines called Acrocheraunij in the borders of Epirus, who preſently took vp armes, refuſing to be any longer tributary vnto the Turkiſh Emperour.

This proſperous and ſpeedy ſucceſſe of the French King in the conqueſt of Naples, filled F the minds of moſt of the Chriſtian Princes, as alſo of the Turkiſh Emperor, with a doubtfull expectation, whither his greatnes would grow: many being of opinion, that he couertly affected the empire of Rome, and to make himſelfe the ſole monarch of Italy. Which conceit no little troubled both the great Biſhop Alexander, and Maximilian then Emperour. Bajazet alſo feared much, leaſt hee ſhould vpon the ſudden turne his forces into Epirus or Grecia, to his no ſmall diſquiet. And Ferdinand, the aduiſed King of Spaine, was no leſſe carefull for the G ſafety of Sicilia. Lodouicus Sfortia alſo (ſhortly after created Duke of Millan, the chiefe occaſion of the French Kings comming into Italy, and a great aider of him in thoſe warres) began now to conſider better of the matter, and to ſtand in doubt of the King, whom he well perceiued to make ſmall reckoning of his word or promiſe, ſo that he might thereby inlarge his dominions.

And the Venetians, who in all theſe wars had ſtood looking on as neuters (in hope that when the Aragonians and French had with long wars, which they vainly imagined, well weakened one another, that they might then at their pleaſure ſhare out ſomething for themſelues) were now in doubt with the reſt of the ſtates of Italy to loſe ſome part of their owne territory: for now there was no Prince or ſtate in Italy able to oppoſe themſelues againſt the French, but ſtood all as it were at his deuotion. H

A great league made by diuers Chriſtian Princes againſt the French King.

Wherefore the aforeſaid Princes, namely Maximilan the Emperour, Ferdinand K. of Spain, Alexander Biſhop of Rome, the ſtate of Venice, and Lodouicus Sfortia, Duke of Millan, for the more aſſurance of their eſtates, by their Embaſſadors ſpeedily ſent from one to another, concluded a ſtrong league among themſelues; whereof the chiefe capitulation was, That if any of theſe confederats ſhould vpon their own accord make war vpon any other prince, they ſhould do it vpon their owne charges: but if any of them ſhould chance to be inuaded, by any other, that then euery one of theſe confederates ſhould of their owne charge ſend foure thouſand horſe and ten thouſand foot in aid of their confederat ſo inuaded, vntill the wars were ended: which league was to endure for twenty yeares. The fame of this league was welcome to many other Princes, but eſpecially to Bajazet, who now feared nothing more, than the forces of the I French, and had therefore offred to the Venetians, to aid them both by ſea & land againſt the French, if their affaires ſhould ſo require. This league ſo much pleaſed not other Princes, but it troubled the French king more, as of purpoſe made againſt him; although it was by the confederates pretended to be made only for their own ſafety. Wherefore he with all expedition placed his beſt Captaines with ſtrong garriſons in all the cities and ſtrong holds of the Kingdome of Naples, and left Mompenſer his viceroy in the city of Naples, and with the reſt of his army returned into France; purpoſing by the way as he went to terrify the diſſembling biſhop, ſo if it were poſſible to draw him from the league: and afterwards to deale with Sfortia & the reſt as he might. But when he was come neer vnto Rome, the Biſhop for feare fled out of the city to Peruſium, intending from thence to haue fled to Venice, if the French King ſhould K haue further purſued him. Charles deceiued of his purpoſe, in peaceable maner entred the city, and there ſtayd three dayes, and ſo departed; vſing violence againſt none, but againſt ſuch as were well known to be of the Aragonian faction. From Rome he marched to Piſa; and ſo with much paine paſſing the Appenines, was at the riuer of Tarrus, not far from Parma, ſet vpon by Franciſcus Gonzago Duke of Mantua, Generall of a great army which the Venetians and Sfortia had raiſed vpon the ſudden to haue ſtopped his paſſage: in which battel he was in great danger to haue bin taken or ſlaine, and there loſt his Tents, with all the rich ſpoyle gotten in the rich kingdom of Naples: yet hauing at length with great ſlaughter valiantly repulſed his enemies, he afterwards returned in ſafety home.

Ferdinand recouereth his kingdome of Naples from the French, and dieth.

About the ſame time that this battell was fought at Tarrus, the yong king Ferdinand, lately L driuen out of his Kingdome by the French King, returned againe out of Sicilia to Naples: where he was ioyfully receiued of the Neapolitans, and by the help of his friends (but eſpecially of the great Gonſaluus, ſent in his aid by Ferdinand King of Spaine) in leſſe than a yeres ſpace recouered the Kingdome of Naples againe from the French: and then dying without iſſue, left the ſame vnto his vncle Fredericus. Wherein the vncertainty of worldly honours, the chiefe felicity of ambitious minds, is well to be noted; when as in that one kingdom the chief gouernment was ſix times changed in leſſe than the ſpace of three yeares: for firſt, Ferdinand the elder dying, left that kingdome vnto his ſonne Alphonſus, at ſuch time as the French King was making preparation for thoſe wars: Alphonſus deſpairing of his owne forces, reſigned the Kingdome to his ſon Ferdinand, when he had ſcarcely reigned fully a yeare: Ferdinand in leſſe M than three moneths was driuen quite out of Italy by Charles the French King: Charles poſſeſſed of the kingdome, in ſhort time after was againe diſpoſſeſſed by the ſame Ferdinand: Ferdinand hauing with much trouble thruſt out the French, died within leſſe than a yere: After whom ſucceeded Fredericus his vncle, no leſſe vnfortunat than the reſt: and Charles the French

King

A king himſelf liued not long after, but died ſuddenly as he came from playing at Tenis, being then but 27 years old; leauing the flouriſhing kingdom of France, with the troubleſome title pretended to the kingdom of Naples, vnto Lewis his ſucceſſor, who liued with great trouble to conquer the ſame, and with greater grief to loſe it again.

1497.

The Turkes inuading Podolia and Raſſia, are in their return for moſt part loſt.

But to return again to the courſe of our hiſtory, from whence the great occurrents of that time (not altogether impertinent to our purpoſe) haue a little too far led vs. Bajazet deliuered of two great fears, firſt by the death of his brother Zemes, and afterward by the caſting out of the French out of Naples; began now to turn his forces vpon the Chriſtians, and by his Lieutenant Bali-Beg Sanzack of Siliſtra, inuaded the countries of Podolia and Raſſia, beeing part of the Polonian kingdom, where the Turks did great harm, and carried away many priB ſoners. But comming again the ſecond time, and making ſuch like ſpoil as before, they ſtayd ſo long, that the cold of Winter (which in thoſe Countries is very extream) was now come on: and in their return, as they were about to haue paſſed through Moldavia, they were by Stephanus Prince of that Countrey, denied both paſſage and victuals, and forced to take the way alongſt the ſea coaſt: where many of them ſtragling from their Army, were by the way cut off and ſlain by the Moldavians; and the reſt, what by the extremitie of the cold, what for want of food, and foulneſſe of the way, periſhed: ſo that of that great Army, very few returned home. The Turks Hiſtories report, That in this Expedition were loſt forty thouſand Turks.

He ſent alſo Cadumes one of his Baſſa's into Illyria, who ſpoiling that country, with a part C of Croatia, was incountred by 9000 Croatians and Hungarians, neer vnto the Riuer Morava, vnder the leading of County Bernard Francopain; where after a cruel & bloudy fight the Chriſtians were put to the worſe, & aboue 7000 of them ſlain; the reſt ſaued themſelues by flight through the woods and mountains. Of the Chriſtians that were loſt, many were drowned in Morava, chuſing rather ſo to end their daies, than to fall into the hands of their bloudy Enemies. This ouerthrow was imputed to the General, who would needs giue the Turks battel in plain field, although he was earneſtly intreated by County Io. Torquatus, to haue kept the ſtreits of that country, wherby he might haue had great aduantage of the enemy. Torquatus himſelf hauing loſt all his horſmen in that battel, and his horſe killed vnder him, fought valiantly on foot, vntil he was by the multitude of his enemies oppreſſed and ſlain. The Baſſa to D giue Bajazet a ſure teſtimony of the victory, cauſed all the noſes of the ſlain Chriſtians to be cut off and put vpon ſtrings, and ſo by Waggon ſent them as a barbarous Preſent to Conſtantinople.

After the death of Charles the French King, Lewis the twelfth hauing obtained that Kingdom, wrot himſelfe alſo Duke of Millan, as deſcended of one of the daughters of Io. Galeatus firſt Duke of Millan: in which his ſuppoſed right he was fully reſolued to make warre vpon Sfortia then Duke of Millan. And for his better ſucces in thoſe wars, ſought by all means he could to draw ſome other of the Princes and States of Italy into the fellowſhip of that intended war; but aboue all others the Venetians, as moſt commodious for his purpoſe; with whom he made a firm league, and for the aid they were to giue him, couenanted, That they ſhould E haue for their ſhare the city of Cremona, with all the pleaſant country about Abdua, then a part of Sfortia's dominions. Which was afterwards accordingly performed.

Sfortia vnderſtanding of this compact made againſt him, & knowing himſelf far too weak of himſelf to ſtand againſt ſo puiſſant enemies; attempted firſt to ſet Maximilian the Emperor, with the States of Germany, vpon the French King. But that not ſorting to his deſire, he ſought to agree with the King, by offering to hold his Dukedome of him, by paying him a yearly tribute. After he had thus in vain proued all the meanes he could deuiſe, to haue appeaſed the French King, and prouided for his own ſafety; he by his Embaſſadors ſent of purpoſe, certified Bajazet of the confederation betwixt the French King and the Venetians, and that their purpoſe was after they had oppreſſed him and ſome other of the States of Italy, F then with their vnited forces to inuade his dominions: and that therfore it were good for him in time to looke vnto it, and to giue aid againſt thoſe who would in ſhort time become his moſt dangerous enemies. By this meanes the Duke was in good hope, ſo to buſie the Venetians, by bringing in the Turk vpon them, as that they ſhould ſtand the French in ſmall ſtead. At which time alſo the Embaſſadors of Florence did what they could to pricke forward the Turk to make wars vpon the Venetians, for the malice they bare againſt them for protecting G them of Piſa againſt the oppreſſion of the Florentines.

Bajazet perſuaded by the Embaſſadours, and calling to remembrance the injuries before don him by the Venetians; firſt by aiding Iohn Caſtriot the ſon of Scanderbeg, and Iohn Chernovich another prince of Epirus, (wherby he loſt a great part of that countrey, and was alſo further inforced to yeeld to ſuch conditions as altogether ſtood not with his honor) and again, by denying to giue his fleet leaue to put into their habors of Cyprus, in the time of his wars againſt the Sultan of Egypt: all which he was glad then to endure, for fear leſt that his brother Zemes (then liuing) ſhould by their means bee ſet vp againſt him; promiſed now to doe what the Embaſſadors had requeſted: glad in his mind, that the diſcord of the Chriſtian princes had preſented vnto him ſo fit an opportunitie of reuenge. H

Friuli part of the Venetian territory ſpoiled by the Turks.

Herupon he made great preparation both by ſea and land againſt the Venetians, and vpon the ſudden cauſed Scander Baſſa his Lieutenant in Illyria, with twelue thouſand horſmen to break into the country of Friuli, part of the Venetian territory vpon the borders of Italy. The Baſſa as he had in charge, paſſing ouer diuers great riuers, at length entred the countrey, burning and deſtroying all before him as far as Liquentia, carying away with him all the poore country people priſoners. But when he was come to the banks of Tiliaventum, & vnderſtood that he came too late to pleaſure the duke of Millan (for why, the French with the Venetians had before without reſiſtance driuen him quite out of Italy & Germany) he there with more than barbarous cruelty put 4000 poor priſoners to the ſword: and ſo hauing filled the country with mourning and with bloud, returned from whence hee came, loded with the ſpoyle of I that rich country.

At the ſame time alſo, Bajazet put to ſea ſuch a fleet, as none of his predeceſſors had before ſet forth; and with a great army in perſon himſelf marched alongſt the ſea coaſt of Morea, in ſuch ſort, as that his army by land, and his fleet at ſea, as neer as they could kept euen pace the one within ſight of the other. Neither were the Venetians vnmindfull of themſelues, but ſet forth a ſtrong fleet vnder the charge of Anthony Grimani their Admiral; in number far inferior to the Turks, but for equipage, ſtrength, ſkilful mariners, and al other maner of warlike prouiſion much ſuperior. For which cauſe the Turkes, although defied and braued by the Venetians, yet durſt not at the firſt join with them in battel, but ſtil kept alongſt the coaſt of Morea, not daring to put farther off into the ſea. In this their courſe the Venetians troubled them K exceedingly, ſometimes making ſhew as if they would haue conſtrained them to fight, and otherwhiles giuing them chaſe, neuer departing far from them, wiſely accounting it right good ſeruice, if they could but keepe that huge fleet from landing in Italy or other place of the Venetian territory. Moſt men were in good hope, that if thoſe great fleets ſhould haue joined in battel, the Venetians ſhould haue had a notable victory, for that the enemy as afraid kept ſo dangerous a courſe, and ſo neer the main. The longer they thus ſailed, the more was the State of Venice offended with their Admiral, that he contrary to all expectation delayed to fight, ſtil ſuffering the dangerous enemy to approch neerer and neerer their territories: and there were none which had not rather hee ſhould haue ſet all vpon the hazard of one battell, than to protract by delay a long and doubtful war. Whilſt all men were thus in expectation L of ſome great exploit to be don vpon the enemy, newes came to the city, That the Turks fleet had put into the hauen Sapientia in the Iſland Sphraga, to water, and was there embayed by the Venetians. This report was of all men joyfully receiued, as if the victory had bin already aſſured: and ſo much the more, for that it was vainly ſuppoſed that it would be gained without any great loſſe. But others which better knew the place, deemed of the matter far otherwiſe, ſaying, That the place wherin the enemy lay was ſuch, as that he might ſafely at his pleaſure depart thence. Yet forſomuch as the Turkes fleet was more ſubiect vnto danger in putting out of the Harbor, than in the wide ſea, there was no man but was of opinion, That the Venetian Admiral would ſet vpon them as they ſhould come forth again. Whilſt men were thus diuining to and fro, and the Venetians attending the comming forth of the Enemies fleet, it M fortuned that Andreas Lauredanus and Albanus Armerius (two valiant gentlemen) but a little before come from Corcyra of purpoſe to be preſent at the battell, were the firſt that began the fight; and with their two nimble ſhips (after they had exchanged a few bullets) boorded a tall Ship of the Turks, being of ſuch beauty and burthen, that ſhe ſeemed rather a Ca-

A ſtle than a ſhip; wherof one Baruch of Smyrna (a notable pirat) was Captain: who after a long and cruel fight, perceiuing that he muſt either yeeld, or by force be taken, deſperatly fired his own ſhip, by the rage wherof both ſhe and the Venetian ſhips faſt grapled vnto her, were all three together burnt downe to the water. Many of the men, to ſhun the violence of the fire, leapt ouer boord into the ſea, where ſome of them were taken vp by other ſhips, and ſome periſhed. Some few other of the Venetian fleet couragiouſly aſſailed the Turkes at their comming out, and doing great harm, put the Turks whole fleet in no ſmall fear. But moſt part of the Venetian gallies lay looking on a far off; vnto whom the other, before in fight with the Turks, after they had don what they could, retyred alſo. But by that they had don it appeared plainly, that the Venetian Admiral that day let ſlip out of his hands a moſt notable victorie, B if he as a reſolute man had with his whole fleet charged the enemy.

After this fight the Turks held on their courſe, ſtil keeping Morea on the right hand, whom the Venetians ſtil followed: at length the Turks fleet was come to the entrance of the gulf of Patras, where the Venetians again faintly ſetting vpon them, ſuffered them to recouer the gulf, with no leſſe diſhonor than they had before let them eſcape at the port Sapientia: for the Venetians hauing the aduantage of the place, and better appointed for fight at ſea, might eaſily (as it was ſuppoſed) haue gained the victory, if the commanders (but eſpecially the admiral) had bin ſo forward in that ſeruice as became men of their ſpirit. But many of them afraid to fight, lay aloof; ſo that Dauthes the Turks Admiral, who perceiuing himſelfe too weake, had purpoſed to run his gallies on ſhore, and ſo to haue fled to the army at land, if he had felt C himſelf ouercharged by the Venetian fleet; had now contrary to his expectation, recouered the gulf he deſired, though not without loſſe of ſome of his gallies. Within this gulf ſtands the antient city of Naupactum (now called Lepanto) then ſubiect to the Venetians, whither Bajazet was now come by land with his Army: and now by the comming of his fleet into the gulf, laid hard ſiege to the city both by ſea and land. They in the city ſeeing themſelues on euery ſide beſet with their enemies, without any great reſiſtance fel to compoſition with Bajazet, and ſo yeelded vnto him the city, which the Turks hold at this day.

Lepanto yeelded to the Turks.

Grimanus the Venetian Admirall returning to Venice, was for all his euil ſeruice (or rather for that he, according to his mild nature, had not vſed ſeueritie againſt thoſe Captaines that refuſed to fight) caſt in priſon: and although he was a man mightily befriended, yet was hee D by a publique decree baniſhed into one of the Abſytides, Iſlands vpon the coaſt of Liburnia. From the firſt foundation of the city of Venice, was neuer man impugned with more ſpight, or defended by greater friends; but Common hatred preuailing, hee was neuertheles exiled. Thus Bajazet hauing made a rode into the Venetian territory by Scander-Baſſa, and taken from them the City of Naupactum, with the Countrey thereabout, returned with victory to Conſtantinople.

The next year following, being the year 1500, Bajazet put to ſea a greater and ſtronger fleet than he had the year before; and himſelf in perſon with a puiſſant army of 150000 men entered by the ſtreit of Corinth into Peloponeſus, and marching thorow the Country, came and incamped before the ſtrong City of Methone (now called Modon) then vnder the gouern- E ment of the Venetians; at which time his great fleet met him there alſo by ſea, as he had before appointed. When he had thus beſet the city both by ſea and land, and with long and continual battery made three great and fair breaches in the walls, he gaue vnto the ſame two terrible aſſaults, and that with ſuch deſperat fury, that many of them which went firſt vnto the breach, ouerthrown by the preſſe of them that followed, were troden to death. Yet neuertheles the city was both times valiantly defended by the citiſens and garriſon ſoldiers. So that when he had don what he could, he was glad to retyre from the walls, hauing filled the Town ditches with the bodies of his ſlain Turks. The Venetian Admirall Triviſanus lying then at the Iſle of Zacynthus, (but far too weak to fight with the Enemie) in the beginning of the ſiege ſent Valerius Marcellus and Baptiſta Polanus, with two Gallies full of men and munition in F relief of the beſieged; and now doubting their further wants, ſent Io. Maripetrus, Alex. Cothius of Corcyra, and Cachuris of Hydruntum, with three other great Gallies, with men, munition, and ſuch other things as he thought needfull for defence of the City. Theſe three reſolute Captains comming with a full winde, and packing on all their ſailes brake thorow the Turks great fleet lying in their way, and ran themſelues aground vnder the Walls of the town:

Town: for they of the Towne had ſo barred the hauen for fear of the enemy, that they could G not poſſibly get in that way. The Citiſens and Soldiers ioyfull of the comming of this freſh ſupply, and withall fearing leſt the Gallies ſhould be ſet off again from them by the Enemy, came running by heaps from all parts of the City, towards the ſea, to receiue this new-come aid. Which was don with ſuch a confuſed diſorder, that diuers places of the city toward the land were left without defendants, as if there had been no Enemie neer. Which the Ianizaries quickly perceiuing, preſently entred by thoſe forſaken places, with very little or no reſiſtance.
Then the Citiſens all too late began to make head: for the Ianizaries already entred, made way for the reſt of the Army; which ſwarming into the City, ſlew without pitty euery one that came in the way, as well Grecians as Venetians, with all the ſouldiers but then newly landed out of the three Gallies. In this ſlaughter, Anthonius Fabrius and Bardella (both H Gouernours of the Town) with Andreas Falco Biſhop of Methone, in his Pontificalibus, and his Mytre on his head, were ſlaine. None eſcaped their fury, but ſuch as were for their ſtrength reſerued for ſeruile labor, or for beauty, to the Victors luſt. And of theſe, a thouſand bound faſt together in long ropes, were brought to Bajazets Pauilion, and there in his ſight, by his commandement cruelly murthered. The Cities of Corone and Pylus (now called Nauarrinum) ſometimes the dwelling place of old Neſtor, terrified with the taking of Methone, yeelded themſelues by Compoſition to Bajazet. The City of Chriſſeum, now known by the name of Caput S. Galli, was taken alſo by Cherſeogles, Bajazet his ſon in law. Al theſe were Cities belonging to the Venetians. Nauplium alſo was beſieged by Haly Baſſa, but yet ſtil defended by the Venetians. Bajazet hauing new fortified the city of Methone, and ſtored I it with new inhabitants, left in it a ſtrong garriſon, and ſo with victory returned to Conſtantinople.

Corone, Pilus, and Criſſeum yeelded to the Turks.

1501 About this time Triviſanus the Venetian Admirall died, of griefe of mind, as ſome ſuppoſed.
In whoſe place the Senat ſent one Benedictus Piſaurius a noble & valiant Gentleman, who with the Venetian fleet followed the enemy, then departing from the ſiege of Nauplium, purſuing them euen vnto the ſtreits of Helleſpontus, ſtil cutting off ſuch as ſtragled or taried behind the reſt of the fleet. By which means he took aboue twenty of their Gallies, and in his return took from the Turks the Iſland of Ægina; and landing in diuers places of the Turkes Dominions, left vnto them the wofull remembrance of his being there. Afterward meeting with Gonſalvus, ſyrnamed the Great (ſent by Ferdinand King of Spain, to aid him againſt the K Turks) at Zacynthus, hee inuaded Cephalenia (which Triviſanus his predeceſſor had in vain attempted the year before) and layd hard ſiege vnto the City; which for a ſpace was valiantly defended by the Turks, but yet at length by the good conduct of Gonſalvus it was by force taken; when as Giſdare the Gouernor therof, with his garriſon of Turks, had before fought it out euen to the laſt man. The City being taken, all the whole Iſland yeelded forthwith to the Venetians.

Sephalenia taken by the Venetians.

Piſaurius hauing taken Cephalenia, repaired the city, and leauing a ſtrong garriſon for the defence of the Iſle, departed for Corcyra; where he was aduertiſed that the Turkes were rigging forth a great fleet againſt the next Spring, wherof ſome part lay in the Bay of Ambracia not far from Corcyra; ſome at Eante, and the reſt within the ſtreits of Helleſpontus. Wherefore L purpoſing to do ſome exploit vpon thoſe gallies which lay in the Bay of Ambracia; to auert the mind of the enemie from perceiuing of that which he had ſecretly with himſelf intended, he ſent the greateſt part of his fleet vnto the Iſland of Neritos, who ſuddenly landing ſhould put the inhabitants in fear. The Captains ſent about the buſineſſe, cheerfully put in execution what the Admirall had commanded, and by their ſudden landing raiſed ſuch a tumult, that all the Countries therabout were filled with the expectation of that which ſhould enſue therof. The Bay of Ambracia is ſo ſtreitned on either ſide with the mountains of Epirus, that the entrance therof is but half a mile ouer: but by and by opening it ſelf into a great wideneſſe, and running vp into the land, maketh a moſt pleaſant and ſafe harbor for ſhips and Gallies to ride in. Piſaurius with a fair wind comming thither with eight Gallies well appointed, M when the Turks thought him to haue bin at Neritos, and entring the ſtreit, rowing farther into the Bay, burnt one of the Turks great gallies, to the terror of all them that dwelt round about the Bay; and carried away with him eleuen more, laded with munition and Victual, through the ſtreit; the Turkes in vain fretting thereat, and doing what they could with their

A their great ordnance from ſhore, to haue ſunk him in going out of the Bay. But hauing done what he came for, he returned with his prey again to Corcyra. Not long after he alſo recouered the caſtle of Pylos in Morea: which as it was ſuddenly gotten, ſo was it as ſuddenly loſt. For Camalia a notable Turkiſh pyrat, who had bin abroad ſeeking after purchaſe, putting in that harbor by chance, took 3 gallies there left by the admiral for defence of the place, and ſo terrified the faint-hearted captain, that he fel to compoſition with the pyrat to yeeld him the caſtle, ſo that he and his ſoldiers might in ſafety depart. Which the pyrat granting, had the caſtle deliuered vnto him, which he could not with far greater ſtrength haue poſſibly won. So was Pylos for fear twice in one yeare yeelded vp vnto the Turkes, and was both times the death of the cowardly captains that gaue it vp, being both beheaded by commandement of B the Admiral. About the ſame time Piſaurius attempted to haue burnt other of the Turks gallies lying in the riuer Eante, vpon the coaſt of Macedonia, but not with ſo good ſucces as before; for the Turks made more carefull by the loſſe they had but a little before receiued at Ambracia, did now more vigilantly look vnto their gallies. So that when Piſaurius had in certain ſmall veſſels made of purpoſe for that ſeruice, imbarked two hundred reſolute ſouldiers, to haue gon vp the riuer to haue fired the gallies, they were by the way, after they had a good way entred into the riuer, incountred by the Turks and inforced to return. But before they could get out of the riuer, the wind roſe ſo contrary, with ſuch a ſtif gale in the mouth of the riuer, that the mariners ouermaſtred with the violence of the weather, when they had done what they could, and ſpent al their ſtrength, were driuen on ſhore, ſome on the one ſide of the C riuer, ſome on the other, and ſo fel into the hands of their enemies, of whom it booted not to craue mercy.

Pylos taken frā the Turks, and againe yeelded vnto them.

About this time Bajazet took alſo the antient and famous city of Dyrrachium, now called Durazo, from the Venetians; before ruinous, and almoſt quite abandoned by the inhabitants, as a place of danger, and not to be kept now that the Turk had got all the Country round about it. The Venetians ſore preſſed with theſe wars ſo long maintained againſt the Turkes, had many times craued aid of other Chriſtian princes, and were wel holpen by the Spaniard in the taking of Cephalenia. And now Lewis the French King, vpon a good deuotion to that war, ſent the Lord Raueſtein with ſeuen tall ſhips and fifteen gallies wel appointed, out of Prouince and Genoa, to aid the Venetians his friends. This fleet departing from Naples, where D they had by the way put in, and paſſing about Italy, and ſo through the Ionian ſea, came vnto Melos one of the Cyclads; at which Iſland Piſaurius with his fleet in ſhort time arriued alſo. From whence they by mutual conſent departed together to inuade the Iſland of Lesbos; and being there ſafely arriued, landed their forces, and laid ſiege vnto the ſtrong City of Mytilene, where by the fury of their artillery they in ſhort time had made a fair breach in the wall. In the time of this battery, whilſt the breach was in making, Piſaurius with part of his fleet ſailed to Tenedos: for it was reported, that certaine of the Turkes Gallies were then comming for that place out of Helleſpontus. Which report, as ſome write, was of purpoſe giuen out by the French, therby to draw the Venetian Admirall from the ſiege; that ſo in the mean time they being in good hope to take the town in his abſence, might themſelues carry away the E honour therof, together with the rich ſpoile. Others fauouring the French, blame the Venetian Admirall, as if he had of purpoſe departed, enuying at the honor of the French. Which is hardly to be beleeued in ſo honourable a perſonage, and in an action ſo much concerning the good of his Commonwealth. Howſoeuer it was, the breach being made, in his abſence was by the French preſently aſſaulted; although that Paulus Valateſius the Venetian Vice-admiral earneſtly requeſted the French Admiral to deferre the aſſault for a while, and to expect the comming of Piſaurius. Which his counſell the French Admirall gaue him the hearing of, but yet went forward with the aſſault. The Frenchmen after their maner furiouſly aſſailing the breach, were valiantly repulſed by the Turks; ſo that in the breach was made a deadly and horrible fight, many falling on both ſides. Yet for all that, the City was manfully defen- F ded by the Turks, and the Frenchmen were inforced to retyre. The French Admiral hauing taken this repulſe, commanded all things to be caried aboord, purpoſing to haue forſaken the ſiege, and ſo to haue departed. When in the mean while the Venetian Admirall returned, and with much ado perſuaded the French to ſtay. Wherupon the battery was again begun with greater fury than before; and now the leaders were conſulting of a freſh aſſault to be giuen; G when ſuddenly news was brought, That the Turks fleet was comming to relieue the city: and therupon the aſſault was for a time deferred, and the battery continued. But thoſe Turks that came being in number but few, were for moſt part by them in the gallies taken and caſt ouerboord; ſome few that got to land, ſaued themſelues in the woods & deſart places of the Iſle.

By this time the city was again made ſaultable, and the Venetians with great courage aſſailed the breach, and had twice gained the top of the Rampiers, from whence they were againe both times beaten down by the Turks, the French al the while looking on. Many valiant men were there ſlain and hurt; and in the end the Venetians were glad with loſſe to retyre, as had the French don before. Whilſt this was in doing, a pinnace came to the fleet with news, That the Great Maſter of the Rhodes was comming with his gallies to the ſiege: wherupon the admirals H determined to maintain the ſiege vntill his comming. But the next day after, the French Admiral changing his purpoſe, ſhipped his men; and hoiſing ſail departed to Chios; and ſailing thence toward Italy, was ouertaken with a terrible tempeſt, wherin the Admirall gally with two others were loſt, with 800 good ſoldiers; the Admiral himſelf with aboue forty others were by chance contrary to all hope ſaued, and with much danger with his weatherbeaten fleet recouered the hauen of Tarentum. The Venetian Admiral thus forſaken of the French, and ſeeing the time paſt wherin he expected the comming of the Great Maſter of the Rhodes, brake vp the ſiege and departed from Lesbos to Chios, and from thence to Paros, where he found the Maſter of the Rhodes with his gallies, vnto whom he complained greatly of the inconſtancy of the French, imputing it to them, that the city of Mytilen was not won. I 1502. Neither were they behind with him, but in all places where they came laid the fault as much or more vpon him. From Paros the Venetian Admiral took his courſe to the Iſland of Melos, where he found one Rhichius an arch pirat of the Turkes, who by force of tempeſt was driuen on ſhore, and by the ſudden comming down of the Iſland people taken. Him (for that he had exerciſed exceeding cruelty vpon certain Chriſtians that he had taken) Piſaurius cauſed to be faſt bound to a ſpit, and with a ſoft fire to be roſted to death. From Melos he returned to Corcyra, and there wintred.

The next Spring, Piſaurius with certain gallies which Alexander Biſhop of Rome had ſent vnto him, vnder the command of Iacobus Piſaurius Biſhop of Paphia, ſailed to Neritos, now called S. Maura, which is an Iſland parted from the firm land with a little fret of the ſea, long K time before that way let in by the Corinthians. Here Piſaurius ſuddenly landing his men, ſurpriſed the Iſland, and with wonderful celeritie and induſtry caſt vp two great trenches, in ſuch ſort and to ſo good purpoſe, that 3000 of the Turks horſemen comming at a low water, ouer that narow ſtreit which parts the Iſland from the maine, were with loſſe repulſed, and forced to retyre. Wherupon S. Maura the chief city was forthwith deliuered to Piſaurius, with the reſt of the Iſland.

The Venetians weary of this long and chargeable war againſt ſo mighty an enemy, ſent Lodouicus Manetius their embaſſador to Bajazet, to treat with him for peace: but Bajazet ſtood vpon ſuch hard points, that nothing could at that time be concluded. Yet Manetius ſo diſcreetly vſed the matter, that Bajazet ſent with him at his returne to Venice, his Embaſſadour, to propound L vnto the Senat ſuch conditions as it pleaſed him to grant them peace vpon. This embaſſador had audience in the Senat twice, where he in his maſters name propounded ſuch vnreaſonable and proud conditions, that they were by the Senat rejected, and ſo he himſelfe diſmiſſed and ſent back again.

1503. The year following, the Venetians ſent an Embaſſador to Bajazet, who moued with the pitiful complaints of his own ſubjects, for the daily harmes they receiued of the Venetians alongſt the ſea coaſt, as alſo for want of trade; and fearing alſo ſome troubles like to ariſe in his kingdom in Aſia (as indeed there did not long after) yeelded himſelf more willingly to heare of peace than before. This embaſſador, called Zacharias Phriſcus, was wel heard of Bajazet, and after long ſuit, brought the matter he came for into ſome good terms; and being honourably M rewarded by the Turkiſh Sultan, returned home, carying with him to the Senat far more reaſonable conditions of peace than had at any time before bin by Bajazet propounded. Herupon the Venetians ſhortly after ſent Andreas Gritti (an honorable Senator) a man wel knowne

A to Bajazet, both for his famous traffique in former time at Conſtantinople, and alſo for that in theſe late wars he was taken priſoner at the winning of Methone, and his life ſpared at the interceſſion of Cherſeogles (Bajazets ſon in law) and afterward ranſomed: hee in the name of the State from whence he came, concluded a peace with Bajazet. The capitulations whereof were, firſt, That the Venetians ſhould deliuer vp the Iſlands of Neritos and Leucadia, reſeruing to themſelues the Iſland of Cephalenia only. Then, That Bajazet ſhould reſtore all ſuch goods as had bin taken from the Venetian merchants in theſe late wars. And that it ſhould be lawfull for them (as they were wont) ſafely to traffick into the Euxine ſea, and to Conſtantinople, and there to haue their Conſul or gouernor as they had in former time. And laſtly, That the Venetian territory ſhould be certainly known, and ſeparated from the Turks by certaine B bounds and limits. Theſe conditions were ſolemnly agreed vpon, and confirmed both by Bajazet and the ſtate of Venice; and ſo a firm peace concluded in the year 1503, after the Wars had continued betwixt them about the ſpace of fiue years.

Peace concluded betweene Bajazet & the Venetians.

The ſame year Bajazet aſſembled a great and puiſſant army of his beſt and moſt approued ſoldiers, as wel in Aſia as Europ, which met together at Sophia, purpoſing as it was thought, to haue inuaded Hungary: but worthily doubting the ſucces of that war againſt ſo warlike a nation, he changed his purpoſe, and leauing Achmetes Baſſa with his Aſian ſoldiers at Sophia, turned himſelf with the reſt of his Army into Albania, to reduce thoſe rebellious people again to his obeiſance; and had before ſent a fleet of gallies to ſtop the paſſages of that country alongſt the ſea coaſt. But the country people vnderſtanding of his comming, fled into the C high and rough rocks and mountains, from whence they did the Turks great harm. Who neuertheles with incredible labor and aduenture mounting thoſe difficult places, and killing an exceeding number of thoſe mountain and ſauage people, carried all the women and children they could light vpon, away with them priſoners; and with fire and ſword made all the country deſolat. After which ſpoil don, Bajazet returned with his army to Manaſtirum: and departing thence, vpon the way met with a Deruiſlar (which is a phantaſtical and beggarly kind of Turkiſh Monkes, vſing no other apparel but two ſheepe-skins, the one hanging before, the other behind) a luſty ſtrong fat fellow, attyred after the maner of his order, with a great ring in each ear: who drawing neer vnto Bajazet, as if he would of him haue receiued an Almes, deſperatly aſſailed him with a ſhort ſcimitar which he had cloſely conueyed vnder his hypocritical D habit. But Bajazet by the ſtarting of the horſe wheron he rid (beeing afraid at the ſudden approch of the hobgoblin) partly auoided the deadly blow by the traitor intended, yet not altogether vnwounded. Neither had he ſo eſcaped the danger, had not Iſkender Baſſa with his horſmans mace preſently ſtrook down the deſperat villain as hee was about to haue doubled his ſtroke; but now ſtruck dead, he was forthwith rent in pieces by the ſoldiers. This treacherous and deſperat act ſo much mooued Bajazet, that he proſcribed all them of that ſuperſtitious order, and baniſhed them out of his empire.

Bajazet in danger to haue bin ſlain by a Deruiſlar or Turkiſh Monk.

After ſo many troubles, Bajazet gaue himſelf to a quiet courſe of life, ſpending moſt part of his time in ſtudy of philoſophy, and conference with learned men. Vnto which peaceable kind of life he was by natural diſpoſition more inclined than to wars; albeit that the regard E of his ſtate, and the earneſt deſire of his men of war, drew him oftentimes euen againſt his wil into the field. As for the ciuil gouernment of his kingdom, hee referred it wholly to his three principal Baſſa's, Alis, Achmetes, and Iachia, who at their pleaſure diſpoſed of all things. After he had in this pleaſing and quiet kind of life, to his great contentment paſſed ouer fiue years; of a little neglected ſparke ſuddenly aroſe ſuch a fire in Aſia, as was hardly after with much bloud of his people, and danger of that part of his Empire quenched: the reliques whereof yet troubleth thoſe ſuperſtitious people at this day. Which thing was brought to paſſe by the crafty deuice of Chaſan Chelife & Schach Culi his boy (whom ſome cal Teckel Schachoculis, and others Techellis) two hypocritical Perſians; who flying into thoſe countries, with the counterfeit ſhew of feigned holines hauing procured to themſelues a great name among thoſe rude F people, with a number of windy headed fellows (filled with the nouelty of their new doctrin) raiſed firſt ſuch a diuerſitie of opinions about the true ſucceſſors of their vntrue prophet, and afterwards ſuch a rebellion amongſt the people, as that the one yet remaineth, and the other was not a good while after with great bloudſhed appeaſed.

Bajazet by nature peaceable.

But for the better vnderſtanding of the ground of theſe troubles,which hapned at this time G in the reign of Bajazet,by occaſion of theſe two fugitiue Perſians;as alſo for the mortall wars which afterwards inſued betwixt Hyſmael (commonly called the great Sophy of Perſia) and Selymus,Bajazets ſucceſſor;it ſhall not be much from our purpoſe, briefly to declare the great mutation which at this time hapned to the Perſian kingdom,as well in the State it ſelf,as in matters of their ſuperſtition. At ſuch time as Aſymbeius Vſun-Caſſanes reigned in Perſia,there was one Haider Erdebil (whom Iouius calleth by the name of Harduelles) a man honorably deſcended among the Perſians,who contemning worldly honor,riches,pleaſure,and whatſoeuer els belonged to delicacie of life(commonly accounted the greateſt part of humane felicity) as vanities and trifles,led ſuch a ſtreit and auſtere kind of life, with ſuch continencie and contempt of the world,as that the vulgar people,for moſt part giuen to pleaſure,wondring at that H in him,which they could not or would not imitate;began to haue the man in ſingular admiration, for the opinion they had conceiued of his vpright life and rare vertues. The fame of this new prophet(for ſo he was accounted)was grown ſo great in the Perſian kingdom, that people without number reſorted out of all parts of Perſia and Armenia, vnto the great City of Tauris,to ſee the man. And he the more to ſeduce the multitude(delighted in nouelties) began to inveigh againſt the common receiued opinion of the Mahometans, concerning the true ſucceſſors of their great Prophet ; and to reuiue the opinion of Giuni,ſyrnamed Sofi;perſuading the people (as if he had bin inſpired with ſome diuine inſpiration) that none of the profeſſors of the Mahometan religion ſhould inherit the kingdom of heauen after death, but ſuch as were the followers of Haly,the true ſucceſſor of their great prophet Mahomet, and his I fellow in writing. Whom he taught them only to honour,as priuy to the mind of the great Prophet,and ſo to receiue his writings, as of all others moſt authentical ; rejecting Ebubekir, Omer and Oſman,with their writings,as moſt wicked and accurſed men : whom the Turks had euer,and yet do with the other Mahometans,honor and worſhip as the true ſucceſſors of their great Prophet,and his ſincere Interpreters,together with the aforeſaid Haly; whom the Perſians do only acknowledge,and therfore in their prayers do commonly ſay, Curſed bee Ebubekir, Omer, and Oſman, and God be fauorable to Haly, and well pleaſed with him. Which their difference about the true ſucceſſor of their Prophet,in whom was no truth,hath bin,and yet is one of the greateſt cauſes of the mortall Wars between the Turkes and the Perſians ; and not the diuers interpretation of their Law (as many haue written)which amongſt the Turks and Perſians K is all one.

The Turks and Perſians differ not about the interpretation of their Law, but about the true ſucceſſor of their great prophet Mahomet.

Haider maries Martha, daughter to the great King Vſun-Caſſanes.

Vſun-Caſſanes mooued with the fame and vertues of this new Prophet , or rather (as ſome thought)deſirous to win the hearts of the multitude that had receiued this new phantaſie; gaue him in mariage his daughter Martha,begotten of the Chriſtian lady Deſpina the daughter of Calo-Ioannes Emperor of Trapezond. Which mariage the Chriſtian Emperour made with the Mahometan prince,and he alſo accepted therof, therby to ſtrengthen themſelues againſt the Turkiſh Emperor Mahomet the Great, whoſe power was then become a terror vnto all his neighbor princes;but to how ſmal purpoſe this policie ſerued them both,is before declared in the life of the ſaid Mahomet. At the concluſion of this mariage,the emperor had ſpecially couenanted with Vſun-Caſſanes,that his daughter Deſpina might haue the free exerciſe L of the Chriſtian religion.Wherby it came to paſſe,that this Martha her daughter, inſtructed by her mother,became a Chriſtian alſo : who now maried by her father vnto this preciſe hypocrit Haider Erdebil,in ſhort time bare him a ſon called Hyſmael; whom ſhe ſo much as ſhee could trained vp in the principles of Chriſtian religion. Wherby it came to paſſe that afterwards when he had by rare fortune obtained the kingdome of Perſia, hee alwaies during his life had the Chriſtians in good regard,and neuer found fault with their religion.

Haider thus graced with the mariage of the great kings daughter Martha,only for his rare vertues and puritie of life, as was commonly ſuppoſed, grew now into far greater credit and eſtimation of the people than before. So that his doctrine and opinions began generally to be receiued,and the number of his followers ſo greatly augmented,that Iacup ſucceeding his M father Vſun-Caſſanes,but lately dead, began to haue his brother in law Haiders power and credit in ſuſpect;and to diſtruſt leſt the Perſians(who ſecretly fauored the remainder of the poſteritie of their antient kings) ſhould aſſemble together vnder color of this new ſuperſtition,

A and raiſe ſome dangerous rebellion before he was well ſetled in his ſeat. For he was not ignorant, that Aſembeius Vſun Caſſanes (his father) had but by force and policie vſurped the Kingdom, hauing killed Moloonchres the lawfull King. Wherof there aroſe two factions, ſome fauoring the Vſurper, and other-ſome the poor remainder of the deſcent of their antient Kings of the race of Tamerlane. For which cauſe Iacup, as he was of a ſuſpitious and troubleſom nature, and aboue meaſure jealous of his eſtate, nothing regarding the neere allyance or reputed holineſſe of his godly brother in law, cauſed him (ſuſpecting no ſuch matter) to be ſecretly murthered: and ſo hauing ſtruck off his head, with fire and ſword perſecuted al the profeſſors of that new doctrine; ſo to deliuer himſelf for euer of that his vain and needleſſe fear: Hyſmael the ſon of Haider (who was afterwards called the great Sophy of Perſia) beeing then but a B child, as it were by fatal deſtiny eſcaped the fury of his cruel vncle Iacup, and fled into Hyrcania, vnto one Pyrchales his fathers friend, who then ruled in a ſmall territory neer vnto the Caſpian ſea.

Haider Erdebil ſecretly murthered.

Amongſt many others of the diſciples and followers of Haider (which in that cruell perſecution were glad to fly for ſafegard of their liues) the two before named, Chaſan Shelife and Schach Culi, afterwards ſyrnamed Cuſelbas, in outward ſhew both of vertue and learning not inferior vnto their maſter, flying that dangerous tempeſt, and paſſing ouer the riuer Euphrates, came into Armenia the leſſer, and there took vp their dwelling at the great mountaine Antitaturus; at the foot wherof the broken rocks haue diuers dark and obſcure caues, made partly by art, partly by nature; which place is by the Inhabitants called Teke-Ili: wherof diuers Hiſtoriographers, C I know not whether deceiued by the name of the place, or els wittingly tranſferring the name of the place vnto the man that liued therin, haue called this Schach Culi (who of the two proued of greater fame) by the name of Techellis, by which name wee wil alſo from henceforth cal him. A thing hertofore much vſed among the religious, and alſo ſome of the children of great princes, who oftentimes bare the names of the places where they were born, or where they moſt liued. This place is both wholſom and exceeding pleaſant, for the varietie of fruits and liuely ſprings, wherwith the plaines adioyning are continually watered, and the mountains at all times of the year garniſhed.

Here Shelife, with his companion Techellis, hauing ſeparated themſelues from the company of men, and giuen themſelues wholly to a contemplatiue life; for diuers yeares liued moſt D ſtreitly and ſeuerely, contenting themſelues with ſuch things as the earth of it ſelfe afforded, without ſeeking for better. Theſe hypocrits were firſt ſeene, and afterward acquainted with the ſhepheards and herdſmen liuing vpon the mountains, and in proces of time with the rude husbandmen and country people, who wondring at their ſtreit and deuout kinde of life, relieued them with all things neceſſary. Yea Baiazet himſelf, hearing of their auſtere and deuout maner of liuing, ſent them yearly ſix or ſeuen thouſand aſpers, as his alms giuen them vpon charitie and deuotion. But afterwards when they began to tell fortunes, and as it were by the way of diuination to prognoſticat of things to come, the rurall people held them for more than men, and conceiued of them a firm opinion that they were ſome diuine prophets. And ſo were by the country people firſt drawn into the country villages, and afterward, as if it had E bin againſt their wils, into the cities; where they had in ſhort time filled all the countrey far and neer with the admiration of their fame. But after they began to publiſh their new phantaſied doctrine concerning the true ſucceſſor of their great prophet Mahomet, they wanted not their new fangled followers (as had Haider their maſter before amongſt the Perſians) who had them in ſingular reuerence, perſuaded now by them, that they ſhould be condemned for euer, if they did not, as they were by them taught, giue the honour of the true ſucceſſion of their great Prophet, only to Haly, and him only to reuerence and call vpon next vnto the great Prophet himſelf.

When they had thus with their often ſermons and blinded prophecies ſeduced the people, and in ſhort time won great credit among the vulgar ſort, of themſelues too much giuen F to nouelty and ſuperſtition; they commanded their diſciples & followers to wear vpon their Turkiſh hats a red band or riband, whereby to be knowne from others that were not of their profeſſion. Of which red bands or ribands, they who profeſſed this new ſuperſtition, were, and yet are ouer all the Eaſt part of the world called by the name of Cuſel-baſſa's, that is to ſad, Red-heads.

The beginning of the Cuſelbaſſa's Hyſmael his behauiour in the time of his exile.

Hyſmael alſo liuing in exile, moſt earneſtly embraced that new ſuperſtition which Haider G his father had before taught in Perſia, but with far better fortune and ſucceſſe. For as ſoon as he was grown to mans eſtate, he following his fathers maner of life, and being by nature won-derfull eloquent, comely of perſon, exceeding wiſe, and of an inuincible courage, was of the rude vulgar people accounted of more like a god than a man; ſo that hee grew to be of great fame and power amongſt thoſe barbarous people with whom he liued. And not the baſe and vulgar ſort only, but diuers noblemen alſo, and others of good reputation, once allured with the noueltie of his doctrine, the more to manifeſt their good will toward the author of their ſect, after they had forſaken their old ſuperſtition, ceaſed not (as the maner of men is) to commend him in the higheſt degree of vertue and honor. And he himſelf as yet but a youth, altogether bending his wit to the ſetting forth of himſelf, making ſemblant of more than was in- H deed in him, obtained, as if it had bin againſt his wil, riches, honor, fame, and authority; of all which things he as a notable diſſembler ſeemed to make no account or reckoning. Neither were ſome wanting who would ſwear, that Haider his father (as hee was an excellent Aſtronomer) calculating his natiuitie, ſhould ſay, That he ſhould proue a great prophet, and the Author of true religion, who ſubduing the greateſt part of the Eaſt, ſhould become as glorious both in matters of religion and martial affairs, as was Mahomet the great Prophet himſelfe.
Which report being bruted abroad among the common people, greatly increaſed his autho-ritie, & gaue them ocaſion to talk of wonders. Not long after, Hyſmael was firſt by the admiration, or rather aſſentation of his friends and followers, and afterwards as if it had bin by general conſent, ſyrnamed Sophos, which amongſt thoſe people ſignifieth a Wiſe man, or the In- I terpreter of the gods. Theſe proſperous beginnings, with the troubled ſtate of the kingdom of Perſia, incouraged him to take in hand great matters: for his vncle Iacup the Perſian King was long before dead, being together with his ſon poiſoned by his adulterous wife: the which he preſently perceiuing, inforced her to drink of the ſame cup; and becauſe he would be ſure ſhe ſhould not eſcape, with his own hand ſtruck off her head, and immediatly after died, with his ſon. After whoſe death great troubles aroſe about the ſucceſſion, and diuers great men one after another aſpired to the kingdom, which they enioyed not long. And among the reſt Elvan Beg (whom Iovius calleth Aluantes) at that time ſtood in no ſure poſſeſſion of the kingdom, being mightily impugned by his brother Moratchamus.

Hyſmael returneth into Armenia, and recouereth his inheritance.

Hyſmael taking hold of this opportunitie, armed diuers of the moſt able men of his follow- K ers, and receiuing ſome ſmal aid from his poor old friend Pyrchales, entred into Armenia, and there partly by the fame that ran of him, and partly by the good wil of the people, rather than by any force, recouered his fathers inheritance, wherunto the remembrance of his dead father did not a little further him. He incouraged by this good beginning, daily grew ſtronger and ſtronger, by the continual repairing vnto him of ſuch as hauing once receiued the doctrine of Haider, were glad of long, for fear of perſecution, to diſſemble the ſame: but now hauing got an head and chieftain to cleaue to, began openly to ſhew themſelues again, and in great number to reſort vnto him, in hope of the good ſucces of their Religion, not ſo happily begun by his father.

Sumachia taken by Ayſmael

His power thus daily increaſing beyond his expectation, he beſieged Sumachia, a City in L the confines of Media, which he took by force and ſacked, and with the ſpoil thereof both enriched and armed his ſoldiers, which before were for moſt part naked men. The taking of this city wonderfully increaſed both his fame and credit; as oftentimes it falleth out, That hauty minds, couragiouſly attempting high exploits, by the good euent of their firſt attempts make way vnto the full of their ſtately deſires. So after this, Hyſmaels thoughts were not ſo low as to think of the taking of this or that little city; but how hee might now compaſſe the great City Tauris, the very ſeat of the Perſian kings, and afterwards the kingdome it ſelfe.
Wherupon repoſing no leſſe confidence in his own good fortune, than the valor of his ſoldi-ers, he marched with his army directly to the City of Tauris, and that with ſuch expedition, that he was come before it before any ſuch thing was feared, much leſſe prouided for it. El- M van the Perſian King was then at Tauris, and had but a little before fought a great battell a-gainſt his brother Moratchamus for the kingdom: and hauing vanquiſhed him, draue him out of Armenia and Perſia. And afterwards, as it commonly falleth out in the winding vp of Ciuile Wars, had cauſed diuers of the chief Citiſens of Tauris, which had taken part with his bro-

Hyſmael commeth to Tauris.

A brother againſt him to bee ſeuerely executed, filling the eies of their friends with the horrible ſpectacle of their diſmembred bodies, and the hearts of moſt men with ſorow and heauines: wherby he had ſo alienated the minds of the Citiſens from him, that now vpon Hyſmaels approch, they were al ready to forſake him: of which their diſpoſition Hyſmael was beforehand informed, and vpon the good hope therof had haſted his comming. Eluan the Perſian King thus ouertaken on the ſudden, had not time to raiſe ſuch forces as might ſuffice either to incounter his enemy, or defend the city; wherfore diſpairing of his own ſtrength, and iuſtly fearing the reuolt and fury of the diſcontented Citiſens, as a man diſmaid ſuddenly fled out of the city. After whoſe departure, the gates were preſently ſet open to Hyſmael. For the citiſens which in thoſe troubleſom times (wherin the two brethren contended for the kingdom) had B ſuffered great calamitie, choſe rather in that preſent danger to receiue a Conqueror as then was Hyſmael, than to their vtter deſtruction to oppoſe themſelues againſt him in the quarel of their cruell King. And the rather, for that they ſaw a general ſecuritie and open way to preferment propoſed vnto all ſuch as ſhould receiue the reformed Religion of this new Conqueror.

Hyſmael entring the city, ſlew certain of the Kings gard which were not yet departed, and then vtterly raſed the ſtately tomb wherin his vncle Iacup was after the manner of the Perſian Kings royally buried. And to mitigat the ſorow hee had ſo long conceiued for his Fathers death, and with reuenge to appeaſe his angry ghoſt, he cauſed the tyrants bones to be digged vp and ſcattered abroad, and the memorial of his name to be quite raſed out of all the places C of the city.

Although Hyſmael was thus poſſeſſed of the regal city of Tauris, and had therby made way for obtaining the whole kingdome, yet hee knew that ſo long as Eluan liued, his conqueſt was not vnto him aſſured: and therfore to the vtmoſt of his power hee augmented his Army with new ſupplies taken vp in that populous city, whom he furniſhed with armor and weapons taken out of the Kings armory. In the mean time news was brought vnto him, That the Perſian King before fled into the fartheſt part of his kingdom, was now comming from Scyras with a great army againſt him: and that Moratchamus his brother forgetting in this common danger all former quarrels, had raiſed a great army about Babylon in Aſſiria, in ſhort time to join with his army.

D Hyſmael neuertheleſſe nothing terified with the report of the great preparation of the two brethren againſt him, to the intent he might ſeeme to vndertake this War by Gods appointment, and vpon a greater aſſurance than his own ſtrength, reſolued to go againſt them. And ſo after he had muſtred his army, and in beſt maner he could prouided all things neceſſary, hee ſet forward from Tauris; vſing no other perſuaſion to incourage his ſouldiers, but that they ſhould all, as became reſolute men, make haſt and follow him whom God had giuen them for a chieftain and leader, vnto a moſt aſſured victory. The Perſian King was at the ſame time ten daies journy from Tauris, when Hyſmael with incredible celeritie preuenting the fame of his comming, was come to the mountain Niphates, which parteth Armenia from Aſſyria: which mountain Eluan purpoſing ſhortly after to paſſe ouer with his populous Army, had ſent beE fore his ſcouts to diſcouer the ſtreit paſſages, and a multitude of pioners to make the wayes more commodious for his great army to paſſe. Which thing Hyſmael vnderſtanding, and politickly conſidering that it ſhould be much for his aduantage, if he ſhould firſt himſelf paſſe ouer thoſe great mountains, and ſo vpon a ſudden ſet vpon his enemies then lying in ſecuritie, and fearing nothing leſſe than ſuch a deſperat attempt; vpon that reſolution aduanced his enſignes vpon the mountains, and hauing with ſmall reſiſtance diſcomfited them which kept the paſſages, came down the ſame mountaines like a tempeſt, and furiouſly aſſailed the King then lying in his camp on the other ſide at the foot of the mountain: vpon whoſe approch ſuch a hurly-burly was raiſed in the Kings camp, that what for the confuſed tumult of the ſouldiers, and fearful outcries of the multitude of baſe people that followed the Camp, the King F could ſcarſly giue order to his captains what he would haue don, or yet incourage his ſouldiers, or put them in order of battel. So that Hyſmael giuing a fierce onſet with his Armenian ſoldiers, there was ſuddenly begun a moſt terrible and bloudy battell. Neither did that day the fortune of Hyſmael faile him, whoſe courage and prowеſſe did neuer faile: for aſſailing the Kings battell of footmen with three ſquadrons at once, hee had ouercome them and put them to flight before that the horſmen could arm themſelues and mount their horſes,which were for moſt part vnſadled and vnbridled at his comming. The king,who had nothing either feared or foreſeen this ſo ſudden a miſchief,but had vainly perſuaded himſelf, That the very fame of his comming with ſo huge an army, would ſo terrifie his enemies, as that he ſhould find none either at Tauris,or in all Armenia,that durſt make reſiſtance; was glad now to run to and fro to incourage his ſouldiers,to ſtay his diſcomfited battels,yea and to come to handy blows himſelf. But when neither his captains nor ſoldiers could put in execution his ſudden directions,which he was inforced to giue in that imminent danger,being ouercome with ſhame and deſperation,he reſolutely thruſt himſelf into the head of his battel,and there valiantly fighting was ſlain. Wherupon the Perſian horſmen,the greateſt ſtrength of the kings Army,hauing now no King for whom they ſhould fight, betooke themſelues to flight; after whom followed the archers and all the reſt of the Kings army.

When as Hyſmael had with leſſe loſſe than a man would haue thought ſo great a victory could haue bin atchieued,poſſeſſed the enemies Tents,he made no great purſuit after them, for that he thought it more requiſit to refreſh his ſoldiers,throughly wearied & almoſt ſpent with long trauel and late fight: wherfore for certain daies he repoſed himſelf and his Army in thoſe his enemies forſaken tents. Afterwards,when he had receiued Embaſſadors from diuers places,yeelding their cities and towns,and that the fauour of the people generally inclined to him,together with the victory; he marched with his army to Seyras,where hee was of the citiſens who had before heard of the victory,joyfully receiued, & his army relieued with all things he could deſire. Hyſmael there entertained with the greateſt honors that the fearful citiſens could poſſibly attribute to him, did oftentimes preach vnto them of the truth & excellencie of his fathers doctrine; and withall gaue out ſtreit proclamations, That hee would account all them for his enemies,which did not within the ſpace of thirty daies renounce all their old ſuperſtition,and receiue this new found verity (as he would haue it.) Wherfore,foraſmuch as on the one ſide were propoſed moſt certain rewards by the happy courſe of his victories; and on the other was threatned exile and torture to ſuch as ſhould obſtinatly perſiſt in their opinion;in ſhort time he drew al the vulgar people to embrace his new doctrine:and afterwards hauing payd his ſoldiers with the riches of that great city, he gallantly furniſhed both his old and new ſoldiers that wanted armour, with moſt excellent armor and furniture. For in that city,one of the greateſt and moſt famous of the Eaſt,were many ſhops full of all kind of armor,which the armorers with wonderfull cunning vſed to make of iron and ſteele, and the juice of certain herbs,of much more notable temper and beauty than are theſe which are made with vs in Europ; not only head-pieces, curiaſſes,and compleat armors, but whole capariſons for horſes,curiouſly made of thin plates of iron and ſteel. Departing from Scyras he took alſo the great city of Saphas, ſuppoſed to haue bin the city in antient time called Suſa,and Sultania; which for the wonderful ruins of the huge buildings, is deemed to haue bin the antient and famous city Tigranocerta. Theſe great matters quickly diſpatched, and hauing in euery city placed gouernors of his own ſect; he paſſed ouer the Riuer Tygris, into Meſopotamia,of purpoſe to expulſe Moratchamus the late Kings brother out of Babylon,who was yet in arms,and had intended (as is before ſaid) to haue paſſed into Armenia,to haue joyned his forces with the King his brother. But now terrified with his brothers calamity (who together with a moſt puiſſant army,and the ſtrength of the Perſian kingdom, was in one day fallen from the height of ſo great a fortune) thought it not beſt to try his fortune in the field againſt ſo fortunat an enemy, but forthwith to withdraw himſelf into the remoteſt places of that large kingdom,and from thence to expect ſome better fortune. For he wel knew that hee was not able to withſtand his victorious enemy, now leading after him a moſt puiſſant army; who not long before with a ſmall power had vanquiſhed and ſlain his brother in a great battel. Hyſmael now by the greatnes of his fame and forces,& as it were by the fauor of God himſelf,become a terror to all the princes of the Eaſt, entered into Meſopotamia after the flight of Moratchamus,and receiued al that great prouince into his ſubiection,euery man ſtriuing as it were who ſhould firſt by his ſpeedy ſubmiſſion purchaſe himſelf the fauour of the victorious conqueror. In brief, Moratchamus already terrified, and repoſing no great hope in himſelf or his own power,neither deeming it ſafe to ſhut vp himſelfe within the walls of any ſtrong City, truſt vp his things of greateſt price,and with his Wiues and children fled into Arabia.

A This Moratchamus is he whom ſome Hiſtoriographers called Mara Beg, and is in the Turks Hiſtories called Imirſa Beg, who (as they report) afterwards marrying the daughter of Bajazet, and recouering part of the Perſian kingdome, was ſuddenly murthered by ſome of his Nobility, whom he purpoſed ſecretly to haue put to death, if they had not preuented the ſame by murthering of him firſt: Hyſmael hauing victoriouſly ſubdued a great part of the Perſian kingdome, and filled all the Eaſt part of the world with the glory of his name, returned out of Aſſyria into Media, and tooke in ſuch cities and ſtrong holds as were yet holden by the garriſons of the late Perſian King. And afterwards returning into Armenia, made wars vpon the Albanians, Iberians, and Scythians, which dwell vpon the borders of the Caſpian: for that thoſe nations, in antient times tributaries to the Perſian Kings, taking the benefit of the long ciuile B wars wherewith the kingdome of Perſia, and all the Eaſt countries, with the ruine of the Kings houſe, had been of late turmoyled; had neither paied any tribute by the ſpace of foure yeres, nor ſent any honourable Embaſſage, as they were wont, and as was expected, eſpecially in ſo great a victory and alteration of the State.

Hyſmael hauing thus obtained the Perſian kingdome, in ſhort time became famous through the world, and was juſtly accounted amongſt the greateſt Monarchs of that age. But nothing made him more to be ſpoken of, than the innouation he had made in the Mahometane ſuperſtition: for by his deuice and commandement a new forme of praier was brought into their Mahometan Temples, far differing from that which had been of long time before vſed. By reaſon whereof, Ebubekir, Homer, and Oſman, the ſucceſſors of their great Prophet Mahomet, C before had in great regard and reuerence, began now to be contemned, and their writings nothing regarded; and the honour of Haly exalted, as the true and onely ſucceſſor of their great Prophet. And becauſe he would haue his ſubjects and the followers of his doctrine knowne from the Turks and other Mahometans, he commanded that they ſhould all weare ſome red hatband, lace, or riband vpon their heads; which they religiouſly obſerue in Perſia vntill this day: whereof they are of the Turks called Cuſelba's, or Red heads. And in ſhort time he had ſo vſed the matter, that he was wonderfully both beloued and reuerenced of his ſubjects; inſomuch that his ſayings were accounted for diuine Oracles, and his commandements for Laws: ſo that when they would confirme any thing by ſolemne oath, they would ſweare by the head of Hyſmael their King: and when they wiſhed well to any man, they vſually ſaid, Hyſmael grant D thee thy deſire. Vpon his coyne which he made both of ſiluer and gold, on the one ſide was written theſe words, La illahe illalahu Muhame dun reſul allahe: which is to ſay, There is no gods but one, and Mahomet is his Meſſenger. And on the other ſide, Iſmaill halife lullahe; which is to ſay, Hyſmael the Vicar of God.

Hyſmael exceedingly beloued and honored of his ſubjects.

1508 Whileſt Hyſmael was thus wreſtling for the Perſian Kingdome, Chaſan Chelife and Techellis (whom we haue a little before declared to haue bin brought out of the mountains and deſarts, into the country villages, and afterwards into the cities; and to haue filled the countries of Armenia and a great part of the leſſer Aſia with the nouelty of their new doctrine and opinions, firſt phantaſied by one Giunet Siech, and afterwards reuiued by Haider Erdebil, Hyſmael his father) hauing gathred a great army of ſuch as had receiued their doctrine, inuaded the Turks E dominion. For after that Techellus (this cold Prophet) had with wonderfull felicity in the preſence of many prognoſticated of things to come; and Hyſmael the Sophi (of late a poore exiled and baniſhed man) was thought to haue grown vnto the higheſt type of worldly honours, not by mans helpe, but by vprightneſſe of life, and the fortunat paſſage of an vndoubted religion: ſuch a deſire of receiuing that new ſuperſtition poſſeſſed the minds of the people in generall, that the cities and townes thereabouts were now full of them which in token of their new profeſſion had taken vpon them the wearing of the red hat, the knowne Cogniſance of the Cuſelba's. Firſt they met together at the city of Taſcia, at the foot of the mountaine Antitaurus, or as the Turkiſh hiſtory reporbts, at the city of Attalia, to the number of 10000, vpon a great Faire day; where they layd hands vpon the chiefe magiſtrate of the city, and F executed him, ſetting his quarters vpon foure of the higheſt towers of the city: and further perſuaded by theſe new maſters of this new ſuperſtition, to take vp armes in defence of themſelues and of their ſincere religion (as they termed it) in caſe that any violence ſhould be offered them by the irreligious Turks; they all ſwore, neuer to forſake their Captaines for any diſtreſſe, or yet refuſe any labour or aduenture for the honor of their moſt holy religion (as they would haue it) in defence whereof they had already vowed their ſoules and bodies. Theſe ringleaders of rebellion, ſeeing the minds of their frantick followers, ſo well prepared for their purpoſe, and repoſing a great confidence in their valour and reſolution; and withall conſidering that the mony which was bountifully brought in vnto them by the country people, partly for deuotion, partly for feare, was not ſufficient to maintaine ſo great a multitude, gaue leaue by publike proclamation to their vnruly followers, to forrage the country round about them, and to liue vpon the ſpoile of them which would not receiue their new found doctrine. Wherupon they diuiding themſelues into diuers companies, and ranging vp and down the country, brought into the camp abundance of cattell, and other ſuch things as the country yeelded: and forthwith (their multitude ſtil increaſing) they entred into Lycaonia, a populous & fruitfull country, where they refreſhed themſelues many daies, roaming vp and downe to the great grieuance and terrour of the people; and brought ſuch a feare vpon the whole country, that they which dwelt in open dorps and villages, were glad to fly with their wiues, children, and goods, into the ſtrong city of Iconium: for proclamations were in many places ſet vp in the names of Chaſan Chelife, and Techellis, wherin many both ſpirituall and temporal bleſſings were in moſt ample maner propoſed to all ſuch as ſhould forthwith take part with them, and follow that their new doctrine already eſtabliſhed in Perſia: but vnto ſuch as ſhould obſtinately perſeuere in their old ſuperſtition, after they had once drawne their ſword, was threatned vtter deſtruction without hope of pardon of life. So that all the inhabitants therabouts, terrified with the terrour of this proclamation, ſome for feare of death, ſome vpon inconſtancy, ſome for ſafegard of their goods and poſſeſſions (dearer vnto them than any religion) ſome other indebted, infamous, in danger of law, beſide many fugitiue ſeruants, dayly reſorted to theſe new maſters. Not long after, whilſt the Turks were making preparation for the ſuppreſſing of this dangerous rebellion, certaine troupes of horſemen ſent from Hyſmael, came in good time to theſe new prophets: for Hyſmael in fauour and furtherance of that new ſuperſtition, had a little before by fit meſſengers exhorted them to proceed couragiouſly in their ſo religious an enterpriſe, and to joine martiall force vnto the religion they profeſſed: promiſing further, not to be wanting vnto them at their need, but to ſend them skilfull Leaders, and from time to time to furniſh them with coyne for the maintenance of that war. All this Hyſmael did openly in deſpight of Bajazet, of ſmall beginning to ſow the ſeed of greater war. For he bearing an old grudge againſt Bajazet for the former wars betwixt the Turks and the Perſians, as alſo for their diſagreement in matters concerning their ſuperſtition, and prickt forward with the heat of youth, deſired nothing more in the greatneſſe of his power, and proſperous ſucceſſe of his affaires, than to haue occaſion to make war with the Turkiſh king: for which purpoſe he ſent his Embaſſadors vnto the State of Venice, to joine with them in league and amity, in ſuch forme and ſort as they had long time before, by Caterinus Zemes, Barbarus, and Contarenus their Embaſſadors, concluded with Vſun-Caſſanes the great Perſian King his grandfather. The chiefe thing that he requeſted of the Venetians, was, That they would ſend him out of Italy by the way of Syria, men skilfull in the caſting of great ordnance, and with their fleet to trouble Bajazet by ſea: promiſing in the meane time himſelfe to fill Aſia the leſſe with his army by land, and ſo to giue a faire occaſion vnto them, to recouer by ſea all ſuch places as they had before in the late wars loſt vnto the Turks vpon the coaſt of Peloponeſus and Grecia.

Hyſmael ſends embaſſadors vnto the Venetians, to joyne in league with thē againſt Bajazet

The Venetians hauing with all courteſie entertained the Embaſſadours, gaue them anſwer, That they would neuer be forgetfull of the antient league and amity they had made with the Perſian King; the remembrance whereof was vnto their State a thing moſt pleaſant: and that they were wonderfull glad, that the new King was an enemy vnto the Turke, and had them in ſuch regard, as to participat to them the cauſes of that war: and further to promiſe vnto them thoſe things, which if his grandfather Vſun-Caſſanes, or his vncle Iacup would haue performed, he ſhould not now haue had need to make wars with the Turkiſh Emperor. But ſuch was the alteration of things and times, that as the Perſian kings then liued at home in peace, thought it not good to ſtir whilſt Bajazet was buſie in Europe; ſo now their State ſtanding in far worſe condition and fortune, could not performe that which they heartily wiſhed, and moſt of all deſired; for that they thought it not good to break the league which they had not long before made with Bajazet the Turkiſh emperor: eſpecially then, when ſundry warlike nations of Europe conſpiring together, and diuers mighty Kings prouoked with no injury, but only enuy-

A ing at their happy eſtate, made warres vpon them; yet neuertheleſſe were in good hope, that God would ſtand in their iuſt defence, and ſtill preſerue their ſtate, which no enemies power had for the ſpace of 700 yeares and more beene able to ouercome. Wherefore they ſhould ſhew vnto their King, that they would as occaſion ſhould ſerue, and as it ſhould ſtand with the good of their State, do their vttermoſt deuoire to make him vnderſtand, that nothing was deerer vnto them than the friendſhip of ſo great a King: nor any thing more honorable, than by mutuall counſell and combined forces to aſſaile the Turke their common enemy.

Shortly after, the Embaſſadors (hauing obtained nothing more than the hope of a league to be in time concluded, and being honourably rewarded) returned with their gallies to Cyprus, and ſo from thence to Syria, where they had ſecret conference with Petrus Zenus (the ſon B of Caterinus Zenus, a man famous for his embaſſage vnto Vſun-Caſſanes into Perſia) Gouernour of the Venetian Merchants at Damaſco. Which thing Bajazet hauing intelligence of, and of the paſſage of the Perſian Embaſſadors that way, complained grieuouſly both by his Embaſſadors and letters vnto Campſon Gaurus Sultan of Ægypt, That he dealt not as a friend and confederat with him; in ſuffering theſe Embaſſadors ſo to paſſe throughout the middeſt of Syria, vnto the Chriſtians their common enemies, to ſtir them vp to war. Whereupon all the Venetian Merchants which were at Tripolis, Aleppo, Damaſco, Berytus, and Alexandria, and eſpecially Zenus himſelfe, were forthwith apprehended by the commandement of the great Sultan, and carried in bonds to Caire, where they were many times inforced in chaines to anſwer vnto ſuch things as were layd to their charge, and after they had by the ſpace of a yeare C endured the manifold deſpights of the proud Mamalukes, hardly obtained to eſcape with life and liberty.

The two ſeditious Prophets, Chaſan and Techellis, well ſtrengthened with the aid of the Perſians, were now come vnto Iconium the moſt famous city of Lycaonia; and waſting all the country before them, drew a great multitude of people to receiue their new doctrine. For the repreſſing of which outrages, Orchanes and Mahomethes, two of Bajazet his nephews (who in ſtead of their fathers Alem Schach, and Tzian Schach, the ſons of Bajazet before dead, gouerned thoſe countries) gathered together their forces, and diſdaining to ſuffer ſuch diſgrace by ſuch a rabble of raſcal people, in the ſight of ſo famous a city, came into the field to giue them battell. But they in their youthfull heat making too muſt haſt, and ioyning battell in a place D of diſaduantage, were by the rebels ouerthrowne and put to flight. Neither would theſe ringleaders in that victory haue forborne to haue aſſailed Iconium, but that they wanted Artillery and engines of war requiſit for the beſieging of cities.

Corcutus alſo, one of the ſons of Bajazet, hauing at the ſame time leuied a conuenient Army about Thiatyra, Sypilus, Magneſia, and Phocea, durſt not further ſtir or ſet forward againſt the rebels, although they lay diſperſed about the country faſt by him. Theſe new prophets with enſignes diſplaied, marching from countrey to countrey through the heart of the leſſer Aſia, entered at length into Bythinia, where neere vnto the riuer Sangarius they met with Caragoſes Baſſa the Viceroy of Aſia, comming againſt them with a great army well appointed, which he had a little before raiſed vpon the bruit of the comming of theſe rebels, and had alſo E commanded Achometes (whom the Turks call Achmetes) the eldeſt ſonne of Bajazet then liuing, Gouernor of the great countries of Capadocia and Pontus, to raiſe his power, and to follow at the backe of the rebels: who if they ſhould hap to be put to the worſe, would neither be able to retyre, neither to keepe the field, being ſo ſhut vp betwixt two ſo great armies. But Techellis by his ſpeedy comming fruſtrated theſe deſignes of the Viceroy; for marching with all ſpeed, he was vpon Caragoſes before he was well aware of his comming, neere vnto the mountaine Horminus, as he was then taking vp of more ſoldiers, and daily expected the comming of others, as if he had been going againſt ſome puiſſant enemy. The Viceroy ſeeing the Rebels approch, although he had before not purpoſed to haue encountered them before he had raiſed far greater forces; thought it not now to ſtand with his honor, to refuſe to giue them F battell, although his army for moſt part conſiſted of the rude country peiſants, taken vp vpon the ſudden out of Paphlagonia, Galatia, Pontus, and Bythinia, raw ſoldiers, and for moſt part vnarmed: as commonly they are which in thoſe countries are preſſed againſt their wils out of the townes and villages, and are of the Turkes called Aſapi, who of the Ianizaries are ſcarcely accounted for men. But his greateſt confidence he repoſed in the approued valour of his antient horſemen, by whoſe means he doubted not in ſafety to retyre out of the battell, G and to ſaue himſelf if any thing ſhould fall out otherwaies than wel; making no great account of the common ſouldiers, more than by them if he could, to weaken the force of the rebels: who on the other ſide (their greateſt force conſiſting of footmen) had no hope to ſaue themſelues by flight, but only by plain valour and dint of ſword. Which Techellis well conſidering, exhorted his ſoldiers to remember into what country they were come, and that there was no cities of refuge, no new power, no other gods of defence to fly vnto, if they ſhould not that day play the men: Wherefore let vs couragiouſly (ſaid he) ſet forward againſt our enemies, and by victory defend our liues, together with the truth of our religion, for which we haue vowed both our ſoules and bodies. He had ſcarcely ſaid thus much, but that his whole Army, in token of cheereſulneſſe, gaue a moſt terrible ſhout, and without further ſtay ſet vpon their H enemies. The Viceroy had placed his footmen in the maine battell in the middle, and his horſemen in the wings, thereby to haue compaſſed in his enemies: but Techellis had ſet all his footmen in one great ſquare battell, and his Perſian horſemen for a refuge. But the Viceroy his freſh-water ſouldiers could ſcarcely abide the ſight of Techellis his army; for in the front of the battell ſtood ſouldiers throughly armed, and all the reſt of his army with red hats vpon their heads, as if they had beene embrued with bloud, which wonderfully terrified the Baſſaes cowardly and vnskilfull ſouldiers: ſo that hauing endured the fight ſcarcely halfe an houre, they all turned their backs and fled. The Turkiſh horſemen which had valiantly aſſailed the rebels army on both ſides, although they had ſlaine many with their arrowes and lances, and ſomewhat diſordered the battell, for that the footmen were enforced to leaue their places, and I to preſſe ſtill on forward againſt them; yet when Techellis his ſoldiers (hauing ouercome the footmen, and diuiding themſelues into diuers ſquadrons) began with their long pikes to kill their horſes, and to lay hardly vnto them, they likewiſe betooke themſelues to flight alſo. Then the Perſian horſemen (which all this while had ſtood ſtill as lookers on) left their ſtandings, and following the chaſe ſlew many of the Turks in their diſordred flight: and following faſt on, incloſed the Viceroy as he was ſtaying of his horſemen, and could not for the thickeneſſe of the duſt well diſcerne his enemies; ſo that he had beene there taken, if he had not been ſpeedily reſcued by his guard, and ſo deliuered from that danger. The reſt of the Turks horſemen ſaued themſelues by flight. In this battell ſeuen thouſand of the Turks footmen were ſlaine, and all their enſignes taken, with great ſtore of prouiſion. K

The battell betweene Caragoſes & Techellis.

Techellis beſiegeth Caragoſes the Viceroy, in the City of Cutaie.

After which victory, Chaſan and Techellis reſting their army one day, marched to the city of Cutaie, neere vnto the mountaine Hormonius: this city is ſcituated as it were in the midſt of Aſia the leſſe, and is the ſeat of the Turkiſh Emperors Viceroy in Aſia; as Sophia in Mœſia is for his other Viceroy in Europe: for it was reported, that the country people had for feare of the preſent war conueyed thither the greateſt part of their wealth; and the rebels well knew, that the Viceroy himſelfe with his chiefe horſemen were fled thither alſo: neither doubted they, but that all the army might be greatly enriched by the wealth of that city, if they ſhould without delay employ their whole forces for the gaining thereof, their enemies now altogether diſcouraged with their late ouerthrow. Techellis alſo deeming that enterpriſe of ſo much worth as whereon to gage his whole forces, comming before the city, placed ſuch field pieces L as he had before taken in the battel, & his archers in ſuch fit places as might moſt anoy the defendants: afterward he cauſed ſcaling ladders to be ſet vp, and proclamation made thorow all his camp, That the whole ſpoile of the city ſhould be the ſoldiers if they could take it; with promiſe of greater rewards to them that ſhould firſt recouer the top of the wals. Filled with this hope, the rebellious multitude approached the wall, fearing neither enemies force, multitude of ſhot, or danger of death; ſtriuing who ſhould firſt mount the ladders, & ſome climbing one in the necke of another, ſo to get vp by the ruins of the wall. The defendants in the meane time from aboue caſting down vpon them great ſtones, timber, fire, ſcalding water, lime, ſand, and ſuch like without meaſure: wherewith although many were ouerthrowne and cruſht to death or ſpoiled, yet others preſently ſtept vp in their place; neither was any of them ſeen, for M feare of the preſent danger to ſhrinke back or be diſcouraged: for the Viceroy on the one ſide, and Techellis on the other, were both eie-witneſſes of euery mans valour in that hot ſeruice: the one prickt forward with doubtfull hope, for feare to be enforced to giue ouer the aſſault ſo begun; and the other with the due regard of his honor, life, and ſtate, all ſubiect to that danger, A ger, and therefore in perſon himſelfe performed all the parts of a worthy chiefetaine and couragious ſouldier. But at length the defendants wearied with the fierce aſſault of the enemy, and for moſt part wounded, Techellis continually ſending in freſh men, and withdrawing ſuch as were hurt, by plaine force brake into the city in two places ouer the heaps of the dead bodies: and hauing repulſed the defendants, burſt open one of the gates, and thereby brought in his whole army. Then began a miſerable ſlaughter of the ſoldiers and poore citiſens in euery houſe and corner of the city. At which inſtant the Palace (whither the Viceroy had retyred himſelfe with his family) was alſo taken: the Viceroy himſelfe with his wiues and children were there alſo taken priſoners, and the ſtately Palace built with marble, in a trice conſumed with fire.

Caragoſes the Viceroy with his wiues and children taken by Techellis in the City of Cutaie.

B The rich city of Cutaie, the ſeat of the great commander of the Turkiſh Empire in Aſia, thus taken by Techellis, and his whole army both beautified and inriched with the ſpoile thereof: he perſuaded himſelfe, that it was now no hard matter for him to take the city of Pruſa alſo, the antient ſeat of the Turkiſh Kings in Bythinia, and ſo endanger the whole ſtate of the Turks Empire in Aſia, if he ſhould now without delay carry the terror of himſelfe thither, before the Turks could in that country make head againſt him, or the citiſens be able in ſo ſudden a feare to make any ſufficient prouiſion for the defence of themſelues and their city; and ſo in the courſe of his good fortune to vſe the courage and cheerefulneſſe of his ſouldiers. Wherefore appointing a day when he would ſet forward, he commanded all things neceſſary to be made ready for the taking of that rich city, being neither ſtrongly walled, neither furniC ſhed with any good garriſon for the defence thereof.

But whileſt he was making this preparation, a new army, lately ſhipt ouer the Helleſpont from Callipolis into Aſia, inforced him to change his former determination. For Bajazet waked at the name of Techellis, & the fame of the new ſuperſtition now generally receiued in Perſia, had long before giuen commandement to his ſonnes, nephewes, and the Viceroy of Aſia, That they ſhould with all carefulnes prouide, that that part of his kingdome tooke no harme thereby. But after he ſaw Techellis of a poore hermit become a great captaine, and backt alſo with the Perſian King, and all his dominions in Aſia in danger of ſome great alteration, he ſent Alis Baſſa with his Europeian army. This Alis an Eunuch, borne in Macedonia (yet for his courage comparable with the greateſt captaines) had for his many and worthy deſerts, in the D time of the great Emperour Mahomet, Bajazet his father, got vnto himſelfe both the honour and name of a moſt famous chiefetaine. He hauing made choice of the principall horſemen of Epirus, Macedonia, Seruia, Illyria, and Thracia, and joining vnto them ſeuen thouſand Ianizaries (the moſt aſſured hope of the Turks in all their expeditions) paſſed ouer from Callipolis into Phrygia, and vpon the way directed his letters vnto Achomates and Corcutus, Bajazet his ſons, and to all the other Sanzacks and Gouernors of the Turks prouinces in Aſia, That they ſhould with as much ſpeed as they could, raiſe their forces and meet him in Galatia. But Techellis aduertiſed of his comming, thought it beſt for him to depart out of Pontus, and to retire to ſome place of more ſafety, leſt by longer ſtaying he ſhould be encloſed by his enemies, repairing thitherwards on euery ſide; or elſe vpon ſome great diſaduantage to joyne battell: E for he ſaw, that if he ſtaied neuer ſo little, he ſhould find no ſafe paſſage or place of refuge to retyre vnto, hauing left ſuch large and ſpacious Countries, ſo many enemies Cities, ſo many great riuers, ſo many diſcontented people behind him; all which the firſt fauor of the vulgar ſort, and ſpeedy courſe of his victory, had a little before layd open vnto him. Wherefore calling together his Captaines and moſt expert men of war to conſult vpon the matter, it was generally thought to be a point of meere madneſſe, or elſe of extreme neceſſity, with ſo ſmall a power of vnskilfull ſouldiers, without any ſufficient ſtrength of horſemen, to joyne battell with ſuch an enemy as better knew the countrey than he, and far exceeded him both for number and expertneſſe of his ſouldiers. Wherefore Techellis truſſing vp his rich prey he had before gotten, began now with ſpeed to retire backe againe with his followers through F Galatia. But the Baſſa hauing intelligence almoſt euery houre by letters and eſpials, both of the retyring of Techellis, and the way he held, paſſed ouer the riuer Sangarius, and coaſting the country, came and incamped betwixt the cities of Cutaie and Ancyra, which way it was ſuppoſed the enemy would paſſe. Where when he had there a while reſted his wearied ſouldiers, and was certainely aduertiſed, that the rebels had taken another way, he ſet forward againe, and after fiue daies march in the plaines of Galatia, ouertooke the ſtraglers of the enemies, G who wearied or wounded, were not able to hold way with the army: all whom the Baſſa commanded to be cruelly put to the ſword. And Techellis to terrifie the great Baſſa, or at leſtwiſe with a moſt horrible ſpectacle to ſtay his purſuit, cauſed Caragoſes the Viceroy, whom he had carried along with him in chaines, to be cruelly empailed by the highway ſide, vpon a ſharpe ſtake ſet faſt in the ground, and ſo left him ſticking for the Turks to wonder at. But Alis Baſſa nothing diſmaied with the horrible death of ſo great a perſonage, held on his way with more haſt than good ſpeed, exhorting his ſouldiers patiently to endure the painfulneſſe of the long march, and to ſtraine themſelues to take reuenge of thoſe rebellious theeues and robbers, who deſtroying the country before them, ſpared not ſo much as the Turks children, and the temples of their religion; and ſo the day following came into the plaines of Ancyra. The ſame H day alſo Achomates came vnto the Baſſa with ten thouſand ſouldiers. Alis Baſſa perceiuing that he could not poſſibly with his whole army ouertake his enemies, marching with greater ſpeed before him, and grieued at the heart to ſee them eſcapes out of his hand, reſolued to proue if he could with his horſemen ouertake them: whereupon leauing his footmen with Achomates, he himſelfe with eight thouſand horſe following the enemy vpon the ſpur, ouertooke the rereward of their army at the mountaine Olyga, a little from the city of Ancyra, vnto whom he gaue an hot skirmiſh.

The battell betwixt Alis Baſſa and Techellis.

Techellis which a little before had taken a fit place for his campe, vpon the riſing of the hil, although he ſaw his men faint with long trauell and the ſcorching heat of the Sun, yet quickly perceiuing that he ſhould haue to do only with horſemen, and that in a place of aduantage, I turning his army, and orderly placing his ſoldiers, as the ground & the ſhortneſſe of the time would giue leaue, valiantly receiued the impreſſion of the Turks, and with their long pikes and arrows at the firſt repulſed them: ſo that it ſeemed they would neither haue giuen ground vnto the bragging horſemen, neither haue done any thing not beſeeming their former victories, had not Alis Baſſa ſent 1000 Carbines, who in troups orderly following one another, deliuered their ſhot as thicke as haile vpon the enemy; with which ſtorme many of them being ſlain, and moe wounded, their ranks began to be ſomewhat diſordred: whereupon the other horſemen breaking in, with great ſlaughter ouerthrew the vauntgard of Techellis battell: in which conflict Chaſan Chelife himſelfe was ſlain. Techellis alwaies at hand where moſt need was, euen in the midſt of the ſlaughter of his men ſet in order a new battell of his moſt ready and beſt K armed ſoldiers, the only remedy in ſo great a diſtreſſe; and bringing them on into the front of the battell, oppoſed them againſt the horſemen, now (as they thought) in poſſeſſion of the victory; commanding them by little and little to retire vnto the mountaine, to the intent that they might ſeeme to do that by commandment of the Generall, which they were like enough to haue done of themſelues for feare: hoping that it would ſo come to paſſe, That the Turks finding the diſaduantage of the place, would leaue ſo hardly to aſſaile them. But the Baſſa encouraged with the firſt ſucceſſe of the battell, exhorted his ſoldiers to vrge the victory, now almoſt as good as gotten, & not to giue the enemy ſpace to recouer the ſtrength of the mountain, but valiantly to charge them, and with a little ſhort paines that day to end all the war, to the honor of Bajazet their ſoueraigne, and worthy commendations of themſelues in generall. L In this ſort encouraging them, he with a troupe of his beſt horſmen (to animate the reſt, and to ſhew his own valor) brake through the enemies battell: which thing he in the ſame heat, with more courage than diſcretion, attempting to performe the ſecond time, was incloſed by his enemies and ſlain: vpon whoſe fall the fortune of the battell was in a moment changed; for the Turks, which erſt fought couragiouſly, hauing beaten backe and almoſt ouerthrown their enemies, now diſmaied with their Generals death, began to fight but faintly, and by little & little to giue ground, and at laſt turning their horſes about, fled. On the other ſide Techellis his ſoldiers who but a little before had repoſed greater hope in the ſtrength of the place and the mountain, than in their weapons and valour, now encouraged with new hope, and taking heart in the faint charge of their enemies, began to thruſt forward, and with a moſt terrible noiſe M crying victory, put to flight the Turks horſemen, before wearied with long trauell, when as they had by the Generals raſhneſſe loſt a notable victory almoſt already gained. Techellis although he knew that the enemy could neither refreſh his horſes, nor yet with any aſſurance keepe the field, if he ſhould haue purſued him; yet hauing loſt many of his beſt ſoldiers, & the Chaſan Chelife ſlaine.

reſt

A reſt of his army ſore weakened with trauell, faſting and fighting, determined to refreſh his wearied followers vpon the mountain Olyga. From whence after a few daies he marched ouer the riuer Halys vnto the city of Taſcia, his old dwelling place, and ſo to the city of Celenis, which the riuer Marſya (much ſpoken of by the Poets) runneth thorow, and is now called by the name of Maras, but as then the regall ſeat of the mountaine King Aladeules. The Turkes horſemen hauing thus in ſome ſmall ſort rather reuenged the injuries done by the rebels, than obtained any victory, returned to Achomates, who was then comming on with the footmen.
Not long after, Bajazet vnderſtanding of the death of Alis Baſſa his Generall, ſent Ionuſes Baſſa, a warlike captaine, and of great experience (borne in Epirus) in his ſtead. Who as ſoone as he had receiued the charge of the army from Achomates, marching forthwith into Cappadocia, B and keeping the way on the right hand towards the mountaine Antitaurus, came in few daies vnto the city of Taſcia, the place of Techellis his abode: where burning and deſtroying the country all about, he came and encamped with his army at the foot of the mountaine.
The Baſſa had in his army about forty thouſand horſe and foot, well appointed, with many field pieces, and plenty of victuals which he brought with him, for feare of want in that bare country. Techellis terrified with his comming, hauing of late receiued no aid from Hyſmael the Perſian king, and wanting alſo great artillery, and beſides that, ſeeing his ſoldiers greatly both diminiſhed and diſcouraged with the late battell at Olyga, determined not vpon ſo great diſaduantage to meet his enemy in the plaine field, but to keep the rough mountains and thicke woods, hoping that if he could be able any time to keepe thoſe ſtrong places, he ſhould either C receiue ſome aid from Hyſmael, or by the heat of the Turks leaders take them at ſome notable aduantage. In the meane time many notable ſkirmiſhes paſſed betwixt the ſoldiers on both ſides: for the Turks fetching a compaſſe oftentimes about the mountains, and ſeeking for the beſt paſſages, by the eaſie riſing of the hils, came to ſkirmiſh with their enemies: and Techellis his ſouldiers on the other ſide, ſallying many times out of the woods and abrupt places of the mountains, valiantly aſſailed the Turks. After they had a long time in this ſort, as if it had been in diſport, rather proued their forces one vpon another, than done any great matter; the Turkes prying into euery corner, at length perceiued two waies whereby their whole army with enſignes diſplaied might without any great difficulty be brought vnto the top of the mountaine, and ſo into their enemies ſtrength. The Baſſa hauing well viewed and conſidered D the places, cauſed the Ianizaries at one inſtant to march vp to the mountaine by one of the aforeſaid waies, and the reſt of his army by the other: who with ſoft pace climing vp the ſteepe mountains, with their targuets defended themſelues as well as they could againſt their enemies darts and ſhot. For Techellus his ſouldiers hauing before taken the high mountaines and places of aduantage, caſt downe vpon the Turks great ſtones and ſhot without number, as if it had beene out of ſome ſtrong fort. But the Turks bending certaine ſmall field peeces againſt the places which moſt anoied them, eaſily draue them from their ſtandings, the harquebuſiers ſtill following their enſignes, ſhrouded cloſe vnder the targuetiers, and deliuered their deadly ſhot as ſhoures of raine vpon their enemies. Whoſe deſperat approch Techellis perceiuing, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and with all his army retired further off into the higher E mountaines and rougher woods. The night following, perceiuing that by the euill ſucceſſe of the former ſkirmiſh he had loſt a great part of his credit and ſtrength, he with great ſilence forſooke the woods, and paſſing quite ouer the mountaines fled into Armenia, then part of the Perſian kingdome. Neither did the Turks perceiue their departure vntill it was light day, and that their ſcouts entring the thick woods, and finding the enemies baggage, with ſome wounded ſoldiers not able to fly, brought newes vnto the Baſſa of the enemies departure, and of his ſpeedy flight into Armenia. Which thing, when he by them that were taken, vnderſtood to be certainely true, fretting and chafing like a mad man, that he had not preſently vpon the enemies retreat beſet the wood round, he ſent his horſemen forthwith to purſue them: but all in vaine, for Techellis was by direct and knowne waies gone into Armenia. Some few ſtraglers not F able to make ſo much haſt as the reſt, were ouertaken by the Turks horſemen, and brought backe to the Baſſa. —

Ionuſes Baſſa ſent by Bajazet, Generall of his army againſt Techellus.

Techellis thus put to flight, Ionuſes cauſed ſtreit inquiſition to be made through all the cities of the leſſer Aſia, for all ſuch as had profeſſed the Perſian religion: and them whom he found to haue borne armes in the late rebellion, he cauſed to be put to death with moſt exquiſit torments, and the reſt to be burnt in their foreheads with an hot yron, thereby for euer to be knowne; whom together with the kinſfolks and friends of them that were executed, or fled with Techellis, he cauſed to be tranſported into Europe, and to be diſperſed through Macedonia, Epirus, and Peloponeſus: for feare leſt if Techellis now fled into the Perſian Kingdome, ſhould from thence returne with new forces, they ſhould alſo repaire againe vnto him, and raiſe a new rebellion. This was the beginning, courſe, and ending, of one of the moſt dangerous rebellions that euer troubled the Turkiſh Empire: wherein all, or at leaſt wiſe the greateſt part of their dominions in Aſia, might haue beene eaſily ſurpriſed by the Perſian King, if he would throughly haue proſecuted the occaſion and opportunity then offered.

The remainder of Techellis his followers, flying into Perſia, by the way lighting vpon a Carauan of Merchants laden with ſilkes and other rich merchandiſe, tooke the ſpoile thereof: for which outrage comming to Tauris, the captaines were all by the commandement of Hyſmael executed, and Techellis himſelfe to the terrour of others burnt aliue.

The next yeare (which was the yeare 1509, the fourteenth day of September) chanced a great and terrible earthquake in the city of Conſtantinople and the countries thereabouts: by the violence whereof, a great part of the wals of that imperiall city, with many ſtately buildings both publike and priuat, were quite ouerthrowne, and thirteene thouſand people ouerwhelmed and ſlaine. The terrour whereof was ſo great, that the people generally forſooke their houſes and lay abroad in the fields: yea, Bajazet himſelfe, then very aged and ſore troubled with the gout, for feare thereof remoued from Conſtantinople to Hadrianople; but finding himſelfe in no more ſafety than before, he left the city and lay abroad in the fields in his tent. This earthquake endured by the ſpace of eighteene daies, or (as the Turkes Hiſtories report) of a moneth, with very little intermiſſion; which was then accounted ominous, as portending the miſerable calamities which ſhortly after happened in the Othoman family. After this earthquake enſued a great plague, wherewith the city was grieuouſly viſited, and for the moſt part vnpeopled. But after that the earthquake was ceaſed, and the mortality aſſuaged, Bajazet cauſed the imperial city to be with all ſpeed repaired, and to that purpoſe gaue out commiſſions into all parts of his dominions for the taking vp of workemen: ſo that there were at once in work eighty thouſand workemen, who in moſt beautifull manner in the ſpace of foure moneths againe repaired the ruines of that great city.

Bajazet had by his many wiues, eight ſonnes and ſix daughters, which liued to be men and women growne: and the ſons all Gouernors in diuers prouinces of his large Empire: whom the Turkiſh Hiſtories reckon vp in this order, Abdullah Zelebi, Alem Scach, Tzihan Scach, Achmet, Machmut, Corcut, Selim, and Muhamet. Yet Antonius Vtrius a Genoway, who long time liued in Bajazet his court, and (as he of himſelfe writeth) waited in his chamber at the time of his death, reckoning vp the ſonnes of Bajazet, maketh mention but of theſe ſix, Sciemſcia, Alemſcia, Achomates, Mahometes, Selymus, and Corcutus: naming the forenamed by names ſomething differing from the other. Sciemſcia the eldeſt, Gouernor of Caramania, for his towardlineſſe moſt deerely beloued of his father, died of a naturall death before him, and was of him and his ſubjects greatly lamented. Alemſcia died in like manner, of whoſe death as ſoone as he was aduertiſed, by mourning letters written in blacke paper with white characters (as their maner of writing is, in certifying of heauy news) he caſt from him his Scepter with all other tokens of honor, and cauſed general mourning to be made for him in the court, and through all the city of Conſtantinople, by the ſpace of three daies; during which time all ſhops were ſhut vp, all trading forbidden, and no ſigne of mirth to be ſeene: and for a certaine ſpace, after the manner of their ſuperſtition, cauſed ſolemne ſacrifices to be made for the health of his ſoule, and 7000 aſpers to be giuen weekely to the poore. His dead body was afterward with all princely pompe conueyed to Pruſa, and there with great ſolemnity buried. Tzihan Gouernour of Caria, and Mahomet Gouernor of Capha, vpon their fathers heauy diſpleaſure, were by his commandement both ſtrangled.

Of his other foure ſons, Achmet, otherwiſe called Achomates, Machmut, or Mahometes, Corcut, or Corcutus, and Selymus: the ſecond (namely Mahometes) was of greateſt hope and expectation, not giuen to ſenſuality or voluptuous pleaſure, as Achomates his eldeſt brother, neither altogether bookiſh as was Corcutus, nor yet of ſo fierce and cruell a diſpoſition as Selymus: but of ſuch a liuely ſpirit, ſharp wit, bountifull diſpoſition, and princely carriage of himſelfe,

A ſelfe, that in the judgement of moſt men, he ſeemed already worthy of a kingdome. Which immoderat fauour of the people, cauſed his elder brother Achomates, yea and Bajazet alſo him-ſelfe to haue him in no ſmall jealouſie, as if he had affected the Empire, and was in ſhort time the cauſe of his vntimely death: which thing he nothing doubting, haſtned (as fatal things are) by ſuch meanes as he leaſt feared might haue procured any ſuch mortall diſtruſt or danger.

Moſt of Bajazte his children were by diuers women, yet Achomates and this Mahometes were by one and the ſame mother: for which cauſe, Mahometes tooke greater pleaſure in him than in any his other brethren, although it were not anſwered with like loue again. Achomates was Lord and Gouernor of Amaſia; and this Mahometes, of Magneſia; who deſirous to ſee the manner of his brothers life and gouernment, diſguiſed himſelfe with two of his familiar and B faithfull friends, as if they had bin religious men, of that order which the Turks call Imalier.
[Theſe men are for moſt part comely perſonages, borne of good houſes, who in cleanly attire made after an homely faſhion, do at their pleaſure wander vp and downe from towne to town, and country to country, noting the diſpoſitions and manners of the people, whereof as fitteth beſt their purpoſe, they make large diſcourſes afterwards to others: they commonly carry about with them ſiluer cymbals, wheron they play moſt cunningly, and therunto ſing pleaſant and wanton ditties: for which idle delight they receiue mony of the people, as an almes giuen them of deuotion. Theſe are the common corrupters of youth, and defilers of other mens beds; men altogether giuen to eaſe and pleaſure, and are of the Turks called, The religious brethren of Loue: but might of right, better be tearmed, Epicurus his hogs, than profeſſors of C any religion at all.] Mahometes and his two conſorts, as men of this profeſſion, trauelled vp and downe the countries of Pontus and Capadocia (where Achomates commanded) and ſo to the city of Amaſia; receiuing for their merry glee by the way as they went, the almes and deuotion of the fooliſh countrey people. And being at length come to Amaſia vpon a ſolemne holiday, they awaited the comming of Achomates to the church: who paſſing by, ſtaid awhile liſtening attentiuely vnto their pleaſant and alluring harmony; which was for that purpoſe moſt curiouſly and ſkilfully before deuiſed, and by them both with their inſtruments and voices performed. When they had ended their muſicke, and according to the manner of their idle profeſſion expected his deuotion; Achomates being a man of a ſpare hand, commanded fiue aſpers to be giuen them in reward [which is about ſix pence of our mony.] Mahome- D tes diſdaining his brothers baſe reward, as a ſigne of his miſerable diſpoſition, would in no wiſe diſcouer himſelfe, as he had before determined; but taking horſe, returned with ſpeed to Magneſia: from whence he wrote taunting letters to his brother Achomates, ſcoffing at his good husbandry (no praiſe to a Prince) and in contempt ſent him backe againe his fiue aſpers; which thing Achomates tooke in ſo euill part, as that he was neuer afterwards friends with him.
The report of this fact was in ſhort time diſperſed throughout all parts of the Turkiſh Empire, diuers men diuerſly deeming of his purpoſe therein.

Not long after Mahometes had in this ſort plaid with his brother Achomates, he attired him-ſelfe with certaine of his truſty followers as if they had beene ſeafaring men, and with a ſmall barke came to Conſtantinople, and there landing as aduenturers from ſea, tooke diligent view E both of the imperiall city, and of the city of Pera ſtanding oppoſit againſt it, curiouſly noting how all things were by his fathers appointment ordered and gouerned. It hapned whileſt he was thus ſtaying at Conſtantinople, that Bajazet had appointed a ſolemne aſſembly of all his chiefe Baſſaes at the court; which Mahometes was deſirous to haue the ſight of, as alſo of the fa-ſhion of his fathers court: but as he with his companions preſſed to haue entred in at the court gate, they were by their baſe apparell taken of the porters to haue bin rude mariners, and ſo by them kept out. Wherefore conſulting what to do in that caſe, he went and preſently bought a moſt beautifull Chriſtian captiue boy, and the next day comming again to the court with two of his companions (as if they had been aduenturers at ſea) requeſted to be let in, for that they had brought a preſent for the Emperor. So finding meanes to be admitted to the preſence of F Bajazet, one of his conſorts (as if he had bin a ſea captain) boldly ſtept forth, and with due reue-rence offered the preſent vnto the Emperor; which he thankefully tooke, and in token therof gaue him his hand to kiſſe, and commanded a rich garment wrought with gold to be giuen vnto him, with two other of leſſe value vnto Mahometes and his fellow, ſuppoſed to be the ſaid captaines followers: who all this while ſtood afarre off, as if it had beene for reuerence of the Emperour, but indeed for feare to be diſcouered. As theſe counterfeit gueſts were returning G from the court in their garments of fauour, they hapned to meet with three courtiers which knew Mahometes; who diſmounting from their horſes, had done him honour and due reuerence, as to the ſonne of the great Emperor, had he not by ſecret ſignes forbidden them, as one vnwilling to be knowne. When he had thus ſeene his father, the court, and the imperiall city, he went againe aboord, and ſo with ſpeed returned to Magneſia.

The report of this his doing, had in ſhort time filled both the city and the court, and was at laſt brought to Bajazets ears: which raiſed in his ſuſpitious head many a troubleſome thought, greatly fearing, that in theſe ſly practiſes lay hidden ſome ſecret and deſperate conſpiracy, dangerous to himſelfe and his other children. Wherefore after long diſcourſe had with the three great Baſſaes then of his ſecret counſell, concerning the matter, to rid himſelfe of all H feare, he reſolued in any caſe to take him away. And therefore cauſed them in his name to write vnto Aſmehemedi, a gallant courtier, and alwaies neere vnto Mahometes, to poyſon him with a ſecret poiſon, for that purpoſe incloſed in thoſe letters ſent vnto him: with promiſe of great rewards and preferments for that his ſeruice, to be afterwards receiued from the Emperor: charging him withall, that if he could not effect the matter, he ſhould ſo conceale it, as that Mahometes ſhould haue no diſtruſt thereof; the leaſt ſuſpition whereof, would tend to his vtter deſtruction. This Aſmehemedi for ſom vnkindnes bare a ſecret grudge againſt Mahometes, which Bajazet knowing of, made choice of him the rather: and he on the other ſide, partly to performe the old tyrants command, and partly to reuenge his owne priuat wrong, vigilantly awaited all oportunities to bring to effect that he had in charge. At length it fortuned, that Mahometes ha- I uing diſported himſelfe in the gardens of pleaſure, and being thirſty after his exerciſe, called for drinke: Aſmehemedi alwaies at hand, in a guilt boule fetcht him ſuch drinke as he deſired, whereinto he had ſecretly conueied the deadly poyſon ſent from Bajazet. Mahometes hauing drunke thereof, in ſhort time began to feele himſelfe euill at eaſe, and preſently ſent for his phyſitians: who thinking that he had but ſomething diſtempered himſelfe with drinking too much cold drink in his heat, perceiued not that he was poiſoned, vntil that within ſix daies after, he died. Of whoſe death Bajazet aduertiſed, could not abſtaine from mourning, although he himſelfe had bin the only author thereof: and the more to manifeſt his heauineſſe, commanded all the court to mourne with him, and praiers to made in their temples after their ſuperſtitious manner, and almes to be giuen to the poore for the health of his ſoule. His dead body K was afterwards carried to Pruſa, and there honourably buried with his anceſtors. Aſmehemedi the traitor in reward of his faithfulneſſe towards his maſter, was by the commandement of Bajazet caſt into priſon, and neuer afterwards ſeene, being there (as it was thought) ſecretly made away.

Now had Bajazet but three ſons left, Achomates, Selymus, and Corcutus. Achomates Gouernour of Amaſia, was a man both politick and valiant: but much giuen to pleaſure and delight: him Bajazet and moſt part of the great men of the court fauoured aboue the reſt of his brethren; except ſuch as were before corrupted by Selymus. Corcutus for his milde and quiet nature, was of moſt men beloued, but not thought ſo fit for the gouernment of ſo great an Empire; eſpecially by the Ianizaries and ſouldiers of the court, for that he was (as they thought) altogether L drowned in the ſtudy of Philoſophy, a thing nothing agreeing with their humor. Yet might Bajazet ſeeme to do him wrong, if he ſhould not according to his promiſe againe reſtore him vnto the poſſeſſion of the Empire, which he had almoſt thirty yeares before receiued at his hands; as is before in the beginning of his life declared. But Selymus being of a more hauty diſpoſition than to brooke the life of a ſubject vnder the command of either of his brethren, and altogether giuen to martiall affaires, ſought by infinit bounty, feigned courteſie, ſubtill policy, and by all other meanes good and bad, to aſpire vnto the Empire. Him therefore the Ianizaries with all the great ſouldiers of the court, yea, and ſome of the chiefe Baſſaes alſo (corrupted with gifts) wiſhed aboue the reſt, for their lord and ſoueraigne: deſiring rather to liue vnder him which was like to ſet all the World on a hurly burly (whereby they might increaſe M their honor and wealth, the certaine rewards of their aduentures) than to lead an idle and vnprofitable life (as they tearmed it) vnder a quiet and peaceable Prince.

Whileſt men ſtood thus diuerſly affected towards theſe princes of ſo great hope, Bajazet now far worne with yeares, and ſo grieuouſly tormented with the gout that he was not able to

A to helpe himſelfe: for the quietneſſe of his ſubjects and preuenting of ſuch troubles as might ariſe by the aſpiring of his children after his death, determined whileſt he yet liued (for the auoiding of theſe and other ſuch like miſchiefes) to eſtabliſh the ſucceſſion in ſome one of his ſonnes; who wholly poſſeſſed of the kingdome, might eaſily repreſſe the pride of the other. And although he had ſet downe with himſelfe, that Achomates ſhould be the man, as well in reſpect of his birth-right, as of the eſpeciall affection he bare vnto him; yet to diſcouer the diſpoſition of his ſubjects, and how they ſtood affected, it was giuen out in generall termes, That he meant before his death to make it knowne to the World, who ſhould ſucceed in the Empire, without naming any one of his ſonnes; leauing that for euery man to diuine of, according as they were affected: which was not the leaſt cauſe, that euery one of his ſonnes with B like ambition began now to make ſmall account of their former preferments, as thinking onely vpon the Empire it ſelfe.

Firſt of all Selymus, whom Bajazet had made Gouernor of the kingdome of Trapezond, rigging vp all the ſhips he could in Pontus, ſailed from Trapezond ouer the Euxine (now called the blacke ſea) to the city of Capha, called in antient time Theodoſia, and from thence by land came to Mahometes King of the Tartars called Præcoponſes, a mighty Prince, whoſe daughter he had without the good liking of his father before married: and diſcouering vnto him his intended purpoſe, beſought him by the ſacred bonds of affinity betwixt them, not to ſhrinke from him his louing ſonne in law in ſo fit an opportunity for his aduancement: And withall ſhewed vnto him, what great hope of obtaining the Empite was propoſed vnto him C by his moſt faithfull friends and the ſoldiers of the court, if he would but come neerer vnto his father (then about to transfer the Empire to ſome one of his ſons) and either by faire meanes to procure his fauor, or by entering with his army into Thracia, to terrifie him from appointing either of his other brethren for the ſucceſſor. The Tartar King commending his high deuice, as a kind father in law with wonderful celerity cauſed great ſtore of ſhipping to be made ready in the Ponticke ſea, and Mœotis, but eſpecially at the Ports at Copa and Tana, vpon the great riuer Tanais, which boundeth Europe from Aſia: and arming fifteene thouſand Tartarian horſemen, deliuered them all to Selymus, promiſing forthwith to ſend him greater aid if he ſhould haue occaſion to vſe the ſame. Theſe things being quickly diſpatched, Selymus paſſing ouer the riuer Boryſthenes, and ſo through Valachia, came at length to Danubius, and D with his horſemen paſſed that famous riuer at the city of Chelia: his fleet he commanded to meet him at the port of the city Varna, called in antient time Dionyſiopolis, in the confines of Bulgaria and Thracia: he himſelfe ſtill leuying moe men by the way as he went, pretending in ſhew quite another thing than he had indeed intended: which the better to couer, he gaue it out as if he had purpoſed to haue inuaded Hungary.

But Bajazet a good while before aduertiſed, that Selymus was departed from Trapezond, and come ouer into Europe, maruelling that he had left his charge in Aſia (the rebellion of Techellis and the Perſian war yet ſcarce quieted) and that vpon his own head he had entertained forreine aid to make war againſt the moſt warlike nation of the Hungarians; and farther, that with his army by land, he had ſeized vpon the places neereſt vnto Thracia, and with a E ſtrong nauy kept the Euxine ſea; he began to ſuſpect as the truth was, That all this preparation was made and intended againſt himſelfe: for the crafty old ſire had good proofe of the vnquiet and troubleſome nature of his ſon, eſpecially in that without his knowledge he durſt preſume to take a wife from among the Tartars, and afterwards with no leſſe preſumption of himſelfe raiſe an army both by ſea and land: whereby he eaſily perceiued, that he would neuer hold himſelfe contented with a ſmall kingdome, ſo long as he was in hope by deſperat aduenture to gain a greater. Yet thinking it better with like diſſimulation to appeaſe his violent and fierce nature, than by ſharpe reproofe to moue him to further choller, he ſent vnto him embaſſadors to declare to him with what danger the Turkiſh Kings had in former times taken vpon them thoſe Hungarian wars: for example whereof he needed not to goe further than F to his grandfather Mahomet the Great, who many times to his exceeding loſſe had made proofe of the Hungarian forces: wherefore he ſhould do well to expect ſome fit opportunity, when as he might with better aduice, greater power, and more ſure hope of victory, take thoſe wars in hand. Whereunto Selymus anſwered, That he had left Aſia, inforced thereunto by the injuries of his brother Achomates, and was therefore come ouer into Europe, by dint of ſword and the helpe of his friends,to win from the enemies of the Mahometan religion a larger and G better prouince for that little barren and peaceable one which his father had giuen him, bordering vpon Hiberia and Cholchos, bare and needy people, liuing as connies amongſt the rocks and mountaines. As for the Hungarians whom they thought to be a people inuincible, and therefore not to be dealt withall,he was not of that baſe mind to be daunted with any danger, were it neuer ſo great: and yet that in his opinion the war was neither ſo difficult or dangerous,as was by them pretended; foraſmuch as the antient prowеſſe of that warlike nation was now much changed,together with the change of their Kings; and their diſcipline of war not onely much decaied,but almoſt quite loſt, after that Vladiſlaus, farre vnlike in policy and prowеſſe,had ſucceeded the renowned Matthias in that kingdome. Neither had he(as he ſaid) from his cradle learned to be afraid of death, or of the common chances of war, as knowing H that neither God nor man would be wanting to him, who with an honourable reſolution did aduenture vpon vertuous and worthy attempts:and that therefore he was fully reſolued for his owne honour (which his father had in ſome ſort blemiſhed by the immoderate aduancement of his brethren)either to die honourably in the field in battell againſt the enemies of the Mahometan religion,or elſe gloriouſly to extend the bounds of the Turkiſh Empire: and that he would not (though one of the youngeſt in the Othoman family) be accounted inferiour to any of his brethren in vertue and prowеſſe. Thus was the Hungarian war neuer by Selymus intended,notably by him pretended,and with no leſſe diſſimulation by Bajazet diſſuaded. The Embaſſadours, although Selymus in all his ſpeeches ſhewed no token of peace: yet in his fathers name preſented vnto him diuers gifts, thereby if it might be to appeaſe his fierce and cruell I mind.Vnto his old gouernment they adjoined Samandria,which the Hungarians call Schenderouia,a ſtrong city of Seruia vpon the borders of Hungary, with many other ſtrong towns in the ſame country: they gaue him alſo threeſcore thouſand ducats, beſide a thouſand garments of cloth and ſilke: with good ſtore of prouiſion wherewith to relieue and content the ſoldiers by him entertained: leſt that they drawne far from home in hope of ſpoile, ſhould take it in euill part if they ſhould be ſent away emptie handed. Selymus in a happy time hauing receiued theſe gifts, returned the Embaſſadours vnto his father, with more doubtfull anſwer and vncertaine hope than before: yet changing nothing in himſelfe of his former reſolution,ſecret meſſengers and letters from his friends in the court ſtill whetting him forward (too much already inflamed with deſire of ſoueraignty) perſuading him to make haſt and to K repoſe his greateſt hope in his quicke ſpeed; for that they vnderſtood, that about the time of his ſetting forward,his brother Achomates was comming with a great power,being ſent for out of Capadocia by his father.

Preſents giuen to Selymus by his fathers Embaſſadors.

Bajazet would appoint his ſucceſſour whileſt he yet liued.

In the meane time Bajazet, moued the rather with the feare of Selymus, reſolued vpon that, whereof he had long before in his minde deeply conſidered, and now ſaid openly, That hee would appoint his ſucceſſor,who in ſtead of himſelfe,ſpent with yeares and ſickeneſſe,ſhould bring with him the floure of youth and ſtrength of body, fit to gouerne ſo great an Empire.
But when thoſe things were propounded vnto the ſouldiers of the court by the foure great Baſſaes (who in all things both of peace and wars had next place vnto the Emperor himſelfe) it was forthwith gainſaied by thoſe martiall men, crying aloud with one voice, That they L would know no other Emperor but Bajazet, vnder whoſe conduct and good fortune they had now ſerued aboue 30 yeres: and therfore would not ſuffer him to liue a priuat life in obſcurity,who with ſo many victories and ſtrong cities taken, had brought the Othoman Empire vnto that height of renown & glory.They ſaid moreouer,that there was in him yet ſtrength enough if he would but with the reuerend honor of his age retain the majeſty of his place,and the glory he had gotten with his long and happy reigne, and moſt famous victories: and that of his children, ſuch a one ſhould vndoubtedly in his due time ſucceed in the Empire, as of right ought: only they wiſht, that the old Emperor might in the mean time liue in health, with a long and happy reigne: neither needed he (as they ſaid) to feare that after his death any controuerſie ſhould ariſe among his ſons about the ſucceſſion; for that the Othoman progeny vſed M to attain the imperiall ſeat,according to the old cuſtome of their anceſtors the Othoman kings, by right and order only,and not by corruption or faction. But if he would needs vpon his own priuat good liking, or as it were by new adoption, proceed to make choice of ſuch a one as the people & the men of war(his moſt loiall & faithful ſubjects)nould not ſo well like of,it would

A be an occaſion of much more trouble, and haply the means to bring in that confuſion of the State,which he thought therby to eſchu. For then,beſide the diſlike of the people,the other brethren would neuer indure ſo notable an injury,or euer be at quiet,vntil they had (as men wrongfully caſt off and diſinherited) by ſtrong hand and indangering of all,recouer their honor loſt by the headſtrong wil of their aged father.

The ſoldiers thus before inſtructed by the friends and fauorits of Selymus (who with mony and large promiſes had corrupted their captains and chief officers) ſpake theſe things frankly, to haue deterred the old Emperor from his purpoſe. But he thinking that they had (as he himſelf did) eſpecially affected Achomates his eldeſt ſon (for that they had generally proteſted, That they would againſt all injuries defend his honor,vnto whom the Empire ſhould of B right appertain) ſaid he would make choice of Achomates,if it ſhould ſtand with their good liking. But the chief of the ſouldiers,who corrupted by Selymus,had together ſold both their faith and themſelues, cunningly commended Achomates, and ſeemed wonderfully to like of him; yet to accept of him for their Soueraign, Bajazet yet liuing, they ſaid was not agreeing with the antient cuſtom of the Othoman Kings, neither for the behoof of the men of war, neither yet good for the ſtate of the Empire; foraſmuch as neither his brethren, Corcutus and Selymus, neither the ſoldiers of the court,could patiently endure the leaſt touch of the ſuſpition of infidelitie; which they muſt needs do, if hee as a ſuſpitious father ſhould doubt either of the loue or loyaltie of his moſt dutiful ſons,or of the faith or conſtancie of his moſt faithfull ſeruants,wherof he had made ſo many trials. Beſides that,it ſeemed vnto them all vnreaſonable, C that by the odious preiudice of that fact, the ſoldiers ſhould be left defrauded of the rewards vſually granted vnto them during the time of the vacancie of the Empire,ariſing of the ſpoil taken from them which are of religion different from the Turks. For it is a cuſtom,that immediatly vpon the death of the Turkiſh Emperor, all the Iews and Chriſtians which dwel at Conſtantinople,Pera,Hadrianople,Theſſalonica,and Pruſa,eſpecially merchants,expoſed vnto the injuries of the Turks,are by the Ianizaries and other ſoldiers of the court ſpoiled of all their wares and goods,and become vnto them a prey: neither will they giue their oath of allegeance vnto the new Emperor,vntil he haue granted vnto them all that prey,as a bounty; and haue ſolemnly ſworn by his own head (the greateſt aſſurance that can by Oath bee giuen among the Turks) freely to pardon all the offenders, and for euer to forget all the outrages D before committed. When Bajazet ſaw his men of war thus generally to oppoſe themſelues againſt the tranſlation of the empire to Achomates,he of purpoſe to corrupt the minds of them which were before already corrupted,promiſed to giue them fiue hundred thouſand duckats, if they would ſtand fauorable to Achomates,and accept him for their Soueraign:which maſſe of mony his cuſtomers and receiuers vndertook to leuy of the ſame merchants ſtrangers and Iewes,and to pay it as Bajazet had promiſed. Yet the ouerthwart forwardnes of theſe men of war ouercame the good fortune of Achomates; although the reward promiſed were great. For why,they had in their martial minds conceiued far greater rewards & preferments, if in ſted of a peaceable and quiet prince,a monſtrous Tyrant of reſtleſſe nature (ſuch as was Selymus) might by their helpe and meanes aſpire to the Empire. Thus Bajazet driuen from his hope, E thought it beſt for the preſent to diſſemble the matter,& concealing his grief, with patience to put vp that diſhonor,vntil a fitter opportunitie were offered for the effecting of that hee ſo much deſired.

Bajazet ſeeks to prefer Achomates vnto the Empire.

Selymus aduertiſed by his friends,with what affection and and faſtneſſe the ſoldiers of the Court had in the ſecret fauor of him, openly withſtood the earneſt deſire of Bajazet for the preferment of Achomates;becauſe he would no longer fruſtrat the expectation of his fauorits by lingring or delay,or ſeem to diſtruſt the ready good wils of the men of war towards him, left the borders of Hungary, & with his army marching thorow Thracia,incamped at length vpon the riſing of a hill not far from Hadrianople, from whence the neighing of his horſes might eaſily be heard,and his tents from the high places of the city diſcouered. From thence F he ſent a meſſenger to his father then lying in the city,to certifie him,That foraſmuch as hee had not of many years before ſeen him, he was now therfore deſirous to come vnto his preſence to viſit him, before he croſſed the ſeas backe again by his appointment to Trapezond.
And the rather, becauſe it might ſo chance that he ſhould neuer ſee him again, beeing now both aged and diſeaſed. Beſides that,it much concerned (as he would haue had him beleeue) the quietnes of his kingdom in Aſia,and the vnity of his children,if the controuerſie betwixt G him and his brother Achomates, which could not ſafely be committed to meſſengers, might by themſelues be diſcouered to him their father, as an indifferent hearer and decider therof.

Wherefore he humbly beſought him to appoint him a time and place to giue him audience in,and not to deny him leaue to come and kiſſe his hands: which thing his Anceſtors neuer refuſed to grant to their poor friends,much leſſe to their children. Bajazet, who a few dayes before vnderſtanding of the comming of Selymus, and throughly ſeeing into his deuices, had called vnto him certain of his Sanzacks or chief captains, with their ſelect companies out of the neereſt parts of Grecia,and had alſo ſet ſtrong watch and ward through the City; fearing leſt vnder colour of parle,his ſoldiers attending about his own perſon, corrupted by Selymus and his friends(who euen then loded with gifts and promiſes,were ſecretly vpon the point of H reuolt) ſhould be quite drawn away from him,and ſo he himſelf at length bee either by open force oppreſſed,or ſecret trechery circumuented, thought it beſt to cut him off at once from all hope of conference,or acces vnto his preſence. Wherfore ſeriouſly blaming him, That he had vpon his own head brought his army into another mans prouince; that he in arms required audience; and laſtly, That he ſo inſolently abuſed his fathers lenitie and patience;he by the ſame meſſenger ſent him further word, That he ſhould not preſume to approch any neerer vnto him,or expect any thing appertaining vnto peace; who garded with forreine power,had without his fathers leaue entred into arms,and ſpoiled the countries of his friends. And that therfore he ſhould do wel,with all ſpeed to retyre out of Thracia, yea and out of Europ alſo, and diſbanding his forces,again to retyre himſelf vnto his charge in Pontus;in which doing I he ſhould find greater fauor and kindnes with him his father, than euer he had before: but if he would needs proceed in the courſe by him begun,then he would no more take him for his ſon,but for his enemy,and before it were long, ſharply chaſtiſe him for his malapert inſolencie, little differing from vnnatural trechery. The meſſenger with this anſwer diſmiſſed,it was not long after,but that Bajazet was by his Eſpials aduertiſed, That Selymus the night following was riſen with his army, and marched directly toward Conſtantinople; whither he was ſent for by his friends,in hope that vpon his approch with his Army, ſome ſudden tumult or vprore would to his auail ariſe in that ſo great and populous a city. Wherupon Bajazet fearing leſt in ſtaying at Hadrianople,he might loſe the Imperial city of Conſtantinople,early in the morning by breake of the day departed from Hadrianople towards Conſtantinople. K Vpon his departure,Selymus peaceably entred the city of Hadrianople, the Citiſens fearing, that if they ſhould haue made any reſiſtance,their vnſeaſonable faithfulneſſe toward Bajazet might haue turned to their vtter deſtruction. Selymus after he had a while refreſhed his army with the plenty of that city,according to his former determination ſet forward again,of purpoſe by long and ſpeedy marches to haue preuented his fathers comming to Conſtantinople.
Bajazet was yet ſcarſly come to Chiurlus,or rather Tzurulum, an antient ruinous city almoſt vpon the mid way betwixt Hadrianople and Conſtantinople, when warning was giuen him by them that followed his army,that the forerunners of Selymus were at hand, cutting off the ſtraglers of his army,and with hot skirmiſhes ſtaying and troubling his rereward. The aged Emperor more mooued than terrified with the ſtrangenes of the matter,becauſe his marching L ſhould not ſeem as if it were a flight or chaſe,commanded his ſtandard to be ſet vp,and al his army to make a ſtand; of purpoſe that if Selymus ſhould come vp to giue him battell, hee might find him in readineſſe. The great Captains and Noblemen then preſent with Bajazet, whether it were for old acquaintance,or vpon ſome new inclination of their affection,or elſe vpon hope of new allyance and preferment,wiſhing well vnto Selymus, and therefore indirectly and cunningly fauoured him, ſeemed not to like of Bajazet his reſolution,to be ſo far mooued (as they ſaid) with the youthfull heat and lightneſſe of his ſon,as to ſeek reuenge by battell, whereas the victory it ſelf could yeeld him nothing but ſorrow,but the ouerthrow threatened deſtruction both to himſelfe and all them that were with him: the imminent euent whereof ſeemed to be ſo much the more dangerous and fearefull, by how much hee was at M that time inferiour vnto his ſonne both in warrelike prouiſion and number of armed ſouldiours.

Wherefore it were the beſt courſe for him (ſaid they) to moderate his anger, and not now in the winding vp of his life, to make too much haſt by a miſerable death in a wofull battell to blemiſh the whole glory of his former life. There was (as they would haue perſuaded

A ſuaded him) but one only courſe to be taken, full of wholſome policie and ſafety; which was, that he ſhould with ſuch ſpeed as he had begun, march on forward to Conſtantinople, that ſo Selymus excluded out of the city (his chiefeſt hope) and then not knowing which way to turn himſelf, ſhould either of his own accord, or for fear of his fathers greater forces, thinke of return; and ſo with his raſcall followers more honeſtly periſh by their hands whoſe countries he had ſpoiled, and vpon whom he muſt of neceſſity liue in his return, than by the ſword of his father. The author of this counſel was Muſtapha, the moſt antient Baſſa of thoſe which beeing in greateſt authoritie vnder the Emperor, are only of his priuy counſel, and ſway all matters of importance concerning either peace or war: he then vpon an vnthankfull and malicious mind loathing Bajazet, as one that had too long reigned, hated him alſo for certain priuat B diſpleaſures conceiued of the emulation of the other yonger Baſſa's by him promoted; & ſecretly bare great affection to Selymus, both in condition and fauor reſembling his grandfather the Great Mahomet, by whom he was brought vp himſelf, and him of all the ſons of Bajazet he thought moſt worthy of the empire. This Muſtapha was born in the town of Seres (neer to Amphipolis) the ſon of a Greek prieſt, a man of a ſly, crafty, and ſubtil wit, alwaies ſubiect to corruption: which diſeaſes of mind were in him well to haue bin diſcouered by his froward look and ſquint eies, the certain notes of a nature to be ſuſpected. Next vnto this Muſtapha was Boſtanges Baſſa, born of the honorable houſe of the Deucagina in Ætolia, and therof called Deucagiuoli; a man for his couetouſneſſe, ambition, and treachery, infamous, as the foul & miſerable end of his life afterwards declared. Vnto this man Selymus had by ſecret mariage betrothed C one of his daughters, now mariageable, as a reward of his corrupt faith. By the which ſleight he alſo allured Ajax (Aga or captain of the Ianizaries, and great Maſter of the houſhold) to promiſe his aid for the obtaining of the empire; wherunto he ſaid he was by deſtiny called: and by his means drew other inferior captains ſecretly to fauor his quarrel; to whom he ſpared not to promiſe whatſoeuer might pleaſe their humors. Yea the captains almoſt generally either corrupted with reward, or for feare following the inclination of the greater commanders, of themſelues leaned that way. Of all the reſt, only Cherſeogles Baſſa (whom the Turks hiſtories call alſo Achmet Hertezeck Ogli) a faithfull conſtant vpright man, free from all double dealing and deceit, a faſt and aſſured friend vnto Bajazet his father in law, was of opinion, That the immoderat pride and inſolencie of Selymus was euen there by force of Armes D and ſtrong hand forthwith to be oppreſſed, before he ſhould approch any neerer vnto the Imperiall city, for fear of raiſing ſome further tumult or trouble there than were well to bee appeaſed; which was the thing that Selymus his friends moſt of all deſired. Neither was it to be thought (as Cherſeogles ſaid) that the naked Tartarian horſemen, although they were in number more, would euer be able to abide the firſt charge of Bajazets well armed penſioners. As for the Ianizaries, of whoſe approued faith and valor tried in many dangers, he had before had good experience; there was no doubt but that they would now to the vtmoſt of their power defend the perſon and honor of their aged and victorious Emperor, who had of long time ſo wel of them deſerued; and alſo to reuenge his quarrel vpon diſobedient Selymus, who neither fearing God, the iuſt reuenger of ſuch vngratious dealing, neither the infamy of men, had moſt E vnnaturally lift vp his ſword againſt his father, wickedly to depriue him of life, of whom hee had receiued life. Wherfore he perſuaded him, in his own iuſt quarrell to go forth vnto his ſoldiers with cheerful countenance, and putting them in mind of the benefits they had from time to time moſt bountifully receiued at his hands, as alſo of their allegeance and duty; to make them to vnderſtand, that repoſing his truſt in their fidelity and valour, he had reſolutely ſet down with himſelf, in that place before he went any further, by their faithful hands to chaſtiſe the preſumptuous inſolencie of his vnnaturall ſonne, together with his rebellious Followers.

Cherſeogles Baſſa the onely great man faithfull to Bajazet perſuadeth him to giue battell to Selymus.

But now that we are fallen into the remembrance of this Cherſeogles, it ſhall not be amiſſe, both for the honor of the man, and the great loue he alwaies bare vnto the Chriſtians, to ſtep F a little out of the way, to ſee the cauſe why he being a Chriſtian born, turned Turk. For hee was not (as almoſt all the reſt of the great men about Bajazet were) taken from his Chriſtian parents of a child, and ſo brought vp in the Mahometan religion; but being now a man grown turned Turk: yet ſo, as that he neuer in heart forgot either the Chriſtian religion, or loue toward the Chriſtians; a thing not common among ſuch renegats. He being the ſonne of one

Cherſeogles, a ſmall prince of Illyria neer vnto the black mountain; and going to be maried to a Lady whom he moſt intirely loued, and vnto whom he was already betrothed, honourably deſcended of the houſe of the Deſpot of Servia; his intemperat father with luſtfull eye beholding the yong Lady of rare feiture and incomparable beauty, deſired to haue her for himſelf; and regarding more the ſatisfying of his own inordinat deſire, than his own honour, or the fatherly loue of his ſon, took her in mariage himſelf; all his friends laboring in vaine to diſſuade him, and with open mouth crying ſhame of ſo foul a fact. Wherfore the yong man, mooued with the indignitie of ſo great an injury, and driuen headlong with diſpair, fled firſt to the Turks garriſons which lay not far off, and from thence to Conſtantinople; where the fortune of the man was to be wondred at: for being brought before Bajazet, who with cheerefull countenance entertained him, for that he was honorably deſcended, and well liked both of the man, and of the cauſe of his reuolt; ſmiling vpon him, ſaid, Be of good cheere, noble Youth, for thy great courage is worthy of far greater fortune than thy fathers houſe can afford thee; now in ſted of thy Loue wrongfully taken from thee by thy father (the kinſwoman of a poor exiled Prince) thou ſhalt haue giuen thee in mariage the daughter of a great Emperor, of rare and ſingular perfection. And not long after abjuring his religion, and changing his name of Stephen, to Achomates and Cherſeogles, he maried one of Bajazets daughters, a princeſſe of great beauty, and deſerued to haue a place among the Baſſa's of greateſt honor in the court. Yet ſtil retaining the remembrance of his former profeſſion, with a deſire to return therto again: inſomuch that he kept in his ſecret cloſet the image of the Crucifix, which he ſhewed to Io. Laſcaris, as to his truſty friend, as hee himſelf reported. This man at ſuch time as the city of Modon was taken by the Turks, and a multitude of poor Chriſtian captiues cruelly put to death in the ſight of Bajazet, by erneſt intreaty ſaued the liues of the Venetian Senators; and afterward deliuered Andreas Gritti, beeing priſoner at Conſtantinople, and condemned to die; who not many years after was choſen Duke of Venice. He was the chief means whereby the Venetians to their great good obtained peace of Bajazet. He alſo by his great authority, and of his own charge redeemed innumerable Chriſtians from the ſeruitude of the Turks, and ſet them at liberty. Neither is his kindnes toward the furtherance of good learning to be forgotten: for at ſuch time as the aforeſaid Io. Laſcaris the notable and learned Grecian, by the appointment of Leo the tenth, ſought antient works of famous Writers, hee procured the Turkiſh Emperours Letters patents, that he might freely at his pleaſure ſearch all the Liberaries in Grecia, to the great furtherance of good letters.

Now Bajazet incouraged by this mans perſuaſion (as is aforeſaid) and hearing as hee lay in his pauilion, the alarm of the enemy, with the tumult & clamor of his own ſoldiers as if they had bin men afraid; and ſundry meſſengers alſo at the ſame time comming to him with news, That Selymus with his Tartarian horſmen had almoſt incloſed the rereward of his Army, and already taken ſome of his baggage; grinding his teeth for very madneſſe and grief of mind, with tears trickling down his hoary cheeks, got him out of his pauilion in his horſ-litter (for he was at the ſame time ſo troubled with the gout, that hee was not able to ſit on horſ-backe) and turning himſelf vnto the Penſioners and Ianizaries ſtanding about him, as their maner is, ſaid vnto them, Bajazets ſpeech to the ſoldiers and Ianizaries of the Court.

Will you, foſter-children, valiant ſoldiers, and faithfull keepers of my perſon, who with great fortune haue ſerued me in field aboue the ſpace of thirty years; and for your faithful and good ſeruice haue both in time of peace and war, of me receiued ſuch rewards, as by your own confeſſion and thankſgiuing, far exceeded your own expectation, and the meaſure of our treaſures: Will you (I ſay) ſuffer the innocent Father to be butchered by his graceles ſon? And your old Emperor, tormented with age and diſeaſes, to be cruelly murthered by a company of wild Tartars, little better than arrant rogues and theeues? Shall I be now forſaken in this my heauy old age and laſt act of life? And ſhall I be deliuered vnto myne enemies, by them, by them (I ſay) who many years ago with great faithfulnes and inuincible courage defended myne honor and right againſt my brother Zemes? and haue many times ſince, not only valiantly defended this Empire againſt moſt warlike nations, but alſo victoriouſly augmented the ſame? But I wil not ſo lightly beleeue that which to my no ſmall grief is brought vnto myne ears concerning the reuolting of my army: neither if I did beleeue it, am I ſo fearfull as to be therwith diſcouraged; or to ſeek to make ſhift for my ſelf. For to what purpoſe ſhould I think of flight, as though I could in any place find more faithfulneſſe, A or ſurer defence than with you? And concerning your ſelues, what ſhould be your hope by this ſo infamous trechery? If any of you (for I cannot beleeue that you are all ſo mad) without regard of faith, of worldly ſhame, or the fear of God, haue polluted your minds with the pernitious conceit of ſo foul a treaſon; doe you think to gain greater rewards and preferments by your trechery and villany, than by your fidelitie & conſtancie? There be many which carefull of my perſon, perſuade me to reſerue this my ſicke and feeble body vnto my better fortune, and to commit my ſelfe to flight, ſo rather to ſaue my life with ſhame and infamy, than to end my daies with honor and glory. Which is ſo far from my thought for the apprehenſion of any fear to do, that I will to the contrary forthwith giue the fierce Enemy battell, and in this my laſt danger make proof of all your fidelitie and valor, and of euery one of your good wils in particular: and ſo by conduct of the Higheſt either defeit the power and breake the ſtrength of this graceleſſe man; or els hauing B reigned aboue thirty years an Emperor, end my daies together with them which ſhall vnto the end continue with me in their faithfulneſſe and loyaltie, although I ſhould bee moſt ſhamefully and diſhonorably betrayed and forſaken of ſome of myne own Gard. Which thing though lying fame would make me beleeue, yet will I not fear it vntil I make proof therof.

The common ſort of the Ianizaries (vnto whom the great Commanders and captains corrupted by Selymus, had not for their leuitie and multitude imparted their purpoſe for transferring the empire to Selymus) began to cry out as if it had bin with general conſent, That he ſhould not doubt to join battel with his enemies, and ſo to make proofe of their conſtant fidelitie and valour. Which was done with ſuch a cheerefulnes and deſire, expreſſed by great C ſhouts, clapping of hands, and clattering of armor, that it ſeemed they would play the parts of reſolute ſoldiers, and that as guiltleſſe men they tooke it grieuouſly to be once ſuſpected of treaſon or infidelitie. Others alſo who ſecretly and in heart were well affected to Selymus, for faſhion ſake followed them with like cry, but ſpecially the great Commanders of the Emperors court and army, now changed their affection, whether it were for ſhame of the fact, or for fear of diſcouering themſelues out of ſeaſon, is vncertain. Wherfore according to the maner of ſuch men, which through their mutability and miſchieuous diſpoſition, fearing to be conuinced and diſcouered, adde vnto the preſent a ſecond and new treaſon or treachery to couer the former: ſo Muſtapha and Boſtanges, not daring now to ſhew themſelues for Selymus, to make a great ſhew of their feigned loyaltie toward Bajazet, departed themſelues out of his pauilion D to incourage the ſoldiers and to marſhal the battel.

The battell betwixt Bajazet and Selymus.

Bajazet ſick in his chariot, by the aduice of Cherſeogles the faithful Baſſa placed his battell in this order: The Sanzacks (which are the gouernors of prouinces) with their horſemen, in number about 6000, he ſet in the front of the battel: the Spachi oglans and Siliphtars, who are the chief horſemen of the Court, and as it were the Emperours Penſioners, were placed as two wings on each ſide of the great ſquadron of the Ianizaries; in the midſt whereof was old Bajazet himſelf. Other 4000 horſemen (ſeruants to the great men of the Court) were left in the rereward, and to gard the baggage. Theſe ſlaues (for ſo indeed they are) for their apparell and furniture, and for their valor alſo, are little inferior to their maſters, by whom they are ſo ſumptuouſly maintained both for ſtrength and oſtentation. The battel thus ordered, Bajazet E commanded the trumpets to ſound, and a red enſigne in token of battell to be diſplaied. On the other ſide, Selymus placing his Tartarian horſmen in both wings, and his Turks in the middeſt, in manner of an halfe moon, for that he in number of horſemen far exceeded his father, did almoſt on euery ſide incloſe him, and ſo charge him. The Tartars when they were come within 100 paces of their enemies, caſting themſelues (after the manner of their fight) into great rings, empty within in manner of a crowne, and ſo running round, that they might both backward and forward deliuer their arrows, caſt vpon their enemies whole ſhowres of ſhot, as if it had bin hail, to the great annoiance of the Turks. When as in the mean time the other Tartarian archers farther off, ſhooting their arrows not right forth, but more vpright towards heauen, which falling directly down, ſore gauled the Turks horſes alſo. But the old ſoldiers, F taught by the example of their captains, ſerred cloſe together, and caſting their targets ouer their heads as if it had bin one whole roofe or penthouſe, receiued their Arrowes with leſſe harm, and haſted with as much ſpeed as they could to come to handy blows. The penſioners alſo at the ſame inſtant brauely charged the middle of Selymus his battell, where his Turkiſh horſmen ſtood: and Ajax captain of the Ianizaries,drawing out 700 ready harquebuſiers out of the ſquadron of the Ianizaries,with them aſſailed the hindmoſt of one of the wings of the Tartars: and the four thouſand ſeruants left in the rereward, as deſirous as the reſt to ſhew their forwardnes,with great ſlaughter repulſed the other wing of the Tartars,which came to haue ſpoiled the Turks carriages. This fierce battel betwixt the father and the ſonne, with doubtful euent indured from noon vntil the going down of the Sun; Selymus in many places ſtil reſtoring his declining battel,and fighting himſelf as for an Empire. But after that the Tartars,hardly charged by the harquebuſiers,were not able to abide the ſhot,eſpecially their horſes,being with the vnwonted noiſe therof wonderfully terrified,and ſo carrying back their riders whether they would or no,began to fly, the reſt of the horſmen could neither by commandment,threatning,or wounds,be inforced to ſtay, but turned their backes and fled. The footmen alſo whom Selymus had attyred and armed after the manner of the Ianizaries, being forſaken of their own horſemen,were now by Bajazets horſemen compaſſed about and almoſt all ſlain.

Selymus his army thus ouerthrown,and himſelf hardly beſet, was by certaine troups of his Turkiſh horſemen which yet ſtayed with him,deliuered from the preſent danger, and beeing wounded, was mounted vpon a freſh horſe, and ſo with all ſpeed hee could fled after the Tartars. But doubting to be purſued and ouertaken by his fathers ſpeedy horſemen,hee changed his horſe,and took another of a wonderfull ſwiftnes: and ſo reſeruing himſelf to his future fortune,with a few of his followers fled to Varna,and from thence by ſea to Capha.

The horſe wheron Selymus fled was all cole blacke, called Carabulo (that is to ſay, a blacke Cloud) whom Selymus as a good ſeruitor euer after exempted from all ſeruice;and had him in ſuch eſtimation,that couered with Cloth of gold,he was as a ſpare horſe without a rider led after him in all his great expeditions, firſt into Perſia,& afterward into Egypt,where he died at Cair, and there to the imitation of Bucephalus, Great Alexanders horſe, had a monument erected for him. Wherein Selymus ſhewed himſelf more kinde than vnto his owne brethren, whom he cruelly murthered, and hardly afforded vnto ſome of them ſo honourable a Sepulture.

In this battel,of 40000 which Selymus brought into the field,eſcaped not aboue 8000,but they were either ſlain or taken priſoners. Of Bajazets army were loſt about 700,and 3000 hurt with Tartarian arrows. Which loſſe he preſently reuenged with extream cruelty, cauſing all ſuch as were taken priſoners to be without mercy put to the ſword in his ſight; whoſe heads were laid together by heaps,and their dead bodies as if they had bin towers. Of this notable battel betwixt the father and the ſon in the year 1511, Chiurlus, called in antient time Tzurulum,before an obſcure old ruinous city (or as Iouius calls it,a village) became famous. But much more afterward by the fatal deſtiny of Selymus,who not many years after,ſtrucken with a moſt lothſom and incurable diſeaſe,ended his daies in the ſame place with an vntimely and tormenting death; God (as it is to be thought) with reuenging hand in the ſame place taking iuſt puniſhment for his former diſloyaltie toward his father,as ſhal herafter in due time and place be declared.

Three daies Bajazet lay ſtil in the ſame place where he had obtained the victory,vntil ſuch time as all his ſouldiers were again returned from the chaſe of the enemy: after that, he held on his way to Conſtantinople, and there bountifully rewarded his ſouldiers. In the meane time Achomates hearing of all the trouble which had hapned betwixt his father and his brother Selymus,with the euent thereof, came with an Army of 20000 from Amaſia, thorow the countries of Galatia and Bythinia,vnto the city of Scutari,called in antient time Chriſopolis (though ſome ſuppoſe it to haue bin the famous city of Chalcedon) which city is ſcituated vpon the ſtreit of Boſphorus,directly againſt the city of Conſtantinople. In this place Achomates incamped his army,neer the ſea ſide, expecting what courſe his father would take after ſo great a victory. For beſides the prerogatiue of his age, and the eſpecial loue of his father towards him,the general affection of the vulgar people,with the good opinion he had of himſelf,had already filled his mind with the hope of the Empire. Wherfore hee ceaſed not night nor day to ſend meſſengers ouer that narow ſtreit to Conſtanſtantinople,and moſt earneſtly to ſolicit Bajazet his father, in ſo fit an occaſion to make haſt to diſpatch what hee had

A ſo long before determined, concerning the reſignation of the empire. He alſo importuned his friends and familiars in beſt manner he could to commend him to his father, and in moſt ample ſort to extoll his graue purpoſe for tranſlation of the empire; and to do the vttermoſt of their devoir, that ſeeing God and good fortune had iuſtly ouerthrown the raſh attempt and force of his brother Selymus, he by their good means might the ſooner obtain the empire, of which he was the vndoubted heir.

Bajazet deſires to prefer Achomates vnto the Empire.

Bajazet, who of himſelfe and according to his old good liking was altogether deſirous of the preferment of Achomates, was by their perſuaſions eaſily intreated to haſten the performance of that he had before determined for transferring the empire. And making no great ſecret of the matter, commanded certain Gallies to be made ready for the tranſporting of Achomates B from Scutario to Conſtantinople. But the great Baſſa's and ſoldiers of the court, the ſecret fauorits of Selymus, vnderſtanding the matter, began again openly to reſiſt and impugn his purpoſed determination, and to alledge the ſame reaſons they had before at Hadrianople alledged: in fine they ſaid plainly, they would by no means ſuffer him ſo far to diſable himſelf, as an inſufficient man to reſigne the empire, who of late had with ſo valiant and couragious an heart fought for the honor of his crown and dignitie: and that therfore ſo long as hee liued, they would acknowledge no other Soueraign but Bajazet. Yet for all that, as they meant not to cut off Achomates hope, ſo neither ought he to diſtruſt the good wil of the men of war; but that he being a man of moſt approued and known valor, might in due time with their general good liking injoy his right, which ſhould then without all queſtion be due vnto him as C the eldeſt ſon of their Emperor. They ſaid moreouer, That they had in the late battel againſt Selymus ſufficiently declared what minds they were of, both towards their Emperor & Achomates, and what confidence they were to repoſe in the fidelitie of their ſoldiers, who to maniſeſt their faithfulnes and loyaltie, had not refuſed to offer themſelues to the haſard of a moſt vnequal battel, yea their liues vnto death it ſelf. O foul diſſimulation, the couert mask of all miſchief! vnder which, meer trechery is here pretended for great loyaltie, the aged Emperor too too much flattered, Achomates ſhamefully deluded, and the man that might not as then without ſome addition of diſgrace bee named, Selymus, euen bloudy Selymus ſecretly ſought for aboue all men to be preferred.

Bajazet by this offwardnes and inſolencie of the ſoldiers again diſappointed of his purpoſe, D or els (as ſome thought) delighted with the ſweetnes of ſoueraignty; for that after the late victory he ſeemed (as one grown yong again) neither to feel himſelfe old or vnable ſtill to gouern ſo great an empire; ſent word to Achomates, how the matter ſtood; & that he ſhould forthwith depart from Scutari to his old charge at Amaſia, from whence he would again call him, at ſuch time as he had with new bounty won the hearts of the ſoldiers; & procured the good liking of other the great men in court, wherby ſo great a matter and not vſuall, might the better and with more ſecurity be effected.

Achomates thus deceiued of his hope & expectation, grieuouſly complaining that he was ſo mocked of his father, and contemned of the ſoldiers of the court, began to mix his new requeſt with words of heat and diſcontent, and to invey againſt his father, for making him a by-E word (as he termed it) and a laughing ſtock vnto the World, after hee had taken the paines to come ſo far, and that by his ſpecial appointment. But if he proceeded ſo to doat, and to make ſo great reckoning of the ſoldiers of the court, that in reſpect therof he neither regarded his promiſe, nor that was right and iuſt, he would himſelf by force of arms take vpon him the defence of his own honour and right, ſo lightly eſteemed by his father, and reuenge the diſgrace offered vnto him by others.

Wherunto Bajazet anſwered by the Cadeleſcher (which is a man of greateſt place and authoritie among the Turks in matters concerning their ſuperſtition, and therfore of them honored aboue others, as the ſacred interpreter of their law) that he did neither well nor wiſely, without iuſt cauſe to fall into ſo great rage and choler, as by his ſpeech and force to think to F extort that good which was only by loue and loyaltie to be gained: whereas all things ſhould be ſurely kept for him, and the empire vndoubtedly deſcend vnto him, if by vntimely haſt hee did not mar that hope which he ought by ſufferance and patient expectation to cheriſh. He might (as the Cadeleſcher told him) learn by that late example & fortune of his brother Selymus, what might be for his own good and welfare; and that it was a thing of far more danger, deſpedeſperatly to thruſt himſelf headlong into ſuch an action as he could not poſſibly ſee the end G of, than moderating by reaſon his hot paſſions, to expect with patience the opportunitie of time, and fitnes of occaſion, with the alteration of matters, all tending to his good.

Achomates inciteth his two ſons Amurathes and Aladin to take part with him againſt their grandfather Bajazet.

Achomates inflamed with anger and grief of the repulſe, all the while the Cadeleſcher was deliuering his fathers meſſage, gaue him many ſharp taunts, and had much adoe to ſtay himſelf from offering of him violence, oftentimes threatning him, that in ſhort time both his father ſhould dearly buy the changing of his purpoſe, and the ſoldiers of the court their treacherous dealing. And ſo ſending him away with this ſhort anſwer, he preſently roſe with his army, and paſſing thorow Bythinia, cruelly ſpoiled the country in his return to Amaſia. There daily more and more inflamed with the grief and the indignitie of the repulſe before receiued, he determined to inuade the leſſer Aſia: that if it ſhould ſo fall out, that hee muſt needs H by force of arms try his right againſt either of his brethren, he might therin vſe the wealth of that rich prouince. Wherby if it ſhould chance that he ſhould by the practiſe of any fail of the whole empire, yet he ſhould at the leaſtwiſe be poſſeſſed of the one half therof, and be the readier for all euents, hauing all theſe great and rich prouinces in his power. Wherſore calling vnto him his two ſons, Amurathes and Aladin, young princes of great hope, after he had grieuouſly complained of the vnkindnes of his father Bajazet, and of the injuries don againſt him by his enemies in the Court, he declared vnto them, that there was now no hope left for him to obtain the empire, except they would forthwith enter into arms with him, and ſo together with him, defend both his and their own right and honour, againſt the malice and injuries of their enemies: which hee ſaid would be an eaſie matter to doe, by ſurpriſing the leſſer I Aſia, if they would couragiouſly enter vpon it; foraſmuch as all Pyſidia, Licaonia, Pamphilia, with the ſea coaſt of Ionia, were not as then kept with an army or navy. And as for his brother Corcutus, there was no great doubt to be made of him, who according to his quiet diſpoſition would be content either to ſit ſtil, or els in regard of his iuſt quarrell to take part with him; or if he would needs intermeddle his quiet ſtate with the troubled, and ſo enter into arms, might eaſily be thruſt out of whatſoeuer he poſſeſſed. As for the Gouernors of the reſt of the prouinces, hee doubted not but that they would alſo yeeld either to his commaund or fortune. Wherſore he willed them to pluck vp their hearts as men of courage, and to go into the countries therabouts to take vp men, and whatſoeuer els were needful for the wars. Theſe gallants, of their own youthfull diſpoſition ready enough for ſuch a matter, and now incouraged K with their fathers perſuaſion, did what they were by him commanded, and had in ſhort time raiſed a notable army of voluntary ſouldiers, of whom the greateſt part were of ſeruile condition. But Achomates himſelfe, beſides his old army which he had formerly led againſt the Perſian rebels, leuied new forces alſo, and called forth into the field all the able men that were to be found in the Cities round about: and ſo running through the prouinces, proclaimed himſelf king of Aſia; and ſuch as would not forthwith yeeld vnto him, thoſe he and his two ſons in diuers places proſecuted with all hoſtility: by which means many cities, eſpecially ſuch as were but meanly fortified, partly for fear, partly by conſtraint, were deliuered vnto him.

After that, he entred with his army into Licaonia and the borders of Cilicia, where by embaſſadors L and often letters he requeſted Mahometes his brothers ſon (who then gouerned thoſe countries) to aid him in his iuſt quarrell againſt them, who by crafty and ſiniſter perſuaſions had to his diſhonor and diſgrace withdrawn his fathers good will from him, and ſo far ſeduced him, that he was determined to appoint another ſucceſſor in the empire, than him his eldeſt and firſt begotten ſon. Which their malice he would (as he ſaid) preuent, and by force of arms recouer his right, which his father knowing to be due vnto him, was about to haue put him in poſſeſſion therof whilſt hee yet liued, had hee not by the ſiniſter practiſe of others bin hindred. For the recouery wherof, if Mahometes would out of his prouince aid him with men and victual, and ſo further his iuſt cauſe, he promiſed that he ſhould find a far better Vncle than he had found a father, and that his preſent friendſhip ſhould in time be moſt amply M and bountifully requited.

Wherto Mahometes anſwered, That he could not do what his vncle had required, except he were ſo commanded by his grandfather Bajazet, whom alone hee acknowledged for his dread Soueraign: and that it was not for him to iudge whether he did right or otherwiſe, That hee would

A would not in his life time reſigne the empire to his ſon. But this (he ſaid) he was not ignorant of, that hee was not to yeeld his obedience to any other, ſo long as hee liued poſſeſſed of the Empire: to whom both his father Tzihan Schach whilſt he liued, and himſelfe alſo, had giuen their oath of obedience and loyaltie. Wherfore it were good for him to pacifie himſelf, leſt in ſeeking vntimely reuenge of his enemies, he ſhould to the offence of all men wrong his father, and by too much heat & haſt ouerthrow both his hope and honor; which of right ſhould be moſt great, if he could but in the mean time haue patience, and ſtay himſelf a while. Achomates, who expected nothing leſſe than ſuch an anſwer, but thought that Mahometes would either for loue or fear haue preſently come vnto him, and now finding his requeſts to bee with greater grauitie and conſideration denied by his nephew, than were by reaſon of him demanded, B entred with his army into the borders of his prouince, and with fire and ſword began to deſtroy the country before him. Which Mahometes with ſuch power as hee had thinking to remedy, was by the way incountred by his vncle, not far from Larenda, and there ouerthrown; and taking that city for refuge, was there certain daies beſieged by Achomates, and at laſt, together with his brother (then but a child) deliuered into his hands, at ſuch time as the City was by the fearfull citiſens by compoſition yeelded vnto him. Achomates hauing taken the city with his two nephews, cauſed Mahometes his counſellors, with his foſter brother, by whoſe perſuaſion it was ſuppoſed that he had ſo anſwered his Vncle and indangered himſelf, to bee put to death.

Theſe proceedings of Achomates filled Bajazet with griefe and indignation, that he ſhould C in ſo great years be ſet vpon by two of his own ſons one after another. Yet to proue if thoſe troubles might without more bloudſhed be pacified, he ſent Embaſſadours vnto him to reprooue him for his diſloyaltie, and to command him forthwith to ſet at libertie his two Nephews, Mahometes & his brother, and ſo without more ſtir to get him again to Amaſia: which if he ſhould refuſe to do, then to denounce vnto him open war. But hee, which by how much the more he had after his repulſe ambitiouſly affected the empire, had reſolued with himſelfe to deal ſo much the more cruelly in his proceedings; hauing receiued this meſſage from his father, cauſed the chief embaſſador (for that he had in frank ſpeech deliuered his meſſage, and denounced vnto him wars) to be in his own preſence put to death; and threatned the reſt with the like, if before the going down of the Sun they auoided not his camp.

Bajazet ſends Embaſſadours to Achomates.

Achomates killeth his fathers Embaſſador.

D This outrage highly offended Bajazet, and alienated the mindes of many, before well affected to Achomates; for that without any reuerence to his father, and contrary to the law of nations, he had violated the Embaſſadors ſent to him for peace. Vpon the firſt bruit herof, the ſoldiers which then waited at the court gate, in the hearing of Bajazet exclaimed, that the inſolencie of Achomates was not longer to be ſuffered, but forthwith by force to be repreſt: that by ſufferance and delay he would grow from euill to worſe; and that if Bajazet ſhould prolong the time, and in fatherly ſort ſeek by fair means to reclaim him, he ſhould afterwards in vain craue the aid of his beſt ſoldiers againſt his rebellious ſon, ſtrengthned by his owne long ſufferance. Muſtapha alſo the chief Baſſa, with Boſtanges and others of great place (who ſecretly fauored Selymus, and had cunningly cauſed theſe things by fit men to be diſperſed among E the ſouldiers) began at firſt to mutter, and as it were to wonder at the ſtrangenes and heinouſnes of the fact, in ſuch ſort, as if they had condemned the deed done, but not the doer. But afterward, when they ſaw that Bajazet was throughly heated, both by his own angry diſpoſition and the ſpeech of the ſoldiers, and vpon the confidence of his former victory againſt Selymus, now ready to ſeek reuenge; they began then to heap freſh coles vpon the fire, and bitterly to invey againſt Achomates, as a traitor to his aged father and the ſtate; and withall highly commended the fidelitie and courage of the Ianizaries and ſoldiers of the court, who for the ſafety and honor of their aged Emperour were moſt preſt and ready to expoſe themſelues, their liues, and whatſoeuer els they had, vnto new dangers.

So was Achomates by the craft and ſubtiltie of theſe great men, by the anger of his father, F and the iudgement of the ſoldiers, proclaimed traitor; and order taken, that the ſoldiers of the Court, with the Europeian horſemen, ſhould with all poſſible ſpeed be ſent againſt him into Aſia. But when choice was to be made of ſome valiant and worthy Generall that might take vpon him ſo great a charge, which ſeemed eſpecially to appertain vnto ſome one of the great Achomates proclaimed traitor.

Baſſa's: it was ſtrange to ſee how they all began to ſtrain curteſie at the preferment, and euery G one to refuſe the place, and diſable himſelfe, ſaying, That it were a great indignitie, that the Emperors Army ſhould be led againſt his ſon by any of his ſeruants: and the ſouldiers (hauing their leſſon before hand) ſaid plainely, That they durſt not nor would not draw their ſwords, or lift vp their hands againſt the ſon of the Emperor, and heir apparant of the empire, except they were conducted and commaunded by ſome of the Othoman bloud in perſon preſent with them: for ſo had his brother, long before when hee rebelled in Cilicia, and now of late Selymus his rebellious ſon, bin both ouerthrown and vanquiſhed, euen by the conduct of Bajazet himſelf, and not by any of his ſeruants. Theſe things all tended to this purpoſe, that Selymus might by indirect means be reconciled to his father, (whom they ſecretly fauoured, although for fear of diſpleaſure they durſt not ſo much as name him, but by way of diſgrace) H and by this very meanes to make way for his returne to Conſtantinople, and ſo conſequently giue him power to ſeiſe vpon the Empire. For it was probably ſuppoſed, that neither Bajazet himſelf, being very aged and diſeaſed; neither Corcutus (altogether buried in his ſtudy) would vndertake the mannaging of thoſe Wars. So that of the Othoman Family onely Selymus was left, to whom that charge might be committed; all the Nephews of Bajazet, by reaſon of their tender yeares, as yet vnfit for the ſame. At theſe ſpeeches of the Baſſa's and the ſouldiers, Bajazet as a man perplexed and in a chafe, flung away into his palace, excuſing himſelf by reaſon of his great years and diſeaſed body. But complaining deeply, That Corcutus in following the vain title of learning, with a quiet contented kind of life, had in the meane time neglected other ſtudies and honourable qualities, better beſeeming his princely birth I and Calling. As he was thus reaſoning with himſelf, and deuiſing what courſe to take, Muſtapha the old Baſſa, who all the time of his reign had vſed to diſ-burthen him of his cares, hauing by way of talk drawn him into a full diſcourſe concerning the proceeding to the intended War, ſet vpon him with this crafty and premeditated ſpeech, framed of purpoſe for his deſtruction.

The crafty oration of the great Baſſa Muſtapha to Bajazet, for the bringing home of Selymus.

Your Majeſty may not (moſt dread Soueraign) although by years and ſtrength of body you were neuer ſo wel able, you may not, I ſay either tranſport your army, or your ſelfe paſſe ouer in perſon into Aſia; leſt whilſt you are there from place to place chaſing Achomates, you leaue a far more dangerous enemy behind you in Europe, who may in your abſence ſeiſe vpon Thracia, Græcia, yea and the Imperiall City it K ſelfe, deſtitute of ſufficient Defendants. Do we not heare, that Selymus is raiſing of new forces aboue Varna? to expect a new ſupply of horſemen from the Tartar king his father in law? And already as it were houering ouer our heads? Is he not of greater ſpirit and courage, than to be daunted or diſmayed with the misfortune of one battell? or if you ſhall ſend ouer your old beaten ſouldiers into Aſia, and call Corcutus into Europe, with the forces he leauied the laſt yeare, who in time of your ſickneſſe may withſtand the attempts of Selymus: will he feare theſe freſh water ſoldiers of Aſia, or their phyloſophicall Generall, which feared not the ſoldiers of your court, the pickt and choſen men of the world, and your ſelfe a moſt worthy and victorious Emperor? You are deceiued, and (if I may be ſo bold ſo to ſay) you throughly ſee not into the doubtfull euent of things, if you thinke not, that you muſt at one time wage war againſt two dangerous enemies, euen in the remoteſt parts of your Empire, in Aſia and Europe: For whileſt you L ſhall go about to expulſe Achomates out of Cappadocia, Selymus neerer at hand, and awaiting all opportunities; will by and by at your back raiſe a moſt dangerous war in the very heart and chief ſtrength of your Empire. But if you, mooued with the greatneſſe and due conſideration of the danger, ſhall goe about to defend Thracia, and for that purpoſe retaine with you the moſt approoued and faithfull ſouldiers of the Court, you ſhall ſee all Aſia on a fire before your face: neither will Achomates make an end of waſte and warre, vntill ſuch time as he hath drawne the Empire of Aſia vnto himſelfe. Wherefore if it be not to be imputed to your fault, but to your fate or fortune, that two begotten of your ſelfe, ſhould by your ſelfe and the conſent of all men be iudged traiterous vnto your crowne and dignitie; whereof the one through raſhneſſe, the other vpon pride and vaine diſcontentment, hath riſen vp in armes againſt you: Why doe you not in ſo doubtfull and perplexed a matter, preferre ſafe and ſound aduiſe before M that which masketh vnder the ſhew of maieſtie and honour? and whom you cannot both at one time correct and be reuenged vpon, to ſet vpon them as occaſion ſhall ſerue when they are together by the eares betwixt themſelues? This is the onely hope of your ſafetie, this is the onely way, if you ſhall reſolue (as the common prouerbe ſaith) to driue out one naile with another, and ſo to ouercome your

A your enemies: moderat for a while your hot deſire of reuenge, and for the preſent diſſemble your griefe; grant vnto one of them pardon, and in ſhew take him into your grace and fauour, imploy him againſt the other: ſo ſhall you without danger, howſoeuer it ſhall fall out, perſecute the one whom you loue not, with the haſard of the other whom you truſt not; and at your pleaſure oppreſſe him to whom you ſhall commit your enſignes and army: the hands of your faithfull and truſty ſoldiers being euer at your appointment ready to take reuenge. So ſhall you with ſecuritie make an end of this war, expoſing vnto the danger, him whome you had rather to ouercome as your enemy, by him whom you wiſh alſo to periſh.

Muſtapha had ſcarſe made an end of ſpeaking, but the other Baſſa's (as they had before agreed B amongſt themſelues) began where he left, and with all their cunning laboured to perſuade Bajazet to call home his ſon Selymus, and to make him General of his Army againſt his brother; ſaying, that he had already endured ſufficient puniſhment for his former diſloyalty, and therfore it was like that he as a wel corrected child would from thenceforth contain himſelf within the compaſſe of his moſt dutifull obedience. Wheras Achomates, proud of his birthright, hauing of late violated his fathers Embaſſadors, and filled all Aſia with rebellion, was not like to be brought to any reaſonable conformity, vntill hee were by force of Armes pluckt down, and ſo made to know himſelf, in like manner as was his brother Selymus of late.
Bajazet ſeeing that in reſoluing of a matter of ſo great conſequence, Cherſeogles Baſſa (his ſon in law, and the only faithful counſellor then about him) ſat all ſilent, hanging the head, as one C of a contrary opinion to the reſt, ſtood a great while in doubt what to reſolue vpon. He could not ſo eaſily forget the late injuries don againſt him by Selymus, it was yet freſh in memory, how that he had out of Aſia inuaded Europ, ſurpriſed Hadrianople, giuen him battel, indangered his perſon by his Tartarian horſmen, and that only by the goodnes of God hee had obtained the victory. On the other ſide, his Majeſty contemned, his Nephewes impriſoned, his Embaſſadors violated, the cities of Aſia ranſacked, and all thoſe goodly Countries preſently ſmoking with the fire of rebellion, ſo filled his old heart with anger and indignation, as that he deſired nothing more than to be reuenged. Whileſt he was thus ſtrugling with his owne thoughts, and doubtful what to do, the vnfaithful Baſſa's by deep deceit and trechery (Cherſeogles moſt inſtantly perſuading the contrary) ouercame him ſo far, as with his owne hand to D write letters to Selymus, promiſing, that forgetting all injuries paſt, he would vpon the hope of his loyaltie receiue him into his former grace and fauor, and make him General of his army, if he would without delay repair to Conſtantinople, and ſo paſſe ouer into Aſia againſt his rebellious brother Achomates.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing at Conſtantinople, Corcutus being aduertiſed by Letters from his friends, of the weak eſtate of his aged father, and by what perſuaſions hee had bin induced (after that Achomates had bin proclaimed Traitor) to call vnto him Selymus, and to make him General of his Army; came down out of Magneſia to Phocis, and there imbarking himſelf in his Gallies, ſailed to Conſtantinople. Where being arriued, he went preſently to the Court, attended vpon with a great number of his friends and fauourits; and entring E into the priuy chamber, humbled himſelf before his father, and kiſſed his hand: and after much talk had betwixt them of diuers weighty matters, is reported to haue ſpoken vnto him as followeth.

Corcutus comes to Conſtantinople.

Corcutus his oratiō to his father Bajazet.

It is now about thirty yeares paſt (moſt reuerend father and dread Soueraign) ſince that I (being choſen and proclaimed Emperor by the prerogatiue of the ſoldiers of the Court, by generall conſent of the Citiſens of this Imperial City, and by the graue judgement of the wiſe and graue Baſſa's of the Court) haue cheerfully and willingly, and as I may truly ſay, with my own had deliuered from my ſelf to your Maieſty, the poſſeſſion of this moſt glorious kingdom and Empire. Which thing what worldly Wight would haue don, but either a Madman, or els a moſt kind ond louing ſon? Vnto which ſo rare an example of a religious F and louing heart, I was not by any fear or conſtraint inforced, but only by regard and contemplation of your own ſacred perſon, and due conſideration of my duty. Neither did it in the courſe of ſo many yeares euer repent me of that my ſingular kindeneſſe and duty done; when as I contenting my ſelf with ſuch things as you had vnto me aſſigned, and with the generall commendation of my well-doing, as wel as with a kingdom,thought this your great eſtate and higheſt type of worldly honour, not to be compared with the quiet G contentment of my pleaſing Studies; when as I accounted it a vain thing, and not beſeeming the reſolu-tion of a ſetled and quiet mind,to long after theſe worldly things,which being had and inioyed to the ful, work no full contentment in the vnſatiable deſires of man : and that ſurmounting vertue, and the ſweet, ô moſt ſweet meditation of heauenly things, promiſed vnto my contemplatiue and rauiſhed minde, things of far more worth and Majeſty than all the Kingdoms and Monarchies of the world. But whilſt I was tracing this path,little regarding worldly honour, or the glory of an Empire; and was for pure deuotion and deſire of knowledge trauelling into the fartheſt part of Arabia, vnto the Altar of our moſt ſacred Prophet Mahomet*;and ſo to the Indians, as to men of a more exact knowledge and ſincere profeſſion;you* in the midſt of my trauel drew me out of Egypt by the long hands of the Egyptian Sultan,back again into Phrygia; commanding me, that eſchuing the manifold dangers which in my long trauel I muſt needs H haue fallen into,I ſhould from thenceforth haue more regard of my life and health,and to expect the fruit both of my loyaltie towards you,and of your fatherly loue towards me. As if you had bin then of opinion,that the time would come,when for the euill diſpoſition of ſome,an innocent man,deuoted vnto the ſtudy of wiſdom and learning,might be a ſtay both vnto your ſelf and the whole Othoman Family. Since which time I haue euer both dutifully obeyed your command,and with as much care and integrity as I poſſibly could,diſcharged my charge : and in the late Perſian war,raiſed and brought into the field myne army,wherwith I defended the frontiers of my prouince from the incurſions of the Barbarians. But after they were vanquiſhed,and by your forces driuen out of the leſſer Aſia, and that my vnnatural and grace-les brethren,the one of them in Europ as a moſt deſperat Recreant,had in plain battell aſſailed the perſon of your moſt ſacred Maieſty (his reuerend father, far ſpent with age, and then grieuouſly tormented with I the gout) of purpoſe to haue at once depriued you both of your life and empire. And the other in Aſia ſeeking by like diſloyalty and moſt horrible treaſon there to poſſeſſe himſelf of a kingdom, had beſieged and taken priſoners his brothers ſons his nephews, yong princes of great expectation, your faithfull and louing ſubiects;and proceeding further,had ſet all that part of your empire on a broil: I thought my ſelf in duty, and to repair hither vnto your Imperial Majeſty, for that I ſaw it came to paſſe, not without the prouidence of the moſt Mighty,that I might at ſuch time eſpecially requeſt the iuſt reward of my due deſert of you my moſt reuerend and louing father, the moſt religious obſeruer of equity and Iuſtice:when as you hauing had too great proof of the infidelity of my vnnatural brethren,might moſt fitly and moſt commodiouſly perform that which you vpon great reaſon might now grant vnto me your dutiful and obedient ſon,although my former deſerts had merited no ſuch thing. Wherfore moſt gratious, I beſeech you, by all K your fatherly loue and affection towards mee, and my known loyalty towards you, to vouchſafe before the comming of Selymus,to haue regard of myne honor,with the ſtate of your empire: for when he ſhal once in arms break in,he wil at a trice cut of all hope of pacification,and ſupported by the men of war,confound all things at his pleaſure. For I hear,that the very garders of your perſon,and chief commanders of your armies,altered in diſpoſition towards you,do but expect the good offer of time,when they may willingly ſalute for their Emperor and Soueraign, him whom your good fortune of late, full ſore againſt their wills, ouerthrew in open field. Wherfore that empire wherof I was ſomtime poſſeſſed, and for the rare deſert of myne antient loyaltie toward you, is of good right due vnto me,reſtore to me again whileſt you may, and whilſt it is yet in your power,in this ſudden and momentary occaſion now preſented. For your Maieſty ſhal in vain fauor my moſt iuſt and vpright claim,after that you (hauing once receiued into the Imperial city L a deſperat and ambitious man) haue for euer loſt your liberty,together with your ſelf.

Bajazet comforteth Corcutus,and promiſeth to reſigne to him the empire,after that Selymus was paſt ouer into Aſia.

Corcutus with tears ſtanding in his eies,hauing ended his ſpeech,the aged Emperor moued with a fatherly affection,and the reaſonable perſuaſion of him his only loyall and moſt kind ſon,comforted him vp with good words,and willed him to be of good cheer, and withall diſcouered vnto him the very ground of his reſolution in calling home of Selymus; telling him further, That he could be wel content to reſigne to him again the Empire,but that it was not in his power ſo preſently to do,for fear of the ſoldiers of the court,who had (as he ſaid) of late withſtood him in the like motion, and would againe with tooth and naile gainſay it, if hee ſhould but giue the leaſt occaſion for them to ſuſpect any ſuch matter. But that by the plot M now laid,Selymus ſhould vnder the title of honor be drawn out of Europe, together with the ſoldiers of the court, into Aſia againſt Achomates (both bars vnto his preſent deſire for tranſferring of the Empire; in whoſe abſence it ſhould be in his power freely to diſpoſe thereof

A at his pleaſure: which he promiſed preſently to reſigne vnto him, ſo ſoone as they were once paſſed ouer into Aſia. Which thing once don, although it were not altogether to their liking, yet feared he not, that either the captains or ſoldiers, who had of late ſo honorably and faithfully defended him againſt Selymus, ſhould now for his ſake diſlike of Corcutus, or attempt any thing not beſeeming the glory of their late deſert: but rather hoped, that if his two vnnaturall and rebellious ſons, Achomates and Selymus, ſhould once joine battell (as it was moſt like they ſhould) that either the one or both ſhould by the juſt judgement of God periſh for their ſo great diſobedience, murdred by the hands one of another. Corcutus not much diſliking o his fathers purpoſe, and reſting himſelfe wholly vpon his fauor, thought it not good further to argue the matter his father had ſo well conſidered of; but taking his leaue returned to his lodg-B ing not without hope of obtaining the Empire, and ſo remained many daies after at Conſtantinople: during which time he ſought neither by gifts nor golden promiſes to procure the loue and good liking of the great Baſſaes or ſoldiers of the court; for that he as a plain vpright man, thought it not good by ſuit and corruption (the great promoters of the vnworthy) to ſeeke for that at their hands, which was of right due vnto him by his fathers fauor & promiſe.

In the mean time Selymus his faſt friends aduertiſing him of the comming of Corcutus to the court, aduiſed him to make haſte, and with all ſpeed poſſible to come to Conſtantinople; for that it was to be feared, leſt Bajazet being very aged, and withall eaſie to be drawn away, might by the perſuaſion of Corcutus be induced to alter, yea, and perhaps quite breake off the courſe before well ſet for his moſt ready preferment. Vpon which news, Selymus attentiuely waiting C vpon nothing more than to haue exceſſe vnto his friends in court, and before reſolued, at his firſt comming thither not to ſpare for any coſt in corrupting the men of warre, and ſo to poſſeſſe himſelfe of the Empire; made now no ſtay but with certaine troups of horſemen, commanding the reſt to follow after, came with wonderfull celerity to Conſtantinople. Corcutus with the great Baſſa's and Courtiers, and moſt part of the ſoldiers of the court, going to meet him at the gates of the city, at his entrance receiued him with a kiſſe (as is the manner of the Turks) and brought him through the midſt of the city, all the people running out by heapes to haue a ſight of the man, of late in euery mans mouth for his deſperat rebellion, but now welcommed with much thundring ſhot in token of triumph, and the joyfull acclamation of men, women, and children, and people of all ſorts. So that it eaſily appeared, that all the ha-D tred before conceiued againſt him, for his late outrage againſt his father, was now quite forgotten; and that he would in ſhort time before his other brethen aſpire vnto the Empire.

The next day after, Selymus came to the court, and hauing acceſſe to his father, fell proſtrate before him and kiſſed his feet, and with the greateſt ſhew of humility poſſible, craued of him pardon for his diſloyalty. O deepe diſſembler, and traitor of all other moſt trecherous! of late in field with ſword drawne to haue ſlaine his aged father, but now proſtrate at his feet; and within an houre mounted perforce into his imperiall ſeat.

The old Emperour ſmiling vpon this Crocodile, in moſt kinde manner tooke him vp, and courteouſly ſaid vnto him:

Thy faults, ſon Selymus, are ſo much the leſſe, for that they haue found ſpeedy repentance, wherefore E I do the more willingly grant thee pardon: but from henceforth endeauour thy ſelfe, that God who hath giuen thee a notable ſpirit and courage, may alſo be thought to haue indued thee with a good and well diſpoſed minde. There is a martiall matter ready, worthy thy hardneſſe, wherein thou mayſt ſufficiently manifeſt vnto the world thy forwardneſſe and courage: there when time ſerueth let it appeare.

Bajazets crafty ſpeech vnto his ſonne Selymus.

Shortly after was called a Councell for the wars, but eſpecially for the chuſing of a Generall to goe againſt Achomates: the honour of which place when many would haue giuen to Selymus, he began with great diſſimulation to refuſe, making as though he would not in any caſe be preferred before his brother Corcutus, to whom he would (as he ſaid) willingly giue place, both in reſpect of his yeares and learned diſcretion, who could no doubt with greater authority and wiſedome mannage that war: as for himſelfe, now he had obtained his fathers F gratious pardon and fauour, he could well content himſelfe with any corner of the Empire, were it neuer ſo little.

But Corcutus and his friends, who had repoſed all their hope and all their deuiſes in the departure of Selymus with the ſoldiers of the court; as if they had with great modeſty contended on both ſides, againe perſuaded him, yea, and inſtantly requeſted him not to refuſe that honour, by generall conſent without any diſgrace to his brother, giuen to him as to a worthy G Chiefetaine of great experience in martiall affaires. So Selymus with wonderfull cunning deluding Corcutus and his fauorits, whileſt he ſeemeth craftily to refuſe the thing he moſt deſireth, is by the generall conſent of all parts choſen Generall of the army to go againſt his brother Achomates. Which was no ſooner made knowne vnto the ſouldiers, eſpecially the Ianizaries and other ſouldiers of the court; but they before inſtructed, with loud acclamations ſaluted him not for their Generall onely, but for their ſoueraigne Lord and Emperor alſo: and ſo without further delay put themſelues in armes to defend and make good that they had done, if any better diſpoſed ſhould ſeeme to withſtand them or diſſent from them.

Selymus by the ſouldiers thus ſaluted Emperour, at firſt made ſhew as if he had beene halfe vnwilling to take vpon him the Empire; and ſo began faintly to refuſe it, as moued ſo to doe H by the due reuerence and regard of his father, yet liuing. But after a while he ſuffered himſelfe to be intreated: and then commending himſelfe and his cauſe wholly to the men of warre, to binde them vnto him the faſter, promiſed beſide the particular fauours he ought them, to beſtow a right great and generall largeſſe amongſt them: which he afterwards accordingly performed.

After that, he requeſted the chiefe Baſſaes and commanders of the army there preſent, to go forthwith vnto his father, and to take ſuch order (ſeeing it was the mind of the whole army it ſhould be ſo) that the Empire might by his good will, without further trouble or tumult, be forthwith transferred vnto him.

Muſtapha the great Baſſa, in whoſe wyly head all this matter was (to his owne worthy de- I ſtruction) firſt hammered; whether it were vpon a new fineneſſe of his owne, or that Selymus (as it was giuen out) had threatned to kill him, except he would go and ſhew all the whole proceſſe of the matter to his father: comming as a man diſmaied to Bajazet, (who awaked with clamour and tumult of the ſoldiers, was come out of his chamber, into the open roomes of his Palace) in few words deliuered vnto him this moſt vnwelcome meſſage, as followeth:

The blunt ſpeech of Muſtapha to Bajazet perſwading him to reſigne the empire to Selymus.

Emperour (ſaid he) the men of war haue in their Councell ſaluted Selymus both their Generall and Emperour, which their choice they require thee to ratifie, being ready preſently to breake into the Court to kill vs both, if thou ſhalt refuſe forthwith to reſigne the Empire. They all with one conſent requeſt that of thee, which they haue already put into the hand of another. Wherefore it is a thing of far more danger, to ſeeke to recouer that thou haſt already loſt, than willingly to yeeld that which is already taken from thee, K ſeeing it is not by any force or policy to be regained. They in armes, in fury, and now entred into rebellion, thinke vpon ſome greater miſchiefe.

Bajazet troubled with feare and choler, and then too late perceiuing the trechery of the Baſſaes, and how he had bin by them betraied; pauſing a while at the ſtrangeneſſe of the matter, afterwards in fury brake out into theſe words:

The reſolute anſwer of old Bajazet to Muſtapha and the other Baſſaes.

Falſe and forſworne, do you thus betray me? and with ſuch monſtrous villany requite mine infinite bounty? Why do you not alſo as murtherers take away my life, which could not endure for a while to expect the diſſolution of this my weake and aged body; but depoſing your iuſt and lawfull Soueraigne, muſt needs in poſt haſte ſet vp a moſt wicked and graceleſſe man to reigne ouer you? But much good do it you with your deſired Emperour, the contemner of God, and murtherer of his father: to whom ere it be long, L you ſhall full deerely pay the price of this your perfidious dealing and trechery againſt me. And he himſelfe beginning his Empire by moſt vnnaturall treaſon, murder, and bloudſhed, ſhall not (I hope) eſcape the heauy hand of God, the vndoubted and ſeuere reuenger of ſo great impiety and treaſon.

Muſtapha, with Boſtanges and Ajax as falſe as himſelfe, returning backe againe to the ſoldiers, ſpeaking not a word of the ſorrow and indignation of Bajazet, told them how that he was well content to reſigne the Empire, and ſo had appointed Selymus (to whom both God and the generall conſent of the men of war had already deliuered the Empire, to ſucceed him in the Empire. When this their ſpeech was generally reported, they whom Selymus had before corrupted, began now to hold vp their heads and looke big on the matter: and others who before ſtood doubtfull what to do, ſeeing now no other remedy, in haſt ioyned themſelues vnto the M ſame faction. Whileſt all things were thus diſorderly carried by the vnruly ſouldiers, Selymus was by them mounted vpon a couragious horſe, and ſo with all pomp conducted vp and downe moſt of the faire ſtreets of the Imperiall city; and with the generall voice and clamor of the people (howſoeuer their minds were for moſt part otherwiſe affected) ſaluted Emperor. And the

A the ſame day both the great Baſſa's and the ſouldiers in generall, were all ſolemnly ſworne vnto Selymus, as their only Lord and Emperour.

Corcutus, whether it were for griefe of his hope now loſt, or for feare of his life, although Selymus had promiſed to giue him the city of Mytilene, with the Iſland of Lesbos, ſecretly embarked himſelfe and ſo returned to Magneſia.

Corcutus flieth.

Bajazet of late one of the greateſt Monarchs of the world, but now thus thruſt out of his empire by his ſon, deteſting both him and the treachery of his ſubiects, and ouercome with ſorrow and melancholy, determined of himſelfe, before he were thereto enforced by Selymus, to forſake Conſtantinople, and to retyre himſelfe to Dymotica (a ſmall city wholeſomely ſcituated in Thracia, not far from Hadrianople; where in former time he had for his pleaſure B beſtowed great coſt, and now as he thought beſt fitted his preſent eſtate.) Wherefore cauſing great ſtore of treaſure, plate, jewels, and rich furniture to be truſſed vp, he with fiue hundred of his houſhold ſeruants, full of heauineſſe and ſorrow, with teares trickling downe his aged cheekes, departed out of the Imperiall city, towards Hadrianople, with purpoſe from thence to haue gone to Dymotica. Selymus brought him about two miles vpon his way, and ſo returning againe to Conſtantinople, tooke poſſeſſion of the Palace.

Bajazet being then about ſeuenty ſix yeares old, or as ſome report full foureſcore; and beſide his old diſeaſe of the gout, ſore weakened with heauineſſe and griefe of minde, was not able to trauell aboue fiue or ſix miles a day, but was conſtrained by the extreamity of his pain and weakeneſſe, to ſtay ſometimes two or three daies in a place. Whileſt he was thus C trauelling, Selymus no leſſe carefull of the keeping of his eſtate, than he had before been for the obtaining of the ſame, began now to doubt, That if he ſhould depart from Conſtantinople, and with all his Forces paſſe ouer into Aſia againſt his brother Achomates, Bajazet in the meane time might in his abſence returne to Conſtantinople, and ſo again poſſeſſe himſelf both of the city and the empire. Wherefore to rid himſelfe of that feare, he reſolued moſt viper like before his going to kill his father, and ſo moſt vnnaturally to depriue him of life, of whom he had receiued life: ſuch is the cruell and accurſed nature of ambition, that it knoweth neither father, mother, brother, wife, kindred, or friend, no ſometimes not her owne children; the fury whereof was neuer in any more pregnant, than in this moſt monſtrous and cruell tyrant Selymus.

D The readieſt and moſt ſecret way he could deuiſe for the effecting of this his damnable deuice, (which without great impiety could not be ſo much as once by him thought vpon) was, to worke it by poyſon: vpon which reſolution he ſecretly compacted with Haman a Iew, his fathers chiefe Phyſitian, to poyſon him; promiſing him for his reward a penſion of ten duckats a day during his life. And for that men are oftentimes with terrour and feare, as well as with reward, enforced to be the miniſters of miſchiefe; he to be the more ſure of this Iew, (prone enough for gaine to do euill) threatned him with moſt cruell death, if he did not both ſecretly and ſpeedily worke this feat, commanding him ſo ſoone as he had done it, to returne vnto him to Conſtantinople.

Selymus practiſeth with Haman a Iew, Bajazet his phyſitian, to poyſon him.

The deceitfull Iew moued both with the feare of death and hope of reward (two great motiues) E comming ſhortly after to Bajazet, and finding him very weake, ſeeming to be very carefull of him, told him, That he would prepare for him a potion, which ſhould both reſtore to him his health, and alſo ſtrengthen his weake body, if it would pleaſe him to take it the next morning early lying in his bed. Bajazet nothing diſtruſting his old phyſitian whom he had ſo often and ſo long truſted, ſaid he would gladly take it. Early the next morning commeth the Iew with the deadly poyſon in a cup of gold, Bajazet yet ſleeping, which he ſet downe in the chaire of Eſtate, and ſo ſtood waiting vntill the aged Prince ſhould of himſelfe awake. But Bajazet ſleeping ſoundly (as oftentimes it chanceth when men ſleepe their laſt) and withall ſomewhat longer than ſtood with the Iewes purpoſe, he preſuming of his wonted practiſe, awaked him and told him, That the time to take the potion was almoſt paſt, and aſked him if F it were his pleaſure then to take it. Bajazet doubting no treaſon, willed him to bring it: whereof when the Iew had taken the ſey, (hauing before himſelfe taken a preſeruatiue againſt that poyſon) he gaue it to Bajazet to drinke, who cheerefully dranke it vp: the Phyſitian commanding them that waited in his bed-chamber, and attended on his perſon, to keepe him well couered with warme cloths, and not to giue him any thing to drinke vntill he had well ſweat.

Bajaset poyſoned by the Iew.

This curſed Iew hauing thus poyſoned the aged Prince, to auoid the danger of the fact, and to G carry the firſt newes thereof to Selymus, ſecretly conueied himſelfe away, and fled in haſte to Conſtantinople. But Bajazet attainted with the force of the poyſon, began firſt to feele moſt grieuous gripings in his ſtomacke, the ſtrong paine whereof appeared by his miſerable complaining and heauy groaning; in the middeſt of which torments he gaue vp the ghoſt, in the yeare 1512, when he had raigned thirty yeres. The Turks report that he died a naturall death: but Antonius Vtrius a Genoway, who at that time ſerued in Bajazet his chamber, and was preſent at his death, reporteth, That vpon his dead body the euident tokens of poyſon were to be ſeene. His dead body with all his treaſures were preſently brought backe againe to Conſtantinople, and deliuered to Selymus, who cauſed the body of his father to be with the greateſt ſolemnity that might be, buried in a moſt ſumptuous tombe, in a chappell neere vnto the great H Mahometan temple, which he had before built for himſelfe at Conſtantinople: which Monument there remaineth at this day to be ſeene. His ſeruants were all by Selymus reſtored to their places which they before held in the court in the time of their old Maſter, excepting fiue of the pages of his chamber, who lamenting the death of their Maſter aboue the reſt, had attyred themſelues all in mourning apparell: for which cauſe they were by the commandement of Selymus caſt in priſon, where two of them were put to death; the other three at the ſuit of Solyman, Selymus his ſon, and of other two Baſſaes, were ſaued: but being ſtript of their rich apparell and whatſoeuer elſe they had gotten vnder Bajazet, they were inrolled for common ſoldiers vnder Sulluſtares Baſſa. Of theſe three, Antonius Vtrius (the Genoway before ſpoken of) was one, who after ten yeres of miſerable captiuity amongſt the Turks, at laſt eſcaped at ſuch I time as Selymus was by the Perſian diſcomfited: and with much adoe returning againe into Italy, wrote the hiſtory of all ſuch things as he himſelfe had there ſeene, with the calamities of Bajazet his houſe, and a great part of the tyrannous reigne of Selymus.

The death of Bajazet.

Selymus causeth two of his Fathers Pages to be put to death for mourning for their Maſter.

Hamon the falſe Iew (as the ſame author reporteth) comming to Conſtantinople, and expecting ſome great reward for his foule treaſon, by the commandement of Selymus had his head preſently ſtrucke off: with this exprobation of his trechery, That opportunity ſeruing, he would not ſticke for reward to do the like againſt Selymus himſelfe. Of this BajaZet, Ianus Vitalis writeth this Elogium:

Hamon the Iew iuſtly rewarded for his treachery.

Paulus Iouius Illuſt. virorum Elog. lib. 4.

Dum rerum exquiris cauſas, & dum procul Hunnes Carmannos, Cilices, Sauromataſque domas: Bajazethe, domi proles tua te petit armis, Et te per fraudes amouet imperio.
Adijcit inde novum ſcelere ſcelus, & tibi miſcet Pocula lethiferis illita graminibus.
Intempeſtiuos crudelis vipera fætus, Per ſua ſic tandem funera, rupta, parit.
Quid tutum eſt, cui ſint ingentia regna tyranno, Si timeat natos, progeniemque ſuam?

In Engliſh thus:

Whil'ſt that thou Bajazethes ſeekes of things the hidden cauſe,
And faine wouldſt bring the Hunne and Ruſſe vnder thy Turkiſh lawes:
Thy ſonne at home ſteps vp in armes againſt thy royall Crowne,
And by falſe treaſon and deceit findes meanes to plucke thee downe.
Whereto he addeth miſchiefe more, and ſtreit without delay, By poyſon ſtrong in glittering boule doth take thy life away:
The cruell viper ſo brings forth her foule vntimely brood, Which eat and gnaw her belly out, their firſt and poiſoned food.
What things may Princes hold for ſafe, that do great kingdomes ſway, If of their children they muſt ſtand in dread and feare alway?

SELYMVS PRIMVS, TVRCARVM IMPERATOR TERTIVS: FLORVIT ANo 1512 1603

Phil. Lonicer. Turc. Hiſt. l. 1.

En Selymus, ſcelere ante alios immanior omnes:
In patris, & fratrum, dirigit arma necem.
In Perſas mouet inde ferox: Memphitica regna Deſtruit: & Syros Æthiopaſque domat.
Hinc in Chriſticolas irarum effundere fluctus, Ipſorumque imo vertere regna parat.
Cum diro victus proſternitur vlcere: Chriſtus Scilicet eſt populi, portus & aura ſui.

Lo Selymus, in cruelty exceeding others farre, His father, and his brethren both, deſtroies with mortall warre.
The Perſian fiercely he aſſailes: and conquers Ægypts Land:
The Syrian, and the Moore likewiſe, he tam'd with mighty hand.
But purpoſing in his mad mood, the Chriſtians to confound, And the memoriall of their name to root from off the ground,
A loathſome Canker eat him vp, and brought him to his end: Chriſt is to his the ſafeſt Port, when he will them defend.

THE LIFE OF SELYMVS, FIRST OF THAT NAME, THE THIRD AND MOST WARLIKE EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

C This Selymus, by fauor of the great Baſſaes and men of war whom he had before corrupted, hauing depriued his father Bajazet firſt of the Empire, and ſhortly after of his life alſo, and now fully poſſeſſed of the Empire himſelfe, firſt tooke view of the treaſures which the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors his anceſtors had before of long time heaped vp in great abundance: out of which he gaue vnto the ſouldiers of the court two millions of duckats; and for a perpetuall remembrance of his thankfulneſſe towards them, augmented their daily wages, allowing vnto euery horſeman foure aſpers a day, and to euery footman two aboue their wonted allowance. By which exceeding bounty, he greatly aſſured vnto himſelfe the minds of the men of war.

Selymus goeth into Aſia againſt his brother Achomates.

D Shortly after he paſſed ouer with a great army into Aſia, leauing the gouernment of the imperiall city of Conſtantinople vnto his only ſonne Solyman: and marching into Galatia, came to the city of Ancyra, in hope there to haue oppreſſed his elder brother Achomates. But he vnderſtanding before of his comming, withall wiſely conſidering how vnable he was to withſtand his forces, fled before into the mountains of Cappadocia vpon the confines of Armenia, taking vp men by the way as he went, and praying aid of all ſorts of people, yea, euen of ſuch as were but of ſmall ability themſelues, and vnto him meere ſtrangers; that ſo he might in beſt manner he could, prouide ſuch ſtrength as might ſerue him to make head againſt his brother, and for the recouery of Aſia.

Selymus murthereth fiue of his brothers ſonnes.

E Selymus hauing ſpent that ſummer without doing any thing worth the ſpeaking of, and conſidering that he could not well Winter in that cold country neere vnto the great mountaine Taurus, by reaſon of the deepe ſnowes and extreame cold there vſually falling; and that to go farther was to no purpoſe, foraſmuch as Achomates flying from place to place, and mountain to mountain, was not to be ſurpriſed; he retyred backe again into Bythinia, and ſending his Europeian horſemen downe to the ſea coaſt, and the Ianizaries to Conſtantinople; reſolued to winter with the reſt of his army at Pruſa. At which time being wholly bent againſt Achomates his competitor of the Empire, he for certaine yeares continued the league which his father Bajazet had before concluded with Vladiſlaus King of Hungary, Sigiſmundus King of Polonia, and the Venetians. And thinking no care (no not of Children) ſuperfluous which might concerne the eſtabliſhing of his Empire, he called vnto him fiue of his brothers ſons, Orchanes the ſonne of Alem Scach; Mahometes the ſonne of Tzihan Scach; Orchanes, Emirſa, and Muſa the F ſonnes of his brother Mahometes; all young Princes of great hope, of yeares betwixt ſixteene and twenty, excepting Muſa who was not paſt ſeuen yeares old: Of all theſe, Mahometes (whom his vncle Achomates had a little before taken priſoner at Larenda, as is before declared, and vpon the death of Bajazet had againe ſet him at liberty) being about twenty yeares old, was for rare feature and princely courage accounted the paragon and beauty of the Othoman family : which great perfection,as it woon vnto him the loue and fauour of the G men of war,and alſo of all the people in generall : ſo did it haſten his ſpeedy death;onely Sely- mus his cruell vncle enuying at his life. After he had got theſe poore innocents into his hands, he ſent for diuers of his great doctors and lawyers,demanding of them, Whether it were not better that ſome fiue, eight, or ten perſons ſhould be taken away, than the ſtate of the whole Empire ſhould with great effuſion of bloud be rent in ſunder,and ſo by ciuile wars be brought in danger of vtter ruine and deſtruction ? Who although they well perceiued whereunto that bloudy queſtion tended,yet for feare of diſpleaſure they all anſwered, That it were better ſuch a ſmall number ſhould periſh,than that the whole ſtate of the empire ſhould by ciuile war & diſcord be brought to confuſion;in which generall calamitie,thoſe few muſt alſo of neceſſity periſh with the reſt. Vpon colour of this anſwer, and the neceſſity pretended, he commanded H theſe his nephewes before named, to be led by fiue of his great captaines into the caſtle of Pruſa, where they were all, the night following moſt cruelly ſtrangled. It is reported, that Mahometes with a penknife ſlew one of the bloudy executioners ſent into his chamber to kill him ; and ſo wounded the other, as that he fell downe for dead : and that Selymus being in a chamber faſt by, and almoſt an eye-witneſſe of that was done, preſently ſent in others, who firſt bound the poore Prince, and afterward ſtrangled him with the reſt : whoſe dead bodies were buried at Pruſa amongſt their anceſtors. The cruelty of this fact wonderfully offended the minds of moſt men,inſomuch that many euen of his martiall men filled with ſecret indignation, for certaine daies abſented themſelues from his preſence, ſhunning his ſight as if he had beene ſome fierce or raging lyon. I

Selymus ſeeketh after the liues of Amurath & Aladin,the ſons of Achomates his brother.

Of all the nephewes of old Bajazet,only Amurath and Aladin (the ſons of Achomates) yet remained, whom he purpoſed to ſurpriſe vpon the ſudden, and ſo to rid himſelfe of all feare of his brothers children;hauing then left none of the Othoman family, but them and his two brethren vpon whom to exerciſe his further cruelty. Theſe two young Princes had a little before recouered the city of Amaſia, from whence they were the Summer before expulſed by their vncle Selymus, at ſuch time as Achomates their father was glad to fly into the mountaines of Capadocia. Selymus fully reſolued vpon their deſtruction, ſent Vſegi one of his Baſſaes with fiue thouſand horſemen, who by great iournies trauelling to Amaſia, might vpon the ſudden come vpon theſe two yong Princes,and take them altogether vnprouided, and as then fearing no ſuch danger:which was thought no great matter for the Baſſa to do,foraſmuch as he might K with his light horſemen eaſily preuent the fame of his comming ; and the City of Amaſia where they lay,was neither well walled, nor as then furniſhed with any ſufficient garriſon for defence therof : beſide that, Achomates himſelfe was at that time abſent,buſied in taking vp of ſoldiers vpon the frontiers of Caramania. But Muſtapha the old Baſſa,by whoſe ſpeciall means Selymus had obtained the Empire (as is afore declared in the life of Bajazet) being priuy vnto his wicked purpoſe, and now in mind altogether alienated from him, deteſting his moſt execrable tyranny,both for the vnworthy death of Bajazet,his father, & the guiltleſſe bloud of ſo many yong princes his nephews by him ſhed without all pitty ; and hauing compaſſion of the imminent danger whereinto theſe two brethren were now like alſo to fall ; by ſecret and ſpee-dy meſſengers gaue them warning of the comming of the Baſſa, and of all that was intended L againſt them. Who vpon ſuch knowledge giuen,preſently aduertiſed Achomates their father thereof,and laid ſecret ambuſh themſelues for the intercepting of their enemies. So that within few daies after, the Baſſa comming with his horſemen towards Amaſia, fell before he was aware into the middeſt of his enemies : at which time alſo, Achomates following him at the heeles, ſo ſhut him in with his army on euery ſide, that moſt of his men being ſlaine, he him-ſelfe with diuers other captaines were taken priſoners and brought to Achomates, and by his commandement committed to ſafe cuſtody.

Vſegi Baſſa taken priſoner.

Now it fortuned, that ſome of Achomates ſoldiers ſcoffing at the priſoners whom they had taken,told them how they had bin deceiued,and how all the matter had been carried (ſo hard a thing it is to haue euen the greateſt counſels in court kept ſecret)boaſting,that they wanted M not their friends, euen of ſuch as were moſt inward with Selymus, who ſecretly fauoured the better cauſe,& would not long ſuffer the cruell beaſt to rage further : all which things Selymus his ſoldiers reported again after they were ranſomed and returned home. But Vſegi the Baſſa lying ſtill in priſon,and getting certain knowledge of the whole matter, by ſecret letters gaue

Selymus

A Selymus to vnderſtand, that Muſtapha the great Baſſa whom he moſt of all truſted, had ſecret intelligence wth Achomates, and had been the only cauſe of the loſſe of his army.

Selymus of late enuying at the great honour and authority of Muſtapha, and wiſhing him dead, (whoſe deſert he was not able, or at leaſtwiſe vnwilling to requite) cauſed him vpon this accuſation without further triall to be ſecretly ſtrangled in his ſight, and his dead body (as it were in ſcorne of his former felicity) to be caſt out into the ſtreet for euery man to gaze vpon. This was the ſhameful end of this traiterous Baſſa, who had of long time at his pleaſure commanded all things in the Turkiſh Empire, and was for riches, power, and authority, next vnto the Emperors themſelues: but now lieth as a dead dog in the ſtreet, no man daring for feare to caſt earth vpon him. A rare ſpectacle of the vncertainty of worldly felicity, and a worthy B example of diſloyalty. But Achomates hearing what had happened to Muſtapha, in reuenge thereof in like manner executed Vſegi Baſſa his priſoner; and according to his courteous nature ſet all the reſt of the priſoners at liberty.

Muſtapha Baſſa ſhamfully murthered.

Vſegi Baſſa put to death.

Selymus thirſting after nothing more than the guiltleſſe bloud of his brethren and nephews, vpon whom he had againſt all right vſurped the kingdom, whereof he neuer thought himſelfe ſufficiently aſſured ſo long as any of them breathed; began with the firſt of the Spring to deuiſe with himſelfe, how he might firſt take away his brother Corcutus, who then liued at Magneſia, and hauing caſt off all hope of the Empire, gaue himſelfe wholly to the ſtudy of Philoſophy, which he (ſeduced with ambition) had in euill time a little before forſaken; but now retyring himſelfe thereto againe, as to his greateſt contentment, ſpent his time in quiet C contemplation, not attempting any thing againſt his cruell brother vſurping the Empire. Selymus reſolued vpon the deſtruction of this harmleſſe Prince, ſuddenly commanded his captaines to make choice of 10000 horſemen to be in readineſſe within three daies, giuing it out that he would make an inrode vpon the ſudden into Cappadocia. In the number of theſe horſemen, Antonius Menauinus a Genoway, author of this hiſtory (as he of himſelfe reporteth) was one.

All things being in readines againſt the appointed time, Selymus in perſon himſelfe ſet forward with his army from Pruſa, ſtill keeping the way on the right hand; ſo that the ſouldiers, who thought they ſhould haue marched directly into Cappadocia, and ſo to Amaſia, as it was before commonly reported; began now to perceiue by the contrary courſe they held, that they were to go for Lydia and Ionia. When a valiant ſouldier among the reſt, who had ſometime D ſerued one of the Baſſaes in Corcutus his court, by diuers circumſtances gathering the intention of Selymus, ſecretly conueied himſelfe out of the army, and being excellently well mounted, taking the neereſt way, came to Magneſia, and gaue Corcutus warning of the comming of his brother. Corcutus conſidering the great danger he was in, richly rewarded the meſſenger, and leauing his houſe in ſuch order as it was wont to be, fled with two of his ſeruants to the ſea ſide, in hope to haue found paſſage either into Creet or elſe Rhodes.

The next day after Corcutus was departed, early in the morning came Selymus to the caſtle of Magneſia before the riſing of the Sun, in hope to haue found Corcutus yet in his bed: but being deceiued of his expectation, he fell into a great rage, and with cruel torments examined all his brothers ſeruants and Eunuchs, What was become of him, and where he had hid himſelf? E and with much ado got it out of them, That he had warning of his comming by a fugitiue ſouldier, and was thereupon fled, but whether they knew not. Wherefore Selymus ſtaied there fifteen daies, during which time he cauſed diligent ſearch to be made all ouer the country, and along the ſea coaſt, for to haue apprehended him. But when after much ſearch he could heare no tydings of him, he cauſed all his brothers treaſure & rich furniture to be truſſed vp, and to be ſent by ſea to Conſtantinople. So leauing one of his captains with a thouſand horſmen in garriſon at Magneſia, he returned againe to Pruſa with as much ſpeed as he came from thence: verily ſuppoſing, that his brother was for ſafegard of his life, by ſea fled into Italy. All this while Boſtanges, Selymus his ſon in law, lying with a fleet of gallies vpon the coaſt of Ionia, had taken from Corcutus all hope of eſcaping by ſea: ſo that he was faine to hide himſelfe in a caue F neere vnto the ſea ſide, not far from Smyrna; liuing in hope, that after a few daies the fleet would depart, and ſo he ſhould finde ſome opportunity to eſcape.

After he had thus a great while in feare moſt miſerably liued with country crabs and other like wild fruit (a poore diet for a man of ſtate) and was with extreme neceſſity inforced to ſend his man for reliefe to a poore ſhepheards cottage thereby, he was by a country peſant diſcoue-red to Caſſumes, who with two much diligence ſought after his life: and being by him apprehended, G was carried towards the tyrant his brother at Pruſa.

Right welcome to Selymus was the report of his taking: who as ſoone as he vnderſtood that he was within a daies journy of Pruſa, ſent one Kirengi Ogli (who of his ſquint looke was called Chior Zeinall) to ſtrangle him vp vpon the way, and to bring his dead body to Pruſa.

The lamentable death of Corcutus.

This captaine comming to Corcutus in the dead time of the night, and awaking him out of his ſleepe, told him his heauy meſſage; how that he was ſent from his brother Selymus to ſee him executed, which muſt as he ſaid preſently be done. Corcutus exceedingly troubled with theſe heauy news, and fetching a deepe ſigh, deſired the captaine ſo long to ſpare his life, vntill he might write a few ſhort lines vnto his brother Selymus. Which poore requeſt being granted, he called for pen and paper, and readily in Turkiſh verſe (for he had ſpent all his time H in ſtudy) reproued his brother of moſt horrible cruelty; vpbraided him, that he had not only moſt diſloially thruſt his father out of his Empire, but alſo moſt vnnaturally depriued him of life, of whom he had before receiued the ſame: and not ſo content, had moſt tyrantouſly ſlaine his brothers children; and now like an vnmerciful wretch thirſted after the guiltleſſe bloud of himſelfe and Achomates his brethren. At laſt concluding his letters with many a bitter curſe, he beſought God to take of him juſt reuenge for ſo much innocent bloud by him moſt vnnaturally ſpilt. And when he had thus much written, he requeſted the captaine, that it might together with his dead body be deliuered vnto Selymus. So without any further delay he was according to the tyrants command preſently ſtrangled. The next day after, when the dead body was preſented vnto Selymus, he vncouered the face thereof, to be ſure that it was he, and ſee- I ing a paper in his hand, tooke it from him: but when he had read it (for all his cruell nature and ſtony heart) he burſt out into tears; proteſting, that he was neuer ſo much grieued or troubled with any mans death as with his: for which cauſe, he commanded general mourning to be made for him in the court, and with princely ſolemnity buried his body. Three daies after, he cauſed fifteen of thoſe diligent ſearchers who firſt found Corcutus, to haue their heads ſtrucke off, and their bodies to be flung vnto the ſea, ſaying, That if he were by any extremity driuen to fly and hide his head, they would not ſtick to ſerue him in like maner as they had don his brother.

Now of al the poſterity of Bajazet remained none aliue to trouble the cruel tirants thoughts but only Achomates and his two ſons: who vpon the approch of the Spring, ſet forward with his army from Amaſia, excited by the often letters of his friends, who aſſured him, that Selymus K might vpon the ſudden be eaſily oppreſſed, if he would with al expedition come to Pruſa; foraſmuch as the Ianizaries and Europeian horſmen, the vndoubted ſtrength of his army, were at that time abſent, and he himſelfe as one hated both of God & man, could not in ſo ſudden and vnexpected danger tel what he were beſt to do, or which way to turn himſelfe: wherefore they willed him without delay to haſten his comming, and not to expect the milder weather of the Spring, leſt in the mean time Selymus ſhould call together his diſperſed forces: God (they ſaid) did oftentimes offer vnto men, both the opportunity and meanes to do great matters, if they had the power to lay hold thereon, and therefore he ſhould do well now by celerity and courage to ſeeke to better his euill fortune, which but a little before had bereft him of his fathers kingdom; for if Summer were once come on, he muſt either gain the victory by plain battell, L which would be a hard matter, or els get him packing out of Capadocia and all Aſia the leſſe.

Achomates, who before had promiſed vnto himſelfe better ſucceſſe, as well for the great ſtrength he had of his owne, as for the new ſupply of horſemen he had procured from Hyſmae the Perſian King, but eſpecially for the hope he had, that Selymus generally hated for his late cruelty, ſhould in the time of the battell be forſaken of his owne ſoldiers; yeelded to the perſuaſion of his friends, who with many pleaſing words ſet before his eies glorious things, eaſie to be ſpoken, but hard to be effected. Wherefore when he was come into Galaria with ſomewhat more than 15000 horſemen, hauing for haſt left his footmen by eaſie marches to come after him: Selymus aduertiſed of his comming, by ſpeedy meſſengers ſent for his horſemen to Pruſa. In the meane time whiles he is leuying other common ſouldiers, and expecting the M reſt of his forces; fortune, which alwaies fauoured his attempts, did then alſo auert the danger prepared for him by the vnfaithfulneſſe of his followers, and ſhewed to him the open way to victory. For Achomates ſecret friends which were in Selymus his campe, continuing firme in their good will toward him, did earneſtly by letters perſuade him (being already ſet for-

A ward,and now come as far as Paphlagonia) to make haſt,and to come before Selymus his forces were come together: for that he had ſent for the Ianizaries and Europeian horſemen, and did with all ſpeed and diligence make all the preparation he could poſſibly; which for all that would all come too late, if he ſhould vpon the ſudden come vpon him before he was prouided. Which letters being by chance intercepted, gaue Selymus certaine knowledge both of his brothers purpoſe and comming, together with the treaſon intended againſt him by his owne ſeruants: wherefore executing them who had writ thoſe letters, he in their names cau-ſed others to the ſame effect to be written to Achomates, perſuading him with all ſeed poſſible to come ſtill on, and not to ſtay for his footmen, for that Selymus might eaſily be oppreſſed with a few troups of horſemen, if Achomates would with ſpeed but come and ſhew himſelfe B vnto his friends and fauorites: who vpon the firſt ſignall of battell would raiſe a tumult in the army, and vpon the ſudden kill Selymus, vnaduiſedly going to and fro in the battell. Which letters ſo written, Selymus cauſed to be ſigned with the ſeales of them whom he had before executed,and found meanes to haue them cunningly deliuered to Achomates,as if they had bin ſent from his friends: who giuing credit to the ſame, and preſuming much vpon his owne ſtrength,doubted not to leaue his footmen, who followed eaſily after him, vnder the conduct of Amurath his ſon; and came and encamped with his horſemen neere vnto the mountaine Horminius,vpon the banke of the riuer Parthemius.Selymus alſo departed from Pruſa,and hauing receiued into his army ten thouſand Ianizaries (but a little before come ouer the ſtreit) ſent before Sinan Baſſa, Generall of his Aſian horſmen, to know & make proofe of the ſtrength C of his enemies. The Baſſa as yet not knowing where Achomates lay, neither of what force he was,being deceiued by the darkeneſſe of the morning,fell into a place of diſaduantage,where he was ſet vpon by Achomates,and hauing loſt ſeuen thouſand of his men, was glad with other eight thouſand which were left,to fly backe vnto Selymus.

Treaſon againſt Selymus diſcouered.

Sinan Baſſa diſcomfited by Achomates.

For all this loſſe,was not Selymus diſcomforted, or doubtfull of the victory, but forthwith marched on forward to the riuer Elata, which runneth directly out of the mountaine Hormi-nius into Pontus,watering moſt large fields vpon the right hand, which at this day are called the plaines of the new land. So did Achomates alſo, who although he knew his brother to be euery way too ſtrong for him,yet being encouraged with the late victory,and in hope that his friends in Selymus his army(whom he vainly ſuppoſed to haue bin yet liuing)would in the ve-D ry battell doe ſome notable matter for him, and that victory would follow his juſt quarrell; reſolued neither to retire backe, neither to expect the comming of the reſt of his army. The riuer was betweene the two camps,and the number of both armies certainely diſcouered: yet could not Achomates (to whom the open fields offered a ſafe retreit vnto the reſt of his army) poſſeſſed with a fatal madneſſe,be perſuaded(conſidering the greatneſſe of the danger)in time to prouide for the ſafety of himſelfe and his army,carried headlong (as it ſeemed) by ineuitable deſtiny to his fatall deſtruction,which preſently after enſued.

Selymus a little before the going downe of the Sun, with his army paſſed ouer the riuer Elata,and gaue generall commandement through all his campe,that euery man againſt the next day ſhould be ready for battell: and in a wood not far off placed a thouſand horſemen in am-E buſh,vnder the leading of Canoglis,his wiues brother,a valiant yong gentleman,whom his father had a little before ſent from Taurica vnto his ſon in law with a choſen company of Tartarian horſemen: vnto him Selymus gaue in charge, that when the battell was joined,he ſhould ſhew himſelfe with his horſemen vpon the backe of his enemies,and there to charge them.

Selymus with his army paſſeth ouer the riuer.

As ſoone as it was day,Selymus in a great open field put his army in order of battell,placing his horſemen in two wings,ſo that all his ſpearemen were in the right wing,& the archers and carbines in the left: in the maine battell ſtood the Ianizaries with the reſt of the footmen. On the other ſide Achomates hauing no footmen, diuided his horſemen into two wings alſo.

Whileſt both armies ſtood thus raunged, expecting but the ſignall of battell, a meſſenger came from Achomates to Selymus, offering in his maſters name, to try the equity of their quar-F rell in plain combat hand to hand:which if he ſhould refuſe, he then tooke both God and the World to witneſſe, that Selymus was the only cauſe of all the guiltleſſe bloud to be ſhed in the battell,and not he: whereunto Selymus anſwered, that he was not to try his quarrell by the appointment of Achomates: and though he could be content ſo to do,yet would not his ſoldiers ſuffer him ſo to aduenture his perſon and their owne ſafety: and ſo with that anſwer returned

the meſſenger backe againe to his maſter, giuing him for his reward a thouſand aſpers. G

Achomates hauing receiued this anſwer, without further delay charged the right wing of his brothers army, who valiantly receiued the firſt charge: but when they were come to the ſword, and that the matter was to be tried by handy blowes, they were not able longer to endure the force of the Perſian horſemen; who being well armed both horſe and man, had before requeſted to be placed in the formoſt ranks, by whoſe valor the right wing of Selymus his army was diſordered, and not without great loſſe inforced to retire backe vpon their fellowes. Which thing Selymus beholding, did what he might by all means to encourage them againe; and preſently brought on the left wing with their arrowes and piſtals, in ſtead of them that were fled: and at the ſame time came on with the Ianizaries alſo, who with their ſhot enforced Achomates his horſemen to retire. Achomates himſelfe carefully attending euery danger, with greater H courage than fortune came in with freſh troups of horſmen, by whoſe valor the battell before declining was againe renewed, and the victory made doubtfull: but in the fury of this battell whileſt he was bearing all downe before him, and now in great hope of the victory, Canoglis with his Tartarian horſemen riſing out of ambuſh, came behind him, and with great outcries cauſed their enemies (then in the greateſt heat of their fight) to turne vpon them: at which time alſo the footmen ſtanding cloſe together aſſailed them afront, and the horſemen whom the Perſians had at firſt put to flight, now moued with ſhame, were againe returned into the battell: ſo that Achomates his ſmall army was beſet, and hardly aſſailed on euery ſide. In fine his enſignes being ouerthrowne and many of his men ſlain, the reſt were faine to betake themſelues to flight. Where Achomates hauing loſt the field, and now too late ſeeking to ſaue himſelfe I by flight, fell with his horſe into a ditch, which the raine falling the day before, had filled with water and mire: and being there knowne and taken by his enemies, could not obtaine ſo much fauour at their hands as to be preſently ſlaine, but was reſerued to the farther pleaſure of his cruell brother. Selymus vnderſtanding of his taking, ſent Kirengen (the ſame ſquint-eyed captaine which had before ſtrangled Corcutus) who with a bow-ſtring ſtrangled him alſo. His dead body was forthwith brought to Selymus, and was afterward by his commandement in royall manner buried with his anceſtors in Pruſa.

Achomates ſtrangled.

Amurath and Aladin the ſons of Achomates. fly, the on into Perſia, and the other to Egypt.

Now Amurath, Acomates his ſonne, vnderſtanding vpon the way by the Perſian horſemen (who ſeered together, had againe made themſelues way through the Turks army) of the loſſe of the field and the taking of his father, returned backe againe to Amaſia: and there after K good deliberation, reſolued with his brother to betake themſelues both to flight; he with the Perſian horſmen paſſing ouer the riuer Euphrates, fled vnto Hyſmael the Perſian king: but Aladin the yonger brother paſſing ouer the mountaine Amanus in Cilicia, fled into Syria, and ſo to Campſon Gaurus the great Sultan of Ægypt.

After this victory, Selymus hauing in ſhort time and with little trouble brought all the leſſer Aſia vnder his obeiſance, and there at his pleaſure diſpoſed of all things, determined to haue returned to Conſtantinople: but vnderſtanding that the plague was hot there, he changed his purpoſe, and paſſing ouer at Callipolis and ſo trauelling through Grecia, came to Hadrianople, where he ſpent all the reſt of the Summer, and all the Winter following: and afterward when the mortality was ceaſed, returned to Conſtantinople; where it was found, that an L hundred and threeſcore thouſand had there died of the late plague.

Hyſmael the Perſian King, whoſe fame had then filled the World, hearing of the arriuall of Amurath, ſent for him and demanded of him the cauſe of his comming. The diſtreſſed young Prince, who but of late had loſt his father, together with the hope of ſo great an Empire, and now glad for ſafegard of his life to fly into ſtrange countries, oppreſſed with ſorrow, by his heauy countenance and abundance of teares, more than by words, expreſſed the cauſe of his comming: yet in ſhort trained ſpeech, declared vnto him, how that his father, his vncle, with the reſt of his couſins, all Princes of great honour, had of late been cruelly murdred by the vnmercifull tyrant Selymus: who with like fury ſought alſo after the life of himſelfe and his brother, the poore remainders of the Othoman family, who to ſaue their liues, were both glad to M fly, his brother into Ægypt, and himſelfe to the feet of his imperiall Majeſty.

Hyſmael moued with compaſſion, and deeming it a thing well beſeeming the greatneſſe of his fame, to take the poore exiled prince into his protection and to giue him reliefe, willed him to be of good comfort, and promiſed him aid. And the more to aſſure him therof, ſhortly after

A gaue him one of his owne daughters in marriage. For it was thought, that if Selymus (for his tyranny become odious to the world) ſhould by any meanes miſcarry (as with tyrants commonly falleth out) that then in the Othoman Family, ſore ſhaken with his vnnaturall crueltie, none was to be preferred before this poore Prince Amurat: beſides that, it was ſuppoſed, that if he ſhould inuade him with an army out of Perſia, that vpon the firſt ſtirre, all the leſſer Aſia mourning for the vnworthy death of Achomates, would at once reuolt from him, who for his cruelty and ſhamefull murthers had worthily deſerued to be hated together both of God and man.

Wherefore in the beginning of the Spring Hyſmael furniſhed Amurat his new ſonne in Law with ten thouſand horſemen, willing him to paſſe ouer the riuer of Euphrates at Arſenga, B and to enter into Cappadocia, as well to make proofe how the people of that Countrey were affected towards him, as of the ſtrength of the enemy: after whom he ſent Vſta-Ogli, the moſt famous Chiefetaine amongſt the Perſians, with twenty thouſand horſemen moe, with charge, That he ſhould ſtill follow Amurat within one dayes journey: and he himſelfe with a farre greater power ſtayd behind in Armenia, doubting to want victuall, if he ſhould haue led ſo great an army through thoſe vaſt, barren, and deſolate places, whereby he muſt of neceſſity paſſe.

Amurat ſpoyleth Capadocia.

Amurat marching through the leſſer Armenia, and entring into the borders of Cappadocia, had diuers towns yeelded vnto him by his friends; ſome others he tooke by force, which he either ſacked or elſe quite raſed; and brought ſuch a generall feare vpon the inhabitants of that C prouince, that the people ſubmitting themſelues to him all the way as he went, it was thought he would haue gon directly to Amaſia, had not Chendemus (an old warlike captain whom Selymus had left for his lieutenant in Aſia) with a great army come to meet him at Sebaſtia, which at this day is called Siuas. This Chendemus had alſo long before aduertiſed Selymus both of the preparation and comming of the Perſians, as ſoon as he had learned by his eſpials, That they were paſſed the riuer Euphrates. Vpon which news Selymus came preſently ouer into Aſia, and commanding all his forces to meet together at Pruſa, had with wonderfull celerity leauied thereabout forty thouſand common ſoldiers. Which ſo ſoon as Amurat vnderſtood, as well by ſuch priſoners as he had taken, as by aduertiſement from his friends, although he was very deſirous to haue fought with Chendemus, yet doubting that if Selymus ſhould with his wonted D celerity come againſt him, he ſhould be intangled in the ſtreits of the mountain Antitaurus, he retyred backe again to Vſta-Ogli. But Selymus, who all that yeare had in his hauty thoughts bin plotting ſome ſuch notable exploit as were worthy his greatnes, ſtanding in doubt whether he ſhould by ſea and land inuade Hungary, the Rhodes, or Italy, at that time ſore ſhaken with ciuill warres, hauing now ſo fit an occaſion giuen him by the Perſian, to the great ioy of all Chriſtendome, conuerted himſelfe wholly to the Eaſt, and in thirty dayes march came to Arſenga. Where ioyning his army with Chendemus, when he vnderſtood that his enemies hauing harried the country, were again retyred, prickt forward with the griefe of the iniury, and deſire of reuenge, with hope of victory he reſolued to follow after them foot by foot, and forthwith to enter into Armenia the greater, the principall prouince of the Perſian kingdom.

Selymus reſolueth to inuade the Perſian.

E But the difficulties of this notable expedition, which were in Councell propounded by them which had beſt knowledge of thoſe Countries, were great and many; all which by his owne good hap and inuincible courage, he himſelfe afterwards ouercame: for the ſouldiers which had in ſhort time already marched by land out of Illyria, Epirus, and Macedonia, into Cappadocia, muſt of neceſſity in this long expedition take vpon them new labours: they were to endure the ſharp and pinching cold of the huge mountaine Taurus, and by and by after the moſt vehement and ſcorching heat in the plaines of Armenia the leſſer, with extreme thirſt, hunger, and moſt deſperat want of all things: and well the more, for that the Perſians in their retreat, ſpoyling the countrey as they went, had vtterly deſtroyed all that might ſerue for the vſe of man, of purpoſe to leaue nothing to their enemies but want of all things, if F they ſhould purſue them: beſides that, his moſt expert Captaines ſtood in no ſmall doubt of the petty Princes of Armenia the leſſe, and the mountaine King Aladules, whom they were to leaue behind them at their backs, without any great aſſurance of their friendſhip, who they well knew would leaue them, if any thing ſhould happen otherwiſe than well to Selymus, either in the battell, or for want of victuals, or in the ſtreit paſſages. For they were to be re- G lieued with victuals from the Armenians: and Aladeules forces then in readineſſe, were neither for number nor power to be contemned; who alſo with caſtles commodiouſly placed, and ſtrong garriſons, at his pleaſure commanded all the ſtreits, paſſages, and entrances which led out of Capadocia into Armenia and the Perſian kingdome: for all the mountaine countries were vnder his command, and his kingdome ſtretched from the mountaines called Scodriſci neere vnto Pontus, all alongſt the great mountaine Taurus vnto Amanus, which diuideth Cilicia from Syria.

Amongſt the reſt, old Chendemus Viceroy of Natolia, a man of great experience, and of all others in greateſt credit, fauour, and authority with Selymus, perſuading him to ſtay a while in Capadocia, and there to refreſh his Europeian ſouldiers already weary of their long trauell, H and ſo to expect the comming of his enemies. And to perſuade him from the dangerous expedition into Perſia, ſpake vnto him as followeth:

Chendemus Baſſa diſſuades Selymus from going any further againſt the Perſians.

It is not to be thought (moſt mighty and inuincible Emperour, that the Perſians are fled for feare, becauſe they retyred before they ſet eye vpon vs their enemies: it is a fineneſſe, and they plainely go about to entrap vs, whiles they by flight make a falſe ſemblant of feare. Know we not what cunning heads, what able bodies Perſia breedeth? Will they feare the naked Turkiſh light horſemen or archers, which with their couragious barbed horſes and themſelues ſtrongly armed, feared not the Scythian ſhot: or (if that be too little) which by their valour haue vanquiſhed ſo many nations, and gained vnto their King ſo great and large an Empire? Thinke you, that you haue either greater or better forces than had long ago Caſſumes your vncle, or great Mahomet your Grandfather; who diuers times prouing their forces againſt this enemy, where more than once put to the worſt, I my ſelfe then ſeruing in their camps neere vnto Trapezond and the mountaines of Nicopolis. I will not deny, but that the great ordnance which you carry with you may ſtand you in great ſtead, ſo that fit place may be found to beſtow ſo many field pieces in: but this ſcorched ground, the froſen and abrupt mountains, with the vaſt and ſolitary plaines beyond them, terrifie me, whom all the armed Forces of our enemies in places of great aduantage could not diſmay. You muſt fight not only with your valiant enemies, but with the difficulties of nature alſo. Neither may your Majeſty giue any credit to the Armenians or Aladaules, Princes of moſt doubtfull faith: although at your firſt ſetting forward they ſhew a faire face, and ſeeme neuer ſo friendly: for they will but expect and await ſome fit occaſion to take you at an aduantage, and ſo to ſet vpon you when you leaſt feare them. But K admit you were aſſured of victory, ô with how much warme bloud of your beſt ſouldiers ſhall you buy the the ſame? with what other ſoldiers, with what other forces will you defend Grecia, if the Chriſtian Kings hearing that you for enlarging your Empire, or deſire of fame being gone into the furtheſt part of Armemenia, ſhall in the meane time inuade you? Wherefore if it be better and more wiſedome, with ſafety to defend your owne, than with danger to ſeeke for that is other mens; if Princes of greateſt policy haue repoſed the glory of their victory, not in the greatneſſe of the ſlaughter of their enemies, but in the ſafety and preſeruation of their own ſoldiers: ſpare to obiect your ſelfe and your army to moſt manifeſt danger, and vnaduiſedly to commit all at once to the hazard of good fortune: which being a moſt tickle and vnconſtant miſtreſſe, if ſhe ſhall but once dally with your dangerous attempts, you ſhall through your raſhneſſe in far ſhorter ſpace tumble downe headlong from the tipe of ſo great Majeſty, than you haue thereunto a L while ago by your rare vertues worthily aſpired.

Selymus as he was of a rough and fierce nature, ſo would he haue all things done according to his own deuice and direction: and though he were not a little moued with this ſpeech of ſo graue a counſellor and moſt expert commander, and ſaw many of his captaines troubled with the imagination of the future danger; yet in a fume refuting ſome little of that which Chendemus had ſaid, he diſmiſſed the Councell, proteſting openly, that he would proceed in his intended purpoſe, hap what hap ſhould, from friend or foe: although that old fellow were (as he ſaid) ſo carefull of his life, that he feared to die a noble death. Which Selymus had no ſooner ſaid, but preſently others about him, accuſtomed to ſerue his humor, which enuied at the glo- M ry and wealth of old Chendemus, tooke hold vpon theſe words, and beginning with the greatneſſe of his forces, the valour of his ſouldies, the ſtore of his artillery, with his own inuincible fortune; made eaſie matters of all the former diſſiculties, and with great words labored to ex-

A tenuat al that the graue Baſſa had before ſaid concerning theároweſſe and power of the enemy. After that they began to diſcredit Chendemus; ſaying, That hee being a martial man, and of known reſolution in al his moſt warlike actions, had not ſaid as before, for want of courage, or any diſtruſt of the victory, but of purpoſe to hinder that moſt honorable expedition, and to cut off all hope of victory, (which was, as they ſaid, as good as already gotten) beeing before loden with Amurats great promiſes, and the gold of Perſia. Wherefore they wiſhed him to beware of the ſly old Fox his wyles and treaſon, and to proceed on in his expedition ſo much the more boldly; and not to think that his ſoldiers would refuſe any danger or labor ſo long as they ſaw courage in himſelf, but would be ready (as they ſaid) to vndertake the moſt deſperat difficulties of war, and deſired nothing more than to be conducted into thoſe far Countries, B where by their martial proweſſe & valiant acts they might make their Emperor Selymus equal with the Great Alexander, and themſelues comparable to his Macedonians. And to work the vtter deſtruction of this moſt faithful Counſellor without all recure, theſe falſe flatterers ſuborned bold faced accuſers, who falſly and ſhamefully affirmed, that hee had receiued great ſums of mony of Amurat, and did not therfore in time go againſt the Perſian robbers; whereby all the former calamities happened (as they ſaid) in that prouince. For which pretended cauſes Selymus commanded Chendemus without further hearing to be ſlain: but indeed to terrifie others from like liberty of ſpeech, and withall to teach them, to deem thoſe deuices and counſels as moſt excellent, which their ſoueraign ſhould as it were by diuine inſpiration find out himſelf, and ſo to accept of them without contradiction. The ſudden death of this moſt C faithful counſellor Chendemus ſtrook an exceeding fear into the minds of all men, for that ſo honorable a perſonage, of late in ſo great credit and fauor with his Soueraigne, was without hearing executed; whom they had knowne as a man of great account both for his proweſſe and policie, to haue ſtood faſt on Selymus ſide, firſt in his wars againſt his father, and of late againſt his brother: not doubting but that Selymus, by nature cruel, and ſuſpitious euen of trifles, would with like tyrannie not ſpare men of meaner calling, who ſpared not his deareſt and moſt antient friends.

Chendemus Baſſa by the commandment of Selimus ſlain

Selymus marching from Arſenga, came to the confines of the leſſer Armenian kings, and of Aladeules; where by his Embaſſadors he requeſted the kings of thoſe nations (who were then in arms) that they would join their forces with his againſt the Perſian, and to go with him in- D to Armenia the great; promiſing that when the wars were happily ended, he would giue vnto them all ſuch teritory as ſhould chance in thoſe wars to be taken from the enemy, as a reward of their aid. But theſe poor kings, who hated both Hyſmael and Selymus, for the manifold injuries they daily receiued in the frontiers of their dominions, lying in the midſt between them (as it commonly falleth out, that the weakeſt go the wals) craftily expecting the euent of this war, would not openly ſhew themſelues, but anſwered, That they had taken vp Armes for no other purpoſe but for the defence of themſelues and their kingdoms. Not meaning in that doubtfull War to bear themſelues as enemies vnto either of thoſe two mighty princes their friends and Neighbours, of whoſe iuſt grieuances they were not able or worthy to determin; yet if they would without hoſtilitie, in peaceable manner paſſe through their Dominions, E they promiſed to giue free paſſage vnto him and his Army; and after he was entred into Armenia the greater, to relieue him with ſuch prouiſion of victual as their bare countrey could afford.

Selymus thus deceiued of this his firſt hope, (for why, hee thought thoſe poor kings would at the firſt either for loue or fear haue bin ready to haue done him all the ſeruice they could) diſſembled his grief for the preſent, as wholly bent againſt Hyſmael, fearing that if he ſhould by word or deed offend thoſe neuter princes, he ſhould haue them at his backe his moſt aſſured and vndoubted enemies. Wherefore paſſing the mountaine called Scodriſci, he came in 8 days to the great mountain Moſchij, which the famous riuer Euphrates, with his mighty ſtream and hugy broken banks, ſeparateth from the great mountain Antitaurus, & with per- F petual ſteep ridges runneth into Iberia and Colchis, and on the Eaſt diſcouereth Armenia the greater. Here Selymus with enſignes diſplaied marching alongſt the bank of the riuer, departed not from the ſame, for fear to lack water in that hot and barren countrey; and ſo held on his way directly Eaſtward, leauing the Countrey of Armenia the leſſe vpon his left hand, and the frontiers of the kingdom of Aladeules on the right, vntil he came to the mountain Periardo.

riardo. This great mountain, famous for the riſing of two great and notable riuers out of it, is for the wonderful fertilitie of all things, of the barbarous people called Leprus, which is to ſay, fruitfull: for Euphrates and Araxis there running out of two diuers and contrary Marſhes, with many arms water and inrich that champian and dry country. Selymus hauing made ſo great a journey, and yet not able ſo much as by report to vnderſtand what was become of Hyſmaels ſo great and populous army, which he knew was but a little before departed out of Cappadocia; as a man in doubt and half afraid, ſtaied and incamped his army at the head of the riuer Euphrates; and from thence ſent out his ſcouts euery way, if haply they could intercept ſome which might giue them knowledge of their enemies. But the Armenians, whether it were for fear of the Turks comming, or that Hyſmael their king had ſo commanded, were all before fled out of that part of the country wherby Selymus was to paſſe with his army; and hauing forſaken their houſes, had carried away with them, or els by fire deſtroied whatſoeuer might ſerue for the vſe of man. Selymus ſends out his Scouts, who returne with bad newes

The Turkiſh ſcouts after they had by the ſpace of two daies ſcoured vp & down the country, returned back again to Selymus, not hauing taken ſo much as one man; ſhewing vnto him, That all things were deſtroyed before him, and nothing left but wild fields and a moſt deſolat country, without any appearance of man or beaſt: and that they were of opinion, that either the Armenian guids were deceiued in the way, or els had of purpoſe brought them into ſuch deſart places, wheras wanting paſture for their horſes, and food for men, they muſt needs together periſh with hunger. Which their preſent fear was greatly increaſed by the weak kings whom they had left behind them at their backs; but eſpecially Aladules, who either for fear or ſhame had a few daies at the firſt holpen the Turks with victuals, but after they were farther entred into Armenia, performed nothing of that he had before moſt faithfully promiſed: ſeeking therin the fauor of Hyſmael, who he thought would with the ſame good fortune vanquiſh the Turks, that he had not long before the greater part of the Eaſt. Selymus perplexed in mind, began now to ſuſpect treaſon, to fear famin, to dread the deſarts and forſaken places, and with grief of mind to call to remembrance all that old Chendemus his faithfull Counſellor had before moſt truly told him. For all that, he ſhewed himſelf to his ſoldiers with cheerfull countenance, as a man nothing diſmaid: which his firm conſtancy ſeemed to promiſe to their diſcouraged minds good ſucces, with ſpeedy victory. Wherefore calling vnto him his Guids, and ſuch as beſt knew the country, and vnderſtanding by them, that on the right hand beyond the mountain Periardo lay the moſt fruitful country of all Armenia, he roſe with his army, and compaſſing the hil toward the North, turned down toward the riuer Araxes, and aboue the city of Coy paſſed his army ouer the riuer, his footmen by little bridges, and his horſemen by foords. For Araxes vntil it haue receiued ſuch riuers into it as fall out of the marſhes of Periardo, runneth but with a ſmall ſtreame, and is in ſome places eaſie to be paſſed ouer. I K

Selymus paſſeth ouer Araxes.

Selymus had ſcarſly wel got ouer the riuer and incamped his great army, when Vſta Ogli (who hauing joined his forces with Amurat, lying incamped not far off, and fearing leſt the City of Coy and the vnprouided citiſens ſhould by the ſudden comming of the enemy be oppreſſed) quickly roſe with his army, and ſet forward to meet the Turkes: for that city of all others in that country, for freſh fountaines and riuers moſt pleaſant (wherein the Perſian kings, for the great plenty of al maner of fruit, & wholſomnes of the air, leauing Tauris, were wont to ſpend moſt part of the ſummer) had then in it many rich citiſens and ſumptuous buildings; which Vaſta Ogli thought good betimes to reſcue, and not with diſhonour to loſe that rich city, looking as it were vpon it; and leauing it vnto the enemy, to ſuffer him there to refreſh his hunger-ſtarued ſoldiers with plenty of all things. Caſsinus an Armenian born, and preſent in thoſe wars, did by many probabilities (as Iouius writeth) ſhew vnto him, That this city of Coy was in antient time that moſt famous city which was called Artaxata, which Domitius Corbulo deſtroied. Neither did Hyſmael himſelf (although he had but a little before ſent the greateſt part of his forces againſt the Coraxeni, who were then riſen vp againſt him in rebellion, as one that made no great reckoning of the Turks, or euer thought that they durſt haue come ſo far into Armenia) make any delay, but forthwith as ſoon as he had heard of the comming of Selymus, came alſo in perſon himſelf vnto his army. L M

By chance Vſta Ogli (who contrary to all mens expectation had till then ſhunned to fight, A or come in ſight of his enemies, of purpoſe with leſſe danger and loſſe of men to ouerthrow them afterward, being ſore weakned & almoſt ſpent with long trauel & want of victuals) lay then incamped neer the city, when as the Turks ſcouts, vpon the comming of Hyſmael, perceiued by the riſing of the duſt, and the neighing of the Perſian horſes, that ſome greater power was at hand. Which ſo ſoon as it was noiſed in the Turkiſh Camp, they began to rejoice exceedingly, and to conceiue the firſt hope both of their ſafety and victory: glad that now meeting with their enemies, they ſhould either by victory turn their labor, toil, famin, and extremities, wherwith they had a long time ſtriuen, into eaſe and plenty of all things, or elſe by honorable death end all their miſeries at once. For many of the horſmen, eſpecially of them which came out of Europ, whoſe horſes were ſtarued for want of forrage, and the common B footmen ſpent with long trauell, and grieuouſly troubled with the flix (who trauelling in the extream heat of the ſun, had for moſt part liued vpon Crabs and other wilde fruits, with a bad ſupping made of meale and vineger, and almoſt diſpairing to get the ſight of their enemies) began now to die in euery corner.

Hyſmael as ſoone as he was come within ſight of his enemies, repoſing great confidence as wel in the valor of his ſoldiers, as in his own rare fortune, the more to terrifie them, thought it good forthwith to giue them battel. Wherupon he ſent an herald vnto Selymus, accompanied with certain skilful ſoldiers, which ſhould in beſt ſort they could take view of the number and force of their enemies, of their artillery, and in what ſort they lay incamped: and to tell him, That foraſmuch as he had no title vnto Armenia, nor that the Turks had at any time claimed C any intereſt therin, he could not but maruel, why he had againſt all right entred with his Army into his dominion. But if he haply vpon a vain preſumption, to the imitation of Alexander of Macedon, ſhould think ſo much of the world his own, as he could by his ſword & good fortune win, he ſhould then make himſelf ready againſt the next day to make proof of his fortune, and the forces of others not inferior to his own.

Hyſmael ſends an herauld to Selymus.

Wherunto Selymus anſwered, that the freſh remembrance of the manifold injuries done to the Turks by the Perſians, was ſuch, as might giue him iuſt cauſe to take vp arms: foraſmuch as long ago, both his grandfather Mahomet the Great, and his Vncle Caſſumes, and euen of late his father Bajazet, and he himſelf alſo in his wars againſt his brother Achomates, had receiued great wrong and diſhonor from the Perſians. All which things, although they were of themD ſelues important, yet he eſteemed not of them as ſufficient cauſes of war, but only ſought after his enemy Amurat his brothers ſon, who had of late ſpoiled Cappadocia; whom if hee would quietly and friendly deliuer vnto him, as the mutual lawes of amity and friendſhip among princes for the maintenance and preſeruation of their eſtates and kingdoms required, then he would withdraw his forces, and peaceably return into his kingdome: otherwiſe, hee threatned with fire and ſword to deſtroy not the frontiers of Armenia, but euen the heart of Perſia. And diſmiſſing the herauld, both the armies for that day lay ſtil in their trenches, expecting the dreadfull euent of battel.

Selimus his anſwer vnto Hyſmael.

The next day Selymus by perſuaſion of his Captaines brought his army into the open field, and in order of battel ſet forward againſt his enemies, which lay about two miles off; thinking E that Hyſmael a prince of ſo great name would ſtraightway accept of battel: yet what ſtrength the Perſian King was of, what number of men hee had, what manner of horſemen, how armed, and with what weapons, he could not certainly learn: for beſide that the Perſians are by nature ingenious and ſubtil, the ſoldiers generally ſo reuerenced and loued Hyſmael their King, that no one was found to haue gon from him to the Turk; wheras many reuolted from Selymus to him, as it was afterwards learned of the Perſian captains.

The order of Selymus battell.

Selymus, who had at that time 80000 horſmen vnder his enſignes, placed Chaſan Baſſa, his lieutenant General of Europ, with his Europeian horſmen in the right wing; and Sinan Baſſa with his Aſian horſemen in the left; and before them both the Acanzij, which are voluntary horſmen the forerunners of the Turks Army, who in hope of ſpoil follow the Turkes Wars F out of all countries: in the middle battel he placed the Aſapi or common ſoldiers, which baſe and half naked people, as men of little worth or eſtimation, are commonly thruſt into the front of the Turks battels, to receiue the firſt fury of the enemy, and to blunt their ſwords, more than for any other good ſeruice: directly behind them he beſtowed his great artillerie, garded with 4000 horſemen: laſt of all followed himſelfe with his choſen pentioners and

Ianizaries compaſſed about with ſmal field pieces and his cariages,as with a double trench : G for he had (as their maner is) ſo inuironed himſelfe round with his ſadled Camels made faſt one to another with long chains,that they ſtood him in ſtead of a ſtrong trench, from whence he might ſpeedily relieue any part of his diſtreſſed army ; and in caſe of extremitie being in the midſt of his ſtrength,might as out of a ſure fort repres the furious aſſault of his enemies.
He alſo commanded his footmen in the vauward of his battel,that vpon the approch of the enemies horſe, they ſhould ſpeedily withdraw themſelues aſide into two parts, leauing ſpace for the great ordnance which was placed behind them,to play in the middle betweene them.
On the contrary part Hyſmael, who by the Turkes fugitiues vnderſtood all the deuices of his enemies,calling to him the chief Commanders of his army,ſhewed vnto them, that there was no doubt of victory,ſo that they could ſhun the fury of the great Artillery : which he aſſured H them would eaſily be done, if when they ſaw the Turkiſh footmen diuide themſelues, they would alſo in like manner withdraw themſelues into two parts, and giue place to the fury of the great ordnance : for which purpoſe he cauſed two great enſignes to be diſplaid, wherunto they ſhould at the time appointed retyre ; the one for himſelf and thoſe whom he conducted ; the other for Vſta Ogli and the reſt of his army.

Hyſmael with 30000 Perſians giues battell to Selymus with 300000.

Hyſmael (as Iouius reporteth)had in his army about thirty thouſand horſemen,without any footmen,among whom were ten thouſand men at Arms,reſolute gentlemen of great experience, all gallantly mounted vpon couragious barbed horſes, and themſelues brauely armed, both for the ſhew,and the terror of the enemy; their weapons were a good lance,a ſure ſcimitar, and a horſmans mace ; the reſt were armed with ſtrong cuiraſſes and head-pieces, & were I either archers on horſeback,or els vſed light horſmens ſtaues made of Aſh after the Spaniſh faſhion,wherwith they ſerued at the half ſtaf : as for guns they had none, in which thing only and number of men they were inferior to the Turks. But ſuch was the inuincible courage and noble minds of the Perſians,that contemning the huge multitude of their enemies(being in number about 300000) and making no reckoning of their great Artillery,they doubted not with ſo few to giue them battel.

Hyſmael hauing giuen the ſignal of battel,came on with his Army,exhorting his ſouldiors then to remember the honor they had long before gotten in many battels, and couragiouſly to follow him their Soueraign, whom they by their worthy ſeruice and many victories had made the greateſt Monarch of the Eaſt : telling them, that they ſhould haue now to doe but K with naked men,whoſe weapons were but weak ſtaues and light targets,and their horſes little poor jades almoſt dead with hunger, neuer able to abide the firſt charge of his valiant men at arms.

On the other ſide,Selymus perceiuing the comming of his enemies,by the riſing of the duſt, cauſed knowledge to be giuen through his army by his captains and officers,that the time of battel which they had ſo long wiſhed for,was now come ; wherin if they would worthily acquit themſelues againſt thoſe their proud enemies, they ſhould to their immortall fame extend the Turkiſh empire from the Perſian ſea to the mountain Caucaſus. But if they cowardly forgetting their antient prowes,ſhould faint in time of battel,they were not then to thinke by any means to eſcape by flight back again thorow thoſe great plains & deſolat countries ; L where they ſhould by the way either ſhamefully periſh,or els to their perpetual infamy be taken priſoners, and as baſe ſlaues, during their liues be inforced to ſerue the Perſian women : foraſmuch as beſides the great diſtance of place,both the great riuer Euphrates, and the huge mountain Taurus,and the faithleſſe King Aladeules (who had ſhut vp all the paſſages) did cut off all hope from them if they ſhould be ouercome,by any means poſſible to eſcape backe again into Capadocia.

The great and mortall battel between Selymus and Hyſmael.

When Hyſmael was come neer with his Army, and the Aſapi vpon ſigne giuen diuiding themſelues,made place for the great artillery to play,as was before appointed ; hee alſo preſently diuiding his horſmen, charged the right wing of the Turks army with ſuch force,that after a moſt terrible fight betwixt the half armed Turks,and the valiant Perſian men at arms, M Chaſan Baſſa the great commander of the Europian horſmen, with the formoſt of that Wing being ſlain,and many more after them,he inforced all that wing to retyre to that place where Selymus himſelf with the Ianizaries ſtood. On the other ſide Vaſta Ogli hauing receiued no little harm by the Turks great ordnance,becauſe he had not ſo ſpeedily cleered himſelf and his fol-

A followers of that danger, as had Hyſmael, charged the Aſian horſmen in the left wing, & there in a bloudy battel made great ſlaughter of the enemy, but not with like good hap as did Hyſmael: for whilſt he moſt couragiouſly in the formoſt ranks aſſailed his enemies, he was ſtruck with a ſmal ſhot and ſlain. With whoſe fall the Turkes were greatly incouraged, inſomuch as that they which but now were glad to giue ground, and had loſt the third part of the left wing, began afreſh to renue the battell, and valiantly to withſtand the Perſians, and with their harquebuſiers (wherwith the Perſian horſmen were wonderfully terrified) draue them headlong vpon the Turks common footmen. The Perſians, whether it were forced by neceſſity, for that they had loſt ſo great a Commaunder, and not well able to gouerne their horſes, terrified with the thundring ſhot; or els for that the open ſide of the footmen preſented to them greater B place of aduantage; ſerring themſelues together, brake through the middle of the battell of the Turkiſh footmen, and bearing them down before them with a mighty ſlaughter, came to the great ordnance, and there ſlew the cannoniers, who diſcharging their field pieces at all aduentures, in that great medly made a great ſlaughter, as well of their own men as of their enemies.
And ſo without ſtop, as victorious conquerors, made way through the midſt of their enemies, vntil they came to the right wing, where Hyſmael was ſtill hardly charging the Europeian horſmen, who hauing before loſt Chaſan their Generall, and being many of them ſlain or wounded, were already inforced to retyre: but now charged afreſh vpon the ſide, had much ado to indure the fury of their enemies, but as men in extream danger were glad to cry to Selymus for help.

Vſta Ogli ſlain

C In this hard diſtreſſe Selymus in two places opened his Carriages, wherewith he ſtood as it were intrenched, and preſently ſent out part of his horſmen. And by and by turning himſelfe vnto his Ianizaries, ſaid, This daies victory is reſerued (moſt worthy ſouldiers) vnto your valor and labor; wherfore now valiantly ſet forward, and as freſh and couragious men aſſaile your wearied enemies; their horſes are all on a water with ſweat, and the men themſelues faint vnder the weight of their armor.
But yet for all that Selymus could ſay, the Ianizaries were not very forward, but ſtood ſtill, as men willing in ſo great a danger to keep themſelues ſafe within the ſafegard of their munition.
Wherfore whilſt they at their leiſure ſet forward, the Perſians in the midſt of the heat of this victory, compaſſing in the Europeian horſmen, ſlew them downright, Selymus in the mean time looking on, and wiſhing in vain to help them. Fabritius Carrectus Maſter of the Rhodes, D who of all theſe things had certain intelligence, writ to Leo the tenth then Biſhop of Rome, that the Ianizaries refuſed to be commanded by Selymus, and were not by any perſwaſion or intreaty to be induced to relieue the diſtreſſed Europeian horſmen, but as men diſtruſting the euent of the battel, choſe rather in their ſtrength to expect the ſucces thereof, than with moſt manifeſt danger to expoſe themſelues to the violence of the Perſian horſmen, which had as a tempeſt ouerborn the vantgard of the Turkiſh footmen.

The Perſians were now ready on euery ſide to haue aſſailed Selymus in his greateſt ſtrength: when Sinan Baſſa, although the wing he led was ſore rent and weakned, yet following the Perſians through the midſt of the heaps of the ſlain footmen, came in, in good time for Selymus, and with certain freſh troups which had eſcaped the fury of Vſta Ogli, reſtored the battell, before E almoſt loſt: but eſpecially by the inuincible courage of Alis Beg and Mahomet his brother, deſcended of the honorable family of the Molcozzij, which for nobility among the Turks is accounted next to the Othomans; both of them for courage reſembling their warlike father Malcozzius, famous for that wofull expedition hee made into Friuli againſt the Venetians in the reign of Bajazet. Selymus alſo not yet diſcouraged, but ſtill in hope, commanded all the great ordnance wherewith he was inuironed, which he had reſerued as his laſt refuge, to bee diſcharged: by the violence wherof ſuch ſlaughter was made as well of his own men as of his enemies, mingled together, that what for duſt, what for ſmoke, and thundring of the artillery, hauing on both ſides almoſt loſt the vſe of ſight and hearing, & their horſes being ſo terrified with the thundring report of the great ordnance, that that they were not now to be ruled; the F battel was broken off, the victory yet doubtful. The Turkiſh hiſtories to expreſſe the terrour of this day, number it amongſt their diſmal daies, terming it, The only day of doom.

The terrour of the battell betweene Selymus and Hyſmael.

Hyſmael in this furious battel hauing receiued a wound vnder the left ſhoulder with a ſmall ſhot, by perſuaſion of his friends withdrew himſelf to haue his wound ſearched: which thing vndoubtedly was the ſafegard both of Selymus & his army: for the Perſians by and by following ing their King, leſt the victory, now in all mens opinion almoſt gotten. But after that Hyſmael perceiued the wound was not deep, for that the ſtrength of his armor had ſo broken the force of the ſhot, that it pierced not far into his body, he was about to haue charged the Turkes afreſh: but vnderſtanding of the death of Vſta Ogli, in whom for his ſingular experience in martial affairs, he had repoſed his greateſt confidence; and his captains alſo perſuading him, not to make ſo light reckoning of his wound, the grief wherof he yet felt not, being warm, but to haue regard to his own health: he in ſeemly order ſoftly marched away in ſuch ſort, that his departure had no reſemblance of flight. And paſſing by the city of Tauris, willed the chief of the citiſens to open the gates of the city to Selymus, if he ſhould come thither, and to receiue his garriſons, rather than by vain conſtancie to fal into vtter deſtruction: and ſo marched himſelf into the confines of Media.

But the Turks intangled with many difficulties, hauing no hearts for fear, nor ſtrength for wearines to purſue their enemies, yet comming to the Perſian tents took them without reſiſtance; where beſide the rich pauilions wrought with needle-work of ſilk and gold, & much other pretious furniture, many noble Ladies and gentlewomen were found, which after the maner of the Perſians had followed their husbands in thoſe wars; whom Selymus cauſed to be all ſet at liberty vntouched, excepting one of the wiues of Hyſmael, whom he detained & gaue her in mariage to one of his Baſſa's. Some which were preſent at this battel, reported, That amongſt the heaps of them that were ſlaine, were found the dead bodies of diuers Perſian women, who being armed, and following their husbands, died with them in the battel; whom Selymus cauſed to be honorably buried.

This was that notable battel fought in the Galderan fields, neer to the city of Coy, betwixt theſe two great princes, the ſeuenth day of Auguſt, An. Dom. 1514. In which battell Selymus loſt aboue 30000 men, amongſt whom was Chuſan Baſſa his great Lieutenant in Europ, ſeuen Sanzacks, in which were the two Malcozzian brethren, who labouring the one to reſcue the other, were both together ſlain. Beſide his common footmen, of whom he made leaſt account, he loſt moſt part of his Illyrian, Macedonian, Servian, Epirot, Theſſalian and Thracian horſemen, the vndoubted flour and ſtrength of his army, which were in that mortall battell almoſt all ſlain or grieuouſly wounded.

Selymus for all this great loſſe, by the confeſſion of his enemies hauing gotten the victory, and receiuing embaſſadors from Coy and the Cities therabouts, and the great City Tauris, promiſing to relieue him with whatſoeuer he needed, and to do what els he ſhould command; marched directly to Tauris, deſiring both to ſee and poſſeſſe himſelfe of that City, as one of the chief palaces of the Perſian Kings. This city is two daies journy diſtant from Coy where the battel was fought, & is verily thought to be the famous city called antiently Ecbatana, about 150 miles diſtant from the Caſpian ſea. The citiſens were ready at the comming of the Turks, and brought them great ſtore of victuals out of the city, where Selymus had lodged his army in the ſuburbs, thinking it no ſafety to lodge within that great and populous City, contenting himſelf to haue the gates therof deliuered vnto him, which he kept with ſtrong gard. Some report, That Selymus durſt not truſt the Perſians, and therfore neuer went into the City but diſguiſed in the habit of a common ſouldier. Yet ſome others ſay, that he did with great magnificence banquet in the ſtately palace of the Perſian King, and there had great diſcourſe with them of Tauris, concerning his late victory. But whilſt he thus ſtayed at Tauris, and with himſelf purpoſed to ſpend that Winter in Armenia, he called together his great Captains and Commanders of his army, to know how they liked therof: who fearing his diſpleaſure, referred themſelues to his owne reſolution. Onely Muſtapha his chiefe Baſſa chanced to ſay, That it were good that the minds of the Ianizaries and the other ſouldiers of the court ſhould therin be known. Which his ſpeech Selymus took in ſuch euill part, that he preſently commanded him out of his ſight, and depriued him of his greateſt honour. And the more to diſgrace him, ſent one of his jeaſters after him, who in great ſcorne and deriſion comming behinde him, cut off part of his Tulipant that hung down as the faſhion was. But the Ianizaries vnderſtanding the matter, and much offended with the indignitie which was offered to the great Baſſa, whom they dearly loued, roſe vp all together in arms, and told their emperor Selymus flatly, That they would not in any caſe Winter ſo far from home in the enemies country: and therfore that it were beſt for him betime to conſider of the matter, for that they were reſolutely ſet down to forſake him, if he would needs ſtay, and not with ſpeed return. Selymus much troubled with this inſolencie of the Ianizaries, and hearing daily, That Hyſmael with new ſupplies out of Iberia, Albania, and Parthia, was comming vpon him with greater power than before, and conſidering withall, with what difficulty and danger he had eſcaped in the late battel, preſerued rather by his good fortune and force of his artillery, than the valour and proweſſe of his ſoldiers; and withall ſuſpecting the multitude and ſtrength of the Tauriſians, of whoſe fidelitie he could make no reckoning; he changed his former determination, and reſolued again to return into Capadocia. Wherupon hauing contrary to his promiſe exacted a great maſſe of mony from them of Tauris, he departed thence, carying away with him 3000 families, the beſt artificers in that city, eſpecially ſuch as were skilful in making of Armor and weapons, and ſo with ſpeed retyred towards the riuer Euphrates, a longer way than that wherby he came; fearing to return again by the head of Araxis and the mountaines Periardes, for meeting the Iberian and Albanian horſemen, who were reported to be then comming againſt him.

Hyſmael vnderſtanding of his departure, followed after with as much ſpeed as hee could, leauing behind him for haſt his cariages and ſuch of his ſoldiers as were not able to endure ſo long and ſpeedy a march. Yet for all his haſt (foraſmuch as Selymus was gon a great way before him) he could not ouertake any part of his army vntil he was come to the great riuer Euphrates; where Selymus ſtaying two daies, and hauing made diuers little boats, was paſſing ouer his footmen: which becauſe they were not ſufficient for the ſpeedy tranſportation of ſo great a multitude, many for haſt ſwam ouer the riuer with bladders, and ſome aduentured to get ouer vpon the broken pieces of their cariages, which they had for that purpoſe burſt in ſunder. Selymus himſelf got ouer to the farther banke in a little boat, hauing before cauſed his horſemen with their horſes at once to take the riuer, of purpoſe to breake the violence of the ſtreame, wherby his footmen and Camels with their burdens got ouer with leſſe danger, and ſome of his field pieces were alſo with leſſe difficulty tranſported: yet for all his ſpeed, the Georgian horſmen, the forerunners of Hyſmaels army, being come within ſight before the Turks were al got ouer, raiſed ſuch a fear and ſtir all alongſt that ſide of the Riuer, that 2000 of the Turkes were in their haſty paſſage there drowned, diuers field pieces left ſticking in the mud, and much of the baggage caried away with the force of the riuer. The Georgians contented with ſuch things as were left, purſued them no further: for the wheels of the Turks cariages intangled together with the violence of the ſtream, had ſtaied a great part of the Turkiſh traſh, floting in the riuer, and much more was in diuers places driuen vpon the ſhore; all which the Georgian horſmen eaſily drew out. Hyſmael in the mean time rejoicing at nothing more, than that hauing chaſed away his enemies, he had alſo recouered much of the great Ordnance, by which he had before receiued ſo great hurt.

Selymus by ſpeedy flight thus got out of the hands of the Perſians, found his paſſage much more dangerous at the mountain Antitaurus than he had before thought of: for Aladeules the mountain King hauing now his fortune in contempt, and diligently waiting for his prey, had with his ſauage people before taken all the ſtreit paſſages of the mountain country; who euery night in theeuiſh maner aſſailed the Turks, as they with their weake and weary companies paſſed through thoſe rough and broken waies; and robbing their cariages, preſently fled into their haunts and places of refuge in the thick woods and rocky mountains. Aladules himſelf in the mean time (by whoſe fraud all this was don) euery day excuſing himſelf, as if it had bin don againſt his wil, by the rude mountain people, inured to ſuch deſperat roberies; whom neuertheles he ſaid he would in ſhort time ſeuerely chaſtiſe, ſo ſoone as hee could finde the authors therof. In the mean while for faſhion ſake ſending a little ſpare prouiſion for certaine daies, did euery night rob and ſpoil the Turkes by his ſouldiers, as they could take them in places of aduantage. Againſt which miſchiefs Selymus could neither by polcie, neither his ſouldiers by induſtry prouide any ſufficient remedy. Wherfore diſſembling the injuries he daily receiued, purpoſing to be therof in time reuenged, together with the foul & trecherous dealing of the faithles king; holding on his way, he with much ado came at length to Trapezond, and from thence to Amaſia, where hee ſpent that winter in repairing his ſoreweakened army; purpoſing with the firſt of the ſpring to make war vpon Aladules and the mountain people, who in his return had don him ſo great harm and injury.

Selymus comes to Amaſia.

In this ſort Iouius, one of the great hiſtoriographers of that time, reporteth the aforeſaid G wars betwixt Hyſmael and Selymus; whoſe credit in that matter other Writers haue ſince for moſt part followed. Howbeit Io. Ant. Mananinus a Genoay who ſerued in thoſe wars, doth in his book concerning Turkiſh affaires, dedicated to the French King, much otherwiſe report of the ſame. Which to ſatisfie the deſirous reader, I haue thought good here in few words to ſet down, as it is by himſelf reported.

The former hiſtory as it is reported by Io. Ant. Menauinus a Genoay, preſent at doing thereof.

Selymus (ſaith he) with his army, in number about three hundred thouſand men, being come to the riuer Euphrates, found the bridge broken down by his nephew Amurat, and his enemies incamped in conuenient place on the farther ſide of the riuer, with their forces greatly increaſed by new ſupplies lately ſent from the Perſian King; ſo that there was then in the Perſian army about 90000 men horſe & foot, the horſmen for the moſt part furniſhed with two horſes H apiece for ſeruice. And although Selymus did what he might to know whether the Perſian King were in perſon himſelf in the Camp, or els (which he moſt feared) was raiſing of greater forces in Perſia; yet could he by no means learn the truth of that he deſired. Wherfore repairing again the broken bridge, he firſt ſent ouer his two great Lieutenants, of Grecia and Natolia, who paſſing ouer the riuer, incamped themſelues as they thought conuenient. The next morning, about two hours before the riſing of the Sunne, Amurat ſuddenly aſſailed the great Commander of Grecia, Chaſan Baſſa, in his trenches, and by plain force diſcomfited the Turks and by good fortune took from them their tents: wherupon ſuch a terror and fear came vpon the other great Commander of Natolia, that his ſouldiers thruſting themſelues for fear into the riuer, ſwam ouer with great danger, and again joined themſelues with the reſt of the army. I Selymus troubled with the great loſſe thus receiued, cauſed all his great artillery to be placed all alongſt the hithermoſt banke of the riuer Euphrates; and becauſe the enemy ſhould not perceiue the ſame, ranged certain companies of his ſoldiers before the Ordnance, as if they ſhould preſently haue paſſed the riuer: who vpon ſignall giuen ſhould forthwith withdraw themſelues and giue place to the great ordnance bent vpon the enemy. But when fire was giuen to theſe great pieces, many of them being ouercharged burſt in ſunder, and ſlew diuers of the Turks: many alſo of their rich horſes and mules being neer vnto the riuers ſide, and terrified with the thundring ſhot, leapt into the riuer, and were there drowned together with their riders. The Perſians alſo receiuing great loſſe, retyred farther off for fear of the great artillery.
So Selymus without reſiſtance paſſing ouer the riuer, marched forthwith [illegible]wards the K enemy; whom the Perſians as men nothing diſmaid, notably incountred. The battell was of long time doubtfull, and much bloud ſhed on both ſides; and if the appro[illegible] of the night had not broke off the force of that fight, the Perſian army rather ouercharged with the multitude of the enemy, than vanquiſhed by valor, had vndoubtedly receiued a great ouerthrow: but by the benefit of the night they without further loſſe eſcaped the purſuit of the Turkes.
Vpon this victory, Selymus left his cariages and baggage with his footmen; and taking with him only his horſmen, ſet forward with intention to haue vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed the regal city Tauris, before the fame of the late fought battell could be caried thither; the Perſians in the mean time being no leſſe carefull of their affairs. The day before, ten thouſand men well appointed, which had not yet bin in the battel, were comming to Hyſmael. Theſe he craftily L laid in the Turks way, commanding them vpon the approch of the enemy, to flie as if it had bin for fear. Selymus in the morning deſcrying theſe horſmen at hand, ſuppoſing them to be ſuch of his enemies as being ouertaken with the darknes of the night, were not able to follow the reſt of the Army, exhorted his ſouldiers couragiouſly to purſue their diſcouraged Enemies.

The Perſians ſeeing the Turks, of purpoſe betook themſelues to flight; and they ſuſpecting no deceit, followed faſt after them, vntill that about mid-day being weary of the purſuit, and comming vnto a little riuer that was in their way, there ſtaid to refreſh themſelues; and after they had taken a ſhort repaſt, againe purſued the Perſians, ſtill leauing behinde them ſuch as were not able ſo faſt to follow, prickt forward with hope, that before night they ſhould ſurpriſe M and ranſack the rich city of Tauris. The Turkiſh horſmen thus drawn far from the footmen, the Perſian horſmen left in ambuſh, in the mean time ſet vpon the Turkes footmen (lying as they ſuppoſed in great ſecuritie) and with a great ſlaughter ouerthrew them: at which time they alſo took all Selymus his treaſure and great Artillery. Which ouerthrow was by ſpeedy

A ſpeedy poſts, about two a clocke in the night made knowne to Selymus (who now in his mind already conceiued the ſacking of Tauris) & withall that the fierce enemy was following him at the heeles. Selymus wonderfully abaſhed with this vnexpected newes, and the loſſe of his footmen, forthwith began to retire: which the ten thouſand Perſians which had before of purpoſe fled, perceiuing, now turning themſelues vpon the retiring Turks, charged them hardly: ſo Selymus incloſed both before and behind by his enemies, receiued a great ouerthrow: and the Turks thus hardly beſet, and almoſt deſpairing of their liues, and hauing loſt their enſigns brake out ſidewaies betwixt their enemies and fled. Selymus ſeeing all deſperat and forlorne, betooke himſelfe to flight alſo with the reſt: and paſſing the riuer Euphrates, brake down the bridge which he had but a little before repaired, for feare the Perſians ſhould further purſue B him, and with much trouble and no leſſe danger comming at length to Amaſia, aſſembled thither the reliques of his diſcomfited army. Such of the Turks as remained behind, and were not able in flight to keep way with the reſt, were all ſlaine by the Perſians.

The Genoway author thus concludeth his Hiſtory, That the Perſian King did not more reioice at this victory, than did he himſelfe for the ouerthrow of the Turks, hoping in that their ſo great a confuſion to free himſelfe of his long & miſerable thraldome, and to find a way vnto his natiue countrey parents: afterwards he did, flying firſt to Trapezond and there taking paſſage into Europ, he came to Hadrianople, from thence he trauelled by land on foot to Salonica, and there chancing vpon certaine ſhips of Chriſtian Merchants which had brought corne thither, he was by them tranſported into the Iſland of Chios; from whence he ioyfully C returned to Genoa his natiue country, after he had amongſt the Turks endured ten yeres captiuity: moſt part wherof he liued as a page in old Bajazets priuy chamber, and the reſt as a ſoldier of the court in the reigne of Selymus; and therfore well acquainted with the faſhion of the Turks Court, and manners of that barbarous nation.

Now ſhall it not (as I hope) be much from our purpoſe, here with Iouius a little to digreſſe in comparing theſe two great Princes Hyſmael and Selymus together, who in that time had filled the world with the glory of their fame: that wearied with bloudy broiles, and the wonderfull chances of war, we may a little repoſe our ſelues with matter of a milder vaine, neither vnpleaſant nor vnprofitable.

Selymus and Hyſmael compared together.

Theſe two mighty Princes, as they were for royall deſcent, ſtrength of body, courage of D mind, riches, and power, equall, and had thereby obtained like fame and renowne: ſo in conditions and qualities of mind, and martial diſcipline, they much differed. Firſt of all (beſide the mutual hatred of the one nation againſt the other, deliuered as it were by ſucceſſion from their grandfathers and fathers) theſe two Princes, and ſo likewiſe their ſubiects alſo, were at great ods about an idle queſtion of their vain ſuperſtition, the one preferring & honoring Eububekir, Homaris, and Ottoman, as the moſt true and rightful ſucceſſors of their great Prophet Mahomet: the other with no leſſe deuotion honouring Haly, and deteſting the three former; differing otherwiſe in few or no points of their moſt fond ſuperſtition: yet did they vnder the colour and zeale of their religion (as they would haue it) both pretend iuſt cauſes of war, although their euil diſſembled ambitious deſires, plainly declared vnto the world, that they both ſhot at one E and the ſame mark, viz. By confirming their power & ſtrength, to extend the bounds of their great Empires. For Hyſmael of purpoſe affected the fame and glory of Darius and Xerxes the antient Perſian kings, who hauing ſubdued Aſia, with great boldnes paſſed ouer into Europ: and Selymus the greatnes of Alexander of Macedon, who ſubuerted the Perſian empire. Which their aſpiring thoughts, maſking vnder the vaile of zeale towards their religon, ſeemed not altogether vain; fortune with like indifference immoderatly fauoring their bold ambitious and endleſſe deſires. But in Hyſmael appeared ſuch a wonderful deuotion and grauity, that his haughty thoughts were with the reuerend maieſty thereof couered: whereas in Selymus, his inhuman cruelty did blot and obſcure all his other princely vertues: for he with reward and puniſhment retained the maieſty of his empire, but with greater fame of ſecurity than bounty. Becauſe it F was expedient in the exact diſcipline of that ſeruile gouernment, wherof the greateſt ſtrength of the Othoman empire conſiſteth, to vſe all rigor and ſeuerity: otherwiſe then it ſtood with the ſtate of Hyſmael, who leauied alwaies his armies of his Nobilitie and men free borne, with whom temperat iuſtice, ciuil courteſie, & popular clemency, are of greateſt force, to win their fidelity, faith, and loyalty: for that there is no man well borne, which feareth not more the blemiſh of infamy than the heauineſſe of puniſhment: ſo that it was not to be maruelled, if G Hyſmael by ſuch honorable vertues did mightily defend the glory of his maieſty & renowne.

Vnto theſe his rare vertues, was alſo ioyned a comlineſſe of face (the faireſt gift of nature) well beſeeming ſo great a monarch: for he was well coloured, quick eyed, yellow bearded, and eies and hearts of ſuch as beheld him. But in Selymus, his ſtern countenance, his fierce and piercing eies, his Tartar-like pale colour, his long muſtacho's on his vpper lip, like briſtles, frild back to his necke, with his beard cut cloſe to his chin, did ſo expreſſe his martiall diſpoſition and inexorable nature, that he ſeemed to the beholders, to haue nothing in him but miſchiefe and cruelty. Which diuerſity of countenances was alſo accompanied with no leſſe diuerſity H of affections, and ſo conſequently with far vnlike manner of gouernment. For Hyſmael was of nature courteous and affable, eaſie to be ſeen and ſpoken withall, doing nothing that beſeem'd his regall function, but in the ſight of all men: his manner was to dine openly in the company of his nobility, delighting much in hawking and hunting, accompanied with his noblemen and the Embaſſadors of forraine princes: He would oftentimes run, leap, and proue maſteries with his chiefe courtiers, being himſelfe a moſt excellent horſman and cunning archer: in his exerciſes he was ſo popular, that he would not ſtick openly to bathe himſelfe and ſwim in his princely bathes: his wiues, the beautifull daughters of his nobility or neighbor princes, ladies of great chaſtity, he neither loathed nor diuorced; after the antient maner of the Perſian kings, who alwaies vſed moſt tenderly to loue and cheriſh their wiues, doing them all the honor poſſible I pledges the more to incourage their minds in time of battell. Whereas Selymus contrariwiſe did all things in ſecret, eating his meat alone without any company, attended vpon with his pages & eunuchs only, and ſatiſfying natures want with ſome one ſimple diſh of meat: he ſeldome went abroad but to the church, vpon the friday the Turks chiefe Sabboth; and then ſo beſet with his pentioners and other ſouldiers of the court, that although he vſed to ride alone mounted vpon ſome couragious horſe, yet was it a hard matter by face to know him among ſo many armed men, who with great pride & inſolency kept back the beholders: he was ſeldom ſeen abroad in the city, chuſing rather for his recreation to paſſe ouer in his gally to Aſia, and K there alongſt the ſea coaſt to take the aire: his wiues he would not ſuffer to come to court, neither vſed their company but for procreation ſake, and that (as was thought) without any great good countenance or familiarity, for that he being not greatly giuen to women, but more delighted with vnnaturall pleaſure, thought a mans body and minde to be not a little weakened with the allurements of women: wherefore he ſeldome reſorted to the cloiſter of choice paragons in the midſt of Conſtantinople, ſhut in on euery ſide with high & blind wals: thoſe dainty peeces, either taken from their Chriſtian parents, or by chance ſurpriſed by pirats, are there moſt curiouſly kept by antient matrons and old eunuchs, by whom they are with all diligence inſtructed in the principles of the Mahometan law, and to read the Arabian tongue, and withall, cunningly and comely to ſing, play, dance, and ſow: but Selymus of all others vſed ſeldomeſt L to ſee their allurements, as a man not greatly delighted with women, or deſirous of many (and oftentimes vnfortunat) children; hauing but one ſon (Solyman) by the daughter of Muhamet a Tartar king, who afterwards by the ſufferance of God, proued a great plague to the Chriſtian commonweale. Such ſpare time as he had from his ſerious & weighty affairs, he vſed to ſpend in walking in his gardens with ſome of his Baſſaes or other great courtiers, and in beholding and noting the Noblemens children there ſporting themſelues, would diſcourſe and conſult of many things of great importance. Some houres he would ſpend in the bathes, and in reading the Hiſtories of his Anceſtors and other forraine Princes: imitating therein his grandfather Mahomet the Great, who cauſed almoſt all the Hiſtories of the famous Princes of the world to be tranſlated into the Turkiſh language, and their liuely counterfeits to be with cunning M hand drawne, that by their worthy examples he might be the more inflamed to extend his fame and glory. He would many times ſcoffe at the great buſines of his father BaiaZet, who (as he ſaid) was ſo drowned in the ſtudy of Auerrois (determining nothing certainly of the nature of the ſoule) and the motions of the heauens, that he deſired rather the name of a ſharp diſputer,

A diſputer amongſt the idle profeſſors of Philoſophy, than of a renowned chiefetaine amongſt his valiant ſoldiers and men of war.

One of the Perſian embaſſadors finding him pleaſantly diſpoſed, demanded of him, why he did not weare his beard long, as his father Bajazet, and other great princes of that age had don, therby to ſeeme vnto their ſubjects of greater majeſty: to whom he anſwered, That he liked not to carry about with him ſuch an vnneceſſary handfull, whereby his Baſſaes might at their pleaſure lead him vp and downe the court, as they had done his father: noting therby, that Bajazet whileſt he yet liued, had bin too much ouerruled by the Baſſaes; which he could by no means indure, following no mans aduice but his own in whatſoeuer he tooke in hand.

But to come vnto the Perſians themſelues, they in their wars had great diſaduantage of the B Turks: for as they were ſtrong in horſmen, ſo were they deſtitute of expert trained footmen, by whoſe only means the Turks haue atchieued their greateſt victories, and performed their greateſt wars. Beſide this, it was a great want in the Perſians, that they had not the vſe of guns, againſt whoſe fury no ſufficient reſiſtance can be made, or force of man oppoſed: as appeared by the lamentable example of Vſun Caſſanes at Artenga, and now of Hyſmael in the Calderan fields; whoſe victorious armies of horſemen were both places put to the worſe by the terror and violence of the Turks artillery. For the naked Turkiſh horſeman is not to be compared with the Perſian man at armes; who comes into the field armed with a ſtrong cuiras, a ſure head-piece, and a good targuet: whereas the Turkiſh Europeian horſemen, altogether naked, vſe onely a ſquare or crooked buckler, wherewith they do ſcarcely couer themſelues: and the C Aſian horſemen, bucklers made of ſoft reeds, wound round, and couered with ſome kinde of ſilke. The Perſian horſemen alſo, wearing their pouldrons and gauntlets, and bearing ſtaues of good aſh, armed at both ends, fight with them as occaſion ſerueth at the halfe ſtaffe, after the maner of the Numidians, and with doubling and redoubling their often thruſts from on high, do eaſily wound or kill the vnarmed Turks, with their horſes: whereas the Turkiſh horſemen, after the manner of the Grecians, couching their ſtaues in their reſts, do at the firſt courſe moſt commonly breake the ſame, being made of light and brittle firre, and ſo preſently come to their ſcimitars or horſemans maces, being in all other things far inferior to the Perſian man at armes. As for the Turkiſh archers on horſebacke, they are in no reſpect to be compared with the Perſians, who well mounted and ſurely armed, and vſing both greater and ſtronger D bowes, ſhoot more deadly arrows, and ſo make ſmall account of the Turks. So that all things well conſidered, the Perſian army, deuoted to their King, as well for the great and firme opinion conceiued of his high courage and diuine ſpirit, as for that they were to him by faith obliged, although it was in number far inferior, yet had it bin of the Turks inuincible, if it had not bin ouerwhelmed by the cruell, cowardly, and murthering artillery, and wonderfull multitude of men. The cauſe why Hyſmael out of ſo many great and large prouinces then vnder his obeiſance (able in antient times with their multitude to couer the face of the earth, & to drink the riuers dry) brought now ſo ſmall an army againſt the Turkiſh Emperor, breaking into the heart of Armenia; was, for that Hyſmael to win the hearts of the people by bounty, had remitted a great part of his cuſtomes and tributes, ſo as then ſtood beſt with his policy, hauing but E lately aſpired to the kingdome, and thruſt downe his neere kinſmen, the poſterity of Vſun-Caſſan and Iacup, the rightfull inheritors thereof: ſo that his coffers being empty, and wanting mony, the ſinewes of war, he was not able to raiſe ſo great an army as otherwaies he might out of thoſe populous kingdoms & countries, yeelding plentifully all things neceſſary for mans vſe. Whereas with Selymus it was far otherwiſe: whoſe horſemen, footmen, captaines, canoniers, both at ſea and land, officers of peace and wars, receiued their daily wages and monthly paies in ready mony, of his treaſurers and paimaſters: for defraying of which charge he neuer wanted coyne, hauing an ineſtimable maſſe of mony alwaies in ſtore in the ſeuen towers at Conſtantinople: and his yerely tributes and reuenues ſtill exceeding all his charges by a fourth part. The ſtrength of the Perſian King conſiſted in three kind of ſoldiers: the firſt were they F which were accounted ſouldiers of the court: the ſecond, ſuch as were by cuſtome and duty bound to ſerue him in his wars: and the third, ſuch as were ſent to him from the Princes his neighbors and confederats. Thoſe which were accounted ſoldiers of his court, had their certain ſtipends, and were altogether maintained of the kings charge; of whom, according to the old cuſtome of the Perſian kings, they at certaine times receiued armor, horſes, apparell, tents,

The Perſians better horſemen than the Turks.

and wages, euery one as he is in place and degree. And being attended vpon with a gallant and G ſtrong garriſon of theſe, he maintained the majeſty of his court, eſpecially when he rideth in progreſſe. The nobility and antient gentlemen of his country, who hold lands and poſſeſſions diſcended vnto them from their anceſtors, or holden by the gift of the King, are ſent for in time of wars, and are of duty bound to performe ſuch like ſeruice as the nobility and gentlemen of Italy, France, and Spaine do vnto their ſoueraignes: theſe hardly amount to the number of twenty thouſand, whereof it is well if the third part come well armed; the reſt content themſelues with head-pieces and jacks, and vſe for their weapons either horſemens ſtaues or bowes, which they can moſt cunningly handle, diſcharging their arrows very neere vnto that they aime at, either forward or backeward. They which come vnto him from forrein Princes, confederat or tributary, are commnoly ſent from the kings and princes of Iberia, Albania, and H the countries bordering vpon Media and Armenia; who being halfe Chriſtians, beare a mortall hatred againſt the Turkes. Hyſmael the Perſian King had then vnder his dominion theſe great and famous countries, Armenia the greater, Sulthania, Perſia, Aſſyria, Meſopotamia, Media and Parthia: wherof Armenia is the chiefeſt, famous for the great city Tauris, called in antient time Ecbathana: this country yeeldeth vnto the Perſian King his beſt footmen; but his choice horſemen come from out of Perſia, and eſpecially from Scyras, called of old Cyropolis: the next vnto them are from Aſſyria, the chiefe city wherof is Bagadat, called in antient time Babylon. The Medes and Parthians are of all others accounted the beſt archers next vnto the Scythians. ―

Selymus with a new army entreth into Armenia.

But now to returne againe from whence we haue a little too far ſtraied. Selymus after his I great expedition againſt Hyſmael, wintering at Amaſia, by his lieutenants and captains in Europe and Aſia raiſed ſuch a power, that with the firſt of the Spring he entered againe into the confines of the Perſian kingdome, with a greater army than before, and that ſomewhat ſooner than the extreame cold of that part of Armenia (ſubject to the ſnowie mountaine Taurus) would either well ſuffer, or that the enemy thought it had beene poſſible for him to haue ſo done. There was vpon the further ſide of the riuer Euphrates a ſtrong towne called Clamaſſum, ſcituate a little aboue that place where the riuer Melas (much celebrated by the Grecian Poets) falleth into the riuer Euphrates; which towne for the commodious ſcituation therof, ſtanding vpon the firſt entrance of the paſſage into Armenia the great, the Perſians had furniſhed with a ſtrong garriſon: this towne Selymus thought good in any caſe to be maſter of, K by taking wherof, and of ſome other holds thereabout, he ſhould open a faire way for himſelfe into his enemies country. Hyſmael at the ſame time was gone with all his power againſt the Hyrcanians, Bactrians, and other ſauage people dwelling neere vnto the Caſpian ſea, then vp in arms againſt him: which wiſhed opportunity Selymus taking, and making a bridge ouer the riuer Euphrates, paſſed ouer with his army, came before the towne, and laid hard ſiege to the ſame before his enemies were all aware of his comming. The Turks at their firſt approch compaſſing the city round with their huge multitude of harquebuſiers and archers, braue the defendants from the wals; and ſtill without reſt or intermiſſion bringing on freſh men, as Selymus had before taken order, and others at the ſame time breaking open the gates, and in diuers places ſcaling the wals, enforced the defendants to forſake their ſtandings, and to retyre L themſelues into the market place, where although they were before ſore ſpent with labor and wounds, yet did they there with wonderfull courage a great while notably withſtand the multitude of their enemies ſtill ſwarming in, and in defence of their country, like reſolute men, fought it out vnto the laſt man.

Selymus hauing taken and ranſacked Clamaſſum, with two other ſmall caſtles which the defendants had for feare before abandoned, although he was with a deadly hatred and ambitious deſire prickt forward againſt Hyſmael, and thirſting after nothing more than the ſubuerſion of the Perſian kingdome: yet he thought it not good to enter further into Armenia, before he had out of thoſe forreſts and mountains chaſed the mountain king Aladeules, who but the yere before had moſt trecherouſly done him and his army ſo many injuries in his return from the M Perſian expedition. For Aladeules not without cauſe fearing his owne eſtate, as ſoone as he vnderſtood that Selymus had againe taken the field, and that he was come to the riuer Euphrates, and ſo to Clamaſſum, ſpeedily aſſembling his forces, had in ſhort time raiſed a great army for the defence of himſelfe and his Kingdome: purpoſing that if Selymus ſhould goe farther

A into Armenia, then after his wonted maner to looke on as a beholder, and by the euent of the war, to take occaſion of prey, and by ſhutting vp the paſſages of his country, at his pleaſure to rob and ſpoile the Turks in their returne. Wherefore Selymus leauing a garriſon at Ciamaſſum, retired backe againe ouer the riuer Euphrates vnto the mountaine Antitaurus, where it was reported that his enemies lay.

Aladeules his kingdome.

This Aladeules (as is aforeſaid) ruled ouer the rude and ſauage mountaine people, inhabiting the great mountaines Taurus and Antitaurus: which mountaines as it were linked together one to another, run from the mountains called Scodriſci, and the borders of Capadocia, with a perpetuall riſing, through many large prouinces and countries vnto the great mountain Amanus, and vttermoſt bounds of Cilicia. The people of this country were by nature fierce B and warlike, more famous for nothing than for the want of all things; who as men dwelling in a rough and bare country, could little or nothing profit by husbandry: yet in ſuch places as would beare any paſture, they had their breed of horſes and cammels, and did with all diligence vſe graſing; but the greateſt part of their liuing conſiſted in hunting and ſtealing. Theſe are ſuppoſed to haue had their beginning from the Galatians, Capadocians, Armenians, and the old inhabitants of Aſia the leſſe, which by long and continuall wars in former ages, and eſpecially by the lamentable irruption of the Scithians, were inforced to forſake their cities and dwellings, and for ſafegard of their liues to fly into thoſe rough and deſolat mountains. Theſe diſtreſſed people ſearching euery hill and euery dale, and following the opportunity of the riuers and fountains, but eſpecially the mildeſt temperature of the aire, and fauourable aſpect C of the Sun, built in many places poore country villages, and afterwards diuers faire townes; where in proceſſe of time they growing to better eſtate, there riſe vp ſome amongſt them, which ouerruling the reſt, ambitiouſly tooke vpon them the name of kings, deſiring to be had in regard, and to be feared of their neighbours, although they commanded but ouer rough woods and ragged rockes. Neere vnto the confines of Aladeules kingdome is the city Orpha, which many ſuppoſe to haue bin the famous city Edeſſa, becauſe that as yet there remaineth certaine monuments of Baldwin in Latine letters; who after his brother Godfrey was poſſeſſed of Ieruſalem, is reported to haue taken Edeſſa, and there reigned. Not far from thence is alſo the antient city Amyda, which at this day is called Caramida, joyning vpon Meſopotamia: which country lying betweene the two great riuers Euphrates and Tygris, is now called D Diarbecha. The chiefe city of Aladeules kingdome was Maras, ſo called as may be thought of the faire riuer Marſias running through it out of the mountaine Cælene, taking the name of Marſias, ouercome by Apollo, and made famous by the verſes of many learned Poets. But Aladeules, after he ſaw that Selymus with his army was entered into the frontiers of his kingdome, and drawing neere vnto him, brought downe all his horſemen, in number about fifteene thouſand, from the mountaines into a faire large valley; commanding his footmen whereof he had great ſtore, to keepe the mountaines on the right hand and the left: where hauing the high rocky mountains and ſtreit paſſages much for his aduantage, he determined in that place which he had long before choſen and fortified, to expect the comming of his enemies. Selymus conſidering the diſaduantage of the place, although he perceiued the victory could not without great E loſſe of his men be obtained; and before perſuaded that his enemies would neuer haue willingly beene drawne to battell: yet made no doubt to aduenture his fortune, preſuming vpon the multitude and ſtrength of his army. Wherefore he commanded Sinan Baſſa the Eunuch (whom he had made generall of the Europeian horſmen in ſtead of Chaſan Baſſa before ſlaine) with a ſquare battell to charge the enemy afront, foraſmuch as the place would not ſuffer him to range his battell in length, nor to vſe any wings: and he himſelfe with his Ianizaries and Aſian horſemen followed after in the rereward. Neither were the ſoldiers of Aladeules vnmindfull of themſelues and their king, who valiantly fought in the head of the battell, but hauing ſpent their arrowes, did couragiouſly receiue the furious aſſault of the Turks: and ſtanding cloſe to them, ſtill keeping the aduantage of the ground, did with ſuch force repulſe F them, that the old beaten ſoldiers of the Turks ſeemed little or nothing to preuaile either with their multitude or valor: for the Turks by reaſon of the ſtreightneſſe of the place, could not incloſe them on either ſide, and were beſide grieuouſly wounded by Aladeules footmen, who ſtanding vpon the ſides of the hils, with their darts and arrowes from aboue, ouerwhelmed the Turks in the valley. When Selymus ſaw that Aladeules, contrary to his expectation, Selymus aſſaileth Aladeules.

made ſtrong reſiſtance, and valiantly withſtood his forces; he drew certaine companies of harquebuſiers out of his owne ſquadrons, and ſent them to relieue their fellowes: and at the ſame inſtant commanded the Ianizaries for all the danger to mount the hill. Then the mountaine people terrified with the ſtrangeneſſe of the ſhot, and not able to abide the force thereof, by and by turned their backs, and by knowne waies fled into their ſure haunts, in the mountaines and woods faſt by, yet the greateſt ſlaughter fell amongſt theſe footmen, who when they ſaw the horſemen put to flight, and the Ianizeries comming vp the hils againſt them, did with much difficulty, by ſteepe and broken waies clamber vp the high mountaines: as oftentimes it falleth out, that both the ſtrength of mens legs and other their wonted forces faile them moſt, when ſurpriſed and ouercome with ſudden feare, they deſire to run and fly faſteſt. The Turks hauing them in chaſe, had the killing of them vntill the going downe of the Sun. The horſmen with the King, vpon their ſwift horſes, well acquainted with thoſe rocks and rough waies, with little loſſe retired themſelues into the further and ſtronger places of the mountains.

Aladeules flies into the mountaines.

Aladeules after this diſcomfiture, finding himſelfe in all things far inferiour to his enemy, thought it beſt by protracting the war, to weary him out: wherefore as the Turks purſued him, and burnt the poore country cottages ſtanding in their way, he ſtill fled from mountaine to mountaine, neuer offering battell or ſhewing himſelfe, but in places of great aduantage: and therefore Selymus fearing leſt in that barren rough and vnknown country, he ſhould either want victuall, or by ſome other means be intrapped, if he ſhould ſtill with the whole army follow after his ſtrong enemies; vpon the ſeuenth day left off to purſue him any further. And encamping himſelfe in the moſt conuenient place of that country, ſent Sinan Baſſa with his light horſmen, who carrying with them certaine daies victuals, ſhould ſtill at the heeles follow the enemy, and with all ſpeed & policy poſſible hunt after the king himſelfe. Selymus in the meane time curiouſly inquiring of the country captiues after the ſtrength of Aladeules, and what means he had to maintaine the war; found, that he had taken with him his beſt men both horſe and foot; and had commanded the country villages to forſake the villages, of purpoſe to leaue all deſolate to the enemy: and hauing ſurely intrenched himſelfe vpon a certaine ſtrong rocke (whither he had before conueied great ſtore of prouiſion) was reſolued not to giue battell vnto his enemies, vntill he had drawn them into the impregnable ſtreits of the mountains, where their hugy multitude ſhould little auaile them, but to increaſe their owne loſſe. Another cauſe there was alſo (as they ſaid) for that he feared to be betraied by Alis Beg his kinſman, Generall of his horſemen; who firſt fled in the late battell; whoſe vnfaithfulneſſe and hatred might ſeeme to proceed of a juſt ground, for that Aladeules had in former time trecherouſly murthered his father, vpon a jealous ſuſpition of his aſpiring vnto the kingdome.

Selymus vnderſtanding all this, cauſed the captiues to haue their yrons ſtruck off, and in ſtead of their gyues lading them with gifts and promiſes, ſent them to Alis Beg with ſecret letters and rewards, to perſuade him in ſo fit a time to reuenge his fathers death; which thing if he would perform by ſome notable exploit vpon Aladeules, he ſhould both purchaſe vnto himſelfe great credit with Selymus, and alſo the kingdome. Theſe homely meſſengers according as was giuen them in charge hauing imparted the matter to Sinan Baſſa, within a few daies had ſo wrought, that Alis beg (whom the deſire of a Kingdome together with Selymus his rewards prickt forward to ſeeke reuenge) was eaſily drawne to joyne hands with Selymus. And when he could no other way hurt Aladeules, who miſtruſting all things, warily looked vnto himſelfe, he found the means to go ouer to Sinan Baſſa, carrying after him a great part of Aladeules his beſt horſemen: by whoſe meanes the reſt alſo which remained being with rewards corrupted, one company after another came at laſt all ouer vnto the Baſſa. Aladeules circumuented with this vnexpected trechery, which neuer before thought it poſſible that his men ſhould all ſo ſuddenly haue forſaken him and reuolted to the Turks, was now glad to repoſe all his hope in ſecret flight. But Sinan Baſſa & Alis Beg, hardly purſuing him as he fled thorow the mountains, hiding himſelfe in rocks and the thick woods, at laſt drew him out of a caue, being betraied by the country peaſants. Aladeules being brought to Selymus, was within a few daies after put to death, & his head in great deriſion afterwards carried about thorow all Aſia the leſſe: and afterward by way of barbarous oſtentation, ſent by Selymus to the Senat of Venice, as a loathſome teſtimony of his victory. Aladeules thus dead, Selymus reduced all his kingdom to the form of a prouince, which he diuided into three parts, & after the maner of the Turkiſh gouernment, appointed to euery part a Sanzacke: yet ſo, that Alis Beg ſhould be chiefe ouer the reſt, with ſuch ſoueraignty, as that he wanted nothing of a King but the name only. And for the better gouernment of all things in that new gained kingdome, he left Sinan Baſſa there all the reſt of that Summer; with commandement, that after he had ſet all things in good order, he ſhould winter at Iconium; and he himſelfe with a ſmall traine returned to Conſtantinople, for he had heard that whileſt he was buſied in his wars againſt Hyſmael and Aladeules in Armenia, that the Hungarians had made diuers incurſions into Seruia, and ſpoiled that country. Wherfore for feare of loſing Samandria (which ſtanding neere to Danubius, for the conuenient ſcituation thereof is reputed the bulwarke of Seruia and Thracia) he ſent Ionuſes Baſſa, then Gouernour of Boſna, with eight thouſand horſemen, who paſſing the riuer Savus entered into Croatia as far as Catinum: and at the ſame time tranſported another army ouer Danubius into Hungary, to the intent that the Hungarians at one inſtant beſet with double danger, ſhould be inforced to feare their owne State; and withall to ſhew vnto the World, of what ſtrength and power the Othoman Emperours were. Deeming it to concerne much, both for the preſent, and the time to come, to the daunting of the Chriſtians; if he ſhould by his happy attempts make it knowne, that hee could at once eaſily and readily maintaine ſo many and ſo puiſſant armies, and wage ſo great warres in diuers parts of the World, and ſo far diſtant one from another.

Selymus inuadeth Hungary.

In the end of the yere, when he had thus with double inuaſion troubled the Hungarians, he ſpent the Winter following at Hadrianople and Conſtantinople, in making of greater preparation for war than euer he had before from the beginning of his reigne. For he was aduertiſed, that the great monarchs of the North his neighbors, namely, Maximilian the Emperour, Vladiſlaus King of Hungary, and Sigiſmundus King of Polonia, with the Princes of Germany, had combined themſelues together to make war vpon him. But after he had learned by his ſure intelligencers (whom he had with great charge ſent into all parts of Europe, diligently to obſerue what was done in the courts of theſe great princes) that all the great meetings of the Chriſtian Princes proued nothing but glorious words and ſumptuous banquets, he being rid of that vaine feare (God ſo appointing) turned himſelfe and all thoſe his wonderfull preparations againe toward the Eaſt, to the great quiet of Chriſtendome in generall.

Yet leſt happily in the abſence of himſelfe and of his armies, the Chriſtian Princes might take occaſion to inuade his dominions, he ſtrengthened the frontiers of his empire with moſt ſtrong garriſons: and left his ſonne Solyman (who afterwards proued the ſcourge of Chriſtendome) at Hadrianople with a ſtrong power, and Pyrrhus Baſſa his tutor (a man of great wiſedome and gouernment) at Conſtantinople. This great Baſſa was of Cilicia, a natiue Turke borne, which was a thing accounted ſtrange, foraſmuch as the great Baſſaes were alwaies choſen of the Chriſtian bloud. After that, he ſent Cherſeogles (whom of all others he moſt truſted) with his army into Bythinia, and made Zafferus an Eunuch Admiral of his nauy, which he had but a little before built, and with a wonderfull labour and charge rigged forth. Then ſtaying a few daies at Conſtantinople to ſee the young ſouldiers, but then choſen Ianizaries, he departed thence and went to his old army, lying with Sinan Baſſa at Iconium, purpoſing to haue againe inuaded the Perſian.

Selymus goeth to Iconium.

When he was come thither, he vnderſtood that Campſon Gaurus Sultan of Ægypt (with a great army leuied in Ægypt and Iudea) was come into Syria; giuing it out that he would aid the Perſian king his confederat, & with al hoſtility enter into Cilicia, if Selymus ſhould farther proceed to inuade Hyſmael the Sophi his friend & ally. Selymus perplexed with theſe news, and fearing that if he ſhould once paſſe ouer the riuer Euphrates, Campſon lying ſo neere in readineſſe, ſhould forthwith break in at his back into Aſia by the mountain Amanus, and ſo indanger that part of his dominion; ſtaied at Iconium, and ſent his embaſſadors with great preſents to Campſon to pacifie him if it might be. The chiefe men in this embaſſage were the Cadeleſcher, a man of great account amongſt the Turks, and of them exceedingly reuerenced for the opinion they had of his great knowledge in the Mahometan ſuperſtition, who afterward wrot the commentaries of this war; and Iachis a great captaine. The ſcope of whoſe embaſſage was, to intreat Campſon, that he would not hinder or diſturbe Selymus from making war vpon the Perſian King; who had ſo often and ſo forcibly inuaded his dominions in Aſia, and by bringing in a new forme of ſuperſtition, had corrupted and altered the moſt certain grounds of the Mahometan religion. And if they found him reſolutely ſet downe and not to be by any conditions G remoued, then with all poſsible diligence to learne his ſtrength and farther deſignes, ſo far as by any meanes they could, and with all ſpeed to make their returne.

The cauſes mouing Campſon to fall out with Selymus.

But Campſon now far ſpent with age, and liuing in the height of worldly bliſſe, although he knew it fitter for him at thoſe yeres to giue himſelfe to eaſe and quietneſſe, than to thruſt himſelfe into wars and other princes quarrels; yet thought this expedition to be for many cauſes both good and neceſſary. Firſt, he deadly hated the man for his inhumane crueltie, and therefore could neuer be perſuaded to renew the league with him which he had in former time made with his father Bajazet: beſides that, he deſired to abate and repreſſe his audacious inſolency, growne already by his proſperous ſucceſſe beyond the bounds of reaſon: for Selymus hauing taken Tauris, ouerthrowne the Perſians, and ſlaine Aladeules, began now to ſeeme terrible H to all the Princes that bordered vpon him; and there were many which ſaid he was another Alexander, who whileſt other Princes ſate ſtill as men aſleepe, did in the meane time plot in his victorious mind, the Monarchy of the whole World. But aboue all things, the feare of the loſing of Syria, and conſequently the loſſe of all his kingdome (the quickeſt motiue for ſtirring vp of the ſuſpitious minds of the greateſt Princes) moſt inforced Campſon to take in hand this war: for as much as the goodly kingdomes of Ægypt, Iudea, and Syria, oppreſſed with the intollerable gouernment of the proud Mamalukes, and therefore leſſe faithfull to the Ægyptian kings, were in danger to reuolt to the Turks, if the Perſians ſhould by any miſchance or fortune of war be of the Turks vanquiſhed. For which cauſe Campſon in the beginning I of this war, ſolicited by the Perſian Embaſſadors, had made a firme league and confederation with Hyſmael; and alſo moued with the miſery of the wofull yong Prince Aladin the ſon of Achomates, was in mind perſuaded, that the cruel Turkiſh tyrant might by his and the Perſian kings forces, eaſily be thruſt out of his empire in Aſia and Europe. For Aladin, who after the death of Achomates his father, fled to Campſon the Sultan of Ægypt (as is before declared) had liued three yeres as a forlorne and diſtreſſed Prince in the Ægyptians court, and by all means he could deuiſe incited the Mamalukes to reuenge the injuries and cruelty of his vncle Selymus. The eldeſt ſon alſo of the late King Aladeules, a goodly yong Prince, hauing at once loſt his father, his kingdome, and whatſoeuer he had elſe, was in good time fled to the Ægyptian king, and had ſo filled the minds of all men with the indignation and deteſtation of Selymus his exceeding cruelty, that the Princes of the Mamalukes of their owne accord came to K Campſon, humbly beſeeching him to take vpon him ſo juſt a war: and if by reaſon of his great yeres he ſhould thinke himſelfe vnable to indure the trauell thereof, it would then pleaſe him yet to giue them leaue of themſelues to take the matter in hand, for the repreſsing of the inſolency of that great and wicked tyrant.

The order of the Mamalukes.

Theſe Mamalukes far excelled the Turks, not onely in ſtrength of body, ſkilfull riding, and goodly armor, but alſo in courage and wealth. Beſide that, they had not forgotten with what ſmall power they had vnder the leading of Caitbeius their great Sultan, ouerthrown the Turks great armies in Cilicia, firſt at Adena, and afterward at Tarſus, where they tooke priſoners, Meſites Palæologus the great Baſſa, and Cherſeogles, Bajazet his ſon in law: by which victory they grew into ſuch a proud and vaine conceit of themſelues, as if they had bin the onely ſouldiers L of the World, able of themſelues to vanquiſh and ouercome whomſoeuer they ſhould ſet vpon. Theſe ſo valiant ſoldiers, were for moſt part of the poore people called in antient time Getæ, Zinchi, and Baſtarnæ, borne neere vnto the Euxine ſea and the fens of Mœotis, eſpecially on that ſide where the riuer Corax falleth into the Euxine ſea: which Country is of later time called Circaſſia, of the people called Cercitæ neere vnto Cholchis. Theſe miſerable and wretched people, the Valachians, Podolians, Polonians, Roxolanes and Tartars, dwelling by Taurica (pulled from their mothers breaſts, or by other violent meanes ſurpriſed) were ſold to Merchants; who culling out the beſt for ſtrength of body, or aptneſſe of wit, conueied them by ſea to Alexandria, from whence they were continually ſent to the great Sultan of Ægypt: & by his appointment were at Caire (after the old maner of that people) deliuered to M Maſters of fence and ſuch other teachers, who carefully inſtructed them, being ſhut vp in their ſchooles, in all manner of feats of actiuity: where after they were become able to bend a ſtrong bow, and taught cunningly to ſhoot, leape, run, vault, ride, and ſkilfully to vſe all manner of weapons, they were then taken into pay, and receiued into the number of the Kings horſe-

horſemen or Mamalukes: and ſuch of them as proued cowardly or vnapt, were made ſlaues vnto the reſt. So that they ſeeing all honor, credit, and preferment, laied vp in martiall proweſſe, did with all diligence and courage imploy themſelues to military affaires, and therin ſo well profited, that oftentimes they which at the firſt were but bare and baſe ſlaues, of the meaneſt of the Mamalukes, by many degrees of ſeruice riſe at length to the higheſt degrees of honour. All theſe Mamalukes were the children of Chriſtian parents, from the time of their captiuity inſtructed in the Mahometan ſuperſtition: for no man borne of a Mahometan father, or of a Iew, could be admitted into the number of the Mamaluke horſemen: which was ſo ſtreitly obſerued, that the honor of a Mamaluke horſeman neuer deſcended vnto the ſons of the Mamalukes, yet might they by law inherit their fathers lands, poſſeſſions, and goods: by which reaſon the ſonnes of the Sultans themſelues neuer ſucceeded their fathers in the kingdome. Hereby alſo it came to paſſe, that many Chriſtians of looſe life, or condemned for their notorious offences, flying thither, and abiuring the Chriſtian religion, and ſuffering themſelues to be circumciſed, being men meet for the wars, grew by degrees to great honor: as did Tangaribardinus the ſonne of a Spaniſh mariner, who by his forwardneſſe and induſtry grew into ſuch credit and authority with Campſon the great Sultan, that almoſt all things were done by his aduice and counſell, and was diuers times by him emploied in moſt honorable ſeruice, being ſent Embaſſador both to Bajazet the Turkiſh Emperor, and to the State of Venice, about matters of great importance. Yet his impiety eſcaped not the hand of God, for at length by the enuy of the court he was brought into diſgrace, thruſt out of his place, and caſt into priſon, where he, loaded with cold yron, moſt miſerably died. Neither was it to be maruelled if the Mamalukes were growne to that exceſſe of wealth, foraſmuch as the Ægyptians and Syrians being miſerably by them oppreſſed, were not ſuffered to haue the vſe either of horſe or armor, neither admitted to any matters of counſell; but being impoueriſhed and brought low with heauy impoſitions and daily iniuries of the Mamalukes, gaue themſelues wholly to the trade of merchandiſe, husbandry, and other mechanicall occupations: ouer whom the Mamalukes had power and command, as imperious maſters ouer their ſeruants, and would with greater inſolency than is to be beleeued abuſe the country people, beating and ſpoiling them at their pleaſure; and not ſo contented, rauiſhing their wiues and daughters without redreſſe. The Ægyptians (a people in antient time much renowned for their valour and proweſſe) were by theſe maſterfull ſlaues kept in this miſerable thraldome and ſlauery about the ſpace of three hundred yeres. For after the declination of the Romane Empire, that rich country falling into the gouernment of the Conſtantinopolitan Emperors, the Ægyptians ſoone weary of the proud and auaritious ſoueraignty of the Greekes, called in the Saraſins, by whoſe helpe they expulſed the Greekes, and after choſe the Generall of the Saraſins for their King, after whoſe name the Ægyptian Kings were of long time called Caliphes, as they had of antient time bin called by the names of Pharo and Ptolemey.

The laſt of theſe Caliphes reigned at ſuch time as the Chriſtians vnder the leading of Godfrey and Bohemund, paſſing as conquerors through Aſia and Syria, erected the kingdome of Ieruſalem. He being inuaded by Almericus ſixt King of Ieruſalem, and finding himſelfe too weake, praied aid of the Sultan of Syria, who ſent him Sarraco, a valiant captaine, with a ſtrong power to aid him; but Sarraco no leſſe vnfaithfull than couragious, trecherouſly ſlew the Caliph, in whoſe aid he came, and tooke vpon himſelfe the kingdome. After Sarraco ſucceeded Saladine his brothers ſon, who vtterly extinguiſhed the name and authority of the Caliphes in Ægypt, whom Sarraco had yet left as high Prieſts. This Saladine oftentimes vanquiſhed the Chriſtian armies in Syria and Iudea, and at length quite ouerthrew the kingdome of Ieruſalem, as is in the former part of this Hiſtory to be ſeen. Saladine dying, left the kingdome of Ægypt to his brother, whoſe poſterity ſucceſſiuely reigned of long time there, vntill the time of Melechſala. This Melechſala (laſt of the free borne Kings, and of the poſterity of Saladine) had great and mortall wars with the Chriſtians, wherein hauing loſt moſt of his beſt ſouldiers, and repoſing no great confidence in the Ægyptians, thought good to ſtrengthen himſelfe with a new kinde of ſouldiers, meere ſlaues bought for mony. For at that time the Tartars breaking into Armenia and Cappadocia, and ouerrunning the people called Comani ioyning vpon Cappadocia, made generall ſpoile of that people, as of priſoners taken by law of armes. Of this baſe people, Melechſala for a little mony bought a great multitude, which he tranſported into Ægypt,and furniſhed them with armes: by whoſe proweſſe he not only defended the frontiers of his kingdome, but alſo beſieged Lewis the French King in his trenches not farre from Camiata,called in antient time Heliopolis, or Peluſium,and ſhortly after in plaine battell tooke him priſoner,as is long before declared. But in the pride of this victory, Melechſala was by the conſpiracy of theſe his new ſoldiers ſlaine: in whoſe place they ſet vp one Turqueminius, a deſperat fellow of their owne company, honouring him with the title of the great Sultan of Ægypt. Turqueminius of a baſe ſlaue now become a great Monarch (after the maner of men) forgetting his old companions which had ſo highly promoted him, and hauing them in great diſdaine, was by one of them (called Clotho) ſuddenly ſlaine; for which fact he was by thoſe baſe ſoldiers, his companions, choſen Sultan in his place: who for the ſhort time of his reigne did much for the confirming of that ſeruile Monarchy: yet was he at length ſlaine alſo by Bandocader, ſometimes one of his fellow ſeruants, who alſo ſucceeded him in the kingdome. After him in long order ſucceeded many valiant men of the ſame ſeruile ſtate and condition,who for breuity I wittingly paſſe ouer. Amongſt the reſt Caytbeius (of whom we haue before ſpoken in the life of Bajazet) was for wealth and martiall proweſſe moſt famous; who according to the manner of his predeceſſors, did with greater bounty and care maintaine that ſeruile gouernment,than any of them who had before him reigned in Ægypt: and was for his notable gouernment and noble acts juſtly accounted amongſt the greateſt Princes of that age. After whoſe death great troubles aroſe in that ſeruile Monarchy about the ſucceſſion. Wherby the Mamalukes drawne into diuers factions,ſome ſeeking to prefer one,and ſome another, had in foure yeres ſpace with ciuile wars ſore weakned their eſtate, and ſlaine diuers of their greateſt Princes which had aſpired vnto that kingdome. For appeaſing of which miſchiefes, tending to the vtter ruine of their kingdome, the great courtiers and chiefe men amongſt the Mamalukes with one conſent offered the kingdome to Campſon Gaurus, or as the Turks call him, Canſaues Gauris, of whom we now ſpeake;a man of great integrity and courage, and altogether free from ambition. He, terrified with the dreadfull example of ſo many Kings whom he had ſeene in ſhort time miſerably ſlaine by the ambitious aſpiring of other proud competitors; when he was ſore againſt his will hoiſt vp vpon the ſhoulders of the nobility and chiefe ſouldiers, and ſo carried into the court, as their manner was, began earneſtly to refuſe the kingdome, and to withſtand their choice, excuſing himſelfe as vnfit for ſo high a place; and with teares ſtanding in his eies,beſought the other great lords his friends,that they would forbeare to thruſt him (well contented with his priuate life) into that glorious place ſubject to ſo many dangers;and the rather,for that he neither had mony to giue bountifully to the ſoldiers of the court, as other the Ægyptian Sultans had accuſtomed; neither held that ſufficiency and authority as was requiſite for repreſſing of ſuch violent and ſeditious tumults as were too riſe in that troubleſome time and confuſion of all things.

The moderate and happy gouernment of Campſon.

The nobility on the other ſide perſuaded him, That he would not vpon a fooliſh obſtinacy or vaine modeſty refuſe the offer of his preſent good fortune, but couragiouſly to take vpon him the gouernment of the ſtate,now ſore ſhaken with ciuile diſcord,together with the regall dignity,which was with the generall good liking of all men ſo frankely offered vnto him. At laſt they all by ſolemne oath promiſed vnto him,That they would with all their power, policy,and wealth,maintaine and defend the majeſty of his ſtate; and that the men of war ſhould not demand their wonted largeſſe, before the ſame might by his receiuers and treaſurers be raiſed of his cuſtomes and other reuenewes of the crowne. By which perſuaſions Campſon incouraged,ſuffered himſelfe to be ſaluted Sultan,and ſo tooke vpon him the gouernment. Afterwards, when he had giuen vnto the men of war ten millions of duckats, by the name of a largeſſe, and by his moderat gouernment had cauſed men generally to haue his proweſſe and wiſedome in admiration, he did with ſuch policy and dexterity reforme the ſhaken ſtate of that kingdome, before rent in ſunder by ciuile wars, taking away by poyſon and other ſecret deuices, ſome few, the chiefe authors of ſedition, that for the ſpace of ſixteene yeares neither tumult nor noiſe of war was at any time heard of in all Syria or Ægypt: worthy vndoubtedly the name of a moſt excellent and fortunate Prince, if when he had by ſingular wiſedome and policy eſtabliſhed the generall peace and proſperity of his kingdome, he could haue there contented himſelfe to haue liued in quiet, and in the winding vp of his life not raſhly haue thruſt himſelfe into the dangerous quarrels of other Princes.

A The Cadeleſcher and Iachis (Selymus his Embaſſadours) departing from Iconium, came in few daies to Campſon the great Sultan, who then lay encamped neere vnto the riuer Orantes, at this day called Farfar. Theſe Embaſſadors entertained by Campſon with greater bounty than courteſie, and ſhortly after their comming hauing audience in his pauilion, did with moſt temperat and calme ſpeech deliuer their Embaſſage. To whom Campſon anſwered, That it was the antient cuſtome of the Ægyptian Sultans (foraſmuch as they held the chiefe place in their religion) with all care and induſtry to keepe the other Mahometan Kings and people in peace and concord amongſt themſelues; whereof he for his part had bin alwaies moſt deſirous: and was for no other purpoſe come with his army into his prouince of Syria, than to perſuade Selymus to peace. Who if he would needs wilfully proceed in his intended wars againſt Hyſmael B the Perſian king, his friend and confederat, he would then do what ſhould ſtand with his honour and place, and not longer ſuffer all to go to wracke, for the vaine pleaſure and fury of one inſolent and ambitious man. He ſaid alſo, That he had of long time before ſeene into Selymus his inſatiable, fierce, and troubleſome diſpoſition; who hauing moſt vnnaturally procured the death of his good father the old Emperor Bajazet, and ſlaine his brethren, Princes of great valour, ſeuen of his nephewes, princes of no ſmall hope; with many other of his beſt friends and faithfull counſellors; could make no end of his ambitious tyranny. Wherefore they ſhould tell Selymus, that one and all the conditions of peace ſhould be, if he would from thenceforth deſiſt from inuading of Hyſmael, and reſtore to Aladeules his ſon, his fathers kingdome, which had of long been vnder the defence and protection of the Ægyptian Sultans, as of right and C reaſon he ought to do: he ſhould in ſo doing, beſide his fauour and friendſhip which might greatly ſtand him in ſtead, reape greater fame and glory by an aſſured and honourable peace, than by doubtfull and dangerous war.

The Embaſſadours, although they knew right well that Selymus would not for any threats giue ouer his enterpriſe or lay downe armes, yet to the intent they might the ſooner be diſpatched, and ſo in time aduertiſe Selymus of the Sultans ſudden comming, ſeemed wonderfully to like of his motion for peace, and to giue good hope by their reaſonable perſuaſions to induce Selymus to like thereof: foraſmuch as they were of his ſecret counſell, and men able to do much with him; whereby they truſted (as they would haue had the Sultan to beleeue) it would eaſily be brought to paſſe, that thoſe ſparks might be quenched, which all things ſtanding D vpright had not as yet kindled the fire of war. So they being by Campſon rewarded, and hauing leaue to depart, trauelling day and night, returned to Selymus, who was then come to Cæſarea.

Campſon alſo remouing from Orantes, came into Comagena vnto the famous city of Aleppo, which city is probably ſuppoſed to haue bin built of the ruines of the antient city of Hierapolis, by Alepius the Emperor Iulianus his lieutenant; who in that prouince did many notable matters, and called that new-built city after his owne name. It is ſcituate neere vnto the riuer Singa, which riſing out of the mountaine Pierius, with many turnings and windings runneth through Comagena, and being but a ſmall riuer, falleth at length into the riuer Euphrates. This city Hyalon king of the Tartars tooke and burnt, at ſuch time as the Chriſtian Princes of E the Weſt made warre with the Ægyptian Kings, for the kingdomes of Syria and Ieruſalem. Which calamity notwithſtanding, it was againe repeopled; and is at this day a famous city, for the commodious ſcituation thereof much frequented with Merchants from the furtheſt parts of the World. It is ſcarce fiue daies journy from Tripolis and Berytus, the great ports of Syria, and is alſo neere vnto the Turks and Perſians: ſo that the riches of the Eaſt are thither commodiouſly conueied out of Turkie, ouer the mountaine Amanus which parteth Cilicia from Syria: and ſo likewiſe out of Perſia and Meſopotamia ouer the riuer Euphrates, where the city Byrrha of late time bounded the Kingdome of the Ægyptian Sultans, from the Perſians.

Selymus vnderſtanding by his Embaſſadors (who had diligently noted all things in the Sultans F campe) both of the comming, and of the number of his enemies; and alſo informed of the Sultans proud anſwer, who had ſo peremptorily preſcribed to him ſuch vnreaſonable conditions as pleaſed himſelfe: thought good to alter his purpoſe, and now to conuert his forces another way than he had before determined. For that to enter farther into Armenia, leauing ſo puiſſant an enemy as Campſon at his backe, ſeemed a thing too ful of danger: and to giue ouer

the enterpriſe he had with ſo great care and charge vndertaken, at the appointment and pleaſure G of another man, ſtood neither with his honor or ſtate. Wherefore in a matter ſo doubtfull, he reſolued vpon a notable neceſſary point, well fitting the greatneſſe of his mind. He made ſhew as if he would haue gone directly againſt the Perſian, as he had before determined; and that the more certaine report of this his purpoſe might be carried to Campſon, he ſent before part of his army with his carriages to the city Suaſſia, in old time called Sebaſta, it ſtandeth in the frontiers of the Perſian kingdome, where the great riuer Euphrates pent vp with the rockes of the mountaine Taurus, breaketh againe violently forth into Meſopotamia: but turning himſelfe vpon the right hand, purpoſed to paſſe the mountaine Taurus, and breaking ſuddenly into Comagena, to come vpon the Sultan before he were well aware of his comming. H Wherefore calling vnto him his truſty Ianizaries, with the other ſouldiers of the court, he openly with cheerefull countenance declared vnto them what he had reſolued to do, with the reaſons of the alteration of his former determination: perſuading them, that the victory would eaſily be atchieued, if they as couragious ſouldiers would with all celerity (before the Mamalukes could perceiue they were returned) get vp to the top of the mountaines, and recouer thoſe difficult paſſages; not fearing the vaine names and titles of the Mamalukes. For why (ſaid he) the ſtrength of thoſe horſemen is long ſince decaied and gone: the old Mamalukes, who in the time of Caitbeius were of ſome fame and reputation, are all dead. You ſhall in battell meet but with a ſort of gallant horſe-breakers rather then ſouldiers, which can cunningly manage their horſes in ſport, to the pleaſure of the beholders, but know not how to encounter the enemy, or to indure to be wounded: who as carpet Knights effeminat with long peace, and corrupted with exceſſe and I delicacy of their great Cities, neuer ſaw their foes intrenched, or armed enemies, neither haue heard the ſound of a trumpet, but at plaies or ſhewes. Wherefore you are to make but ſmall account of them, being furniſhed with no ſtore of ordnance or ſtrength of footmen. But as the reuerend interpreters of our ſacred Lawes and Religion, hauing orderly performed all their obſeruances, do diuine vnto vs all happineſſe: ſo you as men full of hope, ſet forward cheerefully vnto moſt aſſured victory ouer your proud enemies. For God no doubt fauoureth the quarrell of men juſtly prouoked, and offereth meanes of victory to ſuch as take vp juſt and neceſſary armes. Yet to ouercome the enemy, and to enjoy victory indeed, wholly conſiſteth in the courage and valour of them which deeme nothing better or more honourable, than to ſpend their liues for the honour of their Prince and Country. Here the Ianizaries ſhaking their weapons, forthwith cried out with cheerefull voice, That he ſhould lead and conduct them whitherſoeuer K he would: ſaying, That they were ready as couragious men, to ouercome all the difficulties of thoſe hard paſſages, and patiently to endure all the labors and dangers incident to that warre.

Selymus, by the mountaine people hauing found out the eaſieſt paſſages, reſolued to paſſe ouer the mountaine with his army in three places: and ſo appointing three great companies of the common ſouldiers and country people, for the opening of the ſtreit paſſages; he commanded the rough and vneuen waies to be made plaine and ſmooth, for the tranſporting of his ordnance, and the broken paſſages to be caſt euen, that ſo his baggage and carriages might the better paſſe: and the more to encourage his ſouldiers to take paines, he promiſed preſent reward to all ſuch as in tranſporting of his ordnance, ſhould take any extraordinary paines. L Whereby it came to paſſe, that the ſame being of the ſmaller ſort, bearing a bullet of no great height, was in ſhort time by the cheerefull labour of his ſoldiers, drawne ouer thoſe great hils and dales: ſo that in fiue daies all his army with his baggage and carriages were got ouer the mountain Taurus, and come into the plaines of Comagena. For that mountaine where it taketh the name of Amanus, which is almoſt in the middle where the riuer Euphrates parteth the mountaine Taurus, and the Bay Iſſicus, is neither exceeding high, or yet impaſſible: for as it commeth neerer the ſea, it is not ſo rough as elſewhere, but is in many places inhabited and tilled by the mountaine Cilicians, a fierce kind of people accuſtomed to labor and toile, who are now called Caramanians, which is to ſay, the inhabitants of the blacke mountaines; for that the burnt rocks of the mountaine ſeeme a far off to be blacke. M

Alis Beg which betraied Aladeules, whom Selymus had a little before ſent for, as ſoone as the army was come downe into the frontiers of the enemies country, with a ſtrong power of his light horſmen, ſpeedily ouerran all that country which is at the foot of Amanus and Taurus: therby to vnderſtand of the country people and ſuch as they could take priſoners, where Campſon

A ſon lay with his army; and alſo by keeping the paſſages to doe what might poſſibly be done, that Selymus his comming might not be knowne to the enemy.

But Campſon, who with no leſſe vanity than pride had fondly flattered himſelfe, onely by the authority and greatneſſe of his name to haue terrified Selymus, and ouerruled him at his pleaſure; could not be perſuaded that he was come ouer the mountaine Amanus, vntill certain newes was brought him, that he was encamped with a moſt puiſſant army within two daies march of him. With which vnexpected newes being ſore troubled, and in the midſt of that danger to ſeeke counſell, as one which began rightly to conſider of his owne ſtrength, and the ſtrength of his enemy; began then to doubt what were beſt for him to do, & in great perplexity ſometime hoped well, and by and by was as a man halfe diſcouraged and diſmaied. And B now become exceeding carefull both of his honor and himſelfe, he began to doubt whether it were better for him to giue place to ſo great a danger, and ſhunning battell to retire with his army into places of more ſafety; or elſe couragiouſly to abide the comming of his enemies, and to hazard the fortune of a battell, although it were vpon great diſaduantage: foraſmuch as he reputed it far more honourable, after the example of his predeceſſors from whom he had receiued that great kingdome (both gotten and kept by martiall proweſſe) to die with honor in the field, than by ſhamefull and vnwonted flight, either to blemiſh their military glory continued aboue the ſpace of 300 yeres, or for loue of a ſmall remainder of life, being now 77 yeres old, to ſeeme willing to reſerue vnto obloquie and ſhame his laſt daies, depriued of all honour and reputation.

C There were amongſt his chiefetains many, which preferred wholeſome counſell before that which was in ſhew more glorious: but aboue all others, one Iamburd ſyrnamed Gazelles (ſometimes the follower of great Caitbeius) a valiant man of great honor, for his long experience in martiall affaires, and at that time Gouernor of Apamia. He, as he was of opinion, That to fight with the Turks army, conſiſting for moſt part of expect ſoldiers, with ſo ſmall a power, were a thing of deſperat danger; ſo was he alſo, that it were good ſpeedily to retire, and to chuſe the city of Damaſco, as the fitteſt place for thoſe wars: foraſmuch as the Turks army could make no haſte after them, by reaſon of their footmen and carriages, ſo that they might at eaſe and with ſafety retyre; and there calling together all the Mamalukes which were in garriſon in Iudea and Ægypt, and entertaining the Arabians their neighbors, to protract the war vntill D Winter, when as they might eaſily diſtreſſe the enemy for want of victuall. And that it was not to be feared, that Aleppo, if it were furniſhed but with a reaſonable garriſon, could by and by be taken of the enemy, who had but ſmall field pieces not fit for battery. Beſide that, in ſhort time aid would come from the Perſians out of Meſopotamia; yea, and Hyſmael himſelfe hearing of the Turks expedition into Syria, was like enough to break into Aſia the leſſe: neither would the Chriſtians refuſe to furniſh them with great artillery from the Iſlands of the Rhodes and Cyprus, againſt that common enemy, if they were thereto in time requeſted. All which things being laid together, he ſaid, the Sultan might afterward vpon euen hand go into the field, if he ſhould thinke it ſo much to concerne his honor, to giue his enemies battell. But foraſmuch as the greateſt wars, which at the firſt had moſt violent and furious motions, E by the politicke enemies delay, did moſt commonly in time grow calme, he ſhould not therefore make too much haſt to aduenture the fortune of battell: for that the errors of war, which many times chanced through the ouerſight or raſhneſſe of the chiefetaines, might well of good men be lamented and deteſted, but hardly or neuer be recouered or amended.

The wholeſome counſell of Gazelles for protracting the war.

Gazelles his graue and conſiderat ſpeech had much moued both the Sultan and others: yet the cheerfulneſſe of the ſoldiers, and fooliſh hardineſſe of the Mamalukes did ſo fill Campſons eares, that he could not hearken to ſo good and wholeſome counſell: for as ſoone as they heard certainly of the comming of the Turks, they began to leape and dance, and to rejoyce among themſelues, that the time was come wherin they might make proofe of their valor, and win to themſelues honor. For now (as they ſaid) was come that time they had long wiſht for, wherein F they would by notable ſlaughter of their enemies, aduance the honor and majeſty of Campſon their Sultan far aboue the fame of Caitbeius: and ſome euen of the chiefe men about Campſon, vpon flattery and vaine oſtentation, alledging how honorably and with what ſmall labour they had before ouerthrown the Turks great army at Taurus; perſuading him that the victory would eaſily and without any great danger be gotten. But eſpecially Cayerbeius Gouernor of Aleppo and of the prouince of Comagena (who after his war ended, was in reward of his G ſoule treaſon, by Selymus vnworthily preferred to the greateſt honours of Ægypt) extolling with glorious words the faithfulneſſe, courage, and valour of the Mamalukes, and extenuating the power and ſtrength of the enemy, forced his wits to the vttermoſt to ouerthrow the wholeſome counſell of Gezelles.

A ſecret grudge between Campſon and Cayerbeius Gouernor of Comagena.

For this Cayerbeius for all his faire face bare a grudge in heart againſt Campſon, becauſe he had ſome few yeres before poiſoned his brother, whom he had in jealouſie, being a man next to himſelf of greateſt power, wealth, and authority amongſt the Mamalukes, and withall of an aſpiring mind. Whereupon Cayerbeius afterwards thinking it good to looke to himſelfe, and doubting the like practiſe to be intended againſt himſelf, being, as the maſter of that kingdom was, ſummoned to a parliament at Caire, feigned himſelfe ſicke, and would not come: wherewith H Campſon was not a little offended, yet for a time he thought it beſt to diſſemble the matter, & to wait ſome fitter opportunity for the taking away of that proud man, ſo forgetful of his duty, and bearing himſelfe againſt his ſoueraigne, as if he had bin an abſolute King in his own prouince: this he thought might moſt couertly be brought to paſſe, if he ſhould vpon the occaſion of the preſent war (as it then fell out) or els vnder the color of going in perſon himſelfe to the riuer Euphrates, come to Aleppo: for it was the maner of the antient Egyptian Sultans, not to account themſelues worthy of the name of a Sultan or great Generall, before they had, as Caytbeius had of late done, encamped their army vpon the ſide of the riuer Euphrates at the city Byrrha (which ſtanding vpon the banke of the riuer, retaineth at this day both the antient name and fame) and there with ſolemne pompe had in the ſight of the army forced their horſes I into the riuer to drinke: giuing to vnderſtand by that ceremony, the greatneſſe of their empire, and that they were ready by force of armes to proue, that all thoſe countries were theirs which lay alongſt the riuer Euphrates, from the mountain Taurus, vnto the deſarts of Arabia.
But the conſideration of this war letted that he did not at his firſt comming oppreſſe him, becauſe he deemed it to ſtand beſt with his preſent affaires: and not yet knowing the purpoſe of Selymus, to expect the motions of the Turks and Perſians, and to defer the execution of his wrath againſt Cayerbeius, vntill the end of the war, for feare leſt the other Mamalukes diſmaied with the hainouſneſſe of the ſudden fact, ſhould either reuolt from him, or els raiſe ſome mutiny and rebellion in that populous city. For Cayerbeius had by his courteſie and bounty many ſtrong companies in the army faſt bound vnto him: and beſide that, was of greateſt credit and K authority with them of Aleppo, hauing in his keeping a ſtrong citadell, built vpon the riſing of an hill in the midſt of the city, which he kept with a ſtrong and ſure garriſon.

But whiles Campſon doth thus ſlowly and conſiderately purpoſe his deſtruction, many of the Sultans ſecret friends, to him more officious than faithfull, ſecretly aduiſed Cayerbeius to beware of the Sultan, and by ſome good means in time to prouide for his own ſafety. He vnderſtanding of the danger, and thinking all delay deadly, ſent ſecret meſſengers vnto Selymus, diſcouering vnto him the cauſe of his griefe, and promiſing as occaſion ſhould ſerue to come ouer vnto him, and to deliuer into his power the caſtle with the heart of the citiſens, and all the ſtrength of his owne horſmen; thereby to prouide for his owne ſafety, to reuenge his brothers death, and to further his victory againſt Campſon: and for performance of promiſes on L both ſides, required ſecret hoſtages to be giuen. By the ſame meſſengers he alſo aduertiſed him, what ſtrength the Sultan was of, perſuading him in any caſe to make haſt to giue him battell before he had gathered any greater power. Selymus nothing doubted to condiſcend to all that the traitor had requeſted, promiſing of himſelfe far greater things than euer he had required: aſſuring himſelfe of the victory, if his enemie ſhould loſe ſo much of his ſtrength by the reuolt of ſo great a commander.

Campſon enforced by the generall conſent of his ſouldiers, and the violence of his ineuitable deſtiny, then at hand, rejecting the good and faithfull counſell of Gezelles, at ſuch time as Selymus was reported to be at hand; reſolued according to the counſell of the traitor Cayerbeius, to dare him battell. He lay conueniently incamped vpon the riuer Singa, almoſt ten miles M from the city, in ſuch ſort as that his ſoldiers might vſe the benefit of the riuer, and remoued from the houſes and pleaſures of the city, might yet neuertheleſſe be eaſily relieued with the ſtore and plenty thereof.

The Mamalukes notable ſouldiers.

The Mamalukes were ſcarce in number twelue thouſand, but euery one of them, according

A as he was of greater place or calling, ſo had he attending vpon him mo ſeruants, wel furniſhed with horſe and armor. A goodly and inuincible army, if the battel might haue bin tried by true valor. The Mamalukes wearing their beards long and rough, with graue and ſtern countenance, hauing ſtrong and able bodies, vſed ſuch cunning in all their fights and battels, that after they had giuen the firſt charge with their lances, they would by and by with wonderfull actiuitie vſe their bows and arrows, caſting their targets behind them; and forthwith the horſmans mace or crooked ſcimitar, as the maner of the battel and place required. Their horſes were ſtrong and couragious, in making and ſwiftnes much like vnto the Spaniſh Genets; and that which is of many hardly beleeued, ſo docible, that at certain ſignes or ſpeeches of the rider, they would with their teeth reach him vp from the ground, a lance, an arrow, or ſuch like B thing; and as if they had known the enemy, run vpon him with open mouth, and laſh at him with their heels, and had by nature and cuſtom learned, not to be afraid of any thing. Theſe couragious horſes were commonly furniſhed with ſiluer bridles, gilt trappings, rich ſaddles, their necks and breſts armed with plates of iron. The horſman himſelf was commonly content with a coat of male, or a breſt-plate of iron: the chief and wealthieſt of them vſed head-pieces; the reſt a linnen couering of the head, curiouſly folded into many wreaths, wherewith they thought themſelues ſafe enough againſt any handy ſtroke. The common ſouldiers vſed thrumbd caps, but ſo thick that no ſword could pierce them.

Campſon of all his army made four battels: the firſt was committed to Cayerbeius, becauſe it was in his own prouince where the battell was to be fought: the ſecond was led by Sybeius, C who for his wonderful actiuity was of them called Baluano, which in their language ſignifieth a tumbler, or one that ſheweth feats of actiuity: he was gouernour of Damaſco, a man of ſingular faith and valor. Theſe two great Commanders were appointed at once to charge both the wings of the Turks army. After them followed Gazelles with the third battell, to ſecond either the one or the other of the two formoſt, as need ſhould require. Campſon himſelf led the fourth, all gliſtring in gilt armor, behind the reſt almoſt a mile and a half. The laſt was left for defence of the camp.

The order of Campſon his battell.

But Selymus according to his wonted maner ſo ordered his battel, that his Aſian horſemen were in the right wing, his Europeian horſmen in the left, his Ianizaries and Artillerie in the main battel, before whom in the middle between the two wings hee placed his moſt valiant D and gallant Pentioners; amongſt whom (contrary to his wonted cuſtome) he choſe to ſerue that day.

Cayerbeius ſo ſoon as he was come neer the enemy, in token of his braue courage gaue a hot charge vpon the Europeian horſmen; and by and by as if hee would haue compaſſed in that wing, wheeled a great way about behind them, where chancing vpon a great company of ſcullians, drudges, and other baſe people that followed the camp, with an infinit number of cammels and cariages, he made there a great ſtir, with little ſlaughter, that as a valiant & cunning traitor, he might in the ſelf ſame time ſatisfie the expectation of his valor and of his treaſon together. In the other wing, the gouernor of Damaſco, to enter vpon the open ſide of the enemy, forbearing to charge him afront, and turning about his troupes on the left hand, entered E ouerthwart their ranks, where the Mamalukes fought with ſuch fury, that hauing made great ſlaughter of the Aſian horſmen, they brake in amongſt them as if it had bin a raging floud, bearing down all before them, vntil they came to the enſignes in the midſt of the wing. Neither could Muſtapha the Beglerbeg (who was by birth an Hungarian, and Selymus his brother in law) neither the Imbrahor Baſſa (or maſter of the houſe) though they did what they might to withſtand him, after the firſt were ouerthrown, ſtay the reſt, but that they would needs turn their backs and fly. So Sybeius as a valiant conqueror hauing cut in two pieces the right wing of the enemies battel, and thruſting in betwixt the battel of the footmen, and the backs of the pentioners, brought a great terror & fear vpon the whole battel. The matter was now brought to extream danger; for Selymus by the breaking in of Sybeius was almoſt cut off from his foot- F men, in whom he had repoſed his greateſt confidence. And now the Ianizaries were hardly charged by Gazelles, who following the fortune of Sybeius, had ſet vpon the head of the Enemies battell. The Aſian horſemen alſo beeing put to the worſe, and cut in pieces, found no means how to reſtore again their diſordred battel.

In this extremity Sinan Baſſa in good time came in with his horſmen: by his comming, for that he had bin but lightly charged by Cayerbeius the Traitor, and had brought with him many freſh troups of horſmen, the fury of the Mamalukes was repreſſed, the Turks again incouraged, and the victory ſhortly after wrung out of the Mamalukes hands; the great artillery being by the commandement of Selymus at the ſame time diſcharged among them, by the terrible thundring wherof the Mamaluks horſes ſomwhat troubled, could not ſo wel as before be ruled: neither could the men themſelues, although they were of wonderful courage, much preuail, being on euery ſide oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies. Yet in that diſtreſſe being nothing diſmaid, although they were by Cayerbeius & their good fortune forſaken, they were not to ſeek either of courage or direction; but ſetting themſelues cloſe together, they brake through the midſt of their enemies, with great ſlaughter of the Europeian horſemen, and hurt of the pentioners, and ſo with ſpeed fled toward the camp and city. After whom followed Sinan Baſſa with the readieſt and freſheſt troups of his horſmen: for Selymus (who that day in the extream heat, for his wonderful pains, courage, and direction, ſeemed vndoubtedly greater than himſelfe) riding vp and down, called erneſtly vpon his ſoldiers to vrge the victory, and with all ſpeed to purſue their flying enemies. G H

Campſon had now (his deſtiny ſo leading him) ſet forward, of purpoſe to haue come to the relief of his men ſent before; or if the Turks ſhould be ouercome, to be partaker of the victory: when vpon the way he vnderſtood by them that fled, that Cayerbeius was reuolted, his army ouerthrown, and the terror ſo great, as that the flight of his ſouldiers was not now poſſibly to be ſtaied. Beſide that, to augment the fear, it was reported, that the multitude of his enemies & force of their artillery was ſo great, that they were not then to be incountred. With which heauy news the proud old man, who in the perpetuall courſe of his good fortune had neuer taſted of euil hap, was ready for ſorrow and grief of mind to haue ſunke downe to the ground. And forthwith his own men, and the enemy purſuing them, comming vpon him, who in their headlong courſe without regard ouerthrew whomſoeuer they met, euery man making ſhift for himſelf, without reſpect of others harms; he being a corpulent man of great years, and beſide the heauines of his armor, troubled alſo with a rupture, ouercome with heat and griefe of mind fainted in that great preiſe, and ſo falling down, was without regard troden to death, after he had with great majeſty gouerned the kingdoms of Egypt, Iudea, and Siria, many years. The valiant Tetrarchs of Damaſco and Tripolis, whilſt others fled for life, either to the camp or to the city of Aleppo, laboring in the hindermoſt of their flying troups to repres the force of their purſuing enemies, were both fighting honorably ſlain. Selymus erecting a few tents in the ſame field wherin the battel was fought, and keeping moſt part of his army in arms, ſlept not all that night, but ſtood faſt as a man not yet aſſured of his victory or good fortune; fearing leſt men of ſo great courage as were the Mamalukes, ſhould in the couert of the night return and ſet vpon him in his camp. For he knew right wel, that they were ouercome and put to flight rather by the trechery of Cayerbeius, and fury of his great ordnance, than by the valor of his ſoldiers. But Gazelles and the other Mamalukes, after they certainly vnderſtood of the death of Campſon, hauing giuen their horſes a ſhort bait, departed in haſt from Aleppo to Damaſco. The next day Selymus remouing with his army, took the rich tents of his enemies, full of all princely ſtore, which he gaue to his ſoldiers for a prey: and marching thence to Aleppo had the city peaceably deliuered vnto him by Cayerbeius; where he fauorably took the Citiſens into his protection, and the more to win their hearts, granted vnto them greater priuiledges than they had in former time injoyed. I K L

The death of Campſon.

Aleppo deliuered to Selymus by Cayerbeius the traitor.

In this battel were ſlain not aboue a thouſand Mamalukes, but of their ſeruants and followers a great number; mo being ſlain in the flight than in the fight, when as their horſes fainting for heat, and dying vnder them for thirſt, many of them were inforced to betake themſelues to their feet, & ſo were eaſily ſlain of euery baſe horſman. For a great number of goodly horſes died there, which being foggy fat, and delicatly brought vp in cold ſtables, could not endure the feruency of the heat, and that vnacquainted trauel; for that day al things were burnt with the ſcorching heat of the ſun. M

This famous battell was fought the 17 of Auguſt, in the year of our Lord 1516, the very ſame day (which is ſtrange to tell) whereon but two years before hee had obtained the victorie againſt Hyſmael the great Sophy in the Chalderan fields. Selymus loſt in this battell three thouſand horſemen: whereby it may eaſily be gathered, That hee had there receiued a nota-

A ble ouerthrow of his horſmen, if Sinan Baſſa in the left wing (who by the treaſon of Cayerbeius eſcaped with ſmall loſſe) had alſo hapned vpon his Sybeius, as the other General did.

The dead body of Campſon, found two daies after without any wound appearing therupon, was by the commandment of Selymus laid forth in open place for al men to behold; that ſuch as beleeued him yet to liue, and to be gon to repair his army at Cair, might be out of all hope of his return; and others that were already reuolted, might thereby be the more confirmed, as now out of all fear of him. Not long after when the dead body began to putrifie & grow noiſom, and to conuince the fame of his eſcape, had lien open to the view of all men by the ſpace of three days, it was without any funeral pomp or ſolemnitie ſimply buried in the moſt antient temple of Aleppo. Of the riſing and fall of this great man Ianus Vitalis hath written this B Elogium or Epitaph:

Campſons dead body layed out for all men to view.

CAMPSON GAVRVS, Sultan of Ægypt.

CAMPSON GAVRVS SVLTANVS AEGYPTI PERIIT ANNO 1516 Laur: Iohnson. ſculp. 1603

Fortuna cæca & ſurda, verè diceris.
Et mente vna prædita.
Ad alta tollis ſcamna in imo conditos, Vt mox cadant profundius.

Moroſa tu mortalium appetentium Votum, omne fulmine ocyus Fugas, deinde te nihil petentibus Benignitate prodigis.
Campſon vt ille Gaurius, nil ambiens, Nil te proterua flagitans, Invitus Imperator ora Ægyptia Tumultuoſa militum
Ex fece plebis factus inſolentia, Supra volabat nubila, Inter receptus altiora ſydera Mox excidens altiſsimus, Abſumptus armis hinc & hinc rebellibus, Gravis ſenectæ pondere Fit ludus atrox impotentis aleæ Tuæque pervicaciæ, Amiſit & cum vita, opes quas maximo Cum regno habebat maximus.

In Engliſh thus:

Fortune, wel call'd both deaf and blind,
And therto fond withall, Thou ſetſt the beggar vp aloft,
To work his greater fall.
Thou peeuiſh dame, more ſudden than The thunder clap from hie, Rejects the ſuits of greedy wights Which to thee call and cry;
And lauiſhly conſumes thy ſelf, And whatſo els thou haſt, On ſuch as craue nothing of thee, Nor wiſh ought to bee grac't.
As Campſon Gaurus ſeeking nought, Ne crauing ought of thee; Againſt his wil, by ſoldiers rage Was rais'd from baſe degree, And ſoaring vp aboue the clouds, Made King of Egypts land, Receiv'd amongſt the higheſt ſtars, Did there in glory ſtand.
But forthwith falling thence, oppreſt With rebels, war, and age; Became the ſcorn of thine orethwart Moſt fierce and fickle rage.
And ſo with life, together loſt A world of wealth alſo:
Which with his ſtately kingdom great,
He greateſt did forgo.

Selymus comes to Damaſco.

Selymus hauing receiued the City of Aleppo into his obeyſance, ſent Ionuſes Baſſa before him with a great part of his light horſmen, to purſue his flying enemies to Damaſco, whither he himſelf in few daies after came alſo, with the remainder of his Army, when hee vnderſtood that his enemies were departed thence & fled to Cair. They of the city of Damaſco thinking it not to ſtand with their good to ſtay the courſe of his victory, and with their liues to hazard

A the great wealth of that rich city; without delay preſently opened vnto him the gates at his comming. By whoſe example other cities alongſt the ſea coaſt mooued, eſpecially Tripolis, Berytus, Sydon, and Ptolemais, ſending their Embaſſadors, and receiuing in the Turks garriſons, yeelded themſelues in like maner.

Not long after, Selymus held a great councel in his camp, which then lay vnder the walls of Damaſco: for he would not bring his ſoldiers into the city, for troubling the quiet and populous ſtate therof, together with the great trade of merchandiſe, which at that time was with wonderful ſecurity kept there by merchants of diuers countries comming from far, euen from the remoteſt parts of the world. And in the Campe ſuch was the military diſcipline of that moſt ſeuere commander, that the ſoldiers (knowing the victory to giue them no whit the more B libery) ſuffered the fruitfull orchards and gardens of the citiſens, in the moſt plentifull time of Autumn, to reſt in ſafety vntouched, without any keeper. By which ſeuere & ſtreit gouernment he ſo politickly prouided againſt all wants, that his camp was in all parts furniſht with plenty of all things neceſſary, and that at prices reaſonable. There taking vnto him men skilfull in the laws and cuſtoms of the country, and calling before him the embaſſadors of all the cities of the country, he heard and decided the greateſt controuerſies of the Syrians, appointed gouernors ouer the prouinces and cities, took view of the tributes and cuſtoms, and abrogated many cuſtoms and tributes due vnto the old ſultans, which ſeemed either vnreaſonable or grieuous to the people: therby to gain the fame of a iuſt and bountiful conqueror.

Notable diſcipline in Selymus his army.

When he had thus ſet all things in order in Syria, and ſufficiently reſted and refreſhed his C army, and eſpecially his horſes, which with long and continual trauel were grown megre and lean; he of nothing more deſirous than of the conqueſt of Egypt, and the vtter ſubuerſion of the Sultans ſtate and Mamaluks gouernment, ſent before Sinan Baſſa into Iudea with 50000 horſmen, and a ſtrong regiment of harquebuſiers ſelected out of te Ianizaries and other ſoldiers, to try the paſſage of that country, & to open the way for him to Gaza, which was thought would be to him very troubleſom, by reaſon of the wild Arabians roaming vp and downe the Country. The City of Gaza ſtandeth neere vnto the ſea towards Egypt, not farre from the ſandy deſarts, wherby men with much difficulty and dangerous trauel, paſſe out of Syria, and ſo to Cair.

In the meane time the Mamalukes, who vnder the conduct of Gazelles were come to Caire, D with all the reſt of their order which were thither aſſembled from all parts of the kingdom; entring into counſel together (as it often fals out in time of danger and diſtreſſe) without all contention or enuy choſe Tomombeius (of the Turks called Tuman-bay) a Circaſſian born, to be their king. He was then the great Diadare, and by his office next in honor and power vnto the Sultan; whoſe proweſſe & policy was ſuch, that he only in the opinion of all the Mamalukes was thought able & ſufficient to ſtay & vphold the afflicted and declining ſtate of their kingdom. He by their general conſent and good liking promoted to the ſtate of the great Sultan, thinking (as truth was) his own majeſty, and the remainder of the Mamalukes hopes, to be repoſed wholly in arms and the fortune of battel; began with great care & ſingular induſtry to prouide armor, weapons, and horſes from all places; he alſo cauſed great ſtore of ordnance to E be caſt, and muſtred great companies of ſuch of his ſlaues as ſeemed meet for the war: beſides that, he entertained for pay many of the Moors and Arabians his neighbors. He alſo for great reward hired men skilful in the Countries, to go thorow the deſarts of the Palmyrens into Meſopotamia, and ſo to Hyſmael the Perſian King with letters; earneſtly requeſting him to inuade the Turks dominions in Aſia the leſſe, or with all ſpeed to break into Comagena, being by the departure of the enemy left bare and deſtitute of ſufficient garriſons. And further to aduertiſe him, That Selymus who then lay in the borders of Iudæa, might eaſily bee incloſed with their two armies, and ſo be vanquiſhed, or for want of victuals diſtreſſed: and the rather, for that there was no fleet of the Turks vpon that coaſt, able from ſea to relieue their Army by land, or yet to tranſport them thence, in caſe they ſhould by chance of War bee diſtreſſed, and ſo think to return. In which doing, he ſhould both relieue the Egyptian Sultan his friend and Confederat, for his ſake brought into ſo great danger; and alſo without any great trouble or peril, notably reuenge himſelf of ſo many ſhamefull injuries as hee had before receiued from that moſt capitall Enemy. Whileſt Tomombeius doth theſe things, Sinan Baſſa the forerunner of Selymus, hauing eaſily repulſed diuers companies of the wild Arabians, who in maner of theeues and robbers lay vpon the paſſages, had now opened the way, & was come to G Gaza; where the citiſens, although they were in heart faithſul to the Mamalukes, yet for that to ſhut their gates againſt the Baſſa, and to ſtand vpon their gard without a ſufficient garriſon, ſeemed a matter both perillous and vnreaſonable, forthwith yeelded their city vpon reaſonable compoſition, and with the plenty therof relieued the Turks Baſſa, giuing him great, but diſſembled thanks, that by his meanes and the good fortune of Selymus, they were deliuered from the cruel bondage of the Mamalukes, promiſing for the remembrance of ſo great a benefit, for euer to remain his faithful ſeruants. Sinan commending their ready good will, required of them al ſuch things as he wanted, or had occaſion to vſe; which they ſeemed willing to deliuer, and ſo lodged his army neer to the wals of the city, within the defence of the gardens, purpoſing in that place to expect the comming of Selymus. H

Tomombeius by general conſent of the Mamalukes choſen Sultan of Egipt

In the mean time (as he was a man of great experience, and moſt ſkilful in martial affairs) he ſought by all means to get knowledge of that deſart and vnpeopled country, not inhabited for lack of water; and eſpecially of the nature of the great ſands wherby Selymus was with his army to paſſe. He alſo won by rewards the inhabitants of the country therabouts, by large offers to procure him the fauor of the chieftains and leaders of the Arabians neere vnto thoſe places; and alſo to ſpy what the Mamalukes did at Cair, and wherin they repoſed their chief confidence, and forthwith to giue him knowledge therof.

On the other ſide, the citiſens of Gaza in heart enemies vnto the Turks, as daily feeling the grieuances of the preſent army, aduertiſed Tomombeius of the comming of Sinan Baſſa, & that that power of the Turks army might eaſily be oppreſſed before the comming of Selymus, if a I ſtrong power of the Mamaluks were ſent thither vnder the conduct of ſkilful leaders: promiſing, that if the Mamalukes would at an appointed time, vpon a ſudden in the night ſet vpon the ſleepy Turks, they would at the ſame inſtant ſally out of the city vpon the Camp, & there with fire and ſword do what harm they could for the ouerthrow of the enemy.

Of this deuice Tomombeius and the Mamalukes liked wel, and ſo without delay ſent Gazelles with 6000 choiſe horſmen, and a great number of the Arabians, to perform the exploit vpon Sinan. For Gazelles, in that his wholſom counſel had bin by Campſon and others rejected (who being ſtraitway deſirous of battel, had raſhly caſt themſelues & the whole ſtate into ſo great calamity) and afterward in the greateſt danger of the battel, hauing performed all the parts of a politique and valiant chieftain, was grown into ſuch credit, that all men held a great opini- K on both of his valor and direction.

But he was ſcarſly wel ſet forth, when aduertiſement was giuen vnto Sinan by his Syrian intelligencers, That the Mamalukes with the Arabians were comming thorow the ſandy Deſarts, vpon the ſudden to oppreſſe him; and that they would be with him before two dais were expired, foraſmuch as they had ſet forward vpon the ſpur, without any cariages or baggage to let them. Which ouerture in good time giuen, as it was the ſafegard of Sinans army, ſo was it of greateſt importance and moment for the ſubduing and obtaining of the full conqueſt of Egypt afterward. But Sinan Baſſa, although he knew nothing of the trechery of them of Gaza; yet as a man of a prouident and ſubtil wit, ſuſpecting that ſuch a thing might happen, be- L cauſe he would not haue at once to do with a double enemy, reſolued to go & meet the Mamaluks vpon the way, and to giue them battel. Wherfore with great ſilence diſlodging his army betwixt ten and twelue a clock in the night, hee ſet forward and marched out of ſight of the city about fifteen miles toward Egypt. There was neer vnto that place a little low village wherin trauellers vſed commonly to lodge, for the commodiouſnes of a liuely and plenteous ſpring which there riſeth: there by chance both Sinan Baſſa had purpoſed to ſtay, and Gazelles in like maner had alſo determined to reſt a few hours to refreſh his army, that he might by night, after he had well refreſhed his horſes, come vnlooked for vpon his enemies at Gaza. When news was brought to both the Generals almoſt at one inſtant, by the fore-runners of both armies, That the enemy was at hand.

Gazelles not a little troubled with that vnexpected news, for that he perceiued himſelf diſ- M appointed of his purpoſe; and vnable to fight with his enemies in plain battel, eſpecially his horſes being ſore wearied with trauell, was inforced vpon the ſudden for the ſafegard of himſelf & his followers, to reſolue vpon a new reſolution: yet nothing diſcouraged, with cheerful countenance and liuely ſpeech exhorted his ſoldiers to make themſelues ready for battel, &

A that which they could not by policie bring to paſſe,they ſhould by plain force perform. Sinan on the other ſide hauing ſomwhat ſooner ſet his men in order of battel than had Gazelles, foraſmuch as he had before at good leiſure taken order what hee would haue don,if it ſhould come to the point of battel ; with conſtant look and long perſuaſions ful of hope, incouraged his ſoldiers to fight. But the concluſion of all his ſpeech was, that they ſhould play the men, and not once think of flight, foraſmuch as all places about them would be ſhut vp and becom impaſſable,if they obtained not the victory : and that aboue all things they ſhould perſuade themſelues, that none of them could that day periſh, but ſuch as the immortal God had by the ineuitable law of deſtiny appointed to die : and that with like haſard valiant men found life in the midſt of their enemies weapons, that cowards by immutable deſtiny found death B in their ſafeſt flight.

The battell betweene Sinan Baſſa and Gazelles.

The Baſſa had placed his harquebuſiers in the wings of his battell, which were raunged of a great length in thin ranks, therby to vſe their pieces at more liberty, and with more eaſe to incloſe the enemy : in the middle were placed the horſemen to receiue the firſt charge of the Mamalukes. Gazelles approching the enemy, ſent before the troups of the Arabian light horſmen to trouble the wings of his enemies battel, and with a ſquare battell of his Mamalukes charged the middle battel of the Turks. The battel was a great while moſt terrible, & the victory doubtfull: for although the Turks in number far exceeded, yet were they not able to indure the armed and couragious Mamalukes, but were glad to giue ground; and quite diſordered by the breaking in of the Mamalukes, as men diſcouraged, began to looke about them C which way they might fly. When by the commandement of Sinan the harquebuſiers, who with the firſt volly of their ſhot had repulſed the Arabians , wheeling about, incloſed all the enemies battel. By which means both men and horſe were afar off ſlain with the multitude of their deadly ſhot: where true valor helped them not, ſo on euery ſide incloſed. For where any troup of Mamalukes preſſed forward vpon the Turks, they quickly retyred, and in all places of the battel, as much as they could, ſhunned to incounter their enemies with their horſmen, laboring only to gaul them with ſhot. Gazelles ſeeing his horſes ſpent with extream wearines, and that he was not to expect any further help, his Arabians beginning now to fal from him; and alſo conſidering that many of his moſt valiant ſoldiers were either ſlain or wounded, and hauing alſo himſelf receiued a great wound in his necke : he with the reſt of his Army made D way thorow the middeſt of his enemies , and hauing loſt diuers of his enſignes , fled backe again to Cair through the ſandy Deſarts wherby he came. In this battel was loſt the gouernor of Alexandria, and Orchamus Gouernour of Cair (both men of great account among the Mamalukes) and beſides them a great number of the Arabians, with a thouſand or more of the Mamaluke horſmen. Neither got Sinan a ioyfull or vnbloudy victory, hauing loſt aboue two thouſand of his beſt horſmen, and amongſt them certain Commaunders men of great account.

The Turks weary of this battel, which had endured from noon til night, and many of their horſes fainting vnder them, were not able to purſue their enemies, and therefore incamped in the ſame place where the battel was fought, neer vnto the fountain. The day following they E at leiſure gathered the ſpoile, and cutting off the heads of their enemies , which were eaſily known by their long and rough beards, faſtned them vp vpon the Date trees growing therby, as wel in witnes of their worthy labour, as by that ſtrange and horrible ſpectacle to feed the eies of their fierce Emperor (who was ſhortly after to paſſe that way) and ſo to manifeſt vnto him the victory of that day.

In the mean time they of Gaza vpon the riſing of the Sun, perceiuing the Turks camp left empty, as men not able longer to diſſemble their couert trechery ; and vainly ſuppoſing that Sinan Baſſa vpon ſome knowledge of the comming of the Mamalukes , had for feare retyred back into places of more ſafety; ſuddenly ſet vpon ſuch as were left in the Camp, which were for moſt part ſick and weak men (yet in number many) whom they moſt cruelly ſlew, and pre-F ſently ſet vpon 2000 of the Turks horſmen ſent from Selymus to Sinan, which by chance were come thither the ſame day, enquiring with great carefulnes, what was become of the Baſſa and his Army ; and ſpoyling them of their Carriages, put them to flight. Who after that diſcomfiture, ſuppoſing the Baſſa (whom they had thought to haue found at Gaza, tarrying for the comming of Selymus) by ſome miſhap or policy of the enemy to haue beene loſt, with all his army,and therfore fearfully retyring,were by the way miſerably ſlain by the Arabians: G neither had any one of them eſcaped,if they had not met with Iuleb the Gouernor of Achaia at the city of Rama: for he was alſo ſent from Selymus to Sinan Baſſa with a ſtrong companie of Grecian horſmen,by whoſe comming the fury of the Arabians was wel repreſſed.Yet theſe pilfering people ſtil calling forth to the prey more and more of their leaders which dwelt in the mountains adjoining,and being grown to a great army, ouertook the Turkes at a village called Carasbara,where they inforced them to fight in a place of great diſaduantage.For the Arabians hauing before taken certaine ſtreits,which cloſed in the paſſage at the further end of a large vally,ſhewed themſelues at once before,behind,& on both ſides of the Turks:their weapons were bow and arrows,and long ſpears armed at both ſides, which they nimbly handled after the maner of the Moors. Theſe weapons they moſt skilfully vſed vpon their ſwift H horſes,and both in their charge and retreit wounded their enemies deadly. So the Turkes in number few,and for their horſmens ſtaues inferior to their enemies, durſt not offer to charge them;but keeping cloſe together,hardly defended themſelues,ſtil making way as they went: and had vndoubtedly been brought into extream danger to haue been vtterly loſt,had not Iuleb with four pieces of artillery which he brought with him for his defence,driuen them that kept the ſtreits, from their high places, and ſo opening the way, with all ſpeed brought thorow his men. Which ſtreits once paſſed, and comming into the open fields, he with more ſafety marched forward,skirmiſhing afar off with the enemy,with his archers and harquebuſiers,and diſcharging his field pieces where he ſaw the greateſt and thickeſt troupes of thoſe wild people. I

On the other part,the Arabians diſperſedly houering about them in troups,were ſtil in the tail of the army,and ſuch as were wounded or weak,and could not follow the reſt, they ſlew; and ſought by all means to hinder their journy,not ſuffering them(circumuented with ſo many dangers) either to refreſh themſelues,or to take reſt. This was vnto the Turks a moſt diſmal day,for many of them tormented with thirſt,and weakened with wounds and extream labor,gaue vp the ghoſt: and now no help remained in this deſperat eſtate, being ſtil beſet and hardly laid to with a multitude of thoſe fierce and deſperat enemies; when ſuddenly a great number of other Turks came to them in the mid way vnlooked for,being now in deſpaire,and euen at the laſt caſt. For Selymus hauing left the Imbrahor Baſſa with a ſtrong army vpon the borders of Perſia,for the defence of Syria and Aſia,and hauing ſent for new ſupplies of ſouldiers K to Conſtantinople, which ſhould with a great fleet be tranſported into Syria, had now remoued from Damaſco:and the better to prouide for victuals and forrage, which began now to grow ſcant in that waſted countrey;euery day ſent before great troupes and companies of his army,as it were at certain appointed times.

Selymus doubting Sinan baſſa to haue been loſt,becommeth melancholy.

Newe of Sinans victory comforteth Selymus.

So Iuleb deliuered of the preſent danger,by the comming in of theſe freſh ſouldiers, met with Selymus the next day, and in order told him all that had happened vnto him and his firſt troups,at Gaza and Rama,and all the way after; and alſo what they ſuppoſed by conjectures to haue chanced to Sinan Baſſa and his army,for the manifold wyles of ſo dangerous enemies. With which which news Selymus became exceeding melancholy, and therupon thought not good to go any further,before he perfectly knew how all ſtood with Sinan; in whoſe fortune L he had repoſed al the hope of his good ſucces in that ſo great an enterpriſe.But whilſt he was in this dump,ſuddenly came the Syrian ſpies,who declaring vnto him all that Sinan Baſſa had don,conuerted that melancholy paſſion into no leſſe ioy and gladnes:for he ſaw that by that victory Egypt was laid open to him,and his deſires as good as half accompliſhed in les time than euer he expected.

The next day after,he remoued with his Army to Rama,and by the way as hee went(to the terror of others)burnt the dwellings,together with the wiues and children of thoſe Arabians who but a little before had don ſo much harm to his men in their paſſage. And from thence ſending before his footmen to Sinan Baſſa at Gaza,he himſelf with his horſmen turned out of the way vpon the left hand to Ieruſalem,to viſit that moſt antient and famous City, ſo much M renowned both for the antiquity therof,and the fame of the religion of the Iews.That vnpeopled and deſolat city lay then defaced with the hugy ruins of the old ſacred and ſtately buildings; not inhabited by the Iewes, the antient Inhabitants thereof(who for their inexpiable guilt,as men exiled out of the world, haue no Country or reſting place) but for moſt part by a few

A a ſew poor Chriſtians, who to the great ſcorn and ſhame of the Chriſtian name, payd yearely a great tribute to the Sultan of Egypt, for the poſſeſſion of the ſacred Sepulchre: when as the Chriſtian princes flouriſhing at that time with glory, power, & wealth, could not by any motiue of immortal glory and fame be incited to reuenge ſo great an injury; but deeming it (as ſhould ſeem) better agreeing with their ſtate to ſpend their time in idle vanities, or mortall war one againſt another, than in the quarrel of the true Chriſtian religion.

Selymus hauing reuerendly worſhipped the antient monuments of the old prophets, & don eſpecial ſacrifice vnto his great prophet Mahomet, gaue vnto the Chriſtian prieſts keepers of the place (as vnto good and deuout men) mony to maintain them for ſix months; and ſtaying at Ieruſalem but one night, marched in four daies to the reſt of his Army at Gaza: where by B the way he had continual skirmiſhes both day and night with the Arabians, who after their wonted maner were deſperatly at hand in euery place, and where the ſtreitnes of the place inforced the Turks to extenuat their rankes, there would they be ready to skirmiſh with them, and ſuddenly vnlooked for come to handy blows; and when they came into the Vallies, they tumbled down from the mountains great ſtones vpon them, which they had for that purpoſe before prouided. At which time the Turks harquebuſiers, in whom they had greateſt confidence, ſerued them to little purpoſe: for the weather was ſo tempeſtuous and extreame moiſt with continual rain, that the pouder in their flasks became wet and vnſeruiceable, and hardly could they keep fire in their matches. Yet by the valour of the Ianizaries the matter was ſo vſed, that neer vnto the perſon of the emperor no great harm was don by thoſe naked robbers: C for climing vp the hils with pikes in their hands, they droue them from their ſtandings, and inforced them to abandon the ſtreits and high places.

But Sinan Baſſa (who after the victory returning to Gaza, had put to death the authours of the late reuolt, confiſcated their goods, and exacted of the people in general a great ſumme of mony, as the iuſt puniſhment of their falſe trechery) hearing now of the comming of Selymus, went to meet him with his victorious ſoldiers, furniſhed with the ſpoils of their enemies. Whom Selymus moſt honorably receiued, and gaue generally to the captains, and particularly to the moſt valiant of the common ſoldiers, garments of ſilk, with a great ſum of money in reward of their good ſeruice.

Sinan Baſſa goeth to meet Selymus, as hee was comming to Gaza.

After that, he ſtaid but four days at Gaza, for that he thought it not good to giue any long D time of breathing vnto his diſcouraged enemies, now twice ouerthrown; or to ſuffer the new Sultan (not yet wel ſetled in his kingdom) to grow ſtronger by new preparations and ſupplies raiſed in the moſt populous and plentiful country of Egypt. Which to let, although it required great haſt in ſetting forward, and ſerued as ſpurs vnto him, naturally haſting to glory and renown; yet was his army to be refreſhed after ſo long and painful trauel, and great prouiſion to be made for the cariage of water vpon camels all the way through the dry ſolitary and ſandy deſarts. For between Gaza and Cair ly vaſt vnpeopled and barren ſands, which moued by the wind, riſe vp in billows in maner of a wrought ſea, ſo troubleſom, that many times it is not poſſible to ſee for duſt: & the light ſands in many places gauled deep with the wind, wonderfully troubleth the weary paſſengers. But ſuch a ſudden calm inſued the great rain which E fel but three dayes before, that Selymus vnto his great good fortune wanted nothing that hee could wiſh for the happy conduct of his army: for the air was becom ſo calm, that ther was no blaſt of wind to raiſe the ſand to trouble their ſight; and withall, ſuch plenty of water was found almoſt in euery place, by reaſon of the abundant rain, which being not yet ſunk far into the ground, afforded them water in ſuch plenty, if they digged but two foot deep, that the ſoldiers commonly thought it needles to carry any bottle of water for fear of thirſt. Yet for all that, the wild Arabians failed not in all that paſſage, on euery ſide to houer about the Turks army (as hawks ouer their prey) and ſuffered none of them to ſtraggle out of order, or ſtay behind the reſt of the army, but they were preſently ſnatcht vp and ſlain. Againſt whom Selymus prouided an eaſy remedy, by placing his field pieces in diuers parts of his army, which by the F direction of the Leaders (as euery man hapned to be neereſt the danger) were forthwith diſcharged vpon the roaming enemy: and in the rereward of his army were placed ſtrong companies of harquebuſiers, for defence of the weak and feeble ſoldiers, who could but ſoftly follow the army, and therfore were moſt ſubiect to danger.

By this means Selymus with ſome ſmall loſſe receiued from the Arabians, in eight dayes march drew neer to Cair, Sinan Baſſa going before him;who with his Europeian ſoldiers ſtill kept one daies journy before. There is a village about 6 miles diſtant from the city of Caire, called Matharea,famous for the plenty of moſt excellent Balm,with liquor of al others moſt fragrant and ſoueraigne,diſtilled out of low trees there planted; whoſe outermoſt rinde the people cut with ivory kniues,to giue the liquor paſſage;which Balm for the notable vertues therof being not elſwhere to be had, mens diſeaſes and wanton deſires haue made of a wonderful price. Into that place neer vnto a village called Rhodania,had Tomombeius conueyed al his new and old prouiſion of artillery;and had drawn deep ditches ouerthwart al the field and croſſe the highway,which he had cloſely couered ouer with weak hurdls and earth,as if it had bin firm ground. And he with his Mamalukes (in number about twelue thouſand) and a great multitude of Arabian horſmen,lay in places conuenient,of purpoſe that when the Turks battels ſhould approch,they ſhould firſt feel the force of his great Ordnance, before they came within the ſhot of their arrows,& forthwith vpon great diſaduantage with all his forces ſuddenly to ſet vpon them diſordred and intrapped. All which things were ſo cunningly & politickly contriued and done,that there was none in the Sultans Army which doubted of the good ſucces of that day: and a great miſchief had vndoubtedly befallen the Turkes,had not fortune which fauored Selymus,and frowned vpon Tomombeius (or more truly to ſay,the fatall period of that kingdom ſo requiring) by the falſe trechery of a few,fruſtrated the great indeauors of the Mamalukes.

Tomombeius ſeeks to intrap the Turks.

There was in the Sultans army, among the ſoldiers of the court, four Epirot Mamalukes, who grieued to ſee Tomombeius (contrary to their deſires) preferred to the kingdom by others of a contrary faction; whether it were vpon a malicious diſpoſition, or vpon hope of reward and better preferment,or for that in ſo great a declination of their kingdom they thought it good to ſeek for new friends of more aſſurance,fled ſecretly to Sinan Baſſa,as to a moſt famous captain,and one of their own nation. For this great commander Sinan,Selymus his right hand, was born in a poor country village of Epirus, in the mountain of Ambracia, whom a ſtrange miſchance preferred to that height of credit and wealth: for it is reported,that a ſow kept in the houſe wherin he was born,bit off his genitoirs,being then but a child,as he lay by chance ſleeping in the ſhadow;and being made of greater eſteem by that miſhap, was by them that took vp delicat minions for the Turkiſh emperor,brought to Conſtantinople, and preſented to the great Emperor Mahomet, Selymus his grandfather: where fortune by the fatal direction of his good hap,aduanced him to his appointed honors,whom ſhe had long before diſmembred. By theſe fugitiue Mamalukes,Selymus and Sinan were inſtructed of all the deuices of the enemy,and eſpecially what ſtratagems Tomombeius had with great cunning and policy deuiſed:wherinto they muſt needs fall if they ſhould go directly on, and not forſake the Highway. Wherfore guided by the ſaid fugitiues,they fetcht a great compas on the left hand,and by an vnuſed way,before it was day,hauing eſcaped the front of the enemies Campe,with all the dangers prepared for them; they came and ſhewed themſelues at their backs in order of battel,with their great artillery ready bent,becauſe they were deſirous without delay to join battel.

Selymus comming by a way vnexpected, maketh great confuſion in Tomombeius camp.

Tomombeius now too late perceiuing that his plot was diſcouered by the treaſon of ſome of his own people;although he was therwith aboue meaſure grieued, for that al that he had with ſo great induſtry and the labor of ſo many men brought to paſſe,was through ſpiteful fortune made fruſtrat, and in a moment brought to nought; yet for all that, as he was a man of an inuincible courage,preſently entred into his wonted and deep deuices; and calling to him his chief commanders,quickly told them what he would haue don. Now in this ſhort moment of time he was to do many things at once:the ſignal was to be giuen for the ſoldiers to mount their horſes,and to make themſelues ready,the order of his camp was to be changed,his battel to be ordered,his ſoldiers to be incouraged,and all his great ordnance,as the cauſe required,quite the contray way to be turned: all which things,as they could but hardly and trobleſomly by one commander be directed,ſo were they haſtily and diſorderly at once don by many. But aboue all other things,the great concourſe of people for turning and remoouing the great artillery,moſt troubled the well ordering of the reſt; for many of them were hugie iron pieces of great weight,made faſt in ſtocks of wood,with rings and iron Claſpes, after the old and rude manner of ſhip Ordnance, which for their exceeding and ponderous weight

A could not be out of their places remoued, but by the ſtrength of many horſes, and the great labor of men, with levers and rouls put vnder them; and ſuch as were mounted vpon cariages, when they were drawn thorow all parts of the camp, with the great clamour of the diſordered and haſty people, ſome drawing, ſome thruſting forward the ſame, with their tumultuous ſtir and doings wonderfully troubled the other ſoldiers, as they were mounting to horſe, & repairing toward their enſignes. But two things maruellouſly helped theſe difficulties, the ſoldiers cheerfulnes and conſtancy, which was ſuch as paſſeth credit; for they did not vpon any apprehenſion of fear fail either in hope or courage, as oftentimes it happeneth in ſudden accidents, wherin euen the old approued ſoldiers do many times fail of their wonted valor: & although they were twice ouercome in battel, yet ſtil they were of greater ſpirit and confidence, as men B deſtitute neither of courage nor skil, but only of fortune.

Wherfore Tomombeius hauing with much ado ordered this battell, and his ſouldiers with great cheerfulnes deſiring the ſignal to bee giuen, commanded all the multitude of his Arabians to compas in the wings of the enemies battel behind, & ſo to skirmiſh with them: that ſo (if it were poſſible) the Turks horſemen might with the danger of the doubtfull fight with ſuch an vncertain enemy, be diſordred before he ſet fotward to charge them with his troups; and withall commanded his great Ordnance (which was now turned vpon the enemy) to bee preſently diſcharged. So did the Turkes likewiſe, diſcharging at once from a conuenient diſtance both their greater and ſmaller ordnance; and ſpeedily recharging them, brought them within an arrow ſhot: ſo that for a good ſpace they lay beating the one the other on both ſides C with their great artillery only: in which maner of fight the Egyptian cannoniers were almoſt all ſlain, and many of their field pieces broken by force of the enemies ſhot. For Selymus had in his camp many excellent and skilful canoniers, whom he had with great entertainment allured out of Italy and Germany; and eſpecially of thoſe refuce Iewes, who by the zeal of king Ferdinand being driuen out of Spain, afterwards to the ſhame of the Chriſtians diſperſt thoſe rare and deadly deuices through the Eaſt. The chief of theſe canoniers was one Iacobus à regio Lepidi, a cunning enginier, who but a little before ouercome by the Turks rewards, abjuring the Chriſtian religion, reuolted vnto the Mahometan ſuperſtition.

Chriſtian canoniers ſerue the Turkes againſt the Egyptians.

But after that the Mamalukes had brought the matter to battel on both ſides, they gaue out a moſt hideous and dreadful cry, and with exceeding fury aſſailed the Turks in three pla- D ces: for Selymus ſtil keeping his wonted order, approched his enemies with his battel in form of a half moon. Muſtapha Baſſa had the leading of the Aſian horſemen in the right wing; and Iounſes Baſſa of the Europeians in the left: he himſelf ſtood in the main battel with the ſquadron of his truſty Ianizaries, and great ſtore of artillery. But Sinan Baſſa the Eunuch, General of the field, led after him a great number of moſt valiant horſmen, drawn out of euery troup, to be ready againſt al the vncertain euents that might happen in the battel, vnto whom he joined 500 harquebuſiers, Ianizaries, men of wonderfull courage and actiuitie, ſelected out of Selymus his own ſquadron, to relieue ſuch part of the Army as ſhould chance to be moſt preſt by the enemy.

The order of Selymus his army.

Sinan Baſſa generall of the field.

So almoſt at one time, whilſt Tomombeius ſtood in the main battel againſt Selymus, and the E wings of the Mamalukes with equall battel incountred the wings of the Turks; and the Arabians alſo valiantly charging them in the rereward, as they had in charge, foure ſharp battels were at once made in diuers places. It is reported by ſome that were preſent in that battell, that what for the clamor and cry of ſoldiers, what for the noiſe of drums and trumpets, & ſuch like inſtruments of war, what fot the thundring of ordnance, clattering of armor, aud riſing of the duſt, all mens minds were ſo abaſhed and confounded, that running headlong as men furious and deſperat, when neither their ſpeeches could be heard, their tokens known, their Enſigns ſeen, or captains vnderſtood; miſtaking one another in that hurly-burly, they ſlew many of their friends in ſtead of their enemies: for neuer battels met together with greater hatred, neither did euer two great kings with leſſe care of their perſons and ſafety more reſolutely or F deſperatly make ſhew of their ſtrength & courage: for both of them with like danger both of themſelues and of their armies, ſeeing plainly that they had put both their liues & kingdoms to the haſard of a battel, promiſed vnto themſelues no other hope of ſafety, but what they ſhould obtain by victory. Gazelles deſirous both of honor and of reuenge, to requite the Europeian horſmen with like ſlaughter as he had before receiued from them not far from Gaza, with wonderful fury aſſailed Ionuſes Baſſa, and at the firſt incounter brake his firſt ranks, and ouerthrew certain of his guidons; at which time the Arabians couragiouſly preſſing in at their backs, inforced thoſe victorious troups, which in al battels had hitherto caried away the priſe (the very flour of Thracia, Theſſaly, Epirus, Macedonia, & Grecia) to fly & ſhew their backs, which neuer enemy had before that time ſeen. At which time Sinan Baſſa carefully attending euery accident, came ſpeedily in with his moſt valiant troups of freſh men, vpon the ſide of the enemy, and reſtored again the battel, now declining and fouly diſordered. But whilſt Sinan, who in this his laſt worthy labour had interrupted the manifeſt victory of Gazelles, was with an inuincible courage valiantly fighting in the head of his battell, hee was by the comming in of the couragious Captain Bidon with his Mamalukes ouercharged and ſlaine. His moſt valiant followers alſo laboring to reſcue and carry away his dead body, were by Gazelles vnfolding his troups (that ſtanding thin, they might at more liberty vſe their ſwords, in which maner of fight the Mamalukes far excelled the Turks) for the moſt part ſlaine, and the reſt put to flight: and that choſen company of fiue hundred of the moſt valiant Ianizaries, now deſtitute of their horſmen, when they had moſt couragiouſly don what was poſſible for men to do, beeing compaſſed round with the Mamalukes horſmen, were all in a maner cut in pieces and trodden vnder foot. Thus reſteth this Eunuch Baſſa in the bed of fame, who liuing had the leading of the moſt warlike Emperor Selymus his greateſt armies in his moſt dangerous wars.

Muſtapha in the other wing of the Turks battel, comming on couragiouſly with his Aſian horſmen, did ſore preſſe the left wing of the Egyptians (wherof Helymus the Diadare, and Giapab, two valiant captains, had the leading) who but a little before had receiued great harme by the great ordnance that was diſcharged out of the midſt of Selymus his battel ouerthwart the field: which Muſtapha perceiuing, and deſirous to blot out the old infamy he had before receiued, did fiercely preſſe vpon them, ſo diſordered, and with his whole troups ouerthrew their broken ranks; and gliſtring in his bright armor, with a loud voice incouraged his Aſian ſouldiers, exhorting them that day with valiant proweſſe or honorable death, to recouer their antient honor, of late loſt in the fields of Aleppo.

At the ſame time alſo Tomombeius breaking through the middle battel of the Turks horſmen, was entred into the ſquadron of the footmen, with his crooked ſcimiter giuing many a deadly wound, himſelf being a valiant big man, and of great ſtrength. The Arabians had alſo in a ring incloſed the vttermoſt parts of the Turks army, and in many places inforced them to turn their battel vpon them, being ſore charged with a doubtfull fight both before and behind: when Selymus ſet forward with his battel of footmen, and his ſquadron of Ianizaries, his laſt and moſt aſſured refuge in that his hard diſtres: whoſe inuincible force, neither the couragious barbed horſes nor their victorious riders were able to abide; for part of them with their harquebuſies, and the reſt with their pikes, had ſo ſtrongly ſet the front of their battell, that nothing was able to ſtand wherſoeuer that firm battel, linked together as if it had bin but one whole intire body, ſwaied. Yet was this cruell battel continued with diuers fortune on both ſides, from four a clocke vntill the going down of the Sun: neither was there any part of their armies which had not with diuers ſucces and change of fortune, endured the fury of that battel: for both the victors and the vanquiſhed being inraged with an implacable hatred the one againſt the other, fought deſperatly as men prodigal of their liues: the Mamalukes diſdaining to haue the victory wrung out of their hands by them whom they had in ſo many places diſcomfited; and the Turks taking it in no leſſe ſcorn, that they whom but of late they had ouercome and vanquiſhed in two great battels, ſhould now the third time make ſo ſtrong reſiſtance: ſo that on both ſides their fainting hands and bodies, both wearied and weakned with wounds, ſupported only with anger & obſtinacy of mind, ſeemed yet ſufficient to haue maintained that bloudy battel till the next day, if the darknes of the night now comming on, had not made an end of that daies ſlaughter.

Tomombeius vndoubtedly vanquiſhed, and fearing to be vtterly ouerthrown, firſt cauſed a retreit to be ſounded, that his Mamalukes which were not indeed able to withſtand the Ianizaries, might not ſeem to be put to flight, but rather as men commanded, to retyre. Which he thought to concern much both for incouraging his ſoldiers, and for the keeping of his owne credit and eſtimation with his ſubjects. For now the ſelf ſame fortune which had deceiued

A his firſt hopes, ſeemed to him (as it fareth with them in diſtreſſe, ſtill hoping for better) to promiſe him more proſperous ſucceſſe, if he were not diſcouraged: but reſeruing ſuch remainders of his forces as were left, he ſhould againe couragiouſly renew the war.

The battell thus broken off by the approch of the night, the Turks as victors enioying the tents and great artillery of their enemies, purſued the Mamalukes vntill midnight, who held on their way to Caire, in manner as if they had fled. This great battell was fought vpon a Thurſday, the 24 day of Ianuary, in the yere 1517. The Diadare was taken in the flight mortally wounded, and with him the valiant captaine Bidon, hauing in the battell one of his legs broken in the knee with a faulchion ſhot, wherewith his horſe was alſo ſlaine vnder him. Selymus commanded them both the next day to be ſlaine, either for that their wounds were ſuppoſed to be incurable, or els for that it was his pleaſure, with the death of thoſe two honorable B perſonages to appeaſe the angry ghoſt of Sinan Baſſa, whoſe death he wonderfully lamented.

Selymus cauſeth the Diadare & the valiant captaine Bidon to be ſlaine.

The Turks although they ſtill preuailed, yet was their army greatly impaired euen in their proſperous ſucceſſe and fortunat battels: the fourth part of their army was conſumed with ſickeneſſe and the ſword, and that daies labor had tyred a great number of their horſes, beſide the long iourney they had before endured. For which cauſes Selymus was inforced to ſlacke ſomewhat of his accuſtomed haſte: for as yet he had no experience of the diſpoſition of the Ægyptians which dwelt at Caire, neither could he vnderſtand by any certaine report, where Tomombeius ſtaied, or vpon what reſolution he reſted. Which things not throughly knowne, he thought it not good to commit himſelfe and his army into that moſt populous and ſpacious city: but ſtaying foure daies at the village of Mathanea and Rhodania, carefully prouided C for his wounded ſoldiers, and cauſed the bodies of ſuch as were ſlaine to be buried, but the dead carkaſſes of his enemies he left to the birds of the aire and beaſts of the field. And afterward remouing his campe thence, that he might more commodiouſly water, he came to the plaines betweene old Caire and Bulach.

In the meane while Tomombeius, nothing diſcouraged with ſo many miſhaps, gathering together the Mamalukes from all places, encamped his army commodiouſly betweene the new city of Caire and the riuer Nilus; he alſo armed eight thouſand Æthyopian ſlaues (which kinde of men he had not before vſed, for the remembrance of their old rebellion:) beſide that, he opening the old armoury, put arms into the hands of the Mamalukes ſons, and Moores, (his D vaſſals) into the hands of the Iewes and Arabians alſo, and couragiouſly prepared for a greater and more mortal war than before, but foraſmuch as there were many difficulties in the managing thereof, hauing almoſt loſt all his great artillery, with many of his moſt valiant horſemen ſlaine in the former battels; he in his troubled mind did ſo caſt the doubtfull hopes of his laſt deuice, (which cruell neceſſity wrung from him) that foraſmuch as he had by manly force nothing preuailed in open field, he would now altogether vſe policy; as he which of late hauing vnfortunatly made proofe of his ſtrength, his forces yet all whole, thought it not good againe to aduenture the fortune of a battell: neither was he in hope if he ſhould ſo do, to be able with his ſmall power and deſperat ſupplies to protract the war vntil the heat of Summer, as he deſired. Wherefore he reſolued by night to aſſaile the Turks campe, and if poſſibly he E could, to ſet it on fire. For which his deuice he ſeemed to haue two reaſons: whereof the one conſiſted in the ſpeedy execution, that he might deſperatly attempt to do ſome notable exploit in the night, before the enemy ſhould perceiue the weakeneſſe of his power, which was not great, and ſcambled vp on the ſudden; as alſo before he himſelfe ſhould grow into contempt with the naturall Ægyptians, who deſiring nothing more, than to caſt off the ſeruile yoke of the Mamaluke gouernment, with wauering minds expected but ſome fit occaſion to rebell: The other was, That by the benefit of the night he might auoid the danger of the great ordnance; which in ſudden accidents, and eſpecially in the darkeneſſe of the night, ſerueth to little or no purpoſe: in which kind of ſtrength he had before to his great loſſe learned, that his enemies were too good for him. But theſe his reaſonable policies, when al things F were in readineſſe to haue put the ſame in execution, were in like manner as the firſt, ouerthrowne by the treaſon of as ſuch as ſecretly reuolted from him to the enemy.

For Selymus vnderſtanding the whole plot by certain Mamalukes (which hauing the Kings euill fortune in contempt, as it commonly falleth out with men in miſery, dayly forſook him) commanded his army to be alwaies in readineſſe, and making great fires in diuers parts of his campe, kept moſt carefull and vigilant watch. By which his diligence it came fitly to paſſe, that the night following, Tomombeius approching his camp, was repulſed, with no ſmall loſſe of his firſt troups which vnaduiſedly were gone on too farr and had no doubt that night thereby receiued his laſt ouerthrow, but that he wiſely miſdoubting the vnwonted light of the fires ſhining in all parts of the campe, in time called backe his haſting troups, which were themſelues with more haſt than good ſpeed marching into the the very mouth of the Turks great artillery, bent of purpoſe vpon them.

Tomombeius diſappointed of his purpoſe, by perſuaſion of the Chieftains retired to Caire; for the Mamalukes ſtill put to the worſt in plaine field, thought it beſt to proceed in another manner; perſuading him, with the whole ſtrength of his army to man all the conuenient places of that great city, otherwiſe expoſed to the enemies pleaſure, and ſo to keepe the Turks from entring. For they as men brought to this extremity, that they muſt now fight for their dwellings, liues, wiues, and children; thought it more honourable and better agreeing with their antient glory, ſo to do in their fight, and in the entrance of their houſes, than elſewhere further off. Wherefore the Mamalukes comming home to Caire, furniſhed all their families and flat roofes of their houſes, with all manner of weapons: euery one of them now humbly requeſting the Ægyptians their neighbours, to take vp armes againſt the Turks their antient and mortall enemies, and not to ſuffer themſelues to be cowardly ſlaine, their goods ſpoiled, and their wiues and children carried away into moſt miſerable captiuity; foraſmuch as the mercileſſe and greedy enemy, if he ſhould once get the victory, would no whit ſpare them, although they ſhould as neuters ſtand looking on, and helpe neither party: for victory (as they I ſaid) alwaies full of inſolent pride, would know no friend but ſuch as with reſolute hand did their vttermoſt deuoire in time of danger for the obtaining thereof.

The Egyptians diuerſly affected toward the Mamalukes.

There were many of the wealthieſt of the Ægyptians, who as they thought the change of the ſtate would be hurtfull to their trades and wealth, ſo were they ready in all they could to helpe the Mamalukes their old lords: ſo on the other ſide there were many of the middle ſort of the citiſens, and a far greater multitude of the baſeſt ſort of the vulgar people, who hauing little or nothing to loſe, liued in hope now to make a gaine of other mens loſſes; and withall, remembring what miſery and ſlauery they had endured about the ſpace of three hundred yeares, vnder the proud gouernment of the Mamalukes, kept themſelues cloſe in their houſes, expecting the laſt euent of wars; and ſecretly rejoycing in their hearts, that the time was come K (God ſo appointing) wherein their outragious and cruell maſters ſhould be juſtly and worthily puniſhed for their oppreſſion and hard dealing; and that which gladded them the more, was, That the reuenge ſhould be taken by the hazard of other mens liues, with which wiſhed ſpectacle they well hoped ſhortly to fill their deſired eies.

Tomombeius with much labour and greater care, fortified all the gates and entrances of the city, appointed vnto euery ſtreet a particular captain, in euery publike place encouraged the people, omitting nothing that could poſſibly be done or deuiſed; and that which in ſo great a calamity and danger was of all other things the hardeſt, with cheerefull countenance and vndaunted courage made ſhew of greateſt hope. The Mamalukes alſo, beſide the neceſſity L (which in caſes of extremity is of power to encourage and make deſperate the faint hearted coward) prouoked with emulation, ſtraue amongſt themſelues, who ſhould beſt performe all the duties of worthy captaines and ſouldiers: for euery one of them according to his conceit and deuice, cauſed great ditches or great timber-logs to be caſt ouerthwart the ſtreets; ſome in couert trenches ſet vp ſharpe ſtakes, whereupon the enemy falling vnawares might be gaged; otherſome according to their ſtore, furniſhed the windowes and fronts of their houſes in the greateſt and moſt open ſtreets, with harquebuſiers: all which things with many moe, were done with ſuch celerity, that none of the beſt and moſt honourable of the Mamalukes refuſed to handle a ſpade or a mattocke, or to put his hand to any other baſe labour; ſo that nothing could be ſooner deuiſed, but it was forthwith performed.

This great and antient city of Caire was not compaſſed with any wals, yet were there di- M uers gates and entrances which led vnto it: whereof one broad ſtrait ſtreet came directly from the Eaſt gate vnto the caſtle and middle of the city; the reſt were ſo narrow and crooked, that by them no great artillery could poſſibly be brought, or ſoldiers enter without great danger. Into this place eſpecially had Tomombeius conueied his chiefeſt ſtrength; for that he knew his

A enemies muſt of neceſſity come in that way for the largeneſſe of the ſtreets; the other part of the city be kept with leſſe garriſons. But the innermoſt part where the caſtle ſtood, was kept with a very great and ſtrong garriſon of moſt valiant ſoldiers: that whitherſoeuer the clamor of the enemy or danger of the battell ſhould call, they might ſpeedily from thence come with reliefe. For why, that city of all other the greateſt, could not with ſo ſmall a power as Tomom-beius then had, be in euery place and entrance ſufficiently defended: for within the circuit of Memphis (now called Caire) are contained three great cities, which joyned one to another with ſtragling bridges, make one city; wherof the greateſt and moſt populous, is at this day called new Caire. It lieth in length ſix miles, alongſt the riuer Nilus, from which it is equally diſtant a mile: the breadth thereof exceedeth not a mile and a quarter. In the midſt thereof B is a caſtle ſtanding vpon a little riſing ground, ſomewhat higher than the reſt of the city; more notable for the beauty and greatneſſe thereof, than for the manner of the fortification: for in it were many Princely gardens, a faire ſtreet with many large galleries, diuers faire tilt-yards and courts, with ſtately chambers opening euery way: the vtter part thereof was garniſhed round about with towers, fortreſſes, and beautifull battlements, from whence all parts of the city, the riuer Nilus running by, and the high Pyramides, were moſt pleaſantly to be ſeene.
Not far from this Princely pallace, is a lake made by the hand of man, the water wherein deri-ued from the riuer Nilus, is on euery ſide incloſed with moſt ſtately buildings; and is a place of wonderfull pleaſure, when as a man ſtanding at a window may take both fiſh & foule, wher-of there is in the lake great ſtore. Another lake there is far greater and fairer than this, in form C of a triangle, in the vttermoſt part of this new city of Caire toward Bulach: it is filled at the riſing of Nilus by a great ſluce made of ſtone with yron floudgates, and being joyned to the great riuer by a broad channell, is able to beare ſmall boats and barges; wherein gentlemen for their diſport vſed to ſolace themſelues both by day and night in courting their miſtreſſes. The houſes were all gallantly built afront all about the lake, with porches garniſhed with open ga-leries, and paued with ſmooth marble euen to the brim of the lake: there the citizens in their more proſperous times vſed to row vp and downe in boats, and with pleaſant muſicke to delight the liſtening eares of the hearers. On the Eaſt ſide of this lake ſtood a moſt ſumptuous and ſtately pallace, the late work of queene Dultibe wife of the great Sultan Caytbeius, for manner of the building & inward beauty far exceeding the other proud buildings of this pleaſant D place: for the wals gliſtered with red marble, and pargetting of diuers colors, yea, all the houſe was paued with checker and teſſeled worke; the windowes and gates were made of alablaſter, white marble, and much other ſpotted marble; the poſts and wickets of maſſie yuory, checkered with gliſtering black ebony; ſo curiouſly wrought in winding knots, as might eaſilier ſtay than ſatisfie the eies of the wondering beholder: neither was the furniture in it inferiour to the magnificence of the building, but ſuch as might fitly anſwer both a princes ſtate, and a womans quaint deſire. All which things ſhortly after (Selymus hauing obtained the victory) carried to Conſtantinople; not ſparing the very wals, but plucking them down, ſo to take out the curious ſtones whole. Beſide the goodly buildings about that lake, in euery place of New Caire was to be ſeene the faire houſes of the chiefe Mamalukes, more commended for their E commodiouſneſſe, than for the manner of their building. The reſt of the buildings of the city was but low, repleniſhed with the common ſort of baſe people. There are yet extant in diuers places of the city, three churches of the Chriſtians; wherof one is holden in greater reuerence than the reſt, for the fame of a low vault in the ground, where it is reported the Virgin Mary flying the fury of Herod, to haue repoſed her ſelfe with her child Chriſt Ieſus the Sauiour of the World: another dedicated to the Virgin Barbara: and the third to S. George, which amongſt thoſe nations are of great fame. Vnto the city of New Caire, the city of Bulacha is joyned almoſt with continuall buildings. It is of an high and ſtately building, lying cloſe vnto the riuer Nilus, and was in Summer time frequented by the Mamalukes and other noble men, that they might at their pleaſure from their high places behold the inundation of that famous ri-F uer. There land all the ſhips which come vp the riuer; yet the great meeting of the Merchants is at New Caire. On the other ſide of the riuer ouer againſt Bulach, are many cottages made of hurdles and leaues of Date trees, the dwellings of poore fiſhermen and watermen. A little aboue Bulach is old Caire, which is alſo joyned vnto the new city with continuall buildings; yet diſtant from it about two miles and a halfe, and ſtandeth alſo faſt by the riuer Nilus.

Ouer againſt it in the midſt of the riuer is an Iſland, notable for the pleaſantneſſe of the gardens and banqueting houſes therin: in it is an antient temple, famous for the loue of king Pharaos daughter, and the danger of Moſes (a moſt antient hiſtory, yet euery where there ſtil freſh in memory.) But moſt part of the buildings of old Caire, are now grown into gardens and rude ruins. It is ſuppoſed by many probable conjectures, that there ſomtime ſtood the antient city of Memphis. Vpon the banke of the riuer, the late Sultan Campſon built a ſumptuous tower, ouertopping the caſtle in new Caire, to conuey water thither out of Nilus; which being by many wheeles and ingenious deuiſes forced into the top thereof, and there receiued into great ciſterns, was from thence by pipes of ſtone and lead, conueied into all places of the kings great palace at new Caire. About fiue miles diſtant from old Caire on Affricke ſide, ſtand the Pyramides, monuments of the barbarous Ægyptian kings vanity; whoſe proud names and titles Time hath worne out of thoſe huge and wonderfull buildings, of purpoſe made for the vaine eterniſing of their fame and endleſſe wealth; ſo that of them it may now well be ſaid,

The pyramides of Ægypt.

Miramur perijſſe homines? monumenta fatiſcunt: Interitus ſaxis nominibuſque venit.

What wonder we that men do die? the ſtately tomes do weare:
The very ſtones conſume to nought, with titles they did beare.

Within them are the ſepulchres of the old Ægyptian Kings, diuided into chappels, garniſhed with ſtone of great price curiouſly wrought. Yet are thoſe places loathſome of ſmell, and for darkeneſſe thereof, dreadfull to behold: for as men go downe to come into them by a narrow way, almoſt ſwarued vp with rubbiſh, their lights are oftentimes put out with the dampe of the earth and ſwarmes of remiſe flying about their eares. Some hauing got to the tops of them, report, that the watch tower of Alexandria, and the mouth of the riuer Nilus where it falleth into the ſea, is from thence well to be ſeene: and that for the great height of them, a man cannot ſhoot an arrow ſo high as the midſt of the lower tower wheron the ſpire ſtandeth. Of theſe outragious buildings are written many ſtrange and almoſt incredible things, as that an hundred thouſand men ſhould be occupied continually by the ſpace of twenty yeares, in building of one of them: during which time, the charges for roots, garlike, and onions onely, amounted to 1600 talents of ſiluer. Theſe wonderfull Pyramides only excepted, nothing is in the three cities more to be wondred at than the multitude of the people, who in number almoſt incredible go vp and downe euery ſtreet: but for moſt part ragged and torne, for that they which held any wealth, durſt not make any ſhew thereof for feare of the Mamalukes. The common people did then generally liue with mutton, hens, and riſe, whereof the country yeeldeth plenty: neither had they as yet the knowledge of the curious but vnwholeſome forced diſhes, and prouocations of glottony, which other nations had to their great coſt and hurt inuented. But againe to our purpoſe.

Selymus encourageth his ſouldiers to the winning of Caire.

When Selymus vnderſtood aſſuredly, that Tomombeius was retired into Caire, and that the Mamalukes hauing thither aſſembled all their ſtrength, were reſolued there to proue the vttermoſt of their fortune: he with his army drew neerer vnto the city, exhorting his ſoldiers to ſet downe themſelues that day for euer to vanquiſh and ſubdue their enemies, whom they had ſo many times before ouerthrowne; and now a little to force themſelues for the gaining of the rewards due to their former labors and victories: which (as he ſaid) would be ſo many and ſo great, as they had not the full thereof before in their immoderat deſires imagined. Telling them moreouer, that there was but a few good ſoldiers left with the deſolat Sultan, who already wounded and terrified, and not able longer to keep the field, had made choice to end their daies in the ſight & arms of their wiues and children. Beſide that, he made them beleeue, that he was voluntarily ſent for by the Ægyptians, deadly enemies vnto the very name of the Mamalukes, whoſe vtter deſtruction they earneſtly expected: and had therfore promiſed him for the rooting vp of that wicked and cruell kind of men, to aſſaile them as occaſion ſerued out of their houſes, and ſo to further his victory: yet neuertheles he ſaid, that the accompliſhment of the whole matter, and to make a full conqueſt, conſiſted in the ſubduing of thoſe weak remainders of the vanquiſhed and ſcattered army; foraſmuch as they were not to be accounted as men quite

A quite ouercome,which did yet liue in hope,with weapons in their hands,poſſeſſed of the chiefe city and ſeate of their Empire. Wherfore that they ſhould thinke,That in the fortune of that day,reſted the good or bad eſtate and condition of all their liues, honours,and fortunes. Aſſuring them,that it would be a matter but of ſmall labour and trauell, to bring it to a wiſhed end,if they would in that new kind of fight (as they had alwaies valiantly in other battels vnder his conduct)but reſolue with themſelues, that they would ouercome.

This is ſpeech much inflamed the minds of his ſouldiers, but the hope of ſo great a prey much more: ſo that being in good order and ready,they expected but the ſigne of the aſſault.
When Selymus entering by the gate called Baſuela,did at one inſtant thruſt in his horſemen at diuers places of the great city; but his Ianizaries he brought in by the greateſt and largeſt B ſtreet. At the firſt entrance of the City, horſemen encountred with horſemen, and made a bloudy fight in the narrow ſtreets and lanes: but the footmen placing their culuerins and falcons before, and ſuddenly diſcharging them where they ſaw the thickeſt troups of their enemies,cleered the ſtreet directly before them. But when they came to the barricado's and trenches, and were by force to remoue the timber-logs and other like things lying croſſe the ſtreets,and ſo to paſſe the trenches, the Mamalukes on the other ſide vilantly withſtanding them; they fought with ſuch force and obſtinacy on both parts, that in the memory of man was neuer a more fierce and cruell battell ſeene. For both the Mamalukes and the Turks in that fight ſhewed the vttermoſt of their ſtrength and power: not ignorant, that in that, as in the laſt,they were to fight not for honour only, but euen for their liues and Empire; when as C greateſt rewards, or elſe extreame miſery, were by dallying fortune on both ſides propounded both to the vanquiſhed and vanquiſher. At theſe barricado's the Turks receiued great loſſe, as alſo at the trenches; for they vnaduiſedly running on, the hindermoſt ſtill bearing forward the foremoſt,tumbled by heapes one vpon another in the couert trenches, and were there miſerably impailed vpon the ſharpe ſtakes,for that purpoſe before ſet vp by the Mamalukes.The women alſo and children, with manly courage threw downe ſtones and tyles, and ſuch other things from the tops of their houſes,and out at their windowes, vpon the Turks: and they on the other ſide as they could eſpy them,fetcht them off from thoſe high places with their harquebuſies, or elſe violently brake into the houſes from whence they were aſſailed, and there fought with diuers ſucceſſe. But moſt part of the Ægyptians, diligently obſeruing the fortune D both of the one and of the other (accounting them both for enemies) with diuers affection aſſailed ſometimes the Turks, and ſometimes the Mamalukes, ſeeming ſtill notably to helpe that part whom they ſaw for the time to haue the better. Many cruell and moſt terrible incounters were at once made in diuers places of the city: for as they croſſed from ſtreet to ſteet,ſometime the one,and ſomtime the other hapned vpon new troups of enemies; and they which as victors purſued their enemies afront,were by others following them at the heeles, ſlain downe right;ſo that in the victory no man could aſſure themſelues of ſafety. The lanes and ſtreets(a moſt horrible thing to behold)did ſo flow with the bloud of them which lay by heaps ſlaine, that the duſt which at the firſt roſe wonderfull thicke, was quite layd, as with a plentifull ſhoure of raine:the aire was darkned with the ſmoke of ſhot,and ſhowers of arrows: E and ſuch was the clamor of the people and ſoldiers,the clattering of armor, and report of the artillery,that the earth ſeemed to tremble,and the houſes to fall downe.

A moſt mortall battel ſought in Caire.

This dreadfull and doubtfull fight endured two whole daies and nights without intermiſſion: yet ſo,that the Mamalukes in number few,and not able to endure ſo long labour and watchings, giuing ground by little and little, and forſaking their firſt munitions, retyred themſelues further into the city. The third day, beſet with the greateſt danger that could be, as to loſe themſelues with all that they had, (which commonly enforceth mens courages in their laſt attempts) they renewed the battell with ſuch reſolution, that they conſtrained the Turks to retire a great way,and for haſt to leaue behind them certaine of their fiield-pieces. With which repulſe it is reported,that Selymus diſpairing of victory,commanded to ſet fire vpon the F houſes; moued thereunto with juſt diſpleaſure againſt the Ægyptians, for that Ionuſes Baſſa, now his greateſt man of war, had euen before his face receiued a dangerous wound in his head, by a ſtone caſt out at a window.

A long and terrible fight.

Now were the houſes pittifully burning, and the Ægyptians weeping and wailing cried for mercy. The Turks themſelues fought but faintly, expecting the ſound of the retreat: when newes was ſuddenly brought by many at once, that the enemies in the other ſide of the city, G were by Muſtapha Baſſa enforced to retire, and afterward had betaken themſelues to flight, as to their laſt refuge. For Muſtapha by the ouerture of the Ægyptians and fugitiue Mamalukes, was directed to a faire broad ſtreet, where the Mamalukes had left their horſes ready ſadled and bridled; that if the worſt ſhould chance, they might thither retire, and taking horſe, ſpeed themſelues to ſuch places of refuge as they had before thought vpon. All theſe horſes, reſerued by the Mamalukes as their laſt refuge, Muſtapha tooke away, hauing before put to flight the garriſon which kept them, which was but weake, conſiſting for moſt part of horſe-boies, and muletors; as ſafe enough in ſuch a place of the city as was leaſt to be ſuſpected and feared.

This accident (as it oftentimes falleth out in great and vnexpected miſchances) did not a little daunt the courage of the Mamalukes: who now ſeeing themſelues hardly beſet, and that H dereadfull battell by no other hope or helpe maintained, but only by courage; being in their own judgements ouercome, betooke themſelues to flight. Moſt part of them haſting to the riuer of Nilus with Tomombeius (who in that battell had all in vaine proued the vttermoſt of his proweſſe and policy) being tranſported ouer the riuer in boats, fled into the country of Segeſta: others of them hid themſelues in the houſes of the Ægyptians, and in the loathſome corners of the city. A thouſand fiue hundred of the better ſort of the Mamalukes fled vnto the greateſt Temple of their vain Prophet: where after they had a great while valianlty defended themſelues as out of a ſtrong caſtle, becauſe they would not yeeld themſelues but vpon honorable conditions, at laſt ouercome with thirſt, wearineſſe, and wounds, together with the fury of the great artillery, they yeelded themſelues to the pleaſure of the conqueror: part of whom I the furious ſoldiers ſlew in the porch of the ſame Temple, and the reſt within a few daies after were ſent downe the riuer to Alexandria, there to be afterwards murthered.

Selymus hauing thus gained the victory, forthwith ſent part of his army to quench the fire then raging, and cauſed proclamation to be made thorow al the city, That all the Mamalukes which would yeeld themſelues within twelue houres, ſhould be taken to mercy; but vnto ſuch as yeelded not within the appointed time, ſhould remaine no hope of life. Vnto the Ægyptians alſo that ſhould reueale the hidden Mamalukes, hee propoſed rewards: but to ſuch as ſhould conceale them, he threatned to impaile them vpon ſtakes, and hauing ſold their wiues and children, to burne their houſes: vpon which proclamation, many of the Mamalukes before crept into corners, came forth and yeelded themſelues, & were forthwith caſt into yrons. K All which were ſhortly after, contrary to his promiſe, moſt diſhonourably murthered in priſon, (becauſe it was giuen out, they ſought means to haue eſcaped. Many of the Ægyptians which would not breake the bonds of faith and fidelity with the Mamalukes their old lords, being appeached by their malitious neighbours, moſt conſtantly died for their friends, for whoſe ſake they had vowed themſelues to death.

With this victory the Turks growing inſolent, ranſackt euery place of the city, drew out the Mamalukes that had hid themſelues, and ſlew them, rifled the houſes of the Ægyptians, as well friends as foes, and left nothing ſhut vp or in ſecret. And ſome there were, which at one time in the ſame houſes raged with couetouſneſſe, cruelty, and luſt; euery man fitting his owne humour, whereunto he was by nature or cuſtome inclined: for that in time and place of ſo L great liberty, moſt men, but eſpecially the common ſouldier, flattereth himſelfe to the full, making conſcience of nothing, but meaſuring all things according to his inſolent and diſordered appetite. The ſame day that Selymus tooke Caire, Gazelles (who but a little before by the commandement of Tomombeius, was gone to Thebais, to aſſemble the Arabians and to entertaine new ſupplies) came to Caire; but finding all loſt, and ſeeing no poſſibility either by force or policy to preuaile, and therefore thinking it not good againe to proue the fortune of war, which had ſo often with contrary courſe fruſtrated the endeuours both of himſelfe and his partakers; he came to Selymus, vpon his faith before giuen for the ſafety of himſelfe and his followers (which were three Arabian captains, and a number of good horſemen) and being M admitted to his preſence, in the midſt of his greateſt captaines boldly ſpake vnto him as followeth:

Gazelles his ſpeech to Selymus.

If fortune, whom by thy great valour thou haſt won to be thy friend, had not enuied our felicity, thou ſhouldeſt not haue (moſt noble Selymus, at this time, after that all things haue giuen place vnto thy valour)

A valour) matter whereby thou mighteſt excell others in worthineſſe of mind alſo. Whileſt we were in arms againſt thee for our liues and kingdome, our wealth and ſtate yet ſtanding whole, we alwaies as men proudly preſuming vpon their owne vaine ſtrength, made little account of thee or the name of the Turks; yea, to ſay the truth, we hated thee as became enemies: But now that we haue to the vttermoſt of our power made proofe of thy force, and haue in all battels beene put to the worſe; admiring both thy wonderfull and diuine proweſſe, and moſt proſperous victories (not giuen thee without the prouidence of the immortall God) we humbly come vnto thee, by thy goodneſſe to better our hard and aduerſe fortune: that thou by ſparing and pardoning thy vanquiſhed and yeelding enemies (by which only vertue men come neereſt vnto the gods) maieſt extend thy name aud fame aboue the bounds of the reſt of thine immortall glory. We haue faithfully ſerued Tomombeius, ſo long as he held the ſtrength and maieſty, yea, but the B name of a King, or liued in any countenance: but ſeeing he is (his deſtiny ſo requiring) driuen out of his country, and wandreth the deſerts, with vncertaine report whether he liue or not; we come vnto thee, rather as men of him forſaken, than ſuch as haue forſaken their Prince; ready to ſhew vnto thee our loyalty and valour in our better condition and ſtate: if we may by thy goodneſſe, changing our hard fortune, liue and ſerue vnder thy worthy conduct.

Selymus, for that he right well knew Gazelles both for his vertue and valor, wherewith valiant men win credit euen with their greateſt enemies, and alſo deſiring to joine in league & friendſhip with the Arabians (or rather Alarbes) whom he knew of all others to be moſt to be feared, receiued them all courteouſly: appointing vnto euery one of them an honourable penſi- C on, and perſuading them to forget their old eſtate, willed them to looke for far greater things of his bounty. Not long after, when as the Moores and wilde Arabians, with certaine Mamalukes that were fled to the city of Achaſia, made incurſions into the country about Caire, and oftentimes did cut off the Turks which went any thing far from the city to ſeeke abroad for forrage, he ſent Gazelles with part of his army to repreſſe them: who hauing quickly won and ſackt Achaſia, and ſlaine moſt part of thoſe aduenturers, to his owne great praiſe, and the wonderfull contentation of Selymus, honourably returned in leſſe time than was expected.

In the meane time, Tomombeius in the country of Segeſta (which is on the other ſide of Nilus towards Cyrenaica) miſerably beſet with ſo many miſchiefes, began to make head againe. There were come vnto him a ſtrong company of Mamalukes from Alexandria, which he had D by letters ſent for out of the garriſon of that city, and many others had followed him in his flight from Caire. And there were not wanting many great men amongſt the Arabians and Moores (the inhabitants of that country) which promiſed him their help and furtherance. Beſide that, many of the Ægyptians whoſe houſes and families were become a prey and booty vnto the inſolent Turks, promiſed him, That if he would by night come to Caire, they would raiſe ſuch a tumult in the city, as ſhould eaſily worke the confuſion of the Turks; foraſmuch as they all hauing endured moſt horrible indignities and villanies, could no longer abide thoſe moſt inſolent men to rage and reigne ouer them. They ſent him word alſo, that the Turks huge army was now brought to a contemptible number, moſt part of them being ſlaine in the battell at Caire: and the reſt being for the greateſt part brought to extreame weakeneſſe with E wounds and ſickneſſe. For which cauſes as Tomombeius his forces increaſed daily, ſo hope alſo, which neuer faileth the poore vanquiſhed and diſtreſſed king, began now alſo to reuiue in his inuincible heart, aboue the condition of his miſerable eſtate. So that fawning fortune, which euen then moſt cruelly and deſpightfully went about vtterly to ſupplant him (of all other diſtreſſed Princes moſt miſerable) ſeemed but then firſt to change her frowning countenance, and to promiſe vnto him moſt happy and proſperous ſucceſſe.

Albuchomar diſcouereth to Selymus the power of Tomombeius, and the trechery of them of Caire.

Whileſt Tomombeius was making this preparation, one Albuchomar, an Ægyptian, for authority and wealth the greateſt man by far in all the country of Segeſta, whether it were to auert the miſery of the preſent war out of his country; or elſe by the pleaſure of his reuolt to gaine the good liking of Selymus, vpon whom all things ſeemed to fawne, came and certified him both F of Tomombeius his ſtrength, and of the new practiſes of the citizens of Caire. Whereupon Selymus cauſed ſtrong watch and ward to be kept in all places of that great city: and ſuch citizens as he ſuſpected to fauour Tomombeius, he ſhut vp in the caſtle; which being before abandoned by Tomombeius, was then together with the city in his poſſeſſion: and placed all alongſt the Riuer, boates furniſhed with men and artillery, to keepe and defend the farther banke of Nilus, and to impeach Tomombeius his paſſage ouer. Yet conſidering with himſelfe, with how great danger he had ſo many times fought with thoſe deſperat enemies, and what a difficulty it would be to intercept Tomombeius, (protracting the war in thoſe vaſt and vnknowne countries, and ſtill preparing greater forces, without whom he could nothing aſſure himſelfe of all his former victories) to proue if he might be won by clemency and bounty, he reſolued to ſend Embaſſadours vnto him, to perſuade him to lay downe armes, and after ſo many ouerthows, at laſt to acknowledge the fortune of the victor: and withall to promiſe him vpon the faith of a Prince, That if he would come in and ſubmit himſelfe, he ſhould of the courteſie and bounty of the conquerour, vpon conditions reaſonable repoſſeſſe that his late kingdome, which he ſhould neuer be able by force to regaine. But if he would needs deſperatly proceed to make head againe, forgetting his offered grace, together with his owne diſability, he ſhould afterward when the matter was againe tried by battell, by his owne iuſt deſert neuer more find at the hands of his angry enemy, any regard of his princely ſtate or dignity.

The cauſes mouing Selymus to ſend Embaſſadors to Tomombeius.

For Selymus ſeeing himſelfe by the courſe of his victories drawne into a far country, and not without cauſe fearing with ſo ſmall power as he had left, to be oppreſſed in that ſo great and populous a city, euen with the very multitude, men of doubtfull faith; thought it better by ſome honorable compoſition to aſſure himſelfe of ſome great part of that he had won, than by going on, to thruſt himſelfe with his army into new dangers, with the hazard of all. Beſides that, he was certainly aduertiſed, That the Mamalukes before fled into diuers countries, were in euery place leuying new ſupplies of horſemen: and that the fleet which gone into the Arabian gulfe againſt the Portugals, was daily expected at the port Suezzia, wherein were three thouſand Mamalukes, vnder the leading of Amyraſes and Ray Salomon, two expert captains, with great ſtore of good braſſe ordnance: by which good helps Tomombeius ſtood in faire poſſibility to recouer his former loſſes, and to returne againe to Caire, whither he was by his ſecret friends moſt earneſtly inuited. But aboue all things, the care he had of the Perſians moſt induced him to thinke of peace: for feare that if the Baſſa whom he had left at the mountaine Taurus, ſhould not be able to withſtand the forces of the Perſian King, he ſhould ſo be excluded out of Aſia the leſſer, and Syria alſo, before his fleet could from Conſtantinople arriue with new ſupply of men and victuall at Alexandria.

Selymus his embaſſadors ſlaine by the Mamalukes.

Wherefore he ſent certaine of the moſt reuerend of his Turkiſh Religious, and with them ſome of the moſt honourable Ægyptians, Embaſſadors to Tomombeius: who paſſing ouer Nilus, into the country Segeſta, were without further hearing, with more than barbarous cruelty ſlaine by certaine Mamalukes which chanced vpon them: thinking thereby to gratifie Tomombeius, as yet not knowing of any ſuch matter, and to manifeſt their affection towards him, as alſo that they were not deſirous of any peace with the Turks.

This proud and inſolent fact vtterly brake Selymus his patience, and ſhortly after made an end of that mortall war, together with the honour of the Mamalukes. For he being a man of an hot and cruell nature, euen when he was nothing at all moued, could by no meanes brooke that his enemies, ſo often vanquiſhed and put to flight, ſhould ſo lightly reject his offers vnto them as the caſe ſtood, both honorable and profitable; and that worſe was, violate his Embaſſadors againſt the law of Nations, moſt religiouſly kept euen amongſt the moſt barbarous and ſauage people. Wherefore prouoked by ſo great an injury, he carefully prouided for all things neceſſary for his expedition into Segeſta againſt Tomombeius. And becauſe it ſtood not with his honour (as he tooke it) nor with the good of his preſent ſeruice, to paſſe the riuer by boats, he gathering together all the ſmall veſſels and lighters he could poſſibly, made thereof a large and ſtrong bridge ouer Nilus.

Tomombeius vnderſtanding by his eſpials, and from his friends at Caire, of the preparations of Selymus, and of the bridge he had made; fearing alſo the reuolt of the country people, whom he probably ſuſpected to be alienated from him, by the reuolt of Albuchomar, a man of ſo great power and authority amongſt them; determined once againe to proue the fortune of battell, which had ſo often deceiued his expectation. For he juſtly meaſuring of his own ſtrength, and finding himſelfe in all things inferior to his mighty enemy, well ſaw that he was neither able to protract the war, neither in open field to abide his comming with all his forces; and to fly further into the deſarts, was as he deemed it, nothing elſe but to make ſhipwrack of that ſmall remainder that was left of his honour and credit. Wherfore by the aduice of his beſt captains

A (which was the laſt indeuor both of himſelfe and of the Mamalukes) he departed betime out of the prouince of Segeſta with foure thouſand Mamalukes, and twice as many Moores and Arabians, and trauelled day and night without intermiſſion to come to the riuer Nilus. By that deſperat attempt to deceiue the Turks, ſuſpecting no ſuch thing from their vanquiſhed and weake enemy: as alſo by celerity to preuent the fame of his comming; hoping ſo by his ſudden and vnexpected approch to ouerthrow that part of the Turks army which ſhould firſt paſſe the riuer, before they could poſſibly be relieued from the other ſide. Neither was he deceiued in the computation of the time, which he hauing before exactly caſt, with the maner of his trauell, fell out ſo fitly, that he came to the place he deſired, euen at ſuch time as the Aſian horſemen were come ouer the bridge, as he had before gueſſed. The harbengers and pages B of Selymus his chamber, which were gone ſomething further than the reſt, to make choice of the moſt commodious place for the erecting of the Emperors pauillion; by the riſing of the duſt, firſt perceiued the comming of the enemy: and Muſtapha the great Baſſa aduertiſed therof, ſuddenly raiſed an alarum: which ſo vnexpected a matter brought a great feare both on them which were already paſt ouer, and alſo on them that were on the further ſide of the riuer.

Tomombeius preſently aſſailing his enemies, as yet but putting themſelues in order, and repairing to their enſignes, at the firſt onſet ſlew ſuch as made reſiſtance, and the reſt he diſcomfited & put to flight. Neither was Muſtapha the great commander (although he did what poſſibly he could, by his owne example to haue incouraged them) able either by his owne inuincible courage or other perſuaſion, after his firſt ranks were ouerthrowne, to repaire his diſorde- C red battel, or ſtay the flight of his men: for in that ſo hot and ſudden a skirmiſh all was full of tumult, ſlaughter, doubtfulneſſe, and feare; and all alongſt the banke of the riuer, both aboue and beneath the bridge, were to be ſeen fearfull companies of the Turks, ruthfully looking vpon the riuer, and crying vnto their fellowes on the other ſide for helpe. Many forced by the furious enemy, tooke the riuer and there periſhed: others ſtriuing at the end of the bridge, to returne that way, and ouerborne by their fellowes or others continually ſent from the further ſide, or elſe amaſed with feare, fell into the riuer, and were there drowned: the bridge was ſo broad, that foure horſmen abreſt might eaſily paſſe ouer at once, and ſo great numbers of them in ſhort ſpace be conueied ouer. But when the great ordnance (the Turks chiefe ſtrength) was alſo to be tranſported, fewer troups of horſemen were ſent ouer, than either the greatneſſe D of the preſent danger, or ſuddenneſſe of the chance required. Neither did their great artillery as then ſtand them in any ſtead, for that it could neither be ſo ſpeedily conueied ouer, nor without great hurt be diſcharged from the hither banke to the further, by reaſon of their own men ſtanding betweene them and the enemy.

Tomombeius diſtreſſeth the Turks in paſſing the bridge made ouer Nilus.

In the meane time Selymus, who in the beginning of the skirmiſh came downe to the riuers ſide, filled a great number of boats, and other ſmall veſſels with his Ianizaries with their harquebuſies, and withall haſted his horſemen ouer the bridge to relieue their fellowes diſtreſſed on the further ſide: in which boats the nimble watermen vſed ſuch diligence in landing of ſome, and preſently in fetching ouer of others, that in ſhort time they had tranſported diuers bands of thoſe moſt ready and valiant ſoldiers: whoſe comming wonderfully comforted the E Aſian ſoldiers, euen now at the laſt caſt, and ready to haue giuen ouer. Canoglis alſo, the Tartar kings ſon, and Selymus his brother in law, encouraging his horſemen to take the riuer, with loſſe of ſome few of his men recouered the further ſide, to the great admiration of the beholders: which in that nation was not ſo much to be maruelled at, as they which by troups with their horſes had oftentimes ſwam ouer the great riuers Taurus and Volga, no leſſe dangerous than was the riuer Nilus.

Tomombeius at the ſame time, for that he ſaw ſpeedy victory to conſiſt in one thing eſpecially, ſerring his troups together, ſtrained himſelfe with might and maine, to haue gained the head of the bridge, that by plucking away ſome few of the firſt boats, he might ſhut in his enemies already come ouer; and by cutting the cables wherby the boats were faſtened to the F banke, all the bridge with the Turks vpon it, might be borne away with the force and violence of that great riuer: whereupon riſe a moſt cruell and deadly fight, for the reſolute Mamalukes in the front of the battell fought valiantly: and Muſtapha well conſidering the danger, had drawn to that place both his enſignes & his beſt ſoldiers: ſo that there was fought ſuch a fight, as a matter of ſo great conſequence required: the Mamalukes plainly ſeeing, that if they could obtaine the place,they ſhould ſhortly after with little ado,ouerthrow all the former victories of their enemies. And the Turks no leſſe ignorant, that except they kept the bridge whole, they were all but loſt men that were already come ouer;and that the reſt of the army together with their Emperor ſo far from home,and in the midſt of his enemies, muſt of neceſſity ſhortly after run the ſame fortune. But Muſtapha well relieued by the Ianizaries and the Europeian horſmen,which were now come ouer in great number,not onely receiued his enemies charge, but preſſing vpon them,gained ground, and by little and little inforced them to retire.This is that Muſtapha the Hungarian, and Bajazet his ſon in law, which for his owne glory and perpetuall fame, built that notable, ſtately, and ſumptuous ſtone bridge (of the ſpoiles of this victory) ouer the riuer Stremon,which at this day men paſſing ouer into Thracia, wonder at, as at a worke beſeeming the greatneſſe of the Roman Empire.

Tomombeius,to giue a time of breathing to his Mamalukes,who,their horſes for wearines now fainting vnder them,were not able longer to ſhew their wonted courage;and deſirous by them again to proue the vttermoſt fortune of the battell,exhorted the Moores & Arabians, a while to charge the enemy, which thing they after the maner of their fight valiantly performed:and ſhortly after,the Mamalukes hauing a little breathed themſelues & their horſes,came in afreſh and renewed the battell; with ſuch fury that Selymus doubting the victory (although he was by his moſt faithfull counſellors perſuaded to the contrary)yet doubted not to aduenture the bridge, and in perſon himſelfe to go and relieue his diſtreſſed ſoldiers:who by his comming in, encouraged, and in the ſight of their Emperor deſiring euery man for his part by ſome notable ſeruice to deſerue both credit and preferment, repreſſed the fury of the enemy; who in ſhort time after,by the comming on of certain freſh companies of Ianizaries,were notably repulſed,and ſo at length put to flight:whom the horſmen which were not in the battell,purſued all the fields ouer. At length alſo the Tartarians (who carried away with the force of the ſtream,were ſomwhat long before they could recouer the farther bank and come to their enemies)were now come in alſo, and with their ſwift horſes following the chaſe, augmented the ſlaughter. But Selymus aboue all things deſirous of Tomombeius, preſently commanded Muſtapha the great Baſſa,Gazelles,and Cayerbeius,with certaine freſh troups of light horſemen to purſue him at the heeles,and if it were poſſible not to ſuffer him to eſcape : for ſo long as he liued, he could not aſſure himſelfe of any thing he had yet gotten. Theſe vigilant captains not vnmindfull of their charge,followed faſt after him, ouertooke him the next day at the ſluce of a great deepe fen, where he had a little reſted himſelfe and his followers, being then about to cut off a woodden bridge, ſo to haue hindered the enemies purſuit. Some of his followers being there ſlaine, and ſome taken, he was againe inforced to fly. The third day when he had almoſt loſt all his men, and was come with ſome few into the territory of the Secuſſan Prince, theſe great captaines ſtill eagerly purſuing him, and denouncing vnto the poore country people which dwelt in villages thereabout,all extremities and tortures, if they did not with moſt diligent watch and ward ſo keep the paſſages of thoſe mariſhes, as that he ſhould not poſſibly eſcape;he was ſo beſet on euery ſide,that for ſafegard of his life he was glad to hide himſelfe all alone in a foule deepe mariſh : where ſhortly after he the poore Sultan was by the diligent ſearch of the country peaſants found out,hidden among the flags & bulruſhes,ſtanding in the water vp to the ſhoulders,who deliuered him miſerably bound vnto the Turks. Shortly after, he with certaine captains and other of his chiefe friends taken in that flight, was brought to Caire. Selymus before reſolued to put him to death, and the rather for the injury done to his Embaſſadors,would not ſuffer him to come into his preſence, but commanded him to be tortured, ſo to haue cauſed him to haue reuealed the great treaſures of Campſon his predeceſſour, which were thought to haue bin by him hidden:in which moſt horrible and exquiſit torments it is reported, that he with great conſtancy & ſterne countenance vttered nothing but certain deep ſighes and grones,ouercomming with patience the tyranny of the proud conqueror:who after that,commanded him in baſe and ragged apparell,with his hands bound behind him, as a theefe or murtherer condemned to die,to be ſet vpon a foule leane cammell, & ſo to be caried in deriſion through al the publike & notable places of the city; that the Ægyptians might ſee him,whom they but a little before had adored for their king,by chance of fortune caſt into extream miſery, by moſt ſhameful death to end both his life & empire together:when they had thus deſpightfully led him as it were in triumph, & brought him to the chiefe gate of the city

The Mamalukes giue a freſh charge vpon the Turks.

The Mamalukes put to flight.

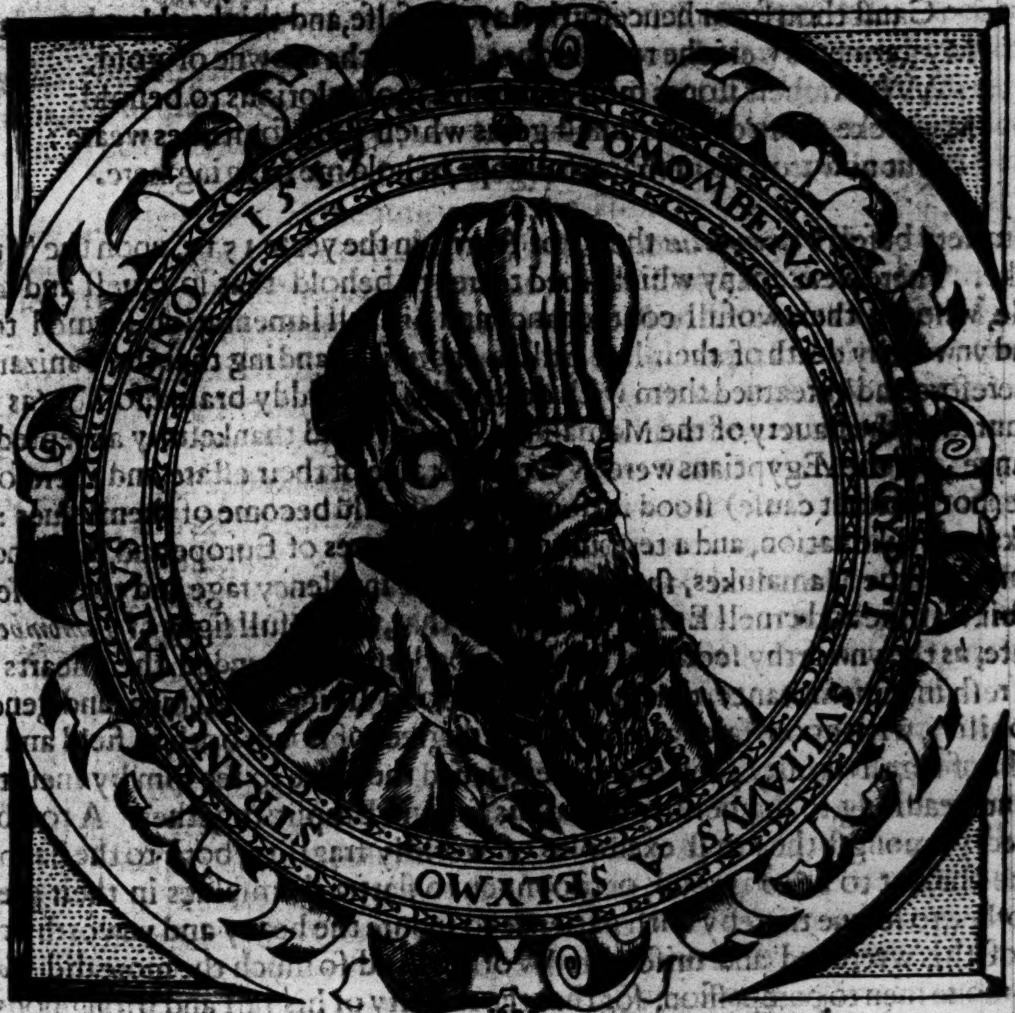
Tomombeius taken & brought to Selymus.

Tomombeius tortured.

A city called Baſuela, they there openly ſtrangled him with a rope: and that he might be the better ſeene, and become more contemptible to all that paſſed that way, they hanged him vp by the necke vpon an yron hooke in an arch of the ſame gate, and ſo left him to the Worlds wonder. Palearius propounding him as a mirror both of the better and worſe fortune, for all men to looke vpon, aptly deſcribeth both his happineſſe and miſery in theſe few verſes following:

The miſerable end of Tomombeius laſt Sultan of Ægypt.

TOMOMBEIVS, THE LAST Sultan of Ægypt.



Paulus Iouius lib. 4. Elog. virorum Illuſtr.

Non fuit in toto, Rex aquè Oriente beatus: Nec magis in toto Rex Oriente miſer, Quam dolor Ægypti, olim Tomombeius, auro Ingenti, atque armis, & ditione potens.
Captus ab hoſte fero, miſerum ſimul atque beatum, Exemplo potis eſt, commonuiſſe ſuo.
Quid rides temerè? quid fles? vis te cohibere?
Et natum poſthac te meminiſſe hominum?
Mitrabeum induto, gemmis auroque corona Cingebat, fulgens & diadema caput.

Mi quandam ornabant pretiosa monilia collum, Nunc fractam miseri vili reste fune gulam.

In English thus:

In all the Eaſt a King more bleſt was no where to be found, Nor in the Eaſt one more accurſt liv'd not vpon the ground, Than Tomombeius, Ægypts griefe, ſometime for ſtore of gold, Of power great for martiall force, and kingdome held in hold.
But taken by his cruell foe, may good example be Both to the happy and diſtreſt, of mans vncertainty.
Why do'ſt thou fondly laugh? Why do'ſt thou vainly crie?
Canſt thou from henceforth ſtay thy ſelfe, and thinke th'art borne to die?
My garments were the royall robes, I wore the crowne of gold, With richeſt ſtones moſt richly ſet, moſt glorious to behold:
My necke adorn'd with richeſt gems which I did ſomtimes weare:
But now truſt vp, in ſhamefull rope, behold me hanging here.

The Egyptians in doubt of their eſtate, bewaile the death of Tomombeius.

This miſery befell Tomombeius the 13 of Aprill, in the yeare 1517, vpon the Munday in Eaſter weeke. There were many which ſhed teares to behold that ſo cruell and lamentable a ſpectacle, who by their wofull countenance and pitifull lamentation ſeemed to deteſt that foule and vnworthy death of their late Sultan; notwithſtanding that the Ianizaries reproued them therefore, and threatned them with death, who like giddy braind fooles (as they termed them) enured to the ſlauery of the Mamalukes, ioyfully and thankefully accepted not of their deliuerance; for the Ægyptians were as yet vncertaine of their eſtate, and therefore as men in ſuſpence (not without cauſe) ſtood in doubt what ſhould become of themſelues: fearing leſt the Turks, a warlike nation, and a terrour to all the Princes of Europe and Aſia, nothing more courteous than the Mamalukes, ſhould with no leſſe inſolency rage and tyranniſe ouer them, vnder their warlike and cruell Emperor. Beſides that, the wofull ſight of Tomombeius hanging in the gate, as the vnworthy ſcorne of fortune, wonderfully wounded their hearts: for why, it was yet freſh in remembrance, that he with the good liking of all men, and generall fauour of the nobility, with good fame riſe vp all the degrees of honor both in field and court, vnto the height of regall dignity; and therefore grieued the more to ſee him by ineuitable deſtiny caſt downe headlong, ſo ſhamefully to end his life and Empire together. A notable ſpectacle vndoubtedly amongſt the rareſt examples of worldly fragility, both to the happy and vnfortunat: the one, not to be too proud, or too much to flatter themſelues in their greateſt bliſſe: and the other, to learne thereby with patience to indure the heauy and vnworthy changes and chances of this wretched and miſerable World. And ſo much the more did Tomombeius ſo hanging moue men to compaſſion, for that the majeſty of his tall and ſtrong body, and reuerend countenance, with his long and hoary beard, well agreed with his imperiall dignity and martiall diſpoſition. The ſame fortune with Tomombeius ran alſo diuers of the Princes of the Mamalukes, with ſome others of the common ſort alſo.

Tomombeius thus taken out of the way, and all the Mamalukes almoſt ſlaine, and no power of the enemy to be heard of in all Ægypt to renew the war: Selymus diuiding his forces, ſent them forth with his captaines, to take in the countries and prouinces of Ægypt lying further off. They of Alexandria after the battel at Caire hauing thruſt out the garriſon, and eaſily ſurpriſed the caſtle of Pharus (which the weake defendants choſe rather vpon the hope of preſent reward to deliuer, than with doubtfull euent to defend) yeelded themſelues many daies before vnto the Turks. Damiata alſo, called in antient time Peluſium, opened their gates, and ſubmitted themſelues to the victors. There was no city betwixt the riuer of Nilus and the borders of Iudea and Arabia, which yeelded not to the obedience of Selymus. The Kings alſo of Affricke bordering vpon Cyrenaica, tributaries or confederats of the Ægyptian Sultans, ſent their Embaſſadors with preſents to Selymus.

There remained none now but the wild Arabians (a people neuer to be tamed) and eſpecially they of Affricke, who hauing loſt many of their friends and kinſmen in aiding Tomombeius, would

A would not(as it was thought)ſubmit themſelues vnto the Turkiſh obedience. This wandring kind of people,liuing for moſt part by theft,had filled the countries from Euphrates,where it runneth by the Palmyrens,with all the inner parts of Ægypt and Affrick vnto the Atlanticke ſea,with huge multitudes of men : and being diuided into many companies vnder diuers leaders haue no certain dwelling places, but liue an hard and frugall kind of life in tents & waggons, after the manner of the Tartars : their greateſt wealth is a good ſeruiceable horſe,with a launce or a bundle of darts : they were alway at diſcord and variance amongſt themſelues, by reaſon whereof they could neuer agree for the expulſing of the Mamalukes, who otherwiſe had not bin able to haue ſtood againſt them, if they ſhould haue ioined their forces together.
So that the late Ægyptian Sultans ſeemed to hold their ſtate and empire among ſo populous B a nation, rather by their diſcord than their owne ſtrength : wherefore Selymus hauing now by fit men, vpon his faith before giuen, allured many of their chieftaines and great commanders to Cair,honorably both entertained and rewarded them. By whoſe example others mooued, came alſo in daily,and hauing receiued their rewards, gaue their Oath of Allegeance to Selymus.
Others which could by no fair promiſes or words be won, being cunningly intercepted by other captains,and deliuered to Selymus,indured the pains of their vain obſtinacy and malice.
The other remote Nations toward Ethiopia, as they had in former time rather acknowledged the friendſhip than the command of the Egyptian Sultans;ſo now induced with the fame of the victory,eaſily joined in like amity with the Turks.

Selymus cunningly reducet; the Arabians to his obedience

About the ſame time Selymus ſent certain troups of horſmen to Suezzia, a port of the red C ſea (of old called Arſinoë) about three days journey from Cair ; in which port Campſon the great Sultan(a little before the comming of the Turks) had with infinit charge and 4 yeares trauel built a ſtrong fleet againſt the Portugals,who by their conqueſts in India had taken away all the rich trade of the Indian merchandiſe into the Gulf of Arabia,to the great hinderance of the Egyptian Kings cuſtoms : ouer which fleet (a little before the beginning of the Turkiſh wars) Campſon had appointed one Amyraſes and Ray Salomon Generalls, with a ſtrong power of Mamalukes and great ſtore of ordnance againſt the Portugals. Theſe valiant Captains hauing yet don nothing in the ſeruice they were appointed vnto ; as they lay at Gidda, (the port of the famous city of Mecha,wherin is the temple of their great prophet Mahomet) vnderſtanding of the death of Campſon,and of the comming of Selymus into Egypt, fell at variance D betwixt themſelues,one of them beeing willing to continue his obedience towards the new Sultan,and the other no leſſe deſirous to follow the good fortune of the victor. Wherupon a mutiny ariſing among the ſoldiers, Amyraſes,who fauored Tomombeius,was inforced to fly to Mecha : but ſhortly after, Ray Salomon requiring to haue him,and threatning all hoſtility except he were forthwith deliuered, he was apprehended by them of Mecha (fearing to haue Gidda their port ſpoiled) and ſo ſent back again to the fleet. Ray Salomon,that he might be Admirall alone,his aſſociat being taken out of the way, and by ſome notable fact to inſinuat himſelf into the fauor of the Conqueror, cauſed Amyraſes in the night to be caſt ouerbord, and giuing to the ſoldiers two months pay,and ſwearing them to the obedience of Selymus, in few days ſailing came back again to Arſinoë,where leauing the fleet,he came directly E himſelf to Selymus at Cair,of whom he was gratiouſly receiued. After that, all the Princes that were before tributaries or confederats to the late Sultans of Egypt,euen to the confines of Dauid the moſt mighty King of Ethiopia (whom ſome call Presbyter Iohn) without delay entred into the like ſubjection or confederation with the Turks.

Egypt with al the prouinces therunto belonging,thus brought into ſubjection,Selymus about the beginning of Iuly ſailed down the riuer of Nilus to Alexandria (Cortug Ogli a famous pyrat of Halicarnaſſus ſitting at the helm of his gally) there to take view of his Fleet, but lately come from Conſtantinople with new ſupplies both of men and victuals, ſent from Pyrrhus Baſſa and his ſon Solyman: which after he had wel ſurueyed, and diligently viewed the wals of the city,and of the caſtle of Pharos, he returned again to Cair. In the mean time the F Mamalukes in durance at Alexandria, were by his commandement murthred euery mothers ſon, in the entrance of the priſon. At which time alſo aboue fiue hundred families of the nobleſt & richeſt of the Egyptians were commanded to remoue from Cair to Conſtantinople, and a great number of women and children,of the race of the Mamalukes, were tranſported thither alſo in ſhips hired for that purpoſe. Into this fleet beſides the Kings treaſure and riches,he conueyed all the priuat and publique ornaments of that moſt rich and famous city, with ſuch a couetous and greedy deſire of ſpoil,that the very marble ſtones, commended either for the excellencie of the workmanſhip, or beauty of the ſtone, were violently rent out of the main walls,to his great reproch and infamy. Lying at Cair,he with great pleaſure beheld the riſing of the riuer Nilus, which had then ouerflowed the Countrey next vnto it; and that with ſuch a deſire, that he moſt curiouſly inquired of the old Countrymen the meaſure and nature of the riuer; for by the diuerſitie of the riſing therof (which they by certain marks and meaſures wel find out) they prognoſticat ſomtime abundant plenty, ſometime extreame dearth,and ſomtime reaſonable ſtore:when as the violent riuer moderately or furiouſly breaking out,ſomtime ſo drownes the greateſt part of the country, that all the ſeed ſeaſon it lieth vnder water; and at another time floweth ſo ſparingly,that in many places it ſcarſe layeth the duſt,therby foreſhewing an vndoubted dearth. So that the Egyptians then aſſure themſelues of plenty, when as Nilus keeping a mean, pleaſantly riſeth neither to the higheſt nor loweſt marks of his inundation.

The Mamaluke kingdom,together with the name of the Mamalukes thus ouerthrown,and the conqueſt of Egypt ſo happily atchieued, Selymus reſolued to make his return into Syria; and the rather, for that it was reported, That Hyſmael the Perſian King was comming with his army into Meſopotamia,and ſo like enough to break into Comagena. Wherfore hauing as he thought good diſpoſed of all things,he left a garriſon of his beſt ſouldiers at Cair, and appointed Cayerbeius that notable traitor his Deputy and great Commander ouer all that great and new gotten kingdom of Egypt,now conuerted into the form of a prouince, as it remains at this day. Which honorable preferment ſo vnworthily beſtowed,exceedingly both grieued and troubled the great Baſſa Ionuſes, before inflamed with the hope and iuſt deſire therof: for now that Sinan Baſſa was dead, hee puffed vp with the eſtimation of his own worth and valour, and proud of the wound hee had lately receiued in the preſence of Selymus at the entring of Cair,and to the vtmoſt of his power ſuffering no man to grow neer him in credit and eſtimation,thought himſelf the only man now left,to whom of all others that eſpecial and honorable charge ſhould in the judgment of Selymus and of the whole Army of right be committed. Neither wanted he the general good liking of the men of war; for immediatly after he was recouered of his wound,when he in the moſt magnificent houſe of the Diadare at Cair (which he in the victory had rather of himſelfe vſurped, than by the gift of Selymus obtained) daily kept princely cheer for all commers (no ſmall means to gain the loue of the common ſouldiers) and gaue frankly to them all; to ſome horſes,to ſome beautiful ſlaues,to ſome money, plate,jewels,rich garments,fair armor,and ſuch like; he won vnto himſelf ſuch fauor and credit,that wherſoeuer he ſhould (as the maner was) go to the caſtle vnto the Emperour, he was brought thither with a great and goodly train of his fauorits and followers, as a man in all mens iudgements aſſigned vnto the gouernment of that great and rich kingdom. All which things highly offended the mind of Selymus, who as he was apt to ſuſpect,and cruel where he feared; ſo did he alſo in ſecret enuy great vertues, accompanied with too much honour and power.

The Traitour Caierbeius made gouernor of Cair and Egypt.

Ionuſes enuies at Cayerbeius his preferment.

Ionuſes ſeeing Cayerbeius the Traitor thus vnworthily promoted, ouercome with grieſe and indignation (who as a man of a proud and haughty mind took it as don to his owne diſgrace) yet colouring his inward diſcontentment by counterfeiting himſelf ſicke, for certaine dayes came not abroad: neuertheles ſtill more and more tormented both with the injurry (as hee took it) don vnto himſelf, and the vnworthy preferment of the Traitor,hee could not ſo well contain himſelf, but that in his choler ſome words fel from him,wherby his diſcontentment was perceiued. It hapned that Cayerbeius comming in curteſie to viſit him, and in the heat of the day familiarly calling for drink (which was water and ſugar after the maner of the Egyptians) immediatly after he had drunke, felt ſuch grieuous and vnwoonted gripings and tormentings in his ſtomack and belly,that many ſuppoſed him to haue bin poiſoned by the Baſſa: yet was he by the power and vertue of a more ſoueraign and effectuall remedy preſerued. Which report,whether it were true or no was vncertain,but certain it is that it did ſinke further into the mind of Selymus than any man would haue thought. He had alſo but a little before been informed, That many of thoſe rich Egyptian Families which hee had before commanded to be remooued to Conſtantinople,had for great ſums of money obtained of Ionuſes

A (who had the whole ordering of the matter) that they might quietly and in ſafety remain ſtil in their own country. Of which his couert dealing great probabilitie was alledged by ſuch as repined at his honor, and ſecretly accuſed him, that thoſe princelike and exceſſiue charges and expences, which he was not able poſſibly to maintain of his ordinary penſion, were royally ſupported with the imbeſelled ſpoil and reuenues of that new gotten kingdom. Which malicious ſuggeſtions, as they tended to the lightening of his credit, ſo alſo another crime, (whether it were of fraudulent dealing or negligence, or other further reſpect, is vncertaine) comming in the neck of another, wrought his vtter diſgrace and finall confuſion: for Selymus after the manner of great princes (who more ſeuerely to puniſh the former offences, notably diſſembling their preſent anger, expect but the occaſion of ſome new crime) with vigilant eie B waiting vpon his words and deeds, proſecuted him with a mortall and deadly hatred, with full purpoſe to deſtroy him.

Selymus commands the wages of his ſoldiers to be left in garriſon at Cair to be augmented.

A few daies before it was certainly reported, that Selymus would again returne into Syria, the ſoldiers appointed to be left in garriſon at Cair, alledging the great diſtance of the place, and the greater dangers they were to expect, with the labor by them already endured, requeſted of the bounty of their moſt fortunat Emperour, that they might haue their wages augmented. Which thing Selymus (neuer ſpare handed to his men of war) eaſily granted; commanding Ionuſes the ſtately Baſſa, that the ſum they required might be added to their accuſtomed wages, and ſo entred into his accounts for the wars. But he caried headlong with diſcontent, made neither the treaſurers nor pay-maſters acquainted with any ſuch matter as Selymus C had before commanded: of purpoſe that the garriſon ſouldiers deceiued of their greater wages promiſed them by their Emperor, might euen at the firſt begin to hate and contemn Cayerbeius, as author of ſo great an injury, that ſo the ſtate of Cair, and of that new gotten Kingdom, diſquieted by the mutinie of the gariſon ſoldiers, Selymus inforced to change his former purpoſe, ſhould in ſtead of that ſtrange gouernor (hated of the Egyptians for his late treaſon, and not beloued of the garriſon ſouldiers, becauſe he was vnto them a ſtranger) of neceſſity ſend ſome of his own Baſſa's, a Turke, for the better ſtay and aſſurance of that wauering and mighty prouince. But al theſe things (as commonly wicked purpoſes haue their foul euents) fel out in fine far otherwiſe than he had in his troubled mind before conceiued. For Selymus being departed out of Egypt, and now on his way almoſt as far as Ieruſalem; the garriſon ſol- D diers of Cair, the pay day being now come, and receiuing no more but their old accuſtomed wages, moued with that euil dealing (as contrary to the Emperors promiſe, and their generall expectation) began with more fury and rage than euer Ionuſes had before imagined, openly and inſolently to inſult and threaten the treaſurer and pay-maſters, and with open mouth to rail vpon Cayerbeius their gouernor. With which ſo inſolent and opprobrious ſpeeches he aſtonied (as one not yet acquainted with the faſhions of the Turks gariſons) together with the pay-maſters, in beſt maner they could excuſed themſelues vnto the ſoldiers, requeſting them not to think ſo hardly of them, who were altogether innocent in the matter, but with patience to vnderſtand the truth of the cauſe; wherin if they ſhould on their part finde any fraudulent or euil dealing, they craued no fauor, either refuſed any puniſhment. Thus Cayerbeius and the E pay-maſters ſeeking by all means to auoid both the ſuſpition and the preſent danger; and the mutinous ſouldiers no leſſe haſtning to find out by whom they were ſo abuſed, and to be thereof reuenged, it was at laſt with much ado agreed, that truſty meſſengers ſhould forthwith be ſent vnto Selymus (who was not yet gon out of Iudæa) to vnderſtand of him the truth of the matter.

Theſe ſpeedy meſſengers hauing with wonderfull celerity diſpatched their journey, ouertook Selymus with his Army a little from Lariſſa in Iudæa: and admitted to his preſence, orderly declared vnto him both the complaints of the ſouldiers, and the carefulnes of Cayerbeius and the pay-maſters to excuſe the matter, together with the danger they were in, with euery other accident whatſoeuer which had hapned ſince the time of his departure from the City F of Cair. Which complaint ſo inſenced the mind of Selymus with new paſſions of anger and choler, being already ſore alienated with former diſpleaſures, that he without further delay commanded Ionuſes Baſſa to be brought before him to anſwer the matter. Who although he were inwardly ſtricken with the guilt of his own conſcience, and ſurpriſed with a deadly feare, which appeared in his colour as pale as aſhes, ſeeing in the angry face and countenance of his ſoueraign the moſt certain tokens of his heauy diſpleaſure: yet as he was a man of great G ſpirit anſwered boldly, That he had forbidden the ſoldiers wages to be augmented, contrary to his Majeſties command, not vpon any euil meaning to haue inuerted that mony to his own vſe, neither therby to haue drawn any man of purpoſe into diſgrace, as was by ſome his malicious enemies ſuggeſted; but for great reaſon, thereby to prouide for his Majeſties Coffers, wonderfully emptied with thoſe late wars: beſide that, the conſtant report of new troubles like to ariſe out of Perſia, gaue good occaſion for him to ſpare vnneceſſary charges. Wheras on the other ſide, as he ſaid, the garriſon ſouldiers were already inriched with the plentifull ſpoils of Egypt, and in a moſt goodly city poſſeſſed the houſes and lands of the Mamalukes, feeding vpon the goods of the Egyptians, and had already receiued both greater pay & more bountiful rewards from him, than euer any ſouldiers had from any his predeceſſors the Othoman H Kings: in which caſe if they were not paſt all modeſty, they might well enough take it in good part, if they were ſomthing reſtrained in their vnreaſonable requeſts. Hee alledged moreouer, That great Princes which retain their ſoldiers in reaſonable pay in time of peace and war, ought ſomtime for warlike diſcipline to require of them a moderation of their deſires; leſt whileſt they all ſtriue with greedines for their priuat gaine, there want money afterwards in the common treaſurie to maintain a greater and more neceſſary charge, wars ſtill riſing vpon wars: ſeeing no Commander, were he neuer ſo valiant or fortunat, euer did any great matter in wars, if he wanted coin, the moſt proper inſtrument and very ſinues of War, anſwering to his other moſt heroical parts and ſufficiencie. But as he was yet thus ſpeaking, Selymus full of wrath and indignation interrupted him (for if he ſhould haue ſuffered him in longer I diſcourſe to haue recounted his former deſerts and worthy ſeruice don, as wel in the time of his father Bajazet, as of late euen in his own preſence, he was like enough to haue had of them who were able to do moſt with him, interceſſors for him) and ſo without further delay cauſed him euen there in his own preſence to be executed: ſaying moreouer, that others who would arrogantly preſume to preſcribe vnto their Soueraigns what they had to do, ſhould for euer after by the example of that moſt inſolent ſeruant be admoniſhed of their duty and condition.

It is reported, that the ſoldiers in deſpight of Selymus wonderfully lamented the vnworthy death of this ſo worthy a man. For he, beſide his notable and rare valour, ſo many times to his great honour in ſundry battels approued, had by the dexterity of his Grecian wit, comelines of perſonage, military eloquence, and gallant maner of liuing, ſo won the loue and fauour K of all men, that there was few or none in all the Army which did not acknowledge himſelfe ſome way indebted and beholden to him; and did therefore condemn the Emperors cruelty.
They then began to tell, how Muſtapha ſyrnamed Caloger, a man of wonderfull credit and authority both with BajaZet and himſelf, was in the heat of his fury ſlain without hearing. And in like maner of rage, old Chendemus, a man of greateſt honor and integrity of life, and of al the chieftains which came out of the great Emperor Mahomets nurſery the moſt skilful, had bin for his graue and wholſom counſel without cauſe murthred. Neither was then Boſtanges his ſon in law forgotten; neither Cherſeogles (the moſt honourable for the great place he held in court, and the mariage of Bajazets daughter; and the other a man of no leſſe marke, being his great Admiral, and bearing himſelf high vpon his infinit wealth, but more vpon his wife, one L of the daughters of Selymus) both which two noble Gentlemen, about two yeares before had their heads ſtruck off, no man well knowing wherefore; and their dead bodies caſt out at the Court gate, to the terror of the beholders, as a miſerable ſpectacle of their own miſery & the Emperors cruelty. Yea, the remembrance of his old tyrannie (renued as it were with this late outrage) preſented afreſh vnto all mens eies the reuerend old Emperour Bajazet his father, with his two brethren Achomates and Corcutus, by right both called vnto the Empire before himſelf; with many other yong princes of the bloud, of great hope and expectation, who as all men knew, periſhed through the vnnaturall and execrable cruelty of this moſt mercileſſe man. So that men generally did both feare him and hate him; foraſmuch as he without all fear of God, or regard of worldly ſhame, accounted no practiſe wicked, or deuiſe deteſtable, M that might ſerue for the better eſtabliſhing of his kingdom: and had ſet down in his minde, (long before corrupted with ambition and tiranny) That it was far better for the aſſurance of his eſtate, to be feared of all, than beloued of many: and therfore ſpared no mans life of whom he had but the leaſt ſuſpition. Howbeit the ſeuerity by him vſed againſt this ſo great a man, and

A and ſo gratious with the people, may in ſome ſort be excuſed, as iuſtly mooued thereunto by the preſumptuous & malicious dealing of the proud Baſſa vnder hand, contrary to the charge giuen him by his lord, to the perill of thoſe his great but late conqueſts both in Ægypt and Syria.

This great Baſſa whilſt he yet liued and flouriſhed in the court, in nothing ſo much offended the minds of the people (who generally both loued and honoured him) as by the cruelty by him ſhewed vpon the perſon of the fair lady Manto his beſt beloued wife. Who beeing a Greek born, and adorned with all the good gifts of nature, whereunto her louely conditions were alſo anſwerable, was by Zebalia her firſt husband (a man of great honor) carried with him into the wars, as his greateſt treaſure and chief delight. But he ſlain, and ſhee by misfortune B falling into the hands of the Turks her enemies, remained ſo priſoner with them for a time; vntil that this great Baſſa Iouuſes ſhortly after (ſeeing her among the other Captiues there taken, ſo far to exceed the reſt as doth the Sun the leſſer ſtars) ſurpriſed with her incomparable beauty, became of her amorous; and in too curious viewing of the captiue Lady, was by her himſelf taken priſoner. Where finding her outward perfections no leſſe graced with inward vertues, and her honorable mind anſwerable vnto her rare feature, took her vnto his wife, honoring her far aboue all the reſt of his wiues and concubins; and ſhe again in all dutiful loyalty ſeeking to pleaſe him, for a time liued in all worldly felicity and blis, not much inferior to one of the great Sultaneſſes. But long laſteth not the ſummer fruit of wanton loue, blaſted moſt time in the bloſſom, and rotten before it be wel gathered: for in ſhort time the Baſſa C more amorous of her perſon, than ſecured in her vertues, and after the maner of ſenſuall men, ſtil fearing leſt that which ſo much pleaſed himſelf, gaue no leſſe contentment to others alſo; began to haue her in diſtruſt, although he ſaw no great cauſe why, more than his own conceit not grounded vpon any her euil demeanor, but vpon the exceſſe of his owne liking. Which mad humor (hardly to be euer purged) ſtill more and more in him increaſing, he became ſo froward and imperious, that nothing ſhe could ſay or do, could now ſo pleaſe or content him, but that he ſtil thought ſome one or other, although he wiſt not who, to bee therein partakers with him; ſo fearful was the jealous man of his owne conceits. Yet could he not chuſe but loue thoſe perfections, wherat he could not enough wonder, although hee found no contentment therin, tormenting himſelf, and her whom he ſo dearly loued, with his own paſſionat diſtruſt. D Vntil at length, the fair lady grieued to ſee her ſelf thus without cauſe to be ſuſpected, and wearied with the inſolent pride of her peeuiſh husband, together with his imperious commands, determined ſecretly to depart from him, & ſo to return again into her own country. Which her purpoſe ſhe diſcouered to one of her Eunuchs, to whom ſhe had alſo deliuered certain letters to be by him conueied to ſuch of her friends, as whoſe helpe ſhe was to vſe in her intended flight: which letters the falſe eunuch opened, and for the more manifeſting of the matter, deliuered them vnto the Baſſa his maſter. Who therwith inraged, and calling her vnto him, forthwith in his fury, with a dagger ſtabd her to the heart and ſlew her: ſo together with the death of his Loue, hauing cured his tormenting jealouſies. The liuely counterfeits of theſe two notable perſonages thus vnworthily ſlain, the one by the imperious command of E his Soueraign, and the other by the cruel hand of her husband, thou maiſt in the pages following behold, as they are by Boiſardus expreſſed.

But leauing this great Baſſa with fair Manto vnto their reſt; his courſe thus run, to return again to Selymus, who now come into Syria, was by letters from the Himbracor Baſſa or Maſter of his horſe (whom he had left vpon the frontiers of his Kingdom, to attend the motions of the Perſians) aduertiſed, That the Perſian preparations which had raiſed ſuch a hot rumor of wars in the beginning of Winter, was grown cold in the heat of ſummer; and that hee had ſeen in all the time of his abode in thoſe quarters, none but certaine ſtragling Companies, who made ſhew as if ſome greater power had beene comming, which had many times made ſudden roads into the Countrey, with whom he had ſundry times proſperouſly encountered; and it was generally reported by ſuch priſoners as hee had taken,and by his owne eſpialls alſo, That Hyſmael troubled with the Hyrcanians and Tartars, had conuerted the greateſt part of his forces againſt thoſe nations:ſo that winter drawing faſt on,and deep ſnows already fallen vpon mount Taurus,he could not though he would that yeare look after Aſia the leſſe, or Syria. There were that reported, That the Tartars which dwel betwixt the two riuers Tanais and Volga,were by Selymus his procurement and mony ſet awork to keep Hyſmael buſied, by inuading the Iberians & Albanians which were vnder his protection:which thing he wrought by means of Mahomet his father in law,the Boſphoran King, who being of the ſame language and nation,by rewards eaſily induced the needy captains of the Tartars his friends and Conſederats,to take vp arms againſt their neighbors. The cauſe why Hyſmael inuaded not Selymus, wholy buſied in the Ægyptian wars.

Many maruelled that Hyſmael the Perſian king neglected ſo fair an opportunity, whereby H he might(as moſt men thought)haue thruſt Selymus quite out of Aſia and Siria,whilſt he was thus buſied in Egypt;yea and eaſily haue deſtroied him,ſhut vp with all his power,eſpecially at ſuch time as the Egyptian Sultans Campſon and Tomombeius made ſo great reſiſtance. But they which could better judge of the matter,ſaw that Hyſmael was not of ſo great power and ſtrength abroad as at home:for his army for moſt part conſiſted of gentlemen,or ſuch as were by cuſtom bound to ſerue him in his defenſiue wars, voluntary men, and ſuch as ſerued without pay. Theſe,as they were the moſt valiant horſemen of the Eaſt, ſo did they with ſingular valor worthily defend the kingdom of Perſia,and alſo as occaſion required, make War with their neer neighbors: but if any longer expedition were to be taken in hand, that they could by no means away withall,accounting it a grieuous thing to depart from their Wiues; vnto I whom they are ſo addicted,that oftentimes they carry them with them into the wars:and being a wanton & fine kind of people,are not able without wages to draw after them,according to their accuſtomed maner,ſo many carriages and horſes as might ſerue both for their neceſſary and wanton vſes. With which difficulty the great King Vſun Caſſanes, Hyſmaels Grandfather by the mother,was much troubled in his wars againſt Mahomet the great. But was now much harder for Hyſmael to do,for that he hauing obtained his grandfathers kingdom by the meer good wil of the people,eaſing them forthwith of their heauy impoſitions, did alwaies think the loue of his ſubjects (which is eaſily gotten by bounty and juſtice) the ſureſt riches of his kingdom; and that to commaund only ouer the bodies and goods of his people, their hearts altogether alienated and loſt by moſt heauy and grieuous exactions, ſeemed not the K part of a gratious and natural prince,but of an outragious and momentary tyrant. Wheras Selymus on the contrary part,who had by force,miſchiefe,and moſt deteſtable practiſes,ſtept vp into his fathers ſeat,had after the maner of the Othoman kings,repoſed his greateſt & moſt aſſured ſtrength,in a ſeruile and mercinary kind of men, whom he might for pay, as his owne Creatures at his pleaſure draw far from home, and as hee beſt liked lead them from place to place,and country to country,for the inlarging of his empire,and eterniſing of his name:and therfore according to the quality of his people, deemed true and ready power to conſiſt only in mony,and the ſeuerity of his own command: wherby he had learned with moſt happy ſucces,in a ſhort time to obſcure all the victories of the former Othoman kings, with the greatnes of his own. L

1518. All the winter following, Selymus ſtaied with his army in Syria, ſpending his time in viſiting the ports and cities of that prouince,and ſetting things in order for the better aſſurance therof. But vpon the approch of the ſpring,when he certainly vnderſtood that by the procurement of Pope Leo the tenth, the Chriſtian Princes were entered into conſultation to make war vpon him,and that ſupplications with great ſolemnity were made for that purpoſe, and honourable Embaſſadours ſent into all prouinces to ſtir vp the greateſt kings of Chriſtendome againſt him; he (leauing Gazelles his Lieutenant in Syria) by great journies returned to Conſtantinople:from thence as at hand to behold the deuices & motions of the Chriſtian princes his enemies. In the mean time, fearing no alteration to ariſe in the prouinces of Syria and Egypt,foraſmuch as he wel ſaw, that Cayerbeius and Gazelles his Lieutenants,beeing at M deadly hatred betwixt themſelues,as wel for old grudges, as for the late treaſon of Cayerbeius (the greateſt cauſe of the ruine of the Mamalukes Kingdome) would neuer agree together againſt him, but rather with a certaine emulation ſtriue betwixt themſelues with diligence, faithfulnes,and moderation,who ſhould deſerue beſt in wel gouerning the prouinces by him committed

A committed to their charge,as indeed they did during the ſhort time of his reign.

Selymus being arriued at Conſtantinople, and purpoſing from thenceforth to turne all his forces vpon the Chriſtians, cauſed wonderfull preparation to be made for his wars; but eſpecially at ſea:wherby it was thought that he would haue either attempted the ſtrong Iſland of the Rhodes(a great moat in his eye)or els ſome part of Italy.But whilſt he was hatching this miſchief,or ſome other of no leſſe importance,and in the mean time delighted himſelf with viſiting the cities of Græcia and Thrace, and ſolaced himſelfe in the pleaſant country about Hadrianople,he was ſuddenly attached with the hand of God,and ſtrucken in the reins of his back with a canker : which melancholy and deuouring malady contemning all cure, did by little and little ſo eat and corrupt his body,as that he,before ſo much honoured, became now B loathſome and odious both to himſelfe and others.

1519.

Selymus purpoſing to inuade the Chriſtians, is ſtruck in the reines of his backe with a canker.

As he lay thus languiſhing,his incurable diſeaſe ſtil increaſing, leaning his head in the lap of Pyrrhus the Baſſa,whom of all others hee moſt loued, ſaid, O Pyrrhus, I ſee I muſt ſhortly die without remedie. Whereupon the great Baſſa tooke occaſion to diſcourſe with him of many matters : and amongſt others,that it would pleaſe him to giue order for the well beſtowing of the great wealth taken from the Perſian merchants in diuers places of his empire:perſuading him to beſtow the ſame vpon ſome notable Hoſpitall for reliefe of the poore. To whom Selymus replyed,Wouldſt thou Pyrrhus,that I ſhould beſtow other mens goods,wrongfully taken from them,vpon works of charity and deuotion, for mine owne vaine glory and praiſe? aſſuredly I will neuer do it:nay,rather ſee they be againe reſtored vnto the right owners. Which C was forthwith done accordingly ; to the great ſhame of many Chriſtians, who minding nothing leſſe than reſtitution,but making ex rapina holocauſtum,do out of a world of euill gotten goods cull out ſome ſmall fragments,to build ſome poore Hoſpital,or mend ſome blind way; a poore teſtimony of their hot charity.

Selymus lying thus ſicke to death, and rotting aboue the ground in his tent, as he was vpon the way going to Hadrianople,ſent before Pyrrhus and Achmetes,two of his greateſt Baſſaes, to prouide for the ſolemniſing of the great feaſt, which the Turks call Bairam (and as it were their Eaſter) purpoſing to come after himſelfe at leaſure, as his weake body would giue him leaue : and kept with him onely Ferhates,the third of his greateſt Baſſaes and priuy Counſellors.
But ſuch was the fury of his foule diſeaſe, continually attainting him with intollerable D paines, that ſhortly after the departure of the other two Baſſaes, he breathed out his cruell ghoſt,in the month of September,in the yeare 1520 : neere vnto the city Chiurli, in the ſelfe ſame place where he had ſomtime moſt vnnaturally aſſailed his aged father Bajazet, with purpoſe to haue ſlaine him, had not the fortune of the old Emperour in a great battell preuailed both againſt his force and the treaſon of his owne people. Thus intending the miſchiefe he could not performe,cut off by a lothſome and vntimely death,he to the great ioy of all Chriſtendome ended his dayes,when he had liued ſix and forty yeares, and thereof reigned eight : which time of his reigne was nothing elſe but a moſt horrible and dreadfull time of bloudſhed.
His dead body was afterwards ſolemnly by his ſon Solyman buried in a new temple at Conſtantinople,which he to the imitation of his father and grandfather,had for that purpoſe E before built. Vpon his tombe is ingrauen in the Greeke, Turkiſh, and Sclauonian Tongues, this ſhort Epitaph.

1520.

The death of Selymus.

The iuſt Iudgement of God.

Hic maximus adſum Selymus, qui orbem domui.
Non bella relinquo ſed pergo inquirere, Non vlla me fortuna potuit euerterere : Licet oſſa jacent, animus quærit.

Phi. Lon. Tur. hiſt. tom. 1. l. 1.

In Engliſh thus :

F

Lo here I lie,great Selymus, which held the World in feare :
  The World I leaue,but not the wars,which I ſeeke,though not here.
No fortunes force,or victors hand,could take from me the ſpoiles :
  And though my bones lie buried here,my ghoſt ſeeks bloudy broiles.

Selymus before his death commends the tuition of his ſon Solyman vnto Pyrrhus Baſſa.

He vſed commonly to ſay, That nothing was ſweeter than to reign without fear or ſuſpition of his kindred. G A little before his death, he commended his ſon Solyman to Pyrrhus Baſſa, ſtreitly charging him, that after his death he ſhould leaue the Perſian, and turn his forces altogether vpon the Chriſtians. And the more to inſence him to the effuſion of bloud, he left him the liuely counterfeit of himſelfe hanging at his bed ſide, with ſundry bloudy precepts breathing forth his cruel and vnmercifull diſpoſition.

The Inſcription of the Table.

Sultan Selymus Othoman, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, Prince of all Princes ; the Sonne and Nephew of God.

On the right hand of the Table were written Greek Verſes to this ſence :

The Prince that ſafely ſeeks to reign, and hold his ſtate in quiet reſt, Muſt neuer ſuffer troubled care to harbor in his princely breſt :
Nor think it ſin to ſpil the bloud of his moſt neer and deareſt kin, Not of his brother, ſo therby aſſured ſafety he may win.
Law, Faith, Deuotion, and ſuch like, to break them all he muſt not ſpare, Nor conſcience make of any thing, to rid him from aſpiring care.
This is the way and only mean that may protect a princes ſtate, And ſet him ſafe without all fear, whilſt none may liue whom he doth hate.

The bloudy and tyrannicall precepts left by Selymus unto his ſonne Solyman, which he afterward aſſuredly kept, as is to be ſeen in his life following.

On the left hand of the Table was written in the Sclavonian Tongue ;

Of him that ſeeks to work thy wo, deſerue not to be counted kind ;
But take him for thy mortal foe, and plague him with reuenging mind.
The rotten lym is cut away, for fear of doing further harm :
The gentle Prince doth bear ſmall ſway, if no abuſe can make him warm.
Forbearance makes men more offend, and to preſume of further grace ;
It doth but ſtrength to Rebels lend, to thruſt their Soueraign out of place.

At the lower end of the ſame Table was written in Turkiſh Verſe ;

What Prince in perſon dareth not in open field to meet his foe,
And there with vnappalled heart his deadly darts himſelf to throw ;
But hides his head for fear of harm, and ſhuns the danger of the field, When martial minds with courage bold withſtand their foes with ſpear & ſhield :
Let him wel know, how that in vain he beareth arms but for a ſhow,
And that the honor of the field wil neuer ſuch a coward know.
Ne let him hope to gain the ſpoil by any wars he takes in hand,
That feareth with couragious mind his enemies forces to withſtand.

SOLYMANNVS MAGNIFICVS TVRCARVM IMPERATOR QVARTVS FLORVIT ANNO 1520
1563

Phil. Lonicer. Hiſt. Turc. l. 1.

Imperij Solyman patrij moderatur habenas, Regnaque Chriſtianum cladibus vſque metit.
Antiquam capit ille Rhodon, Nexumque Parumque Tyrrheni infaſtat Littora curua maris.
Pannonios multo populatur milite fines, Et cingit muros clara Vienna tuos.
Inclyta Sigethi dum mœnia concutit armis, Cogitur, hinc Stygiam nudus adire domum.

His fathers Empire Solyman doth rule with mighty power, And Chriſtian kingdomes ceaſeth not with ſlaughter to deuour.
The antiant Rhodes, with Naxos Iſle, and Paros he did take:
And on the coaſts of Italy did wofull hauocke make.
Faire Hungary with armies great he often did annoy,
And with a world of men had thought Vienna to deſtroy.
But whileſt to Sigeth he layd ſiege, in hope the ſame to haue, Cut off by death in his great pride, went naked to his graue.

THE LIFE OF SOLYMAN, THE FOVRTH AND MOST MAGNIFICENT EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKS.

THe death of Selymus was with all carefulneſſe concealed by Ferhates the onely Baſſa then preſent, for feare leſt the Ianizaries and ſouldiers of the court getting knowledge thereof, ſhould after their wonted manner in the time of the vacancy of the Empire, C ſpoile the Merchants and ſtrangers in places where they lay in garriſon, and eſpecially in the imperiall city: and not ſo contented, after their accuſtomed inſolency preſcribe vnto the greateſt Baſſaes at their pleaſure. For preuenting whereof, Ferhates diſpatched a truſty meſſenger with letters in poſt to Solyman the only ſon of Selymus, then lying at Magneſia, certifying him of the death of his father, and that he ſhould deſerue well of his peaceable ſubjects by haſtening his comming to Conſtantinople, whileſt all things were yet in good order, in time to repreſſe with his preſence the feared diſordered proceedings of his men of war.

Solyman hardly perſuaded that his father was dead.

D Solyman hauing to his great content peruſed the Baſſaes letters, as one deſirous enough of the empire; yet conſidering the cruell diſpoſition of his father (who vpon a meere jealous conceit of his aſpiring mind, and for certain words by him let fall in diſlike of his fathers extream dealing, had practiſed moſt vnnaturally to haue taken away him by poiſon: which danger he eſcaped only by the carefulneſſe of his mother, who miſdoubting the worſt, cauſed the poiſoned rich ſhirt ſent to him from his father, to be firſt worne by one of his chamber, whereof he in ſhort time after died) and alſo that the letters were ſigned only by Ferhates, and the newes not ſeconded by any of the other Baſſaes: fearing ſome hidden and ſecret plot of his father tending to his deſtruction, durſt not aduenture to remoue from his charge, but returned the meſſenger as one to whom he gaue little or no credit. Ten daies thus ſpent, and the death of E Selymus nothing as yet ſuſpected; Ferhates vnderſtanding by his meſſenger the warineſſe of Solyman, and that he expected more aſſured aduertiſement, ſent preſently vnto the other great Baſſa's Pyrrhus and Muſtapha at Hadrianople, that they ſhould without delay repaire vnto the court: vnto whom at their comming he declared the death of the Emperour. Which after they had ſeene to be true, they by another ſecret and ſpeedy meſſenger aduertiſed Solyman again therof, confirming thoſe letters with all their hands and ſeals: whereby Solyman now aſſured of his fathers death, preſently put himſelfe vpon the way, and by long and painfull journies in few days came to Scutarium, called in antient time Chriſopolis, ouer againſt Conſtantinople. Where he was met with the Aga or captain of the Ianizaries, and by him tranſported in a gally ouer that ſtreit paſſage to Conſtantinople, where at his landing the Ianizaries by F the appointment of their captain were ready to receiue him, knowing as yet nothing of the death of Selymus, vntill that Solyman being now in the midſt of them, the captaine with a loud voice ſaid vnto them, Behold your Emperor. Whereupon they all with great acclamation cried out, Long liue the great Emperor Solyman: which conſent of the men of war, is vnto the Turkiſh Emperours the greateſt aſſurance of their eſtate. And ſo with much triumph he was by them brought into the roiall pallace, and placed in his fathers ſeat in the yeare 1520: in which yere alſo Charles the fifth was choſen Emperour of Germany. The Ianizaries diſappointed by the Baſſaes of the ſpoile of the Merchants, eſpecially Chriſtians and Iewes, receiued of the bounty of Solyman a great largious; and in the beginning of his reigne had their accuſtomed wages ſomewhat augmented alſo, to their wonderfull contentment.

Solyman was about twenty eight yeres old when he began to reigne, and was at the firſt ſuppoſed to haue bin of a milde and peaceable diſpoſition: ſo that the Princes to whom the name of Selymus was before dreadfull, were now in hope that a quiet Lambe was come in place of a raging Lyon. But in ſhort time they found themſelues in their expectation far deceiued; and eſpecially the Chriſtian Princes bordering vpon him, vnto whom he became a far more dangerous enemy than was his father before him; conuerting his forces moſt part of his long reigne vpon them, which Selymus had almoſt altogether imploied againſt the Kings of Perſia, and Ægypt, the greateſt Princes of the Mahometan ſuperſtition.

The firſt that felt his heauy hand was Gazelles Gouernor of Syria: who preſently vpon the death of Selymus, thinking himſelfe now diſcharged of the oath of obedience which he had giuen to Selymus, but not to his ſucceſſors; and earneſtly deſiring to reſtore againe the kingdome of the Mamalukes lately ouerthrowne, gathered together the remainder of the diſperſed Mamalukes, which ſpeedily reſorted vnto him out of all parts of Aſia and Africke: and alluring with rewards the leaders of the wilde Arabians, with great numbers of the country people of Syria, diſcontented with the Turkiſh gouernment, entred into open rebellion, and by force of armes draue the Turks garriſons out of Byrrha, Tripolis, and diuers other cities of Syria, taking them into his owne poſſeſſion. And the better to effect that he had taken in hand, he ſent Embaſſadors to Caire, vnto Cayerbeius, who had of Selymus receiued the gouernment of Ægypt, the vnworthy reward of his horrible treaſon; perſuading him by any meanes to take reuenge of the injury and wrong before done to the Mamalukes, and by killing of the Turks garriſon to make himſelfe Sultan of Ægypt, and reſtore againe the kingdome of the Mamalukes, offering him therein the vttermoſt of his deuoire and ſeruice. But Cayerbeius either not truſting Gazelles his old enemy, or aſhamed by new treaſon to augment his former diſhonor, or els (which was moſt like) miſdoubting his owne ſtrength in performance of ſo great an enterpriſe: after he had attentiuely heard what the Embaſſadours had to ſay, cauſed them preſently in his own ſight to be put to death as traitors, and with all ſpeed certified Solyman thereof: who without delay ſent Ferhates Baſſa with a ſtrong army into Syria. Which thing Gazelles hearing, and hauing in his power moſt of the cities of Syria, retired himſelf with all his army into the ſtrong city of Damaſco; whither at length, Ferhates the great Baſſa by long march came alſo. Gazelles (reſolued to try the fortune of the field, and ſo either by ſpeedy victory or honourable death to end the matter, rather than to ſuffer himſelfe to be ſhut vp within the wals of the city) vpon the comming of the Baſſa, valiantly iſſued forth with all his power, and gaue him battell; which for the ſpace of ſix houres was moſt cruelly fought, and many ſlaine on both ſides. At length Gazelles being oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies (being eight times more in number) and hardly aſſailed on either ſide, was inforced to fight in a ring, and there performing all the parts of a worthy Generall and valiant ſoldier, honorably died together with his Mamalukes in the midſt of his enemies, leauing vnto them a bloudy victory. Gazelles thus ſlaine, the city of Damaſco with all the country of Syria without any more ado yeelded againe vnto the Turks obedience, which the Baſſa tooke in ſo good part, that he would not ſuffer his ſoldiers to enter into the city, then richly ſtored with commodities of all ſorts, brought thither by Merchants out of diuers parts of the World.

Gazelles ſlaine.

Syria thus pacified, the Baſſa went to Caire in Ægypt, and there commended Cayerbeius for his fidelity, confirmed him in his gouernment, and enuying againſt the cruelty of Selymus (ſo to pleaſe the Ægyptians) wiſhed them to hope for all happineſſe vnder the peaceable gouernment of the new Sultan Solyman. And ſo when he had ſet all things in order in both the prouinces of Syria and Ægypt, returned againe to Solyman.

The yeare next following, Solyman by the counſell of Pyrrhus Baſſa his old tutor (a mortall enemy vnto the Chriſtians) and by the perſuaſion of the Ianizaries, reſolued to beſiege the ſtrong city of Belgrade, otherwiſe called Taurunum, ſcituat vpon the borders of Hungary, where the riuer Savus falleth into Danubius. Which city his great grandfather Mahomet (ſyrnamed

A named the Great, and before him the warlike Amurath) had with all their power, long time before to their great loſſe and diſhonor, vainly attempted. Wherein vntill that time were reſerued the enſignes, then taken from the Turks, to their no ſmal griefe, with other trophies of the glorious victories of the worthy captaine Huniades, and the great King Matthias Coruinus his
ſon. Wherefore Solyman ſending his army before, was come as far as Sophia, a city in Seruia (the place where the Turks great lieutenant in Europe is alwaies reſiant) before that the Hungarians were aware of his comming: for they liuing at eaſe all the time that Vladiſlaus reigned, and ſleeping ſecurely vnder the young King Lodouicus his ſonne, a man of no experience; who contenting himſelfe with the title of a King, ſuffered himſelf to be ſo pilled & poled by his nobility and great clergy men (inuerting all the wealth of the land to their owne priuat B gaine) that he was not able to raiſe any ſufficient power to go againſt his puiſſant enemy; eſpecially his nobility, in whoſe hands reſted the wealth of his kingdome, promiſing him much, but performing indeed nothing. Huniades with his hardy ſouldiers, the ſcourge and terrour of the Turks, was dead long before; ſo was alſo Matthias that fortunat warriour: after whom ſucceeded others giuen to all pleaſure and eaſe; to whoſe example the people faſhioning themſelues, forgot their wonted valour, and gaue themſelues ouer to ſenſuality and voluptuous pleaſure: ſo that Solyman without let, preſented his army before the city of Belgrade, and with battery and vndermining in ſhort time became Lord thereof, hauing loſt few of his people in that ſiege. How much the loſſe of that ſtrong city concerned the Chriſtian common-wealth, the manifold and lamentable miſeries which afterwards enſued by the opening of that gap, C not vnto the kingdome of Hungary onely, but to all that ſide of Chriſtendome, did, and yet doth, moſt manifeſtly declare. It was won by the Turks the nine and twentieth day of Auguſt, in the yeare 1521.

Belgrade won by Solyman.

1522

After the taking of the ſtrong city of Belgrade, Solyman returning to Conſtantinople, brake vp his army and there lay ſtill almoſt all the yeare following. During which time he cauſed great preparation to be made at Calipolis and other his ports, for rigging vp of a great fleet: which cauſed the Italians, Venetians, and them of the Rhodes, to looke about them, as men carefull of their eſtates, fearing that thoſe forces would ere long be imploied againſt ſome or all of them.

About the ſame time Philippus Villerius a man of great wiſedome and courage, then following D the French court, was in his abſence by the knights of the Rhodes choſen Great Maſter of that honourable company: who embarking himſelfe at Marcelles, after a long and dangerous journy (being not without the knowledge of Solyman hardly laied for at ſea by Cortug-Ogli, a famous pyrat of the Turks, whoſe two brethren the Knights of the Rhodes had but a little before ſurpriſed and ſlain, and then held the third in priſon) arriued in ſafety at the Rhodes, where he was with great joy and triumph receiued.

Philippus Villerius choſen Great Maſter of the Rhodes.

The great Baſſa, by whoſe graue aduice Solyman was contented in all his weighty affairs to be directed, conſulted with the other Baſſaes, of diuers great exploits, which was firſt to be taken in hand, for the honour of their Emperour and inlarging of his Empire, were of diuers opinions concerning the beſieging of the Rhodes. Pyrrhus the Baſſa of greateſt account, diſſuaded E the taking in hand of that action, as too full of difficulty and danger: producing for proofe thereof the example of the great Emperour Mahomet, Solymans great grandfather; by whom it was vnfortunatly attempted, and in fine ſhamefully abandoned. But Muſtapha next in place and reputation to Pyrrhus, extolling the power and fortune of Solyman, ſaid, That the greatneſſe of their Emperor was not to be concluded within the attempts of his predeceſſors; as well appeared by the late taking of Belgrade; from whence firſt Amurath, and after him, Mahomet, two of the moſt warlike Princes of the Turks, had with great diſhonour been repulſed: and ſhould no doubt with like good fortune preuaile againſt the Rhodes alſo, being able (if need were) to bring more men before it than were ſtones in the wals thereof. Which he ſo confidently affirmed, with extenuating the power of the Rhodians, that he ſeemed to make F no doubt of the good ſucceſſe of that war: preſumptuouſly affirming, that vpon the firſt landing of Solymans great army, they of the Rhodes would without delay yeeld themſelues and their city into his hands.

Amongſt others of great experience, whoſe opinions Solyman was deſirous to haue, before he would take ſo great a matter in hand,was the famous pyrat Cortug Ogli, a man of a miſchieuous G and cruell nature,but of great experience in ſea matters. Who preſented to Solyman by Muſtapha and Ferhates,two of the greateſt Baſſaes,going before him,after due reuerence done, and commanded to deliuer his opinion,ſpake vnto Solyman as followeth :

Cortug Ogli the pyrat perſuadeth Solyman to beſiege the Rhodes.

The greatnes of your deſerts (moſt mighty and puiſſant Emperour) maketh me (being by you ſo commanded) at this time frankly to ſpeak what I think may be for the glory and honour both of your Majeſtie and Empire. I daily hear the pittifull lamentation of the miſerable people of Mytilene, Eubœa, Peloponeſus, Achaia, Caria, Lycia, and all alongſt the ſea coaſt of Syria and Ægypt, bewailing the ſpoil of their Countries, the ranſacking of their Cities, the taking away of their cattell and people, with other infinit and incredible calamities which they daily ſuffer of the croſſed Rhodian pyrats, no man withſtanding H them. Many a time haue theſe wretched people holden vp their hands to me for help, moſt inſtantly requeſting me to be a mean for them vnto your Imperiall Majeſty, whereby they might be protected from the injury, rapine, and ſlaughter of theſe cruell Rouers. Wherfore in their behalf I beſeech your ſacred Majeſty, by the moſt reuerend name of the holy Prophet Mahomet, & by your own moſt heroicall diſpoſition, to deliuer your afflicted ſubiects from theſe their moſt cruell enemies, and at length to ſet them free from the fury, captiuity, and fear of theſe Pyrats, more grieuous vnto them than death it ſelf : And conſider with your ſelf, That this inſolencie and iniury tendeth not ſo much to the hurt of your poor ſubjects and oppreſſed people in priuat, as to the diſhonour and diſgrace of your Imperiall name and dignity; which if any other Chriſtian King or Prince ſhould offer, your Majeſty I know would not ſuffer vnreuenged: I And will you then ſuffer theſe Robbers, Cut-throats, baſe people gathered out of all the corners of Chriſtendom, to waſt your Countries, ſpoile your Cities, murther your People, and trouble all your ſeas? For who can paſſe by ſea to Tripolis, Damaſco, Alexandria, Caire, Chalcide, Lesbos, Chios, nay, vnto this your Imperiall City of Conſtantinople, without moſt certain and manifeſt danger of theſe Rouers? What haue we heard euery Spring theſe many years, but that the Rhodians had taken ſome one or other of your Ports, led away your people into moſt miſerable captiuity, and carried away with them the rich ſpoiles of your countries? And that which is of all other things moſt diſhonourable, this they doe vnder your noſe, and in your ſight, in the middeſt and heart of your Empire. Pardon me I beſeech you moſt mighty Emperour, if I too plainely ſpeake what I thinke : For whatſoruer I ſay, I ſay it to no other end, but that you ſhould now at length do that which ſhould many yeares ago haue beene done. We your moſt loyall ſubjects K may not, nor ought not, for the increaſe of our Mahometan Religion, and for the inlarging of your Empire and Honour, to refuſe to aduenture our goods, our bodies, our liues, to all hazard and danger without exception. If you likewiſe be carried with loue of glory and renowne, or rauiſhed with deſire of neuer-dying Fame; in what wars can you more eaſily gaine the ſame, or better imploy vs your ſeruants, than in vanquiſhing and ſubduing the Rhodes, the reputed bulwarke of Chriſtendome, which onely keepeth vs from their countries? But ſome will perhaps ſay, your anceſtors haue in former times vnfortunatly attempted that city : ſo did they alſo Belgrade in Hungary; yet hath your happy fortune to your immortall fame brought the ſame vnder your ſubjection, being farre more ſtrongly fortified than in times paſt : and doe you then deſpaire of the Rhodes? Caſt off ſuch vaine and needleſſe miſdoubt. The Turkiſh Empire hath alwaies growne by aduentures and honourable attempts : Therefore make haſt to beſiege it both by ſea and land. L If your ſubjects mourning vnder the heauy burthen of the Chriſtian captiuity, built it with their owne hands for the Chriſtians; cannot they now at liberty, deſirous of reuenge, and fitted with opportunity, with like hands deſtroy the ſame? if it pleaſe you to vouchſafe but to looke into the matter (moſt dread Soueraigne) you ſhall ſee that there is a diuine occaſion by the procurement of our great Prophet Mahomet, preſented vnto your moſt ſacred Majeſty, now that the Chriſtians of the Weſt are at diſcord and mortall warre amongſt themſelues. Your Majeſty is not ignorant, that in managing of warres, the opportunity of the time is eſpecially to be followed; and that when occaſion ſerueth, all remiſneſſe and delay is to be carefully auoided : the changes of times are moſt tickle, and if you ſuffer your good hap now to paſſe ouer, you ſhall perhaps in vaine afterwards purſue the ſame when it is fled and gone.

Solyman by nature an ambitious yong prince, prickt forward thus alſo by the perſuaſions of Cortug Ogly and others, ſeeking their further credit and preferment by fitting his ambitious humor : but moſt of all by the inſtigation of the Baſſa Muſtapha, reſolued to go in perſon him-

A ſelfe againſt the Rhodes. And firſt to make ſome proofe of what ſpirit and courage Villerius the new choſen Great Maſter was of, in whoſe ſufficiency the greateſt part of the defence of the city was ſuppoſed to conſiſt: to him by way of a little cold friendſhip, he ſent a meſſenger with this ſhort letter thus directed:

Solyman by the grace of God, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, greateſt Emperour of Conſtantinople and Trapezond, moſt mighty King of Perſia, Arabia, Syria, and Ægypt; Lord of Aſia and Europe; Prince of Mecha and Aleppo; Ruler of Ieruſalem; and Maſter of the Vniuerſall Sea: to the Reuerend Father, Philippus Villerius Lilladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes, and Legat of Aſia, B greeting.

I am glad of thy kingdome and new promotion, which I wiſh thou maieſt long and happily enjoy, for that I hope thou wilt in honour and fidelity exceed all them which before thee ruled in the Rhodes: from whom as my anceſtors haue withdrawne their hand, ſo I after their example joyne with thee in amity and friendſhip. Ioy thou therefore, my friend, and in my behalfe rejoyce of my victory and triumph alſo: for this laſt Summer paſſing ouer Danubius with enſignes diſplaied, I there expected the Hungarian King, who I thought would haue giuen me battell; I tooke from him by ſtrong hand Belgrade, the ſtrongeſt city of his kingdome, with other ſtrong holds thereabouts: and hauing with fire and ſword deſtroied much people, and carried away many moe into captiuity, as a triumphant conqueror, breaking vp mine army, am retur-C ned to my imperiall city of Conſtantinople, from whence farewell.

Solymans Leter to Villerius, Great Maſter of the Rhodes.

The Great Maſter hauing read theſe Letters, and well conſidered of the ſame, perceiued forthwith Solymans meaning; and that peace was offered him in words and ſhew, but warre in deed and meaning. Which becauſe he was ready by force to repulſe, he rewarded the Turks meſſenger, and ſent backe with him another of his owne, a priuat perſon. For the Rhodians did ſeldome vouchſafe to ſend any honourable Embaſſadours to the Turkiſh Emperours (with whom they for moſt part liued in hoſtility) either the Turks to them. By this meſſenger he anſwered Solymans Letters with other of like vaine, as followeth:

D Philippus Villerius Lilladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes, to the Turke.

I right well underſtand your letters which your meſſenger brought vnto me. The friendſhip you write of, is as pleaſing to me as diſpleaſing to Cortug-Ogli your ſeruant, who went about to haue intercepted me vpon the ſudden, as I came out of France: but failing of his purpoſe, ſtealing by night into the Rhodian Sea, he attempted to haue robbed certaine Merchants ſhips bound from Ioppe to Venice: but ſending my fleet out of my hauen, I ſtaied his fury, conſtrained the pyrat to fly, and for haſt to leaue behind him the priſes he had before taken from the Merchants of Crete. Farewell, from the Rhodes.

The anſwer of Villerius to Solymans Letters.

By this anſwer Solyman perceiued, that he was well met withall in his owne fineneſſe, and E that he ſhould not ſo eaſily carry the Rhodes, as he had before done Belgrade. Yet being fully in himſelfe reſolued to try his fortune therein, he called vnto him certaine of the chiefe commanders of his wars, to whom he opened the whole determination in this ſort:

Although I doubt not, worthy chiefetaines, but that you are of the ſame mind now that you haue beene alwaies of, in the inuading of other Nations; yet I haue thought it good in matters tending to the common glory, and good of vs all, to vſe your generall aduice and counſell. Since the time that my father left this World, we haue made warre with diuers Nations and people. The Syrians by nature vnconſtant, and prone to rebellion, we haue by force reduced to their former obedience. The Sophi, that mighty King, nephew vnto the great King Vſun-Caſſanes, by his daughter the ſiſter of King Iacup, in heart and deed F our mortall enemy, not contented with the Kingdomes of Aſſyria, Media, Armenia the greater, Perſia, and Meſopotamia, we haue with our forces ſhut vp within the compaſſe of his owne dominions. The laſt yeare running through Hungary, both on this ſide and beyond Danubius, we tooke Belgrade the ſtrongeſt fortreſſe in that Kingdome: And whatſoeuer elſe we attempted, we ſubdued. Yet for all that (to ſpeake plainly plainly of my ſelfe) my minde greater in conceit than my Empire, and the bloud of Othoman, findeth no contentment in theſe victories. For whatſoeuer you haue yet done, although it be great, yet I deeme it all but little in regard of your worth: my deſire carryeth me further. This haue I alwaies aboue all things moſt earneſtly deſired, to ſet vpon the Rhodes, and vtterly to root out all the ſtrength and forces, yea, the very name of thoſe Rhodian ſouldiers. And haue not you alſo no leſſe than my ſelfe deſired the ſame? How often haue I heard you crying out, The Rhodes, The Rhodes? I haue expected the time that being diſcharged of other warres, I might here employ my whole ſtrength and power. That we ſo long deſired is now come: there was neuer greater opportunity of good ſucceſſe offered, a great part of the wals of the city of the Rhodes now lying euen with the ground; which cannot in ſhort time be repaired, eſpecially in their want of coyne. Beſide this, the garriſon in the caſtle is but ſmall, and their aid from France far off, which will either come too late when the city is loſt, or that which I rather beleeue, neuer. For neither will the French King (being at mortall warres with the Germane Emperour, and Lord of Italy) ſuffer his ſtorehouſes to be diſfurniſhed, or his Ports bared of the neceſſary defence of his ſhipping. Neither do you beleeue that the Spaniards (diſtreſſed at home with famine, war, and ciuill diſſention) will eaſily come hither out of Sicilia and Campania with ſupplies of men and victuall. But you may perhaps thinke, that great danger is to be feared from the Venetian fleet, and the Iſle of Crete, which I aſſure you is not ſo: for I know (although I will not now manifeſt the ſame) how I haue preuented that miſchiefe. Wherefore couragious ſouldiers (borne to the ſubduing of all Chriſtendome, much more of the Rhodes) with cheerefull hearts follow me your Soueraigne againſt theſe your moſt perfidious and cruell enemies. How long I pray you will you ſuffer that ſtaine and diſgrace to ſticke vpon the Othoman Family, and generally vpon all the name of the Turks, which theſe Rhodians caſt vpon vs the laſt time they were beſieged? Which was not ſo much done by their valour, as by the vnfortunat counſell of my great grandfather Mahomet, calling home Meſithes Palæologus his Generall in that war, for one vnlucky aſſault. But admit that their valour gained them victory, will you alwaies ſuffer theſe pyraticall excurſions vpon our Maine and Iſlands? The ranſacking of cities and countries? The carrying away of your cattell and richeſt ſubſtance? The captiuity and ſlaughter of your wiues and children? The ſlauery of your neereſt friends and kinſmen. So helpe me great Mahomet it ſhall not ſo be: I vow in deſpight of Chriſt and Iohn, in ſhort time to ſet vp mine enſignes with the Moone in the middle of the market place of Rhodes. Neither do I ſeeke any thing vnto my ſelfe, more than the honour of the enterpriſe; the profit I giue vnto you my fellow ſouldiers, their coine, plate, jewels (which is reported to be great) their riches and wealth is all yours, to carry home with you vnto your wiues and children. Wherefore let vs now with all our forces and courage ſet forward to the beſieging of the Rhodes.

Solymans purpoſe thus made knowne, and the ſame with one accord of all his captains well liked of: Pyrrhus the eldeſt Baſſa and of greateſt authority, who at the firſt diſſuaded the war, ſtanding vp in the middeſt of the reſt, ſaid:

I cannot but much admire the great wiſedome and rare vertues of our young Emperour, who ſo wiſely and aduiſedly hath declared all the deep counſels of a worthy chiefetaine in taking the war in hand. Bleſſed be Mahomet, thrice and foure times bleſſed is this Empire, bleſſed is our eſtate, and bleſſed are we with ſuch a Prince, which carrieth with him in his wars not only men and habiliments of war, but moſt deepe wiſedome and policy. Which wholeſome manner of proceeding, if we had alwaies before our eies, and would follow, we ſhould in ſhort time bring vnder our ſubjection not the Rhodes only, but all the kingdoms of the Chriſtians. Yet beſide that which our Emperour hath moſt carefully and conſideratly deuiſed, mine age and experience would exhort you, by gifts, promiſes, rewards, and all other means whatſoeuer, to corrupt if it were poſſible the chiefe and principall citizens of the Rhodes, thereby to enter into their moſt ſecret deuiſes and counſels: which how it may be wrought, I will in few words giue you to vnderſtand. I as a man indifferent, deſirous of peace and quietneſſe, will by meſſengers, and letters induce the great Maſter to ſend ſome honourable Embaſſage to our dread Soueraigne, which if I can once bring him vnto, then let me alone with the reſt.

Solyman maketh preparation againſt the Rhodes.

This counſell of the old Fox pleaſed all the hearers wel, but aboue others the emperor himſelfe, who gaue him in charge with all diligence and ſpeed, to proue what he could do: the other captains he commanded to prepare the greateſt forces they could, both for land and ſea ſeruice.

A ſeruice. Which preparation was ſo great both at Conſtantinople and other places, that it could not long be kept ſo ſecret, but that news thereof was brought to the Rhodes the fourth day of February: which newes dayly increaſing, and ſtill confirmed by more certaine reports, Villerius the Great Maſter for more certaine intelligence, ſent a Chriſtian of Epidaurus, who could perfectly ſpeake the Turkiſh languege, as a ſpy to Conſtantinople; who by ſecret letters from thence gaue him knowledge that the Turks were preparing a great fleet, and raiſing a mighty army, aduertiſing him alſo of a wonderfull proportion of artillery prepared for battery: but againſt whom was not commonly known, ſome deeming it to be for the inuaſion of Italy, ſome for the Rhodes, others ſuppoſing it to be for Cyprus or Corcyra: which diuerſity of conjectures, made many (whoſe conceits auerted from themſelues the fortune of that war) B to be more careleſſe & ſecure. But whileſt euery man was of opinion, that it was made againſt any man rather than himſelfe, certaine aduertiſement was giuen to the Rhodians, from diuers places by Letters from their friends and confederates, That the Turks did with extraordinary diligence keepe ſtreit watch and ward in all their ports thereabouts along the ſea coaſt, otherwiſe than they were before accuſtomed: which ſeemed to prognoſticate ſome farther matter than the defence of their frontiers. Villerius carefull of his charge, as the marke whereat the enemy aimed, prouided with all poſſible diligence great ſtore of victuall, armor, weapons, ſhot, powder, and whatſoeuer elſe neceſſary for the defence of the city.

Villerius prepareth to make reſiſtance againſt the Turks.

The new wals of the City, and Auergne fortreſſe, by Baſilius engineer to the Emperour Charles the fift (a worke begun in the time of Fabritius Caretus the late Grand Maſter, but not C yet finiſhed) was now with all diligent labour ſet vpon, euery man putting his helping hand vnto ſo neceſſary a worke. Whileſt theſe things were with ſo great endeauor and labor a doing, a meſſenger came from Conſtantinople, (ſent from the old Baſſa Pyrrhus) a ſharpe witted and cunning fellow; who with much filed ſpeech in moſt ſimple manner doing his meſſage, by the way, painted forth the great towardlineſſe and courteous nature of the Turkiſh Emperour Solyman, with the great commendation of Pyrrhus Baſſa his Maſter: deliuering from both of them Letters vnto the Great Maſter of this purport.

Solyman by the grace of God, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, &c. To the reuerend father Philippus Villerius Lilladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes, and Legat of Aſia, greeting.

I am certainely informed that my Letters are deliuered vnto thee; which for that thou vnderſtoodeſt them aright, I cannot expreſſe how much it pleaſed me. Truſt to it, that I am not contented with the victory I got at Belgrade; I hope for another, may I aſſure my ſelfe thereof, which I will not hide from thee whom I am alwaies mindfull of. Farewell from Conſtantinople.

Solymans letters to Villerius.

Pyrrhus, great Counſellour to the mighty Emperour Solyman, to Philippus Villerius Lilladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes and Legat of Aſia, greeting.

E

Your Letters, greater in meaning than character, I haue deliuered vnto our moſt mighty Emperour: but the bearer thereof I would not ſuffer to come to his preſence, leſt he ſhould be too much offended with ſo baſe a meſſenger. Vnto whom from henceforth ſend men of worth commendable for their yeares and diſcretion, with whom his Majeſty may (if he ſo pleaſe) conferre and conclude of matters concerning the common good: which thing if you ſhall do, it ſhall neither repent you of the doing thereof, nor me of my counſell. The meſſenger I ſend, bringeth Letters vnto you alſo from our great Emperour; to whoſe diuine excellency how you are to anſwer, you are already admoniſhed. Farewell from Conſtantinople.

Pyrrhus Baſſa his letters to Villerius.

These letters being openly read, drew the minds of the Rhodians diuerſly. Such as altoge-F ther wiſhed for peace, meaſuring others after their owne plaine meaning and integrity, commended the counſell of Pyrrhus, ſaying, That he being an old man of great experience, was not ſo deſirous of our quiet, as of the quiet of his prince and country: and therefore wiſhed by wiſedome to order that which the yong prince ſought for by war, fearing the uncertainty of mans fragility, the common chance of war, the violence of fortune, which haue oftentimes in a moment with a handfull of men ouerthrowne moſt mighty Kings with their ſtrong armies. The perſuaſion of theſe men took ſuch effect, that one of the Knights of the Order called Raimond March, a Spaniard, a noble gentleman of great courage, and very eloquent, skilfull alſo in the Turkiſh tongue, and then Muſter-maſter, was appointed to haue beene ſent Embaſſadour vnto the Turkiſh Emperour. Many there were of a contrary opinion, which ſuſpecting fraud and deceit, ſaid it were good to beware of the enemies counſell: asking, to what end this Embaſſage were? For ſhould we proclaime war (ſay they) againſt the moſt mighty tyrant, not yet our profeſſed enemy, who writeth all peace; Or ſhould we intreat for peace, no war as yet proclaimed; that he which as yet is afraid himſelfe, may now vnderſtand that he is of vs feared? Beſides that, with what ſecurity, with what face can our Embaſſadors go, vnrequeſted of the Turkiſh Emperor, without his ſafe conduct through thoſe countries which we daily burne and ſpoile? But they ſhall ſhew Pyrrhus the great Baſſaes letters forſooth, his protection, his credit and authority ſhall defend them from all injury and wrong; as though the ſeruant ſhould preſcribe lawes to his maſter, and ſuch a ſeruant as is moſt like vnto his maſter (that is) cruell, falſe of faith, a hater of all Chriſtians, but eſpecially of vs Rhodians: whom the mercileſſe tyrant hauing in his power, with his nauy and army in readines, ſhall with cruell torture inforce to diſcouer vnto him our prouiſion, the ſecrets of our city and Order. This opinion of the wiſer ſort, was greatly confirmed by the two much curioſity of the meſſenger which was ſent, who with all diligence enquired of the ſtate and ſcituation of the city, of the number and ſtrength of the Order. Wherefore in concluſion he was ſent backe againe accompanied but with one priuat ſoldier to carry the Great maſters letters vnto the Turkiſh tyrant: the tenour whereof was thus;

Philippus Villerius Great Maſter of the Rhodes, vnto the Turke, greeting.

Villerius his anſwer to Solymans letters.

That you are mindfull of me grieueth me nothing; and I am alſo mindfull of you. You repeate your victory in Hungary, wherewith not being contented you hope for another: nay, you promiſe and aſſure your ſelfe thereof, before you haue attempted the war. Beware you deceiue not your ſelfe; mens expectations neuer deceiue them more than in warres. Farewell, from the Rhodes.

The other lettes written to Pyrrhus, were to this effect.

Philippus Villerius Liiladamus Great Maſter of the Rhodes, to Pyrrhus the Baſſa.

Villerius his anſwer to Pyrrhus the Baſſa his letters.

I haue aduiſedly conſidered thy letters, with the behauiour and diſpoſition of thy meſſenger. As I contemne not thy counſell, ſo I will not follow the ſame, whileſt my men of war do ſpoile the countries and ports of thy lord and maſter, which I beare withall, by reaſon of the injuries they haue ſuſtained of the Turkiſh pirats. But I will call them home, and will ſend Embaſſadors vnto thy great lord: ſo that thou before ſend me ſafe conduct vnder thy maſters great ſeale, for their ſafe comming and returne. Farewell, from the Rhodes.

Villerius aduertiſed of the comming of the Turks.

But theſe letters were neuer deliuered to the great Turke, or the Baſſa: for as ſoone as the Turkiſh meſſenger was come ouer into the maine, he preſently tooke horſe, which was there in readineſſe for him, and poſted towards Conſtantinople with as much ſpeed as he could, leauing the Chriſtian meſſenger his companion behind him; who returning backe againe to the Rhodes, and telling what he had heard and ſeene, gaue them all great occaſion to diſpaire of peace: whereupon Villerius ſent into Crete to hire certaine companies of Cretenſian archers. In the meane time aduertiſement was giuen vnto the Great maſter by letters from the Iſland of Naxos, That the Turks were ready to put their fleet to ſea with the firſt appearance of the new Moone: which thing they moſt ſuperſtitiouſly obſerue in the beginning of all their great actions. The ſame newes was brought alſo by certaine merchants of the Iſland of Pathmos, who came to the Rhodes with a great ſhip laded with corne from Eubœa; vnder the colour of the ſale thereof, they (by the commandement of the Turks, to whom they were tributaries)

A ries) diligently noted all that was done in the city, ſhortly to be beſieged. The great maſter with no leſſe diligence, ſent diuers of his ſmall gallies amongſt the Iſlands and alongſt the maine, to learne what might be of the enemies doings. Ioannes Lupus one of the knights of the order, and captaine of one of theſe gallies, meeting with a great ſhip of the Turks laded with corne, tooke her and brought her home to Rhodes. But Alphonſus captaine of another of the gallies, lying in harbor in one of the Iſlands, and ſuffering his men to ſtraggle too far into the land, was ſet vpon by a Turkiſh pirat and taken.

About the ſame time the Turks by often fires made vpon the maine in the night ſeaſon, gaue ſigne vnto the Rhodians, that they were deſirous to haue ſome parly with them, as their manner was. Whereupon one Menetou a French-man, one of the Knights, by commandement B of the reſt of the Order, was ſent with a gally well appointed to the maine to ſee what the matter might be; and with him was ioyned Iacobus Xaycus a pay-maſter for the gallies, that he might of the inhabitants of the place, and his friends there dwelling, diligently enquire of all things concerning the intended war: for this Xaycus, beſides that he was a skilfull ſeaman and one that knew the coaſt well, had alſo good experience in ciuill affaires, and was wonderfully beloued and made of by the Turkiſh Merchants whoſe language he had perfectly learned. Drawing neere the ſhoare, he found the Turkiſh Merchants making merry vpon the maine, with their carpets, cotten-wooll, and ſuch like merchandiſe about them as they vſed to exchange with the Rhodian Merchants for woollen cloathes: vnto theſe Merchants he gaue due ſalutations, gaging their faith for their ſafety, and they likewiſe to him. But being requeſted C to come aſhore to make merry vntill one of his familiar and old acquaintance might be ſent for, who as they ſaid was not far off; he anſwered, he could not ſo doe, except they would firſt deliuer a pledge for him a ſhipboord. The perfidious Turks laughing as it were at his needleſſe feare, willingly ſent their merchandiſe, and a pledge aboord the gallies. Xaycus then going aſhore, and embracing the Turkiſh Merchants which met him: vpon a ſigne giuen, was forthwith beſet on euery ſide and taken priſoner, and by poſt horſes conueied with all ſpeed to Conſtantinople; where he was with the moſt exquiſit torments that could be deuiſed for any man to endure, enforced to confeſſe whatſoeuer his cruell enemies could deſire. After Xaycus was by treachery thus loſt, then began their prouident wiſedome to be highly commended, which were the occaſion, that the decree made for ſending Embaſſadors vnto the Turks, was D againe reuoked. The hoſtage giuen for Xaycus, being brought to the Rhodes and examined, was found to be a ſimple country fellow whom the Turks had of purpoſe well apparelled to deceiue the Rhodians: who frankly and plainly according to his ſimple knowledge, anſwered to all things that were of him demanded; as that the Turks were making great preparation for ſea, vpon the coaſts of Caria and Lycia, and had taken vp many ſoldiers in the countries thereabouts to ſend into the frontiers of his dominions towards Syria, for defence of the ſame againſt the Perſians. All which was true: for Solyman to put the Rhodians out of all ſuſpition of inuaſion (whom he knew carefully to obſerue his doings) ſent the ſouldiers whom he had leuied in the countries neereſt to the Rhodes, far away againſt the Perſian, as if he had meant nothing againſt the Rhodes, and ſo vpon the ſudden to ſet vpon them with his army brought E out of Europe, before they were aware. But this his deuice ſerued to ſmall purpoſe; for the great Maſter perceiuing by many circumſtances, but eſpecially by that late calamity of Xaycus, that the Rhodes was the place the Turkiſh Tyrant longed for; and fearing that delay might bring further danger, cauſed a ceſſation from all other buſineſſe to be proclaimed, vntill all things neceſſary for defence of the city were accompliſhed: watch and ward was kept in euery ſtreet, the great artillery planted vpon the wals and bulwarks, companies appointed for the defence of euery place, the publike armory of all warlike prouiſion was open, all the ſtreets were full of men carrying weapons, ſome to one place, ſome to another. At which time a generall muſter was taken by the chiefe men of the Order, where where found about fiue thouſand men able to beare armes, among whom were ſix hundred Knights of the Order, and F fiue hundred ſouldiers of Creet; the reſt were for the moſt part mariners, able bodies, who in the time of the ſiege did great ſeruice, encouraged by their ſea captaines: the Iſland people which repaired into the city, ſerued to little other purpoſe but to dig and carry earth vnto the rampiers: and the citizens (except it were ſome few of the better ſort) were for the moſt part weake and of ſmall courage, not able to indure any labor or paines, and yet hardly to be kept in order and gouernment; great ſpeakers, but ſmall doers, greater in ſhew than in deed. The G Great Maſter hauing carefully prouided and ordered all things needfull for defence of the city, and fearing nothing more than the faint heart of the citizens, cauſed them all to be called together; for incouragement of whom, he ſpake vnto them as followeth:

Villerius his Oration vnto the Rhodians.

Valiant Gentlemen and worthy Citizens, wee heare that the Turke our mortall enemy is comming againſt vs, with a huge army raiſed of diuers Nations: from whoſe naturall cruelty and wonted periury except we defend our ſelues by force, one and the ſelfeſame danger is like to befall me, my knights, and you all. For we haue with common conſent and hand grieuouſly ſpoiled him both by ſea and land, and you are by booties taken by ſtrong hand out of his dominions, inriched: and at this day we keepe his people in grieuous H ſeruitude, and he ours; but he injuriouſly, and we moſt juſtly: For his anceſtours (weary of the darke dennes and caues of the mountaine Caucaſus, their naturall dwelling) without right, title, or cauſe, incited only with couetouſneſſe, ambition, and the hatred of our moſt ſacred religion, haue driuen the Chriſtians out of Syria: and afterwards oppreſſed the Grecians in Grecia; where not contented to haue deſtroied the people, with one ſimple kinde of death (as barbariſme is euer cruell and mercileſſe) they haue with moſt exquiſit and horrible torments, butchered many thouſands of that Nation. All whom, this wicked proud youth (whoſe miſchiefe exceedeth his yeares) an euill neighbour to all men, not contented with the dominions of Arabia, Syria, Ægypt, the greateſt part of Aſia, and of many other places moe, ſeeketh in tyranny, murther, ſpoile, perjury, and hatred againſt Chriſt and Chriſtians, far to excell: and forceth himſelfe to the vttermoſt of his power, to take from vs our Iſlands, and to ſubdue the Chriſtian Countries, I that ſo at length being Lord of all, and commander of the World, he may at his pleaſure ouerthrow the Chriſtian Cities, kill the Chriſtians, and vtterly root out the Chriſtian name, which he ſo much hateth. For the repulſing of which intollerable injury, we haue eſpecially choſen this Iſland of the Rhodes for our dwelling place, becauſe the ſame ſeemed more commodious than any other for the annoying of this barbarous Nation. We haue done what in vs lay, holpen by you: we know by proofe your great valour and fidelity, which we now haue not in any diſtruſt. Wherefore I will not vſe many words to perſuade you to continue in your fidelity and loyalty, neither long circumſtance to encourage you to play the men: ſithence worthy minds are not with words either encouraged or diſmaied. But concerning my ſelfe and my Knights of the Order, I will ſpeake a few words. I with them, with whom (as I hope) the Chriſtian Princes and other my Knights of the Weſt will in good time joyne their forces, are moſt ready and K preſt to defend your ſelues, your children, your wiues, your goods, the monuments of your anceſtours and ſacred Temples, dedicated to the ſeruice of our God. Which opinion that it may remaine firme and fixt in your minds, if nothing elſe, my faithfulneſſe in your warres, my body not yet altogether ſpent, but able enough to endure paines and trauell, the Nobility of theſe worthy Knights of the Order, their loue towards you, and their hatred towards your enemies were ſufficient to confirme: but beſide this, the ſtrength of this city, which this noble Order hath with infinite charges ſo notably fortified with ditches, wals, towers and bulwarkes, againſt all the force and fury of Artillery, is ſuch, as that no city may worthily be compared, much leſſe preferred before the ſame. It is wonderfully ſtored with all kinde of weapons and warrelike prouiſion: we haue laied vp plenty of wine, fleſh, and corne, in vaults, ſo that neither wet weather nor wormes can attaint the ſame: of wood and wholeſome water not to be taken from vs, things neceſſary L for men beſieged, we haue plenty, and able men ynow for the defence of the City. All which things promiſe vnto vs aſſured victory, and ſuch end of the warre as wee wiſh for. Beſides this, Neceſſity, which giueth courage euen vnto cowards, will enforce vs to fight. Yet ſtandeth on our ſide true Religion, Faith, Conſcience, Deuotion, Conſtancy, the loue of our Country, the loue of our Liberty, the loue of our Parents, Wiues, Children, and whatſoeuer elſe we hold deare: Whereas they bring with them the proud command of their captaines, Infidelity, Impiety, Vnconſtancy, a wicked deſire of your bondage, of your bloud, and the bloud of your parents, wiues, and children. Out of doubt (beloued citizens) our good God will not ſuffer ſo many good vertues to be ouercome by their foule vices. Wherefore be you in minds quiet and ſecure, and trouble not your ſelues with forboding feare of your enemies; onely continue in the fidelity and loyalty which you haue alwaies kept inuiolate and vnſpotted toward this ſacred and honourable M fellowſhip, in moſt dangerous warres, and hardeſt chances of fortune: and if need ſhall ſo require, with couragious hand ſhew your valour againſt your enemies, and make it knowne vnto the Spaniards, French, Italians, Hungarians, and Engliſh, That the Rhodians are of power to daunt the Turkiſh pride, and to auert their fleets and armies from Italy, which they haue ſo many yeares threatened with fire and ſword: and will no doubt thither with all ſpeed haſten and come, if (that which my mind abhorreth A to ſpeak) they ſhould here preuail. Neither will his ambitious youth, in courage, falſhood and cruelty exceeding Hannibal, imitate him in that, that hauing ouerthrown the Romans in the great battel at Cannas, knew not to vſe his victory; but he will preſently with more than Cæſars celerity, bring forth the treaſures his father got in Egypt, and with great fleets and huge armies inuade Apulia, Calabria, and Sicilia: from whence he will forthwith break into France; and afterwards into Spain and other Chriſtian countries, raging through them with all cruelty. But I am carried away further than I purpoſed, & than need is: for your fidelitie and valor (moſt worthy Citiſens) to endure the ſiege, and repulſe the Enemy, is ſuch as needeth not my perſuaſion; and of greater reſolution than that it can be ſhaken with the dangers incident to men beſieged: yet the greateſt and moſt forcible miſeries of all, which is hunger and thirſt, I aſſure you, you ſhall neuer feele. Which pinching calamities for all that, ſome people (in faithfulnes, courage, B and valor nothing comparable to you) haue neuertheles moſt conſtantly indured. For they of Petelinum, beſieged by the Carthaginenſes, for want of victual thruſt their parents and children out of the city, the longer to hold out the ſiege, and liued themſelues with hides and leather ſod or broiled, and leaues of trees, and many other homely things, by the ſpace of eleuen moneths; and could not be ouercome, vntill they wanted ſtrength longer to ſtand vpon the walls, and to hold their weapons in their hands. They of Caſilinum, beſieged by Hannibal, held out vntill a poor Mouſe was ſold for much mony. You muſt of neceſſity keep watch and ward in your ſtations; if your houſes chance to be beaten down with the enemies artillery, you muſt haue patience; for why, they ſhall be repaired again, and it is not a matter of ſuch importance, that we ſhould therfore yeeld vnto our enemies, in whoſe curteſie and fidelitie no aſſurance is to bee repoſed. For beſides that he is by nature cruell and vnfaithfull, he can by no means be gentle and faithful C towards vs, which haue don him ſo much harm, who only (as himſelf ſaith) haue oftentimes to his griefe, interrupted the courſe of the victories of him the conqueror both of ſea and land: whom hee hath ſo many times aſſailed by open force, with all his ſtrength, wit, craft, deceit and policy: yet alwaies hitherto in vain, almighty God ſtill protecting vs, whom aboue all things (moſt dear Citiſens) I wiſh you to ſerue and call vpon; for except he keep and defend the city, the watchmen do but watch in vain.

This cheerful ſpeech wonderfully incouraged the hearers, eſpecially the vulgar ſort, eaſily caried away with pleaſing words. But whilſt they in their jolity dream of nothing but of triumph and victory; the wiſer ſort poſſeſſed with care, ceaſed not to do what in them lay, to D procure, that the good commonly forewiſhed, might in fine come to effect. Amongſt others, Clement Biſhop of the Greeks, a man both for his place and deuout manner of liuing, had in great reputation amongſt them, laboured earneſtly by dayly exhortations, to perſuade the Greeks his countrymen, in that great and common danger with heart and hand to joyne with the Latines in defence of the city: for although the gouernment was altogether in the great Maſter and his Knights, which were Latines, yet the people both of the Iſland and City were for moſt part Greekes, who liked not altogether ſo well of the Latine gouernment, but that they did many times repine therat; howbeit the matter was at that time ſo ordered by the good perſuaſion of the Biſhop, and good gouernment of the great Maſter, that they all agreed as one man to ſpend their liues in defence of the City; and were ſo far from fear of the comming E of the barbarous Enemy, that many of the Vulgar people (in whom appeareth commonly more heat than wit) wiſhed rather for his comming than otherwiſe. But looke what they had fondly wiſhed, proued afterward to their coſts ouer-true: for within a few nights after, the Turks by fire made in the night time vpon the main, gaue ſign of parly vnto the Rhodians.
Wherupon a Gally well appointed with a long boat, was preſently ſent forth to ſee what the matter was: which drawing neer vnto the ſhore, was haled by a Turke, accompanied with a troup of horſmen, deſiring the captain of the Gally to ſend ſome on ſhore, with whom they might more conueniently parley. Which thing the Captain refuſing; What, ſaid the Turk, art thou afraid of Xaycus fortune. To whom the Captain in threatning maner anſwered again, Xaycus, whom you haue contrary to your faith and oath taken, troubleth me not; neither F am I afraid of you, whom I truſt not, but if you haue any thing to ſay, let me heare it, or els get you farther off, otherwiſe I wil ſpeak to you by the mouth of a canon. Then one of the Turks comming to the waters ſide, laid down letters vpon a ſtone, ſaying, That in them was contained that they had in charge. Which ſaid, he preſently ſet ſpurs to his horſe and departed with the reſt of his company. The Captain ſending out his long boat for theſe Letters, found them directed in this ſort:

Solyman by the grace of God, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, most mighty Emperor of Conſtantinople and Trapezond, &c. Vnto the reuerend Father Philippus Villerius Lilladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes: To his Knights, and all his people in general.

Solyman his threatning letters vnto the Rhodians.

THe compaſſion I haue of my diſtreſſed ſubjects, and the great injury you do me, hath mooued me to wrath: wherfore I command you without delay to yeeld vnto me the Iſland and city of the Rhodes, willingly and charitably granting you leaue ſafely to depart with all your riches, or to tary, if you ſo pleaſe, vnder my obeiſance, your liberty and religion in no part infringed with any tribute or impoſition. If you be wiſe, prefer friendſhip and peace before bloudy war: for vnto them which are by force ſubdued, are reſerued all extremities which the miſerable vanquiſhed vſe to ſuffer of the angry Conqueror: from which neither your own force, nor forrein aid, nor huge walls, which I will vtterly ouerthrow, ſhall be able to defend you: Fare you well. All which ſhall aſſuredly be performed, if you ſhall make choice rather of my friendſhip, than of my force. Wherin you ſhall neither be deceiued nor circumuented; I take to witneſſe God the Creator of heauen and earth, the four Writers of the Euangelicall hiſtory, the fourſcore thouſand Prophets deſcended from heauen, and amongſt them our higheſt Prophet Mahomet; the reuerend ghoſts of my Father and Grandfather, and this my ſacred and Imperial head. From our palace at Conſtantinople.

When theſe letters were openly read in the counſel chamber at Rhodes, ſome were of opinion, that it was good to anſwer the Turkiſh tyrant roundly, therby to let him know that they feared not his threats. Others thought it no wiſdom, with hard words to prouoke ſo great an enemy to further diſpleaſure. Thus whilſt euery man would haue framed an anſwer according to their own diſpoſition, in concluſion it was agreed vpon to giue him no anſwer at all.

The ſame day theſe letters came to the Rhodes, which was the 14 of Iune, one of the Turks great commanders at ſea with 30 gallies, the fore-runners of the Turkiſh fleet, arriued at the Iſland of Chos, famous in antient time for the birth of Hippocrates the great Phyſition, & the wonderful picture of Venus left there vnperfect by Apelles, which for the excellencie thereof neuer man durſt afterward take in hand to perfect: which fruitful and pleaſant Iſland was then at the arriual of the Turks, part of the dominion of the Rhodes. The Admirall of this Fleet here landing his Turks, began to burn the corn which was then almoſt ripe, with the country villages round about. With which injury Prejanes Gouernor of the Iſle (a man of great courage and valor) mooued; with a choſen company of footmen, and certain troups of horſe, ſuddenly ſet vpon the Turks, in diuers places diſperſed abroad far into the countrey, with ſuch a terrible cry of the country people, and inſtruments of war, that the Turks being therewith amaſed, ran away as if they had bin mad, and were many of them ſlain without reſiſtance. And had not the gallies lien neer the ſhore, to receiue them that were able to fly thither, there had not one of them which landed eſcaped the hands of the Iſland people. The Turks hauing receiued this loſſe, left the Iſland and put to ſea again.

The Rhodians for fear of the Turks, deſtroy their ſuburbs and places of pleaſure without the city.

The Rhodians for the moſt part now aſſured and out of doubt of the Turks comming, by the perſuaſion of Gabriel Pomerolus Vice-Maſter, and other men of great experience, plucked down the ſuburbs of the City, and layd them euen with the ground: their pleaſant orchards alſo and gardens neer to the city they vtterly deſtroyed; the great Maſter for examples ſake beginning firſt with his own, being a place of great delicacie lying vnder the wals neer to the French bulwark: and taking into the city all ſuch things as they thought needful for the induring of the ſiege, they vtterly deſtroied all the reſt, were it neuer ſo pleaſant or commodious, within a mile of the towne, leauing all that place as euen and as bare as they could poſſibly make it; to the intent that the enemy at his comming ſhould find nothing neer the city, wherof to make vſe. But whilſt the pleaſure and delights of the ſuburbs are thus defacing, another

The feare of the country people.

A more heauy and woful ſight preſented vnto the eies of the citiſens, filled the city with greater mourning and penſiuenes than did the comming of the enemy. The miſerable multitude of the poor country people, ſome bringing wood, others corn, cattel, fouls, and other neceſſaries that they had out of the country, into the city (for ſo the great Maſter had commanded) after whom followed great numbers of women & children weeping, with diſhiueled haire, ſcratching their faces & tearing themſelues after the maner of the country, wringing their hands, and caſting vp their eies to heauen, beſeeching God with heauy countenance and flouds of tears, to defend the noble city of the Rhodes, and themſelues from the fury of their enemies. Which multitude of country people, with their prouiſion, being packt vp into narrow rooms in the houſes of the citiſens, and their cattel ſtaruing for want of fodder, afterwards corrupted B the air, wherof inſued rotten agues and the flix, during the time of the ſiege: but after the city was giuen vp, ſuch a plague and mortalitie followed, as deſtroied great numbers of the Turks and poor Chriſtians, who knowing not whether to go, choſe rather there to dy, than to forſake their natiue country.

The General of the Turkiſh fleet which landed in the Iſland of Chos, and was of purpoſe ſent by Solyman, to prouoke the Rhodians to battell at ſea, before hee with his whole power came to beſiege the Iſland; came daily with twenty gallies halfe thoſe narrow ſeas ouer, between Lycia and the Rhodes, leauing the reſt of his fleet riding at anchor at the promontory called Gnidium (not far from the City of Rhodes) ready to aid him as need ſhould require. This maner of brauery he vſed many daies together, hoping thereby to allure the Rhodians C out of their hauen to giue him battel: knowing, that if he ſhould therin obtain the victory, it were at that time little leſſe than the taking of the city; or if he could by cruel fight but weaken the forces of the Rhodians, he ſhould therein do his maſter good ſeruice, and greatly further his victory, by diminiſhing the number of the Defendants. When hee had many dayes without intermiſſion in this proud maner come half ſeas ouer, and ſometimes paſſing farther, came and lay at the mouth of the hauen, as it were daring them to fight: the Rhodians not wont to be ſo braued at their own doors, mooued with the intolerable inſolency of this proud Turk, by their continual importunitie cauſed the great Maſter to call a councell, to conſider whether they ſhould fight winh this fleet of the Turks or not. The Counſellors by appointment of the great Maſter aſſembled; the Chancellor, a man of great authoritie and ſpirit, D famous for his noble acts both at home and abroad, and chiefe of them which were of opinion this fleet of the Turks was to be fought with, ſaid;

The Chancellors ſpeech, perſuading the Rhodians to fight with the Turks gallies.

So great diſgrace was not longer to be ſuffered, but preſently reuenged. For (ſaid he) the hugy Fleet of the Turks, I do not ſay at whoſe force and ſight, but at whoſe very name many men do tremble & quake (which for all that is vnto vs no great nouelty, for euery year we hear of the like) is as a head to be joined vnto theſe pyraticall gallies, as members; and then will it be moſt expedient (which will be an eaſie thing for vs to do, hauing the better both for ſtrength of ſhipping, and number and valor of men) to giue that great head ſuch a blow and wound, by cutting off theſe limbs, that it ſhall euer after ſtagger and faint for want of ſtrength: or elſe there is no other fleet at all prepared againſt vs to follow this, and then this diſ- E comfited we ſhall be in quiet. Which thing in my opinion (though others which fear their own ſhadowes and the falling of heauen ſay otherwiſe) is moſt like to be true: for the great Turk is not ſo ſottiſh to come hither, the fitteſt time of the year being ſo far ſpent, in the later end of Iune, to beſiege this city, and ſuch a city as he knoweth to be moſt ſtrong, wanting nothing that is needfull, and thorowly manned with valiant ſoldiers, from whence his anceſtors haue bin with loſſe and ſhame repulſed: when as the remainder of the Summer will be ſpent before he can incamp himſelf, and place his batteries. And Winter time you know is vnfit for euery ſiege, eſpecially in this Iſland, wherin they can find no hauen or harbor to reſt in. Wherfore on Gods name let vs ſet vpon our proud enemies, and let vs not for a few threatning words ſent vnto vs from a fearfull youth, vpon a finenes and policie leſt we ſhould follow the tail of his fleet bound for ſome other place, ſit ſtil like cowards within our walls, with our hands in our boſomes, as men which for feare F and dread durſt not ſhew their heads. Which our cowardiſe and want of courage we (forſooth) call Fabius his policy. But I would to God we were like Fabius: but I fear we ſhall proue more like Antiochus, the Ætolians, the Vitellians; all whoſe courage conſiſted in words, vainly hoping to gain the victory by ſitting ſtill and wiſhing well. But Gods help is not to be gotten with womens prayers and ſupplications, or theſe faint-hearted policies, which cowards call adniſed counſell. But victory is gained by adventuring and expoſing our ſelues to danger and perill.

With theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches he ſo mooued the multitude, who commonly conceiue moſt courage vpon the greateſt vncertainties, that they deſired to fight; ſaying, That they would waſh away that foul diſgrace with the bloud and ſlaughter of their enemies: for why, they wanted not weapons, courage, or hands (as they ſaid) to do it withall.

For all this, the grauer ſort of the Counſell (without whoſe conſent the Maſter might in ſuch caſes do nothing) thought it not good in ſo dangerous a time to adventure any great part of their forces, which they ſhould afterwards want for defence of the city. The Turkiſh General deceiued of his expectation, and perceiuing that the Rhodians would not bee drawn forth to battel at ſea, withdrew his fleet twelue miles off, vnto a place called Villanova, where caſting anchor and landing his men, he burnt the Corn all thereabout, which was now almoſt ripe, but forſaken of the people as a thing deſperat: as for the people themſelues, they were all fled into the city of Rhodes, or els into ſtrong caſtles in other places of the Iſland.

At the ſame time certain troups of horſmen ſent out to skirmiſh with the Turks that were burning the corn, were by a meſſenger ſent from the great Maſter commanded to retyre. For the prouident General ſought by all means to reſerue his ſoldiers for greater dangers, which he iuſtly feared in the expected ſiege; during which time he ſhewed himſelf a moſt politique captain & braue ſoldier: he many times by day eat his meat with his ſoldiers, as one of them; and moſt part of the night kept watch himſelf, walking vp and down, & reſting himſelf when he was weary, vpon ſome ſtone or piece of timber, or other homely ſeat as it chanced. In time of aſſault he was alwaies more forward and aduenturous than the graue Counſellors wiſhed, fearing neither ſhot nor enemy, yet did hee more commend diſcreet counſell, grounded vpon reaſon, than proſperous actions commended but by their euents. And which was moſt wonderful, amongſt ſo many cares, in midſt of ſuch diuers and dangerous chances, hee carried alwaies ſuch a grace and maieſty in his cheerful countenance, as made him to be of the ſoldiers both reuerenced & loued. Al the time he could ſpare from the neceſſary affairs of his weighty charge, from aſſaults, and the natural refreſhing of his body, he beſtowed in prayer & ſeruing of God; he oftentimes ſpent the greateſt part of the night in the church alone praying, his head-piece, gorget, and gantlets lying by him: ſo that it was often ſaid, That his deuout praiers and carefulnes would make the city inuincible.

The 26 of Iune early in the morning, news was brought into the city from the watchtower ſtanding vpon S. Stephens hil almoſt a mile from the city, That a moſt huge fleet was deſcried at ſea, making thitherwards all alongſt the coaſt of Lycia. This bad news much troubled the city, although it was not of moſt men vnexpected: all places were filled with tumult & hurly-burly; euery man meaſured the greatnes of the danger by his own fear, and ſuch a pittiful cry was in euery place as is vſual in cities preſently to be beſieged. Herupon publick praiers were made throughout the city, and euery man with great deuotion beſought the God of heauen, That as it was his pleaſure, that the Rhodians ſhould at that time be the Champions of the Chriſtian religion, ſo he would giue them ſtrength and victory againſt their enemies, and to turn the calamities of War vpon the enemies of his Name. Their deuotion ended, the gates of the city were ſhut vp, and people from all places ran vnto the walls, great flocks of women, children, and aged men, not able to ſtand without a ſtaffe, going forth of their houſes to gaze vpon the dreadful fleet (wherein was aboue two hundred ſailes, as is reported) filled the ſtreets and tops of the high towers and houſes. The formoſt of the fleet was the Admiral of Callipolis, to whom Solyman had committed the charge of all his Navy, and to aſſaile the City by ſea. The Rear-Admirall was Cara-Mahometes an arch pyrat, who was afterwards ſlaine with a great ſhot out of the city. The Vice-Admirall in the middle of the fleet with a great ſquadron of Gallies, hauing a faire Weſternly winde, ſtrook ſail directly before the mouth of the hauen (which was on both ſides defended with two ſtrong towers well furniſhed with ſtore of great artillery) and began to row toward the city: wherupon an alarm was raiſed, the trumpets ſounded, and many haſted into the bulwark which defended the left ſide of the hauen, which the enemy ſeemed to direct his courſe vnto, and was indeed more ſubiect vnto danger than

A than the other. But the Turk ſeeing himſelf in danger to be ſunk with ſhot from the bulwark, was glad to get himſelf farther off vnto the reſt of the fleet: the Rhodians from the wals with loud outcries ſcornfully deriding him for his fooliſh attempt. This great fleet in exceeding brauery & triumph paſſing by the city in ſight of the Rhodians (ſtanding vpon the wals with enſignes diſplaied) did not more terrifie them, than they were themſelues terrified to behold the ſtrength of the city, and cheerfulnes of the defendants. But paſſing on, they came vnto the promontory which the inhabitants cal Bo, about three miles diſtant from the city Eaſtward: which ſmal hauen being not able to receiue ſo great a fleet, many of the gallies were inforced to ride it out at ſea, where they were by ſhot out of the city oftentimes indangered, and inforced to get them further off. Whilſt the enemy was there landing his great ordnance, & other B inſtruments of war prepared for the ſiege, chuſing a place for his camp, tranſporting his land-ſoldiers from the main into the Iſland, viewing the ſtrength and ſcituation of the city, and in what place he might with moſt eaſe aſſault the ſame: the Rhodians in the mean time were not idle, but ſunk diuers deep ſounds in many places of the city neer to the walls, to diſcouer the enemies mines, and fortified their bulwarks with greater rampiers; in which work euery man put to his helping hand without reſpect of age or calling. The grand Maſter about that time ſent Lodovicus Andugus one of the Knights of the Order, into Spain to Charles the Emperour; & Claudius Ducenuillus another of the Order alſo, to Rome to the Cardinals, & Italian knights of the Order; and from thence into France vnto the French King with letters, crauing the aid of theſe Chriſtian princes for relief of the city, by ſea and land beſieged. But all in vaine; for C they caried away with the endles grudge of one againſt another, or reſpecting only their own eſtates, returned the Embaſſadors with good words, but no relief.

The great Maſter by embaſſadors craues aid of the Chriſtian Princes.

At this time Preianes gouernor of Chios (of whom we haue before ſpoken) a man comparable with any of the captains of that age, an excellent ſoldier both by ſea and land, valiant, and therto fortunat, of an inuincible courage, brought vp in the wars from his childhood; when he had by the ſpace of two or three daies hid himſelfe in the rocks at ſea, for fear of the Turkes great fleet, came by night in a ſmal pinnace to the Rhodes, hauing deceiued the Turks watch: at whoſe comming the Rhodians wonderfully reioyced; for the ſoldiers repoſed greater confidence in no man than in him; and if any great exploit were to be don, him the Maſter truſted aboue any other: he alwaies in arms during the ſiege incouraged the ſouldiers, ſearched the D watch, ſurueyed the bulwarks, repaired the breaches, and ſuch labors as others accounted extream miſeries, he cheerfully indured, as if they had bin but his pleaſures and recreations. At the ſame time alſo Gabriel Martiningus of Brixia, a moſt skilful enginier, came to the Rhodes out of Creta; by whoſe induſtry, 55 mines which the Turks did with infinit labor and charge make (by reaſon of the ſpringing of the water, and hardnes of the rocks) during the ſiege, were all by countermines diſappointed and defeated.

The commendation of Prejanes.

The city of Rhodes is ſcituated on a plaine ground, on euery ſide to be beſieged; onely Northward it is defended with a goodly hauen, from whence it lieth all Weſtward. Betwixt it and the hils round about it, lieth a ſtony plain ground, not very broad, but of greater length; theſe hils are full of ſprings, and orchards planted with oliues, fig trees, Vines, and ſuch other E fruits as ſuch dry & ſandy grounds wil bear. But what by nature wanted, was by the hand and induſtry of man ſupplied; for it was compaſſed about with a moſt ſtrong double wal & deep trenches, threatning the enemy with thirteen ſtately towers, and ſure againſt all aſſaults, with 5 mighty bulwarks, with diuers goodly fair gates: & that which was the greateſt defence of of all, within the city was alwaies kept a moſt exact and ſtreit form of War-like Diſcipline.
The defence of the whole city was thus proportioned: From the French Tower (which with the greatneſſe and height thereof ſeemed to mate the sky) ſtood the Frenchmen, with the French Lillies in their Enſignes, vnder their Commander Ioannes Abbinus, a noble Knight of the Order. From thence to Saint Georges Gate lay the ſtout Germanes with the Eagle in their Enſignes. In the third ſtation were placed the French Avernois, with the Spaniards, F for that the ditches in that place were neither ſo deep nor broad as elſwhere. In the fift place lay the Engliſh garriſon, ouer whom the grand Maſter himſelf commanded. After them ſucceeded they of Narbona: and laſt of all the Italians, in valor not inferior to any of the reſt, vnder the leading of Petrus Balinus and Gregorius Morgutus. In euery of theſe ſtations were di-

A Turkiſh woman ſlaue conſpireth to fire the City.

The enemie was not as buſie without the city in placing his battery, but traiterous minds were as buſie within, to haue betraied the ſame. A Turkiſh woman, ſlaue to one of the rich citiſens, had conſpired with certain other her complices, at ſuch time as the Turks ſhould aſſault the town, at one inſtant to ſet on fire the houſes wherin they dwelt, in diuers parts of the city, that the defendants drawn from the wals to quench the fire, the Turks in the mean time might the more eaſily enter. But this treaſon was in good time reuealed, and the offenders worthily executed.

The painfulnes of the Turkes pioners.

The Turks had not as yet placed their battery, when as they took a certaine hill whereon ſtood a church dedicated to Coſmus and Damianus, directly ouer againſt the Engliſh ſtation.
From thence (as it ſeemed, rather for exerciſing of their ſoldiers, than for any great harm they could do ſo far off) they began with ſmal battering pieces to ſhoot into the city; & afterward H they began to dig mines, and to caſt vp trenches: for the performing of which kinde of worke, and for the filling vp of the towne ditches, they had brought with them twenty thouſand pioners, men better acquainted with country labor and keeping of cattel, than with wars; which being inforced vnto their labor day and night, ſomtime with ſtripes, and ſomtime with death, did with incredible celerity bring that to paſſe, which was before thought impoſſible. They cut waies through tthe hard ſtony rocks, raiſing the plains as high as mountaines, with earth brought two miles off, and laying the mountains euen with the plains, and yet they did neuer work in ſafety, but were miſerably rent in ſunder by the great ordnance out of the town: and that which moſt of all troubled them, the Rhodians ſallying out vpon thoſe ouer-laboured I people, hauing neither courage nor skil to defend themſelues, but truſting only to their heels ſlew great numbers of them, and not of them only, but of others alſo appointed for their defence, whom the Rhodians, taking courage of their fear, fiercely purſued and ſlew downright.
And when many others iſſuing out of the camp in great companies, thought to haue relieued their fellows, the great ordnance before of purpoſe placed to moſt aduantage, ſo thundered from the wals among the thickeſt of them, that the ground lay couered with the bodies and weapons of the dead Turks. With which manner of fight, after the Rhodians had twice or thrice troubled the enemy, the Turkes for more ſafety wrought moſt vpon their mounts by night, keeping moſt ſtrong watch for defence of their pioners, which for more aſſurance they doubled in the day time, and bent their Artillery againſt the places which the Rhodians vſed to ſally out at: which did not ſo much keep them in, as the feare of weakening themſelues by K often ſallies; knowing that one man was vnto them more loſſe, than vnto the enemy an hundred.

The Turkes deceiued by certain Chriſtian Mariners.

Among others which in the beginning of this great ſiege forced the vttermoſt of their deuices to the deſtruction of the Turks, were certain mariners, who hauing the Turkiſh Language perfectly, with leaue of the grand Maſter (diſguiſing themſelues in the habit of Turks) departed by night out of the hauen in a ſmal boat, loded with apples, plums, peares, mellons, grapes, and ſuch other fruits as the time of the year afforded; and in the darknes came alongſt the coaſt, vnto that part of the Iſland wherunto the paſſage was out of the maine. There, as if they had bin Turks come from the main, they landed their commodities, which the Turkiſh ſoldiers bought greedily. When they had thus ſould their fruits, and in ſelling thereof diligently L noted the ſpeech and talk of the ſoldiers and were now ready to depart, certain Turks which greatly diſliked the hard beginning of this ſiege, ſeeing themſelues if they did but ſtir in danger to be ſet off with ſhot out of the Towne, earneſtly requeſted the mariners to take them into the main: which to do, at the firſt the mariners diſſembling, refuſed as a thing dangerous; and beſides that, their boat was too little to receiue ſo many as would willingly haue gon with them. Yet with much ado they ſuffered themſelues to be intreated to take in ſeuen or eight, ſuch a number as they could wel maſter: who in hope of paſſing ouer into the main, were (contrary to their expectation) brought priſoners to the Rhodes, where they were by Preianes brought vp to the top of the higheſt tower of S. Iohns church, from whence they might ſee all about the country, and wel deſcry all the maner of the Turks camp, which they ſimply M diſcouered vnto the captain, and whatſoeuer els they were demanded, and among other things confeſſed, that the ſoldiers were greatly diſcontented with the ſiege, hauing in the beginning therof loſt ſo many men, and that they were ready to riſe in mutinie againſt their Captaines, and would hardly by them be commanded out of their trenches and cabbins, ſaying, That all they

A they did was but loſt loſt labor;and that they ſhould find it another piece of work to win the Rhodes,than they had at Belgrade:wherfore if they were wiſe they ſhould in time depart,before they had receiued further harm both from the enemy,and for want of neceſſaries,wherewith the ſoldiers began already to be pinched. All which was then ſuppoſed to haue bin ſpoken by the captiues to pleaſe him in whoſe power they now were:yet it appeared afterward to be all true;for Pyrrhus Baſſa conſidering the troubled ſtate of the Camp,and the generall diſcontentment of the ſoldiers,whom he was gladder at that time to pleaſe than to puniſh,writ vnto Solyman at Conſtantinople, That if hee would the ſiege ſhould goe forward,hee ſhould without delay come in perſon himſelf to the Camp;for that the ſouldiers without regard of ſhame,were ready to riſe in mutiny,and to abandon the ſiege,refuſing to be commaunded by B their captains.

In the mean time whilſt Solyman prepareth himſelf to ſet forward, the Turkiſh Captaines vnderſtood by certain Fugitiues (wherof in all wars ſome are to be found) that the high ſteeple of S. Iohns church ſerued them of the town for a watch-tower:for which cauſe,and for deſpight of the croſſe ſtanding vpon the top therof,they labored nothing more,than with continual ſhot to beat down that Tower; which whilſt they were doing with great diligence,Solyman himſelf came into the camp the 28 of Auguſt in the afternoon,where finding in his Army all the ſignes of cowardiſe and fear that could be ſpoken of or deuiſed, and nothing done according to the command of ſuch as he had appointed for that charge,but all things out of order,he took more griefe to ſee that great diſorder,than he did pleaſure & good hope of two C hundred thouſand ſoldiers that were then in his army. Yet,for all that he was inwardly chafed with the heat of youth and indignation,both againſt his owne people and the Rhodians, he moderated himſelf betwixt his own rage and the offence of his ſoldiers;and calling them together,cauſed them to be diſarmed,not leauing among them ſo much as a ſword; and compaſſing them in with fifteen thouſand harquebuſiers whom he had brought with him wel appointed, he ſtept into his royal ſeat,there ſet on high for that purpoſe,where ſitting down, he pauſed a good while without any word ſpeaking, as if he had conſidered with himſelfe,whether he ſhould only puniſh the authors of the mutiny, or elſe with the puniſhment of many to reuenge ſo foul a ſedition, little differing from an open rebellion. But following of himſelf the milder reſolution,he thought it ſufficient to correct the multitude and common ſort D of ſoldiers with ſharp and bitter words: and after generall ſilence made; brake out into this cholerick ſpeech;

Solyman comes into the Camp.

Slaues (quoth he) for I cannot find in my heart to call you ſoldiers,What kind of men are you now become?
are ye Turks? men wont to fight and ouercome. Verily I ſee the bodies,countenances, attyre, and habit of my ſoldiers; but the deeds, ſpeeches,countenances and deuices of cowardly and vile traitors. Alas how hath my opinion deceiued me? that Turkiſh force and courage is gon;the valor and ſtrength both of bodies and minds,wherwith the Arabians,Perſians,Syrians,Egyptians, Seruians,Hungarians, Bulgarians, Epirots,Macedonians,and Thracians were ſubdued,is loſt: forgetting your countrey, your Oath, the command of your captains, your obedience, and all other warlike diſcipline, you haue againſt the Majeſtie E of myne Empire refuſed to fight,like cowards betaken your ſelues to flight, for vain fear of death & danger, not beſeeming men of war. If any man ſhould at home but haue named the Rhodes,in your Feaſts, amongſt your pots,in your aſſemblies and great meetings, you could then with your tongues brag to pul it down, you had much ado to hold your hands: here,when I would make proof of your force and courage, it is nothing. But you thought perhaps,that the Rhodians ſo ſoon as they ſaw your enſigns before their gates, would ſtraitway yeeld themſelues and their city into your power. Let all men ceaſe ſo to ſay or thinke, and beleeue me that know the truth, This baſe and infamous den which you ſee, is ful of moſt cruel beaſts, whoſe madnes we ſhall neuer tame without much labor and bloudſhed. Yet ſhall we tame them; for why,nothing is ſo wild but at length it may be tamed: which vnles I bring to paſſe, I haue fully reſolued and vowed to my ſelf,either here to die,or ſpend my daies. And if euer I do or ſay otherwiſe, let this my head, my Fleet, F myne army, and empire, be for euer accurſed and vnfortunat.

Solymans cholericke Oration to his ſoldiers.

And ſo without further ſpeech,deſiring rather to be accounted of his ſoldiers gentle than ſeuere,he pardoned them all their former offences,and ſwore them al again to his obedience.

This mutiny ſo appeaſed, all things afterward were don with better ſucceſſe, and greater care both of the ſoldiers and commanders. Firſt they planted in diuers places twelue great Bombards, wherwith they threw vp ſtones of hugy weight into the air, which falling down into the city, might break down the houſes and whatſoeuer els they lighted vpon: with the fall of one of theſe the great Maſter was like to haue bin ſlain. Howbeit this prooued a deuice of more terrour than danger: for with 200 ſuch ſhot were but ten men ſlaine. Which thing amongſt others Apella a traiterous fugitiue declared vnto the Enemy, with whom he had intelligence, as he himſelf confeſſed, being taken vpon ſuſpition and examined: for which his treaſon he was iuſtly executed.

Apella a Traitor.

The Turks battery.

The force of the battery was more feared, wherin the Turks had planted forty great pieces of battery, and amongſt them twelue Baſilisks; ſo aptly named of the Serpent Baſiliſcus, who as Pliny writeth, killeth man or beaſt with his ſight. With theſe pieces the Turks battered the wals continually, but lying ſomwhat far off, did no great harm.

At the ſame time alſo Solyman cauſed battery to be laid againſt the tower of S. Nicolas, ſtanding vpon a narrow piece of ground pointing far into the ſea, defending the hauen vpon the right hand, where ſometime ſtood the great Coloſſus of the Sunne, accounted the greateſt among the ſeuen wonders of the world. Which Caſtle was both ſtrongly and ſumptuouſly built at the charges of the dukes of Bourgondy, as appeared by their Arms there ingauen in marble. This tower was valiantly defended by Guido a Frenchman, who had the charge therof with 200 ſoldiers, among whom were 30 Knights of the Order.

The Turks artillery planted againſt the tower was by the ſkilfulnes of the Chriſtian Canoniers in ſhort time diſmounted with ſhot from the tower, and many of the Gunners ſlain; ſo that they were glad to ſurceaſe any more to batter the tower by day, but lying ſtill all the day, they began to batter the ſame by night, wherin they preuailed no more than they had before don in the day time: for the defendants warily obſeruing ſuch places as were likeſt for the enemy to place his battery in, did ſo aptly place their ordnance againſt the ſame, and to ſo good purpoſe, that the Turks ſwore their doings were by ſome means diſcouered vnto the Enemies. So when they had in vain beſtowed 500 ſhot, and made a ſmall breach which they durſt not once attempt to enter, they ſhamefully abandoned that place alſo.

All this while Pyrrhus was buſie in working of mines to vndermine the City; 32 of which mines the defendants fruſtrated with countermines; in which kind of work many were loſt on both ſides. Yet for all the carefulnes of the Chriſtians, the Engliſh bulwark was vndermined by the enemy, & vpon the fourth of September part therof blown vp, with ſuch violence, that vnto them in the city it ſeemed at the firſt to be a generall earthquake; and diuers Engliſh men were therwith ouerwhelmed. The Turks attempting preſently to enter, were by the Grand Maſter and his followers with great ſlaughter repulſed.

The Engliſh Bulwarke blowne vp.

But Muſtapha the Baſſa comming on with freſh ſupplies, and crying out of the cowardiſe of them that retyred, renued the aſſault; where for a while was fought a moſt ſharp and cruell fight, the leaders cheerfully incouraging their ſoldiers, & they likewiſe doing what was poſſible for men to do: all mens ears were filled with the thundring of the ſhot, noiſe of trumpets and drums, and cries of men. And vnto the Turkes it ſeemed that it rained ouer their heads deadly ſhot and ſtones of fire: for the townſmen and women mingled with the ſouldiers, caſt down vpon the Turks fire, ſtones, timber, and whatſoeuer els came to hand; ſo that they vnable longer to endure the courage and force of the Chriſtians, turned their backs and ran away by heaps, not expecting any ſign of retreit, euery man ſeeking to ſaue one: among whom as they fled, the great ordnance ſhot off from the wals made wonderful ſlaughter. At this aſſault of the Turks were ſlain, as ſome write, almoſt 2000, and amongſt them the maſter of the Turkes ordnance, a man whom Solyman greatly loued: which victory the Chriſtians gained not without ſome loſſe; for beſides ſome few others that were ſlain, fifty Knights of the Order (men worthy of eternal memory) ended their daies alſo.

The Turkes aſſault the Engliſh Bulwarke the ſecond time and are againe repulſed.

The fift day after (which was the ninth of September) Solyman by the perſuaſion of Muſtapha the great Baſſa, commanded a freſh aſſault to be giuen to the Engliſh bulwarke; which was attempted by the Turks with greater reſolution than the firſt. Seuen enſigns of the Turks were broken in by the ruines of the Bulwarke, and had inforced the Defendants, oppreſſed with

A with number to giue ground, when the grand Maſter comming in with the enſigne of the Order, garded with a company of moſt valiant Knights, draue them out againe by force, and made good the place. Muſtapha ſeeing his men retyre, couragiouſly reſtored the battell, by bringing on of new ſupply, and other captains with threats, ſtrokes, and terror of death inforced the ſoldiers (who had before turned their backs) now again to fight. So that there began a more cruel fight than had before bin from the beginning of the ſiege: which was vnto the Chriſtians more dangerous, for that they were ouerwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkiſh ſhot. But in this extremity no man regarded either danger or life, only this they remembred, that thoſe were their barbarous enemies, whom they muſt either victoriouſly vanquiſh, or die therfore. With which fury the aſſault was continued by the ſpace of three hours, vntil B at length Muſtapha with his Turks diſcouraged, with the loſſe of 2000 of their fellows, & of three great noblemen whom Solyman eſpecially fauored, and ſore beaten by the Spaniards out of their flankers, were inforced to retyre. Few of the Chriſtians, in reſpect of ſo many Enemies, were ſlain: yet had the enſigne of the Order been then loſt (Ioachimus Cluys the Enſigne-bearer hauing both his eies ſhot out) had not Emericus Ruiaulx an Avernois, and one of the Knights of the Order, with incredible courage reſcued the ſame.

After this ſecond aſſault, falling out ſo vnluckily vnto the Turks, Muſtapha the great Baſſa began to grow in contempt with Solyman: and Pyrrhus to keep his credit by doing ſomething, with continual battery of 17 great pieces, did batter the mount neer vnto the Italian bulwark. At which time alſo Caſsius gouernor of Bythinia, another of the Turks great commanders, labored by C undermining to haue ouerthrown the French bulwark: ſo glad they were to attempt any thing to content their imperious great lord and maſter. But the indeauors of Caſsius was by countermines, through the carefull diligence of Gabriel Chierus hauing charge of thoſe works, fruſtrated: and Pyrrhus in the other place after he had by hot aſſault ſlain them which were appointed for the defence therof, and gained the mount, and brought a great feare vpon the city, was again with great loſſe ſhamefully repulſed, and by Solymans commandment cauſed to retyre. At this aſſault the gouernor of Eubœa, Solymans Lieutenant Generall, a man of great honor (if any of the Turks ſlaues are ſo to be accounted) was ſlain, for whoſe death Solyman was exceeding penſiue and heauy.

Muſtapha the Baſſa finding himſelf in diſgrace with Solyman for the two vnfortunat aſſaults D by him giuen at the Engliſh ſtation, determined if it were poſsible, by a third to recouer his loſt credit: and for his better ſucces therin, agreed with Achimetes another great commander, at the ſame time to aſſault the Spaniſh bulwark. According to this reſolution, Achimetes hauing with a mine ſuddenly blowne vp a great part of the Wall of the Spaniſh ſtation, in the thick of the duſt and ſmoke preſently entred his men, who by the ruins of the wal recouered the top of the rampiers. Muſtapha alſo at the ſame time hardly charged the Engliſh; ſo that in both places was made a hard and doubtful fight. Muſtapha deſiring nothing more, than with better ſucces now to redeem his former diſhonor, did what he might to incourage the ſoldiers, calling vpon them by name, and putting them in remembrance of their former victories. The Rhodians on the other ſide mindfull of their former honor, with the greatnes of the E preſent danger, valiantly repulſed the enemy, and forced him with ſhame to retyre. In this aſſault many Engliſhmen were ſlain, and Preianes alſo ſore hurt, hauing before ſlain many of the Turks. Muſtapha beſide the loſſe of his men, had alſo two of his enſignes taken by Chriſtophorus Vaulderick Commendator of the German Knights. Achimetes hauing won the top of the walls, had there ſet vp the Turkiſh enſignes; but by the valor of the defendants, and by means of certain pieces of ordnance, by Martiningus aptly placed in the houſes before the new made breach, and by force of ſhot out of the flankers on both ſides the breach, whereof none fell in vain, he was again inforced to forſake the wals, and to retyre.

The Engliſh bulwarke the third time aſſaulted by Muſtapha.

The Turks Enſigns aduanced to the top of the wals, are again caſt down.

The 23 of September, the Turkiſh captains hoping by meanes of a mine which they had made againſt the Avergn bulwark, to enter and win the City, approching the wals with multitudes F of ſoldiers, ready to haue entred vpon the blowing vp of the mine: it being met with a countermine out of the city, wrought not ſuch effect as was by them expected: ſo that hauing receiued ſome harm, ſtanding in a place of great diſaduantage, and don nothing, they returned again to the camp. Yet all the expert captains probably coniecturing that the Wall

might bee inwardly ſhaken by the mine, though it were not by them outwardly perceiued, cauſed that part of the wal to be moſt violently battered al the reſt of that day and night following, and by the fury of their artillery made a fair & large breach. Al that night was heard in the Turks camp an vnwonted clattering of weapons, and of men running to and fro, as had there bin ſome great matter a doing: which the Rhodians coniectured (as the truth was) to be a ſign of ſome great aſſault to be ſhortly giuen.

Solyman reſoluing the next day with all his force to aſſault the new made breach, after hee had by himſelf in a melancholy mood walked vp & down in his tent a great part of the night, ſent for the chief commanders of his army, to whom he declared his mind as followeth.

Your valor and wiſdom (worthy Captains) needeth not any exhortation; yet the deſperat madneſſe of our enemies maketh me to ſpeak vnto you theſe few words: who whilſt they yet do, as from the beginning, as men without reaſon deſperately defend their City rent with our artillery, ſhaken with our mines, their Churches and houſes beaten downe about their eares, wearied and worne out with ſlaughter, labour, and wounds, which muſt needs befall men ſo often aſſaulted; they worthily ſeem vnto our ſoldiers men of inuincible force and courage: which opinion to haue remoued, much concerneth the happy and wiſhed ſucces of our aſſault. Wherfore I would haue you with effectual perſwaſions and bountiful promiſes to hearten on our men to the winning of this city. Beſides this, you ſhall open vnto them my purpoſe and intent, and that they ſhould not think that they are brought hither to beſiege one city, but that in taking this one, they ſhall vpon the matter make a way into all the dominions of the Chriſtians. Here be the kinſmen, allyance, and friends of all the Kings, Princes, and Potentats of Chriſtendom: here is all our enemies treaſure, the ſpoil wherof promiſed vnto our ſoldiers, may ſerue to great purpoſe to incourage them forward: here is the ſtore of ordnance, armor, and other warlike prouiſion, which ſhall both furniſh vs, and in time to come miſerably confound the reſt of the Chriſtians. We ſhall beſide this enioy a moſt goodly and rich city, with a hauen of all others moſt commodious, from whence all things neceſſary for war may at all times as occaſion ſhall require, by land and ſea be ſupplied: which as they ſhall be to vs things of great importance, ſo ſhall we deſpoil our enemies of far greater. This is their caſtle, ſtorehouſe, treaſury, and armory: this is the very receptacle and place of refuge for all ſuch as trouble the Turks by ſea: from hence ſhal wee haue free ſcope and paſſage into Apulia, Calabria, Sicilia, and many other Chriſtian countries. But as for your ſelues, valiant Captains, when as I conſider how that you haue within theſe few months by your valor and wiſdom ſubdued vnto my empire the ſtrong city of Belgrade, which my great graundfather Mahomet that mighty Emperor could not with all his power get; I reſt in great hope, that theſe fierce and obſtinat Chriſtians ſhall not long be able to defend themſelues in theſe their dens and lurking places.

Hauing ended this ſpeech, the captains euery one vnto his company made known what the great Emperors wil and pleaſure was; and open proclamation made thorow all the campe, by which the ſpoil of that rich city was all granted vnto the ſoldiers, as a prey and reward for the pains they were to take.

Solyman heauy with ſleep and care, lay down vpon a palat to take his reſt: but the great Maſter (to whom the vnaccuſtomed ſtir of the enemy portended ſome great matter) al that night in arms painfully viewed euery part of the city, cherfully incouraging his ſoldiers to remember, That they did watch for the ſafety of their Country, their liues and liberty. It fortuned the ſame night, that a poor Chriſtian ſeruing a Turk in the camp, calling ſecretly to the watch vpon the wals, gaue them warning that the Turks prepared the next day to giue a generall aſſault vnto the city. Which thing when the great Maſter certainely vnderſtood, becauſe hee would haue nothing don raſhly or fearfully (as it commonly hapneth in things don vpon the ſudden) called together his Knights, and ſpake vnto them as followeth:

I am glad (ſacred Companions and Fellowes in Armes) that the time is come when in one battell, getting vnto your ſelues great honour, and defending your Countrey, you may be iuſtly accounted the worthy Defenders and Reuengers of the Chriſtian Commonweal and Name. The people againſt whom we are to fight tomorrow, aſſaile vs onely as preſuming vpon their multitude: But if we meaſure Valour not by number, but by courage and prowesſe, vndoubtedly a few reſolute men will eaſily ouercome a great multitude of cowards. You know your enemy, and the manner of his fight: you are to fight (moſt worthy Knights) with them whom you haue alwaies vanquiſhed at ſea, and in iuſt battel ſomtimes ouercome by land, at ſuch time as with their whole power they aſſaulted your walls: omitting in the mean time many hot ſkirmiſhes, wherin you euer put them to the worſt. Wherfore you and they in the aſſault tomorrow ſhall haue ſuch courage, as conquerors and men conquered vſe to haue. Neither wil they fight becauſe they dare fight; but becauſe the great Tyrant and violent commaund of their Captaines inforceth them therunto. Wherfore remembring what you are by birth, what opinion the Chriſtian commonwealth hath conceiued of you, where you are, and what you haue taken vpon you; take up your arms with iuſt fury and indignation, and fight againſt them, following one frantick youth, as if you ſaw your ſlaues bearing arms againſt you. Wherunto you are inforced not only by the indignity of the wrong by them offered, but alſo by neceſſity, which of it ſelf is of power to make cowards valiant and hardy. For here wee are in an Iſland from whence we cannot eſcape, and in a city whoſe rent and battered walls do not ſo much protect and defend vs, as our weapons: wherfore tomorrow we muſt here either vanquiſh them, or die therfore: tomorrow ſhall giue vnto vs either ioyfull victory, or a moſt honorable death.

As he was yet thus ſpeaking, news of the enemies approch cauſed him to make an end, and euery man haſted with ſpeed to the place of his charge. The enemy comming faſt on, with a moſt horrible cry, as their maner is, fiercely aſſailed the city in fiue places, where the Engliſh, Spaniards, Italians, Narbonenſes, and Avergnois had their ſtations. To the aſſault of euery of which places Solyman had appointed ten thouſand Turks. Muſtapha the Baſſa calling vpon the name of his great Prophet Mahomet, and promiſing vnto the ſouldiers the rich ſpoil of the City, fiercely aſſailed the Engliſh ſtation, from whence he had bin three times before ſhamefully repulſed. Pyrrhus the other great Baſſa with like fury aſſaulted the Italian ſtation. In both places was maintained a cruell and deadly fight; the Turks fighting for the prey, and the Rhodians for their liues and liberty. Neither was there any, of what degree or order ſoeuer, which did not that day fight for defence of the City. The prieſts and religious men were not then exempted, but fought among other ſoldiers: women, children, and with them the aged fathers, beyond the ſtrength of their bodies, & courage of their minds, brought weapons vnto the defendants, ſome ſtones which they had digged out of the ſtreets, ſome burning pitch barrels, ſome hoops with wild-fire, ſome ſcalding oil, ſome boyling pitch; which being caſt down vpon the enemies, troubled them ſo, as nothing was more feared: for vpon whomſoeuer it fel, it ſtuck faſt, and ſo ſcalded their bodies, that they were glad to caſt downe their weapons, to tear off their cloaths, wherwith many of them rent off the skin and fleſh alſo. All which things fel ſo thick vpon the Turks as if it had rained fire and ſtones: beſides the deadly ſhot, which among ſuch a multitude of enemies neuer fell in vain. The great Maſter hauing a careful eye ouer euery part of the city, after he had well relieued the Italian ſtation, which was the firſt hardly diſtreſſed by Pyrrhus, left there Antonius Monterollus a Knight of the Order, with ſuch company as hee thought conuenient for the ſafety of that place; and went himſelf with the reſt vnto the Engliſh ſtation, which was then hardly laid to by the Baſſa Muſtapha. But whilſt he was there buſied in repulſing the enemy, and had now well relieued the place, a ſudden cry ran along the wals, that the Spaniſh bulwark was already poſſeſſed by the enemy: with which heauy news he was not a little troubled; but leauing there Emericus Gombaulus, one of the Knights of the Order, with a choſen company of ſoldiers for defence of that place; he with his gard haſted to the Spaniſh ſtation, which he found by a wonderfull chance already taken by the enemy. In the beginning of the aſſault, certain Turks to ſhun the danger of the ſhot, had for fear hidden themſelues at the foot of this bulwarke, among the ſtones which had before bin beaten downe with the battery: in the mean time other Turkes of the ſame regiment, vnder the leading of the valiant Captain Achimetes, hotly charged the Spaniards on the right hand of the bulwark, not medling with the bulwark it ſelf, as a thing of greateſt ſtrength: and the valiant ſouldiers appointed for the defence of the bulwark, ſeeing their fellowes and Countreymen diſtreſſed faſt by them on the right hand, could not endure to ſtand ſtil as lookers on, but left the Bulwark, and went to the place ſo hardly aſſaulted; where whilſt they were valiantly incountring the enemy, the cowardly Turkes who had before for fear hid themſelues, hearing all ſtil ouer their heads, and therby gheſſing (as the truth was) that the defendants were drawn thence to another place more diſtreſſed, to color their fear, & proue their good fortune,like tall fellows crept out of the holes wherein they had before for fear hid themſelues,and ſecretly crauling vp the battered wals of the Bulwark, got into it before they were diſcouered:where finding none but a few ſoldiers (who buſied in remouing of a great piece to a place more conuenient for annoying the enemy, had laid downe their weapons) they ſuddenly ſet vpon them,ſlew them,ouerthrew the Chriſtian enſign,and ſo became maſters of that ſtrong fort. The Turks without,ſeeing that,wonderfully commended the valor of theſe men,and blaming themſelues of cowardiſe,made great haſt through the midſt of the town ditch,to get vp into the bulwark to help their fellowes. But in going through the ditch,they were ſo cut off with ſhot on both ſides out of the flankiers,that few of them could get vp into the deſired bulwark:and the Great Maſter with a crew of valiant ſoldiers, nothing fearing the armed enemy,now in poſſeſſion of the bulwarke ouer their heads,with great reſolution ſcaled the ſame. In the mean time Hugo Caponus a Spaniard,and Menotius a Frenchman, both Knights of the Order,with a company of Cretenſian ſoldiers brake into the bulwark by a gate which the Turks had not as yet bolted,and being once got in,they quickly diſpatched the Turks; for whom they ſlew not with the ſword, they inforced to miſchief themſelues for haſt back again ouer the wals. The bulwark thus again recouered (which had bin two houres in poſſeſſion of the enemy) & the city deliuered of a wonderful fear,the worthy great Maſter leauing a ſufficient number of ſoldiers for the keeping of that fort, went with the reſt of his company vnto the place where the Spaniards with the reſt of the defendants ſore charged by Achimetes,and now wearied and almoſt ſpent,had much ado to hold out:who incouraged with the ſight of the grand Maſter,as if victory had attended vpon him,with great cries and ſignes of joy,valiantly & with great ſlaughter repulſed their enemies as if they had bin freſh men. Long it were to recount the deadly fight & hard aduentures which befel at the aſſault of the other two ſtations of the Avergnois and Narbonenſes: but the Turks were in euery place put to the worſt,and lay by heaps ſlain in the ditches and breaches of the town. Solyman from his ſtanding(for that purpoſe made of high maſts)beholding the miſerable ſlaughter of his men, and no hope of gaining the City,cauſed a retreit to be ſounded,a thing welcome both to the Rhodians and Turks. In this terrible aſſault,which indured by the ſpace of ſix hours,diuers of the Knights of the Order were ſlain, eſpecially of the French and Spaniſh nations, with 150 common ſoldiers,all men worthy of eternal fame;and of the Turks (as they which write moſt modeſtly report) 20000. The yong tyrant was ſo much offended with the ſhamefull repulſe he had receiued at this laſt aſſault,that he fel into a rage againſt al them which had perſuaded him to enter into that action; but eſpecially againſt the great Baſſa Muſtapha, whom he accuſed as an vnfaithful counſellor and chief perſuader of that vnlucky war:who flattering him in his vain humor,by extolling his forces aboue meaſure;and falſly extenuating the enemies power,aſſuring him that vpon the firſt approch of his army they would yeeld themſelues without reſiſtance, had drawn him into that dangerous expedition, like to ſort to the great diſhonor of himſelf and all the Othoman family:for which doing he adiudged him worthy of death, and in great fury commaunded the executioner without further delay to put him to death in his preſence. Which dreadful doom, ſo ſuddenly and vpon ſo light an occaſion giuen vpon a man of ſo great mark and quality,ſtrucke ſuch a terror into the minds of all there preſent that none of them durſt ſpeak a word againſt the rigor of that ſentence,or ſo much as fet a ſigh in pittying his caſe. The executioner now ready to giue the fatal ſtroke,Pyrrhus the moſt antient of all the Baſſa's,moued with compaſſion,and preſuming of his great fauor with the tyrant,whom he had from his childhood had the charge and gouernment of, ſtept forth, and appealing vnto his mercy, earneſtly requeſted him to ſpare his life. Wherwith Solyman was ſo filled with wrath and indignation, that for his preſumption, and for ſending for him to Conſtantinople to come to that dangerous ſiege,he commanded him to be executed alſo. All the reſt of the counſellors ſeeing the danger of theſe two great men,fell down at the feet of the fuming tyrant,crauing pardon;ſaying, That the enemies ground had already drunk too much of the Turkiſh bloud, and was not to be further moiſtned with the bloud of two ſuch noble perſonages and worthy Counſellours. Solyman mooued with this general interceſſion of his great men, pauſing a little vpon the matter, the heat of his fury being ſomthing ouer, ſuffered himſelf to be intreated, and granted vnto them their liues: To Pyrrhus for his great age

The Spaniſh bulwark again recouered.

The Turkes giue ouer the aſſault.

Solyman in his fury commands the two great Baſſa's, Muſtapha & Pyrrhus to bee put to death.

The Baſſas ſpared at the interceſſion of the other Counſellors.

A age and wiſedome, and to Muſtapha for his wiues ſake, who was the tyrants naturall ſiſter ſometime the wife of Boſtanges.

All the time of this ſiege, the Turks great fleet, furniſhed with men and all manner of warlike prouiſion, lay before the enterance of the hauen without doing any thing at all: for the Admirall being no man of war, ſeeing the mouth of the hauen chained, and the caſtles vpon the entrance full of ordnance, and ſtrongly manned, durſt not attempt either to enter the hauen, or beſiege the caſtle: for which his cowardiſe, and for that he had negligently ſuffered prouiſion both of victuall and munition, to be conueied into the city during the time of the ſiege, to the great reliefe of the beſieged, he was by Solyman adjudged to die a moſt cruell death: but by the mediation of Achimetes, one of his beſt men of war, the ſeuerity of that ſentence B was changed into a puniſhment, vnto any noble mind more grieuous than death it ſelfe: for he was by Solymans commandement, openly ſet vpon the poupe of the admirall gally, and there as a ſlaue receiued at the hands of the executioner a hundred ſtripes with a cudgell, and ſo with ſhame was thruſt out of his office.

Solyman diſplaceth his Admirall and puniſheth him as a ſlaue.

After that Solyman had in ſo many places with all his power ſo long time in vaine beſieged the Rhodes, his haughty courage began to quaile, ſo that he was vpon point to haue raiſed his ſiege and left the Iſland, yea, the griefe he had conceiued, went ſo neere him, that he many times fainted and lay ſpeechleſſe, as if he had been a dead man. The remembrance of ſo many vnfortunat aſſaults, the death of ſo many worthy captains, the loſſe of ſo many valiant ſouldiers (ſufficient to haue ſubdued a whole kingdome) ſo much grieued him, that a great while C after he ſhunned the company of men, and would not ſuffer himſelfe to be ſpoken withall: vntill at length he was againe by Abraham his minion, a man in whom he tooke ſingular pleaſure, recomforted, and perſuaded to continue the ſiege; for that Time (as he ſaid) which worketh all things would at length tame the fierceneſſe of his enemies, whom the ſword could not vpon the ſudden ſubdue. In the meane time Solyman for his pleaſure, and to ſhew vnto the Rhodians, that he purpoſed not to depart, began to build a ſumptuous caſtle vpon the top of the mount Philermus in the eie of the city. During which time diuers letters were ſhot into the city with Turkiſh arrowes out of the campe, wherein many of Solymans moſt ſecret counſels were reuealed, and the reuolt of a great man promiſed, which the Rhodians by many circumſtances gathered to haue beene Muſtapha, who could not eaſily forget the injury ſo lately D offered vnto him by Solyman: needs it muſt be ſome of Solymans ſecret counſell, otherwiſe he could not haue reuealed ſo great ſecrets as it were out of the boſome of Solyman. But ſee the chance, at the very ſame time tidings came vnto Solyman, that Cayerbeius the Gouernour of Ægypt was dead, in whoſe place Solyman ſent Muſtapha to Caire as Gouernour of Ægypt, by that honourable preferment againe to pleaſe his diſcontented mind, after which time no more letters came into the city.

Solyman exceedingly grieued with the repuls and loſſe receiued at the ſiege of the Rhodes, was vpon point to haue left the ſame.

Now the Turks began to make faire wars, their terrible battery began to grow calme, and for certaine daies it ſeemed by the manner of their proceedings, that they purpoſed rather by long ſiege than by aſſault to take the town. Neuertheleſſe the enemies watching day and night in their trenches, vſed all the policy they could, ſometimes offering vnto the ſouldiers vpon E the wals great rewards, if they would yeeld vp the city, and ſometimes threatning them as faſt: and to breed a diſlike among the defendants, they would oftentimes ſay, that Solyman deſired only to be reuenged vpon the Latines, without meaning any harme vnto the Greekes.

It was now the beginning of October, and Winter began to grow faſt on, great rain, with terrible thunder and lightening, and mighty tempeſts, heauens threats, then fell ſo abundantly, that the Turks before wearied in body with labor and wounds, were now alſo in mind diſcouraged. And that more increaſed their feare, the ſea was growne ſo rough, That the Admirall was not able in that open and dangerous ſea longer to ride it out with his gallies: but was inforced to ſlip his ankers, and as he might to run his gallies on ground. In theſe troubles wherwith both Solyman himſelfe and all his army were at furtheſt of their wits, and almoſt quite F diſcouraged, Achimetes one of his moſt valiant and expert captains, came to comfort him and promiſed if he would continue the ſiege, in ſhort time to make him an open way into the city: vpon confidence whereof, Solyman to encourage his fainting ſouldiers, now ſcarce able for cold and lacke of courage to hold their weapons in their hands, cauſed them to be aſſembled before his pauillion, where from a high place, he comforted them in this ſort:

Achimetes promiſeth to make a way for Solyman into the city.

Solyman comforteth his ſouldiers and perſuadeth them with patience to endure the ſiege.

I am not ignorant (moſt valiant ſouldiers) what great things you indure for mine honour, and the glory of mine Empire. This continuall threatning of the heauens, this immoderate raine, this terrible thunder and lightening, the coldneſſe of the weather, the want of neceſſaries, with the manifold miſeries of this long ſiege, doe much perſuade me, to giue you leaue to lay downe armes and to take your reſt. But firſt let vs conſider if vnto men of courage it be not a diſhonour, for the tediouſneſſe of raine and tempeſt, to leaue vnto our enemies the victory already in our hands, and ſhamefully to forſake our trenches, forts, mounts, ouertopping not only the wals of the city, but mating the heauens, with ſuch other like workes made with my infinite charge, and your great trauell, all for the taking of this city. Truely this warre either ſhould not haue beene taken in hand at all, or being once begun, is to be ended for the honour of the Othoman Empire. Which forſomuch as it could not be accompliſhed in Summer; the reputation of mine Empire in common, and the regard of the commodity of euery one of you in priuate, enforceth me to performe it in Winter. For if we ſhould from hence depart with our army, who doubts but the enemy, not only for deſire of reuenge, but alſo ſtrained by neceſſity, hauing loſt all he had of his owne, will prey vpon your countries, houſes, and goods, and will bring you, your wiues, and children, into a farre more miſerable ſlauery and bondage, than that wherin he himſelfe now is? Wherefore I aduiſe you to continue the ſiege, and neuer to depart before you haue attained vnto the end of your deſires. And admit there were no neceſſity in the matter, yet the honour and fame of the action ought to impoſe vpon you a reſolution both of body and mind to indure the ſiege: For the eies and countenances of all nations, eſpecially the Chriſtians, are fixed vpon you; whom when they ſhall vnderſtand not to be able to indure the field one Winter, they will of right call you Summer-birds, which ſo ſoone as any ſtorme ariſeth, looke after your houſes, and places of repoſe. It is reported, that the Grecians for a ſtrumpet beſieged Troy ten yeares; and ſhall not the Turks, vexed and oppreſſed with ſlaughters, robberies, inuaſions both by ſea and land, and that more is, with the ſeruitude of two hundred and foureteen yeres, endure one Winters ſiege? They will ſay that the terrour if your name is but vaine, and that fame hath increaſed the ſame (as many other things moe) which not ſeen, are more feared in far countries amongſt men of ſmall experience: And that now euery man may ſafely enough abide your force, which make your inuaſions rather vpon a fury and brauery than vpon any good reſolution, which in all kinde of war (but eſpecially in beſieging of cities) is moſt neceſſary: whereof many being by naturall ſcituation and fortification impregnable, time hath with her handmaids, Famine and Thirſt, ouercome and vanquiſhed, as it ſhall do this city of the Rhodes: againſt which (beloued in armes) there is a ſecret miſchiefe prepared, which may not in this open audience be publiſhed; for it is as neceſſary that the vulgar ſort ſhould be ignorant of ſome things, as to know the ſame.

Many thought, that this was ſpoken rather of policy than vpon any good ground: and although his hot perſuaſion had little moued the cold courage of his deſpairing ſouldiers, yet the regard of duty in that moſt loyall nation, with the greedy expectation of ſo great a ſecret, ouercame all other difficulties; ſo that they departed (at leſtwiſe in ſhew) contented to indure whatſoeuer ſhould befall.

Achimetes winneth the Vaumures of the Auergne bulwark, raiſeth a ſtrong penthouſe againſt the wall, and ſo vndermineth the ſame.

Achimetes author of this great expectation, and the only hope of Solymans ſucceſſe, came oftentimes and aſſailed the Vaumures of the Auergn ſtation, which although they were not very high, yet were they alwaies valiantly defended by the Rhodians. It fortuned, that this warlike captaine dayly attempting the Vaumures, in the end by force obtained the ſame, and ſo poſſeſſed of the place he ſo much deſired, deſperatly kept it vntill greater helpe came running in, who with wonderfull expedition (with matter for that purpoſe before prepared) clapt vp a ſtrong and defenſible couering in manner of a penthouſe againſt the towne wall, betwixt the wall and the Vaumure, vnder which they ſhrouded themſelues from the defendants; which was an eaſie matter for ſuch a multitude to do, the ditches of the towne in that place being now filled vp ſo high, that the defendants could not out of the flankers ſcoure the ditch, nor yet without manifeſt danger come to caſt any thing downe vpon them from the top of the wals: for the Turks harquebuſiers which lying vpon their mounts, higher than the battered wals of the city, ſuffered none to appeare vpon them without danger. So that the Rhodians who erſt thought themſelues at great quiet, were now ouertaken with a ſudden and an vnexpected miſchiefe: which at the firſt filled the city with feare and heauy ſilence, which ſtraitwaies after brake out into pitifull outcries and lamentations. The Turks lurking vnder their penthouſe, laboured with mattocks and pickaxes to dig vp the foundation of the wall; and Prejanes forward and couragious to do what might be done, threw downe vpon

the

A the Turks, fire, ſcalding oyle, burning pitch, wild-fire and ſuch things. But when the miſerable men which ſhrunke from the worke for feare of the fire, were againe beaten forward by their imperious commanders, and preſently ſlaine if they made any delay, and freſh men ſtill thruſt on in ſtead of ſuch as were hurt or ſlaine: the fatall worke began the ſeuenth day of October, went apace forward, with the great and continuall labour of theſe wretched ſlaues. A great number of the common ſouldiers whom the Turks call Aſapi were imploied in this worke: of whom Solyman in this ſiege of the Rhodes, and other his expeditions, made not much more account but as of pioners to worke in mines and to caſt vp trenches, and oftentimes with their bodies to fill towne ditches to make a way for the Ianizaries to paſſe ouer vpon: they by the conſtraint of Achimetes vndermined the wall, and as they wrought, ſhoared vp the ſame againe B with timber, whereunto they afterwards ſet fire, hoping by that means to ouerthrow the wall; which falling not out according to their expectation, for that they had not far enough vndermined it, they aſſaied with great hooks and ſtrong ropes to haue pulled it downe. But the Rhodians with their great ordnance from the Auergn bulwarke, quickly put them from that mad worke with great ſlaughter, and fruſtrated all their long labor. Achimetes thus diſappointed of his purpoſe, ſtood in great doubt whether he ſhould giue ouer the enterpriſe, for that he ſaw he laboured in vaine, or elſe in that dangerous place to expect ſome better hap, the only means to ſaue him from the tyrants heauy diſpleaſure; who as he knew meaſured all things by the euent. Solyman vnderſtanding by Achimetes, that the wall (although it was not ouerthrown as was expected) was yet ſore ſhaken and weakned with vndermining, cauſed his bat-C tery to be planted againſt that part of the wall ſo vndermined; which ſo many waies weakned, and now ſore battered, fell downe dayly more and more. For remedy whereof, the Rhodians laboured day and night to raiſe a new wall, in ſtead of that which was beaten downe.

The miſerable ſtate of the common ſoldiers of the Turks, and the ſmall account is made of them.

At the ſame time, Solyman perſuaded by the generall opinion of all his great captains, that the city was that day or neuer to be taken, determining to giue another generall aſſault, cau-ſed proclamation to be made thorow his campe: wherein he gaue the ſpoile of the city vnto his ſoldiers, and the more to encourage them, ſpake vnto them in few words, as followeth:

Fortune at length, valiant ſoldiers, hauing notably proued your courage and patience; now offereth vnto you the worthy rewards of your labour and paines. The victory and wealth of your enemies which you D haue ſo much deſired is now in your hands. Now is the time to make an end of this mungrell people, of whom more are ſlain than left aliue; and they not men, but the ſhadows and ghoſts of men, feeble and ſpent with hunger, wounds, wants, and labour; who will I know reſiſt you, not becauſe they ſo dare, but becauſe of neceſſity they ſo muſt, enforced thereunto with all extremities. Wherefore now reuenge your ſelues of the falſhood, cruelty, and villanies of theſe Chriſtians, and make them a wofull example to all poſterity, that neuer man hereafter preſume to offer injury to a Turke, in whatſoeuer ſtate he be. The way is already open into the city, there is a faire breach made whereby thirty horſemen may at once enter: nothing wanteth but courage in you to aſſaile the ſame.

Solyman encourageth his ſouldiers to a freſh aſſault.

The ſouldiers encouraged with this ſpeech of their Emperour, made great ſhew of cheere-E fulneſſe, and promiſed to do their vttermoſt deuoire, threatning vnto the Chriſtians moſt horrible death and miſerable captiuity.

In the meane time the great ſhot flying continually through the breach, did beat downe many houſes in the city; but the countermure new built againſt the breach ſtanding vpon a lower ground, it ſeldome toucht, to the great good of the Rhodians. The ratling of the falling houſes, the horrible noiſe of the enemy, with the thundering of the great artillery, wonderfully terrified the miſerable citiſens: in euery place was heard the lamentation of women and children, euery thing ſhewed the heauineſſe of the time, and ſeemed as altogether loſt and forlorne. The day thus troubleſomely ſpent, the night followed much more troubleſome; and after the night, the day of aſſault of all others moſt dreadfull: for with the dawning thereof, F the gliſtering enſignes of the enemy were ſeene flying in the wind, and the Turks cheerefull with the hope of ſpoile and victory, haſted towards the breach with great outcries and ſongs, after their country manner: and there before one of the gates of the city called S. Ambroſe gate, ſet downe a great number of their enſignes deckt with garlands, in token of victory. The Turks great fleet alſo at the ſame time ſayling too and fro before the hauen, made ſhew as if

The diſtreſſed eſtate of the Rhodians and their couragious reſolution therein.

it would haue aſſailed the city on that ſide: who had ſeene the city ſo beſet, would haue ſaid that it would at one inſtant haue bin beſieged both by ſea and land; and to moſt mens judgements, it ſeemed that the Rhodian ſtate ſhould that day haue taken end and bin deſtroied. Yet for all theſe extremities, the Rhodians were nothing diſcouraged, but looking vpon their weapons as the only remainders of their hopes, not regarding any danger, vpon the alarme giuen came running out of their houſes by heaps vnto the wals, like deſperat men oppoſing their bodies in ſtead of their battered wals againſt their enemies in defence of their country. There needed neither exhortation nor command of captaine, euery man was vnto himſelfe a perſuader to fight valiantly in defence of the city; and one of them propounded vnto another the cruell death, the miſerable ſeruitude, the mocks and taunts they ſhould indure, if they ſhould chance to come into the proud enemies hand: all which was to be auoided either by honorable victory or death. The Turks conducted by Achimetes, fiercely aſſailed the breach, which was by the Rhodians (ſtanding vpon the ruins of their wals) valiantly defended. In the meane time the diſmaied matrons and maidens, ſome in their houſes, with heauy hearts expected the woſull deſtruction of the city and themſelues, otherſom in their churches with floods of tears and lamentable cries, poured forth their praiers vnto the Almighty, crauing his helpe in that their hard diſtreſſe, and to protect them againſt their barbarous enemies. The deadly fight at the breach, was on both ſides with great courage and force maintained. The Turks were in good hope forthwith to win the city, if they did but a little more ſtraine themſelues: and therfore to terrifie the Rhodians the more, oftentimes in their fighting gaue out moſt terrible outcries, and the Rhodians accounted the Turks as good as vanquiſhed, for they being ſo many in number, and in place of ſuch indifferency, had not yet preuailed: beſide that, they were greatly incouraged with the greatneſſe of the common danger, and the ſight one of anothers valor; ſo that by their inuincible courage the Turks were inforced ſhamefully to retire. The Rhodians ſeeing their enemies turne their backes, gaue a great ſhout in deriſion of them: the Turks diſdaining that they in number many (and now victors, if they ſhould with a little reſolution maintain the aſſault they had begun) ſhould be ſo derided of a handfull of men as good as already vanquiſhed; with great indignation returned again to the breach, and more furiouſly aſſailed the Rhodians than at the firſt. At which time the city had vndoubtedly bin taken, had not they which defended the end of the wall, yet ſtanding on both ſides of the breach, out of their baricadoes with their ſhot ouerwhelmed the Turks thronging in at the breach; & others with murthring ſhot out of the flankers of the new built wall ſo cut them aſunder, that a greater ſlaughter for the time was hardly in any place ſeen. Achimetes beholding the wonderfull ſlaughter of his ſoldiers, and that he fought with great diſaduantage and loſſe, againſt deſperat men, who reſoluing to die, feared no danger, gaue ouer the aſſault and againe retired: leauing behind him in the breach and towne ditch, the carkaſſes of fiue thouſand of his dead Turks, beſides many more which afterwards died vpon the hurts there receiued

The Turks trouble the Rhodians with continuall alarmes, and by caſting vp of trenches get into the city

This aſſault was giuen vnto the towne the laſt day of Nouember, a day dedicated to S. Andrew: after which time the captains of the Turkiſh army, although they deſpaired not of the victory, yet terrified with ſo great ſlaughter of their men, reſolued with one accord no more to attempt the city with any notable aſſault; but by ſundry great trenches to be made thorow the midſt of the ruins of the wals, to get into the city; and with matoks and pickaxes to ouertrow the new made wall and another barricado which the the defendants had made within the ſame: and in the meane time whileſt this was in doing, to keepe the Rhodians ſtill buſied with continuall skirmiſhes and alarmes. This deuiſe put in execution by the wonderfull labour of ſuch a multitude of people, ſerued the enemy to greater purpoſe than all that he had done before: who daily ouerthrowing or deſtroying the new fortifications which the Rhodians made in ſtead of them which were before ouerthrowne, and by little and little creeping on further, draue the defendants to that extremity, that they were glad to pull downe many of their houſes, therewith to make new fortifications, and to make their city leſſe, by caſting vp of new trenches: ſo that in ſhort time they were brought to that point, that they could not well tell which place to fortifie firſt, the enemy was now ſo far crept within them: for the ground which the enemy had thus gained within the city, was almoſt 200 paces in breadth, and 150 paces in length.

Solyman, although he did now aſſure himſelfe of the victory, and was by nature cruell and deſirous

Parley offered by the Turks to the Rhodians.

deſirous of reuenge; yet perſuaded by Achimetes and Caßius (two of his moſt valiant captains) that for the inlarging of his empire nothing was better than the fame and clemency: commanded Pyrrhus the old Baſſa to proue if the Rhodians might by parley be drawne to yeeld their city vpon reaſonable conditions. Whereupon the Baſſa ſent one Hieronimus Monelia, a Genoway, vnto the wals, who crauing of the defendants ſafe conduct, ſaid he had ſomething to ſay tending to the common good of the diſtreſſed city. Al mens minds were preſently filled with expectation of ſome great matter, and he commanded to ſpeake. Who anſwered, that he might not deliuer his meſſage openly, but would either by ſpeech in ſecret, or by letters deliuer the ſame vnto one Mathias de Via his countryman, one of the citiſens of the Rhodes. When Fra. Farnouius, one of the Knights of the Order, a Frenchman of a chollericke diſpoſition, whoſe great courage was well ſeene in all that ſiege (hauing as it is reported, with ſhot out of Saint Georges tower himſelfe ſlain 500 Turks during the time of that ſiege) being now preſent, and moued with indignation to heare a motion made of priuat conferance with the enemy: bent his piece vpon the meſſenger, and cauſed him ſorthwith to depart without doing his meſſage. Many who in time of the aſſault feared not any danger, but were altogether become deſperat and careles of themſelues, after that they had vnderſtood that the enemy had offered parley, and that they began to conceiue ſome hope of life: reſorted vnto the Great Maſter requeſting him, that he would prouide for the ſafety of his louing people, whoſe warlike forces was with many aſſaults ſore weakned, the city beaten down about their eares, and moſt of them which were left, either wounded or ſicke. They had (as they ſaid) now ſufficiently proued both their force and fortune: wherefore he ſhould do well, to beware, leſt while he were too long in conſulting, the enemy ſhould conceiue a further indignition in ſeeing his offers refuſed. With theſe and ſuch ſpeeches they inforced the Great Maſter to ſend Embaſſadors to Solyman. The men that were ſent, were Anthonius Groleus a Frenchman, enſigne bearer for the Order, a man of great reputation for his wiſedome and experience, and with him Robertus Baruſius, a man of great grauity, and skilfull in the Greeke tongue: for whom was receiued as pledges, a kinſeman of the great captaine Achimetes, and a certaine Epirot which fled out of the city vnto the Turks, becauſe one of the Grecian captaines had ſtrucke him with his open hand; a man of a ſharpe wit, and one that could perfectly ſpeake the greeke, Turkiſh, and Italian tongues, as appeared to his great credit amongſt the enemies, being had of them in great regard although he was not knowne whileſt he dwelt in the city, that he was any ſuch man. After that came alſo Solymans interpreter, for he himſelfe could ſpeake no other longuage more than his own, accounting it a diſgrace, and againſt the Othoman Empire to vſe any other language. The Embaſſadors admitted into Solymans preſence, told him, that they were ſent to know, for what cauſe he had ſent to require parly? Who in a flaming heat, as if he had knowne nothing thereof, ſaid there was no ſuch matter: and commanded them preſently to auoid his campe, ſent them away with letters to the Great Maſter and the citiſens, to this effect:

Secret parley rejected.

The great Maſter at the inſtance of his people ſendeth embaſſadours to Solyman.

Solymans letter ſent to the great Maſter and the Rhodians, by their embaſſadors:

If I had not compaßion of humane infirmity, which oftentimes tumbleth headlong mens ambitious and hauty minds, into moſt dangerous & vnneceſſary miſchiefs, truly I would not haue directed vnto you theſe letters at this time; but as you haue well deſerued, perſecute you with death and moſt miſerable ſeruitude: which how eaſie a thing were it for me to do, you your ſelues know. But hauing now ſufficiently tried my force, if you be wiſe make proofe of my clemency. You haue already ſatisfied your owne fury, your owne mad humour: and now aduiſe your ſelues, lay your hand vpon your heart, and without delay yeeld your ſelues as I command; your liues I giue, I giue you your wealth; and more than that, your choice to tarry there ſtill, or to depart: Refuſe not the grace frankely offered, which was of you to haue been moſt heartily deſired. It ſhall not alwaies be lawfull for you (as at this preſent) to make choice of both. From our campe.

Vpon the returne of the embaſſadors, the poore of all ſorts flockt together to the Great Maſter his houſe not far from the breach: where after the multitude of the common people was diſmiſſed, and the chiefe of the burgers ſent for, the imperious letter of the Turkiſh tyrant was openly read before the Knights of the Order, and the better ſort of the citiſens. Whereunto the Great Maſter accounting it both honour enough, and ſufficient tearme of life honorably to die, anſwered in this ſort.

You heard (ſacred fellowes in armes, and valiant citizens of the Rhodes) theſe imperious and ſorrowfull letters: whereunto how we are to anſwer, requireth no great deliberation: we muſt as reſolute men either yeeld or die; all hope of the victory is gone, except forraine aid come. Wherefore if you will follow my counſell, let vs with weapons in our hands, vntill the laſt gaſpe and the ſpending of the laſt drop of our bloud, like valiant men defend our faith and nobility receiued from our anceſtors, and the honour which we haue ſo long time gotten both at home and abroad: and let it neuer be ſaid, that our honour died but with our ſelues. G

This ſpeech of the Great Maſter ſeemed vnto many, heauier than the imperious commandement of the Turkiſh tyrant: and a great while men ſtood ſilent, heauily looking one vpon another, many with changing of their countenance and outward geſture, more than by words expreſſing what they thought in heart. At length a certaine Greeke Prieſt, with great compaſſion of mind (as it ſeemed) and teares trickling downe his cheekes, brake forth into theſe words: H

And I would alſo hold my peace, if I were a priuat man, and not firſt of all in ſo great and troubled aſſembly broch mine owne opinion. But foraſmuch as the regard of our common preſeruation, can wring a word out of no mans mouth; and all men know, that now is the time to ſpeake and ſay what euery man thinketh beſt, which ſhall neither alwaies nor long be granted vnto vs; I will not let it now ouerpaſſe and ſlip away: Wherefore let vs ſuppoſe, that no command of a moſt mighty Prince beſieging vs, were come vnto vs, but that I was reaſoning as a priuat man with his neighbour, or one friend with another by the fire ſide, or in our cups without care, without any great affection to either party, as men indifferent, not liking or hating (as men do oftentimes of Princes affaires which concerne them nothing) and then (as I hope) my ſpeech ſhall be vnto you neither vnpleaſing nor vnprofitable. We Greekes and Latines, with ioyned armes, haue now theſe ſix moneths withſtood our deadly enemies, not only abroad before our wals, but alſo in the very bowels of our city, without any forreine helpe: which as we haue of long time all vainely looked for, ſo are we now euery one of vs out of hope thereof. And yet our enemy, either moued with the ſecret goodneſſe of God, or elſe ignorant of our ſtrength and forces, ſpent with wounds, ſlaughter, ſickeneſſe, and perpetuall labour, doth voluntarily offer that vnto vs, which was of vs moſt of all deſired and earneſtly ſued for. Your publike and priuate treaſures, the bodies of your ſelues, your wiues and children, he keepeth inuiolated; he taketh from vs only the city, which he hath for moſt part already beaten downe and taken. K Worthy Great Maſter, and you moſt valiant Knights, I haue knowne proweſſe and valour in many battels at ſea, but eſpecially in this ſiege; whereof ſeeing there is no more vſe in this our deſperate eſtate, I doe appeale vnto your wiſedome and diſcretion. Since all is now the conquerors, in that he leaueth vnto vs our liues and goods, that is to be accounted gaines, and the yeelding vp of the city and Iſland no loſſe, which the victorious enemy already commandeth: which although it be a heauy matter and grieuous vnto the nobility, yet your fortune perſuadeth you thereunto. Wherefore if you be to be moued with any compaſſion, I account it better to yeeld, than to be ſlaine your ſelues, or to ſee your wiues and children by law of armes to be led away before your faces into miſerable captiuity and ſeruitude. If any Chriſtian compaſſion remaine in your warlike minds, I beſeech you ſeeke not the vtter deſtruction of this innocent people, who (I may with modeſty ſay) hath not euill deſerued of you, whom Chriſt Ieſus, whom the enemy himſelfe, would haue preſerued. L That I ſay this which I ſpeake vnto you for Chriſtian charity, & for no other cauſe, let this be a ſufficient teſtimony, That ſo long as you were able to reſiſt by your own power, or hoped for aid of forrein Princes, I neuer ſpake word, or once thought of yeelding: but now ſeeing the fatall ruin of all things about vs, our common eſtate brought vnto the vttermoſt extremity, our deadly enemy in the heart of our city, no hope, and that the war cannot longer be protracted; I wiſh you to yeeld, and for my part had rather make choice of peace than war, and to proue the enemies fauour, than his fury.

Moſt of them there preſent, were of the ſame mind with the Prieſt. But as nothing can be ſo reaſonably ſpoken as to content all men, ſo this ſpeech was not of them all liked: ſome there were (though not many) which conſidering the harmes they had done vnto the Turks, and M doubting with what ſafety they might yeeld themſelues, into the power of that faithleſſe people, had rather to haue fought it out to the laſt man, and ſo to haue left vnto them a bloudy victory. Amongſt theſe, one bold ſpoken fellow ſtept forth, and in preſence of them all diſſuaded the yeelding vp of the city, in this ſort:

A I haue not beene with any thing more vnacquainted, than to deliuer my opinion before Princes, or in ſuch great and publike aſſemblies, being alwaies more deſirous modeſtly to heare other mens opinions, than impudently to thruſt forth mine owne. But now, ſeeing extreame neceſsity will not longer ſuffer me to keepe my wonted courſe of ſilence, I will frankly ſpeake my mind, and tell you what in my opinion is to be anſwered vnto the heauy meſſage and imperious command of the moſt perfidious tyrant. This cruell enemy hath ouerthrown our wall, and is entred three hundred foot and more within our city, and as a moſt troubleſome gueſt liueth and conuerſeth with vs as it were vnder the ſame roofe. Such as liſt not longer to indure ſuch an vnwelcome gueſt and troubleſome neighbour, perſuade you becauſe he is troubleſome, to giue him all: but (worthy and ſacred Knights) I am of far different opinion; neither do I thinke a poſſeſsion of two hundred and foureteene yeares is ſo lightly to be deliuered vp, and the ground forſaken: but B rather that this troubleſom intrudor is in like manner to be himſelf troubled, and with deadly skirmiſhes continually vexed: whom after we had by force of armes and vndaunted courage, maugre his head, held out fiue moneths, at length he brake into our city, not by any valour in himſelfe, but holpen by time, which tameth all things: and ſince his firſt entrance it is now almoſt forty daies, in which time for all his haſte, he hath ſcarcely got forward a hundred and thirty paces, hindered by the blockes we haue laied in his way, and will not ceaſe continually to lay, if we be wiſe men and mindfull of our former valour. Deſtroy me you heauenly powers, before I ſee with theſe eies theſe ſacred knights to yeeld vp this famous city of the Rhodes; the antient Bulwarke of Chriſtian religion, vnto our mercileſſe enemies, polluted with the infamous ſuperſtition of Mahomet*: who beſides the vnſatiable thirſt they haue of our bloud, how faithleſſe and miſchieuous they are by nature, if we know not, we need not make example of our ſelues, but we may take example* C by the calamity of Conſtantinople, the late miſery of Eubœa, and that which later was, of Methone, as alſo by the Mamalukes at Caire, miſerably ſlaine contrary to the league, contrary to the faith and promiſe by the Turkiſh Emperour himſelfe before giuen. What, do you not remember how the death of the moſt noble captaine at Belgrade was of late procured by the falſhood, craft, and deceit of the ſame faithleſſe miſcreants? Let vs then, being men of wit and vnderſtanding, truſt theſe mad beaſts, let vs giue our ſelues into their power, which haue no regard of right or reaſon, of religion, or any thing elſe: whoſe couetouſneſſe and cruelty it is hard to ſay which is greater, which for theſe many yeres haue plotted & laboured nothing more, than how by policy or force they may vtterly root out the very name of the Rhodians, which they ſo deadly hate. They keepe vs ſhut vp and beſieged now the ſixt moneth, feeling together with vs extreame dangers and endleſſe labour, ſlaine by heapes before our wals and fortreſſes, and cannot be remoued hence D with thunder, lightenings, ſtormes, tempeſts, and all the calamities of Winter, a time which giueth intermiſsion of all warre, both by ſea and land; ſo deſirous they are of reuenge, and greedy of our bloud: and that not altogether without cauſe, for we haue alſo ſhed theirs, and gladly would ſtill ſo do if it lay in our power. But ſeeing it ſeemeth good vnto God otherwiſe, and that we are ſurpriſed with ineuitable neceſsity, yet let vs whileſt we are at liberty, and haue power our ſelues, by honourable death amongſt the Chriſtian enſignes, eſchew the torments and reproches which our cruell enemies hope to inflict vpon vs: ſo ſhall we enjoy eternall fame and glory, prepared both in heauen and earth for ſuch as honourably die in defence of their Prince and country: which honour it becommeth not them to enuy vnto thy moſt noble name and vertue, worthy Grand Maſter, which hauing for many yeares enjoyed the commodity and profit of peace, and greatly inriched by bounty of this ſacred military Order, refuſe now to beare this laſt E burden of war.

At theſe words an antient Greeke, for his wiſedome and diſcretion of great reputation both with the Greekes and Latines, perceiuing his countrymen wrongfully touched, and the deſperat holding out of the city vainely perſuaded, tooke hold and interrupting this young gallant; in anſwer of that he had ſaid, ſpake as followeth:

The former ſpeech notably anſwered by a Greeke, and the yeelding of the City vrged.

That griefe of minde and deſperation can make men rather eloquent than wiſe, as you haue many times heard before this, ſo you might this day perceiue alſo, moſt valiant gentlemen: for aduiſed modeſty neuer falleth into obloquy, neither confoudeth falſehood with truth; it deſireth not the ſlaughter of the citiſens, F it perſuadeth not fury, nor exhorteth men to madneſſe: but it is by nature ſo engraffed in many, that when they cannot by their owne wiſedome and policy deliuer themſelues from their troubles, they yet ſeeke to draw others into the fellowſhip of the ſame danger: ſo greedy haue malice and miſery alwaies beene of company. But if you (worthy Commander) will giue me leaue to ſpeake, a man amongſt his countrymen not of meaneſt place and authority, whith thing both the preſent calamity and vrgent neceßity might of G you eaſily obtaine. I would alledge ſuch reaſons, and lay downe ſuch matter, as ſhould not only refell the copious and glorious words ſo this ſharpe witted Orator, ſcrapt together of purpoſe to flouriſh out the matter, but alſo ſuch as might ſtir your minde to that which is honeſt, profitable, and neceſſary; expulſing hatred, feare, trouble, or deſpaire. This Gentleman, whom we all know, not only to be a vehement Orator, but ſome-time a man moſt terrible, whereas for all his great words he is by nature mild, and ſo mild, that he neuer had the heart to kill, nay, not ſo much as lightly to wound any one of them whom he calleth barbarous, mad, cruell, whoſe perfidious dealing he deteſteth, whoſe cruelty he accurſeth, whoſe manner of liuing he exclai-meth againſt, as altogether without law, without reaſon, without order, without regard: and now in time of truce, and whileſt the ſhowres of arrowes, yron bullets, fire and ſtones doth ceaſe, creeping out of his caue, maketh much adoe, and keepeth a great ſtir: and not knowing in what danger he is, doth now H with glorious words call vpon death, whereof he hath hitherto ſhewed himſelfe too much affraid, and all forſooth (as he ſaid) leſt he ſhould be inſorced to endure the mocking and ſcorning of the enemy. But this is meere pride, not Chriſtian fortitude or humility. But our enemy neither threateneth nor purpoſeth any ſuch matter, nothing ſo perfidious or cruell as he would make him, rubbing vp the ſlaughter at Caire, Eubœa, Methone, and Conſtantinople, cities taken either by force or warlike policy, and not yeelded by compoſition, vpon faith giuen betwixt the beſieger and the beſieged: who becauſe he would ſpare vs, will not ſuffer vs to do that whereby we ſhould vndoubtedly periſh. But whereof proceedeth this new found clemency? this vnwonted fauour toward the people of the Rhodes? I am not of the tyrants priuy counſell, neither euer curiouſly ſought after the reaſon of another mans bounty, but am glad to receiue it when I need it. Yet for all that, I will not diſſemble what I thinke in a matter ſo doubtfull: he is willing (as I I ſuppoſe) in this ſiege and conqueſt of the Rhodes, to ſhew vnto other nations whom he purpoſeth to inuade, both his power and his patience: leſt alwaies ſatisfying his cruell nature, he ſhould make deſolation in places he would raigne ouer, and ſo for euer alienating the minds of men, be inforced to fight with all men with fire and ſword: by which rigour he hath not ſo much hurt his enemy as himſelfe. For this cauſe (as I ſuppoſe) he leaueth vnto vs life and goods, leſt whileſt he in going about to take them from vs by force, and we ſeeking to keepe them by deſperatneſſe, we ſhould both fall into great deſtruction, no leſſe lamentable vnto the conqueror than to the vanquiſhed. Beſides that, if he ſhould kill all here, truly he might then enter the breaches of the city on the bodies of the dead, no men now left aliue to reſiſt him. But Lerus is ſhut vp, Arangia is ſtrongly fortified, Lyndus is by ſcituation impregnable: here he knoweth are weapons, armour, and men; here he muſt begin a new war, except he will haue the remainder of your warre, K the fatall plague of his Empire, to prey ſtill vpon his ſubjects: all which ſtrong places he ſhall haue without ſlaughter, without bloudſhed (as reaſon is) if he ſhould let you and vs poore wretches depart in ſafety with a little traſh. Except theſe worldly conſiderations haue moued him to mercy and compaßion: then out of doubt it is wrought by diuine power and the ſecret fauour of God towards vs, and of our Sauiour Chriſt Ieſus crucified. Whereunto if you be men well aduiſed, if religious, if mindfull of the duty of Chriſtians, it becommeth not you to impoſe any obſtacle, and with the ruine of your ſelues to deſtroy this miſerable people, which for this halfe yeares ſiege, hath ſcarcely had ſo much reſt as might ſuffice the ne-ceßity of nature, ſtanding for you in battell, induring both wounds and death for your honour and victory: by whoſe faithfull labour and diligence you haue beene alwaies holpen both at home and abroad; whether you inuaded the Turke by land in Mytilene, Naupactus, Methone, Patras, or other parts of Peloponeſus; L or els by ſea thruſt him out of the poſſeßion of the Ionian or Ægeum: whereby it may appeare euen vnto a blind man, how iniurious it is, and far from truth, to object vnto vs, That injoying the fruits of peace, we refuſe the charges of wars; nay, we neuer refuſed wars. But now it is come to that point, that if we would neuer ſo faine make wars, we are not able ſo to do, the floure of our youth being ſlain: and the ſmall remainder that is left, not only weakened in body with wounds, ſickneſſe, watching, and reſtleſſe labour; but alſo in mind diſcouraged, whileſt all things fall out proſperouſly to our enemies, and to vs aduerſe: the greateſt and beſt part of our great artillery being broken with continuall vſe, which if it were whole, we could haue thereof ſmall vſe or profit, for want of pouder, which not only this city now wanteth, but alſo your ſtrong holds, Lerus, Lyndus, Halicarnaſſus, Arangia. I was neuer deſirous or curious to looke into other mens doings, much leſſe into your manner of war: but yet (Great Maſter) you cannot deny but it is ſo; who haue M cauſed ſoldiers to be brought from thence hither openly, and gunpoudder ſecretly: by which policy you haue withſtood your forreine enemy theſe ſix moneths, and deceiued the trechery of one or two domeſticall traitors. But I gladly admit we haue all theſe things, I ſtand vpon the truth, I ſay not what moſt men ſay, but I ſpeake

A I ſpeake to pleaſe a few : and ſuppoſe we want neither armour nor courage, I would then aske you this, whether they would aduiſe you to vſe them to your defence, or to your deſtruction? For vnto both it cannot be, no more than at once to be a freeman and a ſlaue. To vſe them to your deſtruction, that were madneſſe and ſenceleſſe pride, hatefull to God and man; you ſhould therefore vſe them to defence : but how ſhall we defend a city (I do not ſay as the truth is) already loſt and poſſeſſed by the enemy, wherein he reigneth, raungeth, and turneth all vpſide downe? but hauing the wals battered downe, a great breach in the Spaniſh ſtation, & another not like, but euen now as good as made in the Italion ſtation, how ſhall we be able to keep this vnfortunate towne, battered and rent at the French, Engliſh, and Auergn ſtations, and the tower of S.Nicolas? Which if it were not ſo battered and bared of all warlike prouiſion, but ſound and thorowly furniſhed with munition and victuall, yet neceſſity enforcing, and reaſon perſuading, you ought to forſake B it, forſomuch as all power of further reſiſtance is taken from you. Doe you ſee how eaſily and almoſt without any trouble the enemy (by meanes of the caſtle he hath new built vpon the mount Philermo, not paſt two miles diſtant) can take from you all manner of prouiſion both by ſea and land, and reſtraine you from going out or in? Truly notable Gentlemen, honourable for your martiall proweſſe, you ſee and haue long agoe foreſeene theſe things better than I, altogether ignorant in martiall affaires, altogether buſied in the trade of merchandiſe, and caring for my family : yet ſuffer me to ſay the truth. All the powers whereby this kingdome ſtood, are departed and gone; againſt the force of our enemies no policy of force remaineth; and to expect armies of angels or ſouldiers from heauen, and other ſuch like miracles, is in my judgment more and more to prouoke God to anger, although in his anger he be vnto vs mercifull. Wherefore being deſtitute of all worldly helpe, let vs as we may, prouide for our ſafety. I beſeech thee (worthy C Great Maſter) by theſe my aged teares, by the naturall piety ingrafted in thy noble nature, expoſe not this miſerable city to the ſpoile of the enemy, or old and middle aged men to the ſword, our wiues and daughters to be rauiſhed, our boyes and youths to the vnnaturall filthineſſe of our barbarous enemies, and to be corrupted with the mad and groſſe opinion of the vngodly Mahometane ſuperſtition. I would (noble Knights) you had ſeene with what teares, with what mourning our heauy families and children crying about their mothers, ſent vs hither, and what praiers they made for vs at our departing : I would you knew with what minde and how great hope they expect their ſafety from your clemency and aduiſed reſolution.

This ſpeech of the aged Greeke might haue moued a heart of flint: but the Great Maſter, D who in his countenance ſhewed a greater courage than his preſent ſtate required, commanding euery man to his charge: after the matter had bin thus moſt part of the night diſcourſed, gaue then no other anſwer, but, That he would be careful of all their well doing. The next morning he ſent for Preianes, Martiningus, and a few other of the greateſt judgement and experience; by whom he was fully reſolued, that the city in ſo many places by the enemy laid open and ſhaken, was not poſſibly to be long defended: whereupon he cauſed a common counſell to be called of all the Knights of the Order together with the burgeſſes of the city : where after long debating, whether they ſhould fight it out to the laſt man, or yeeld vpon ſuch conditions as was to be obtained; it was by generall conſent concluded, that the city ſhould be yeelded, and thereupon a decree made which was by the Great Maſter pronounced. Whileſt theſe E things were thus in doing, a truce was taken with the enemy for foure daies, but full of feare and danger. During which time, diuers of the Turks preſuming vpon the truce, came by great companies to behold the wals and rampiers of the city : wherewith Fornouius the Frenchman (of whom mention is made before) being ſore moued, in his choler without further command diſcharged a tyre of great ordnance among the thickſt of them, contrary to the truce taken. At which time alſo the Rhodians receiued into the city ſecretly by night a ſhip loded with wines out of Crete, and in her Alphonſus a Spaniard, chiefe pilot of the Rhodian gallies, and with him 100 voluntary ſoldiers all Latines, all which went out of Crete without the knowledge of the Venetian Senat: for at that time the Venetians were in league with Solyman. The Turks juſtly offended with the breach of the truce, and the taking in of new ſupplies, which F they ſuppoſed to haue bin far greater than in truth they were; without command of any captaine or enſigne diſplaid, in great numbers thruſt in thorow the ruines of the breaches into the city as farre as the rampiers and baricadoes new made, and furiouſly aſſailed the defendants: In which conflict many were ſlaine and wounded on both ſides. But after the Turkes had to their coſt againe made proofe of the courage of their enemies, as without commandement they

The Great Maſter reſolued that the city was not to be defended, calleth a common counſell of all his knights, and the Burgeſſes of the city.

A truce taken with the Turks for foure daies.

A barbarous fact.

they began that ſkirmiſh,ſo of themſelues they brake it off and retired. After the truce was thus broken, the captaine of the Turks ſencers, a bloudy cruell fellow, hauing taken three Chriſtians priſoners, cut off their hands, eares, and noſes, and ſent them ſo diſmembred into the city with letters to the Great Maſter, charging him with the vnjuſt breach of the truce, barbarouſly threatning within three or foure daies to make like example of him to all poſterity. Amongſt others none was more troubled with this ſudden and vnexpected breach of the truce, than Robertus Peruſinus, Raymundus Marchet, and Raymundus Lupus, three Knights of the Order, men of ſingular wiſedome and grauity, Embaſſadours at that time in the Turkes campe: whom the barbarous people in their fury had vndoubtedly ſlaine or put to torture, if they had not feared the like meaſure to haue been ſhewed to their hoſtages in the city. But after that Nicholas Vergotus, and Georgius Sandriticus, two of the Burgeſſes of the city, were come into the campe with articles containing the conditions whereupon the Rhodians were contented to deliuer vp the city, all their fury and rage was quickly appeaſed. Solyman for his greater majeſty and the more terror of theſe meſſengers, beſet round about with his great army, and guarded about with his Ianizaries in their richeſt attire and gliſtering armour, gaue them audience: who admitted to his preſence, with great humility offered vnto him in writing the conditions whereupon the Rhodians would yeeld vp vnto him the city. The chiefe points whereof were, That the Churches ſhould remaine vnto the Chriſtians inuiolated: That no children ſhould be taken from their parents: That no Chriſtian ſhould be inforced to forſake his religion and turne Turke: That ſuch Chriſtians as would tarry ſtill in the city, might ſo doe at liberty, without paying any tribute for the ſpace of fiue yeares: That all they which would depart might go with bag and baggage, furniſhed with conuenient ſhipping and prouiſion as farre as Crete, and to carry with them ſo much great ordnance as they pleaſed; and that the Chriſtians ſhould appoint a reaſonable day for the time of their departure. All which articles Solyman condeſcended vnto, and ſolemnly ſwore faithfully to performe the ſame. But how they were indeed performed the writers of that age do much vary: it ſhould ſeem they were neither altogether kept, nor broken; but ſo performed as pleaſed the conqueror: certaine it is, that many great outrages were through military inſolency committed by the proud Turks vpon the poore Chriſtians, contrary to the mind of Solyman. Iacobus Fontanus a Ciuilian, and at that time one of the judges of the city (out of whoſe writings this hiſtory is for moſt part collected) reporteth, that the Turks not expecting the departure of the Chriſtians, brake into the city vpon Chriſtenmas day, by the gate called Coſquinium, polluted the Temples, ſhamefully abuſed the Chriſtians, and made hauocke of all things; and that he himſelfe falling into their hands, after he had with ſuch mony as he had, redeemed himſelfe, hauing not ſufficient to content all their greedy deſires, was by them hardly intreated and grieuouſly beaten. The Great Maſter by the counſell of Achimetes, putting on ſuch ſimple attire as beſt beſeemed a vanquiſhed man that was to humble himſelfe before the conqueror, went out of the city into the campe, attended vpon with a few Knights of the Order: where after he had waited in the raine moſt part of the day, before Solymans tent, at laſt he had a rich gowne caſt vpon him, and ſo brought into the proud tyrants preſence. Where after they had a while at the firſt, with piercing eies one earneſtly beheld the other; the Great Maſter humbling himſelfe before him, was in token of grace admitted to kiſſe his hand, and welcommed by Solyman in this ſort.

Solyman his ſpeech vnto the Great Maſter.

Although (ſaid he) I might worthily and juſtly infringe the articles I haue preſcribed concerning the yeelding of the City, with thy moſt wicked croſſed compiers, the people of the Rhodes, and thee eſpecially ſuch a capitall enemy, from whoſe deſerued puniſhment, neither faith nor oath ought to ſtay a moſt juſt conquerour: yet I haue determined to be not onely gratious and mercifull vnto thee ſo great an offender, deſeruing exemplary puniſhment, but alſo liberall and bountifull: who if thou wilt by weldoing amend the grieuous tranſgreſſions of thy former life, I promiſe vnto thee moſt honourable entertainement, great preferment, and the higheſt places in my Empire, in my army in time of warre, and in counſell in time of peace. Not to refuſe this mine offer, both thy preſent eſtate perſuadeth thee, and the Chriſtians (whoſe quarrell thou tookeſt vpon thee to defend aggainſt me, with better beginning than ſucceſſe) deſerue at thy hands no better: for what ſhould let thee, forſaken of all thy friends, a man as it were betraied and vanquiſhed, to caſt thy ſelfe into the perpetuall faith and protection

of

A of a moſt mighty and mercifull conquerour, of himſelfe offering thee this vndeſerued grace and fauour.

Whereunto the Great Maſter anſwered:

The reſolute anſwere of the Great Maſter to Solyman.

Moſt Mighty and gratious Emperour, your offered fauours before your other worthy captaines, I deſerue not; neither is my preſent eſtate and deſert towards you ſuch, as that I dare or ought to refell the ſame: yet I will ſpeake freely in the middeſt of your victorious army, a man vanquiſhed in preſence of the conquerour, whoſe great mercy I neuer deſpaired of, and whoſe faith I neuer doubted: I had rather now I haue loſt my ſoueraignty, forthwith to loſe my priuat and vnfortunate life; or elſe for euer hereafter to B liue in obſcurity, than of my people to be accounted a fugitiue rather than a vanquiſhed man: For, to be vanquiſhed is but chance of warre, and of ſo great a conqueror, no ſhame to him that is conquered: but afterwards to forſake his owne people and to turne to the enemy, I account it ſhamefull cowardiſe and treachery.

Solyman maruelling at the courage and majeſty of the hoary old Prince, in his ſo great extremity, diſmiſſed him, and ſent him againe into the city, guarded with his owne guard, vntill he was come into his palace: and vnto euery one of the Knights attending vpon the Great Maſter, was giuen a rich garment, in token of Solymans fauor. Within a few daies after, Solyman comming into the city, went to viſit the Great Maſter alſo: whom he found buſie in packing vp his things againſt his departure. C Here when the Great Maſter falling downe vpon his knees would haue worſhipped him, he would in no caſe ſuffer him ſo to do: but with his hand putting aſide his vaile of majeſty (which manner of reuerence the Turkiſh Emperors giue only to God and their Great Prophet Mahomet) tooke him vp and ſaluted him by the name of Father. To whom the Great Maſter for his wiſedome and diſcretion now to him no leſſe admirable, than he was before in time of war for his valour and courage, ſpake in this ſort:

Solyman commeth into the city vnto the Great Maſter.

The ſpeech of the Great Maſter to Solyman.

If my fortune and ſucceſſe had beene anſwerable to my heart and courage, I ſhould here be in this city, rather as a victorious conquerour than a man conquered. But ſithence the fatall Deſtinies would needs ouerthrow the Rhodian eſtate, I am glad that you are the man before all other, by fortune aſſigned, of whom D I ſhall receiue both force and grace. And vnto you, amongſt many other your rare and worthy praiſes, this ſhall not be the leaſt, That you vanquiſhed the Rhodes and ſhewed mercy. By this means you haue joyned vnto your dreadfull power, the fame of clemency and courteſie: an honour not of the higheſt to be deſpiſed, by which alone we come neereſt vnto God. Wherefore I doubt not you will keepe the conuentions of the late peace inuiolate, which your owne clemency perſuaded you to grant, and neceſſity inforced vs to take. I ſhall now be an eternall example of the Turkiſh Emperors clemency and vertue, more than if I had by and by at the firſt yeelded my ſelfe: Obſtinate wilfulneſſe hath made thy glory and mercy now famous through the whole World, and vnto the Worlds end.

E Whereunto Solyman by his interpreter anſwered:

The notable anſwere of Solyman to the Great Maſter.

It is to me a great pleaſure, that God at length hath put into thy minde to make choice of peace before warre, which I would thou couldeſt haue liked of from the begining: then truly thou ſhouldeſt at this time haue receiued of my great and mighty Majeſty, more good than thou haſt indured harme. Which that I haue done vnto thee, not for any hatred, but only for deſire of Soueraignty thou mayſt gather by this, That I ſuffer thee and thine to depart hence at liberty, with all your wealth and ſubſtance: for I make not warre, thereby to heape vp wealth and riches; but for honour, fame, immortality, and enlarging of mine Empire. For it is the property of a King royally deſcended, by ſtrong hand to take from others, and to inuade others; not vpon a greedy and couetous minde, but for the honourable deſire of rule and ſoueraignty; F which whileſt my neighbour withſtandeth, I count it enough by force of armes to remoue him.

But the tyrant (as many ſuppoſed) ſpake all this by way of diſſimulation, hauing as it was commonly bruted, giuen order for the rigging vp of a great ſhip, and certaine gallies, for the ſudden tranſporting of the Great Maſter and the Knights of the Order to Conſtantinople, which report ſeemeth to haue beene but feigned either of malice, or elſe by ſuch as leaſt knew Solymans minde: for if he had ſo purpoſed, who ſhould haue let him, hauing them all in his G power. Iouius in his little treatiſe Rerum Turcicarum dedicated to Charles the fifth, reporteth that he himſelfe heard Lilladamus the Great Maſter ſay, That when Solyman entered into the Rhodes attended vpon with thirty thouſand men, there was not any man heard to ſpeake a word, but that the ſoldiers went as if they had bin obſeruant Friers: and that when he came to aske leaue of Solyman that he might depart, he was ſo courteouſly vſed of him, that turning himſelfe to Abraham the Baſſa, whom hee aboue all men loued, ſaid, Truely I cannot but grieue to ſee this vnfortunate old man, driuen out of his owne dwelling, to depart hence ſo heauily.

The Great Maſter embarking himſelfe with his Knights and ſuch other as was willing to depart, in veſſels and gallies prepared for that purpoſe, departed out of the Iſland on New- H yeares day at night: and after long and dangerous trauell by ſea in that Winter weather, landed at laſt at Meſſana in Silicia, from whence he afterwards ſailed into Italy, and ſo trauelled to Rome where he was honorable receiued by Adrian the ſixt of that name then Biſhop there, a Hollander borne, ſometime ſchoolemaſter to Charles the fifth, and his Vicegerent in Spaine; who if he had been as forward in the ſhort time of the Papacy to haue relieued the Rhodes, as he was to maintaine Charles his quarrell againſt the French King, it is not vnlike but that famous city had been relieued, and the Iſland in poſſeſſion of the Chriſtians at this day. Thus Solyman, whileſt the Chriſtian Princes were at diſcord amongſt themſelues, to his great glory and no leſſe griefe of all good Chriſtians, entered the Rhodes the 52 day of December, a day I dedicated vnto the Natiuity of our Sauiour Chriſt, in the yeare 1522, after it had bin by the Knights of the Order valiantly kept and defended againſt the Infidels by the ſpace of 214 yeares, ſince the time they by force tooke it from the Infidels in the yeare 1308: and now being ſo long holden as was poſſible, againſt all the power of the Turks, was yeelded vp when it had bin ſix moneths beſieged. At this ſiege Solyman loſt a great part of his army; for beſides them that were ſlaine at the aſſaults, which were many, thirty thouſand died of the flix.

Solyman entreth into the Rhodes on Chriſtenmas day, in the yere 1522.

Solyman ſends Ferhates Baſſa againſt Alis-beg the mountaine Prince.

Whileſt Solyman thus lay at the ſiege of the Rhodes, Ferhates Baſſa Gouernor of the Marches of the Turkiſh Empire, alongſt the riuer of Euphrates, by the commandement of Solyman went with a great army againſt Alis-Beg, whom the Turks call Schach, Suar-Ogli, that is to ſay, King Suar his ſon: which P. Iouius corrupting, calleth him by the name of Saxouar-Oglis. This K Alis after he had betraied his vncle Aladeules the mountaine King, vnto Sinan Baſſa, was by Selymus left chiefe Gouernor of that large and wild country alongſt the borders of Armenia and Capadocia, wanting nothing of the honor of a king but the name only, as is before declared in the life of Selymus. Solyman jealous of his honour, and fearing leſt he ſhould take vpon him the abſolute gouernment of that country (which indeed of right belonged vnto him, the children of Aladeules the late King, being now all dead) and ſo to make himſelfe King; eſpecially if he ſhould joyne in friendſhip with the Perſian King: after the manner of ambitious men, purpoſed by any means to haue him taken out of the way: and had therefore ſent Ferhates to eaſe him of that care. The Baſſa without making any ſhew of hoſtility, marching with his army along the confines of his country, as if it had been but to looke to his charge, when he was L come as neere as he could to Alis, without miſtruſt, thought good to aſſay if he could by policy bring that to paſſe which he was otherwiſe with great danger to attempt by force.
Wherefore faining himſelfe to be extream ſicke, he ſent Embaſſadors to Alis, requeſting him as a friend to vouchſafe to come vnto him being at the point of death, vnto whom he had many things of importance from the great Emperour to impart, and would if he ſhould die, leaue with him all his charge vntill Solyman ſhould otherwiſe diſpoſe thereof.

Alis and his foure ſonnes treacherouſly ſlaine.

Alis, who from his youth had alwaies honoured the Turkiſh Emperours and faithfully ſerued them, miſtruſting no harme came to the Baſſa, accompanied with his foure ſons; whom the faithleſſe Baſſa without regard of infamy, cauſed preſently to be put to death with their father: and ſo reducing all that country into the manner of a Prouince, vnder Solymans obeiſance, M came to him with twenty thouſand men, about the time that the city of the Rhodes was yeelded vp. This is the faithleſſe dealing of the Turks, not with the Chriſtians only, but with them of their owne ſuperſtition alſo: vſing it as no ſmall policy, vtterly to extinguiſh the nobility of all countries ſubject to their ſeruile tyranny.

Solyman returneth to Conſtantinople.

Solyman vpon the diſcord of the Chriſtian Princes & diſordered ſtate of Hungary, taketh occaſion to inuade that kingdome.

1526

Solyman commeth againſt Lewis king of Hungary.

The vanity of Tomoreus.

A Solyman after he had thus ſubdued the Rhodes, and diſpoſed of the Iſland as he liked beſt, returning to Conſtantinople, brake vp his army, and for the ſpace of three yeares after followed his pleaſure,not doing any thing worthy of remembrance. During which time and many yeres after,the rich and flouriſhing countrey of Italy, ſomtime miſtreſſe of the world,was miſerably afflicted & rent in pieces by Charles the fiſt(then Emperor)and Francis the French king,the one enuying vnto the other the glory of the Empire : and he not content therewith, ſeeking with immoderat ambition to make himſelfe lord of all Italy:moſt of the other Chriſtian princes and ſtates being at the ſame time either by the one or by the other, drawne into the fellowſhip of that war, to the great trouble and ſore weakning of the Chriſtian commonweale.
Wherupon Solyman waiting all occaſions that might ſerue for the inlarging of his empire, B & annoying of the Chriſtians,thought it now a fit time for him to ſet his foot into Hungary, whereinto he had already laid open a way by the taking of Belgrade. He knew right well that wis then King of Hungary was but yong,altogether vnacquainted with the wars,commanding ouer his headſtrong ſubiects(eſpecially his rich prelates and nobility)no otherwiſe than pleaſed themſelues,being himſelfe rather by them altogether ouerruled:beſides that,he was in good hope,that the other Chriſtian Princes neer vnto him,either carried away with regard of their own eſtate,would not,or els before vnto himſelfe by league faſt bound,could not affourd vnto him any great aid or ſuccor:the Germanes he knew would make ſmall haſt vnto ſuch wars as ſhould yeeld them much danger, and but ſmall pay. As for the Princes of the houſe of Auſtria,Charles the Emperor,and Ferdinand his brother, although they were ioyned C vnto the yong king with the neereſt bonds of allyance(Lewis hauing married Mary their yongeſt ſiſter,and Ferdinand, Anne, king Lewis his ſiſter)yet was there as he thought ſmall help to be expected from them;Charles hauing his hands full in Italy, and Ferdinand altogether carefull of himſelfe:and that Sigiſmund king of Polonia would for the yong kings ſake breake the antient league he had with the Turkiſh Emperors, he could hardly be perſuaded:as for other Chriſtian Princes farther off,he ſtood not in any great doubt. Thus hauing with himſelfe ſingled out this young Prince the Hungarian King,whom he had in his greedy mind already deuoured, he ſet forward from Conſtantinople,and was come on his way as far as Sophia in Seruia with a mighty army of two hundred thouſand men, before that the Hungarians had any knowledge of his comming (ſo blind and ſenceleſſe was that ſtate, which now ſleeping in ſecurity, D had long before loſt thoſe eies which euer watcht, and neuer ſpared coſt or paines to keep the ſame in ſafety) in ſtead of whom were others come in place, ſharp of ſight, and too too prouident for that concerned their owne aduancement;but blind as beetles in foreſeeing this great and common danger(wherwith they were ſhortly after all quite ouerwhelmed(vntill it was now brought home vnto their owne dores. The yong king of himſelfe but weak,by reaſon of his youthfull yeares,and nothing ſtrengthned by them for whom he had moſt done, and ſhould haue bin his greateſt ſtay;was wonderfully diſmayd with the fame of the approch of ſo mighty an enemy:yet the better to withſtand him, he ſent Embaſſadours with all ſpeed to the Chriſtian Princes his neighbors, requeſting their aid againſt the common enemy:but all in vain. In the mean time,after the antient maner of his countrey he gaue out general ſummons E for the aſſembly of his counſell for the wars : whither his great ſtipendarie Prelates (of duty bound to appeare)came with their troups of euill appointed horſmen,and not halfe full; who alſo deliuered in leſſe ſums of money by far,than of right they ſhould haue don,towards the maintenance of the charge of that common war. And the temporall nobilitie,forgetting the warlike diſcipline of their famous aunceſtors,as freſh water ſouldiers which had ſeen the Turkiſh Emperour in his ſtrength, and but little acquainted with ſome light skirmiſhes or ſmal inuaſions,in their vain brauery made light account of the Turks;proudly vaunting, That although they were in number but few,yet they would eaſily ouerthrow the great numbers of them,if euer they came to handy ſtrokes. But aboue all the reſt,one Paulus Tomoreus, Archbiſhop of Coloſſa,ſometimes a Minorit, who had before bin in diuers light skirmiſhes againſt F the Turks,with great inſolency did ſo confidently brag & boaſt of the victory he vainly dreamed of,that in his ſermons vnto the ſouldiers,and in open talke with the nobility (if he could haue done ſo much as he vaunted of) it ſhould ſeem that he himſelfe had bin enough to haue ouerthrowne the Turks whole army.

But when all the Kings army was aſſembled, and a generall muſter taken, there was hardly found fiue and twenty thouſand men in all, horſe and foot. So that the fooliſh hardineſſe of G Tomoreus, and others ſo forward to giue the Turks battell, was of moſt wiſe men diſliked. The old ſouldiers and men of great experience ſaid plainly, That it was meere folly and madneſſe with ſuch a handfull of men to giue battell vnto the enemy, who would bring eight times ſo many moe into the field as they were. Wherefore ſome wiſhed, that the yong king ſhould be withdrawn from the eminent danger: among whom Stephanus Verbetius, a noble captain, of all the reſt beſt acquainted with the Turkiſh wars, gaue counſel, that the perſon of the yong king ſhould for the ſafety of the common ſtate, whatſoeuer ſhould happen, be kept out of danger wholſom counſel not followed in the ſtrong caſtle of Buda. But the vnruly ſoldiers with open mouth impugned his wholſom counſell, and ſaid plainly, That except the king himſelfe did lead them, they would not at all fight. Of which opinion was alſo the raſh prelat Tomoreus, perſuading them with all ſpeed to H giue the enemy battell, and that the noble yong king vnder the protection of Almighty God ſhould in perſon himſelfe go & giue the ſignal of battell againſt his enemies. The king ouerruld by this vnlucky counſell, vpon a brauery without reaſon ſet forward with his army, and came to a place called Mohatchz or Mugace, which is a little countrey village not farre from Danubius, almoſt in the middle between Buda and Belgrade. And now Balybeus with 20000 horſemen (the forerunners of the Turkiſh army) was at hand, at which time the commanders and captains of the kings army, entred into counſell, Whether it were better to incamp their army within their waggons alongſt the riuer of Danubius, and ſo to expect the comming of Ioannes Sepuſius, County of Cilia, and Vayuod of Tranſiluania (who was then ſaid to be comming towards the king with his Tranſyluanian horſemen) of all other fitteſt to haue incountred I the Turks, or elſe to march on forward, and preſently to giue them battell: But Tomoreus, who now commanded all, knowing that vpon the comming of the Vayuod, he was to giue place, and himſelfe to be commanded (which vnto ſo proud a man was no ſmall griefe) for the maintenance of his credit and reputation, and to carry away the glory of the victory he ſo vainly hoped for, could not abide to heare of any delay; but haſting headlong to his own deſtruction, did with ſuch vehemencie impugn the wholſom counſel of others, who would haue expected the comming of the Vayuod, that he by his franticke perſuaſions, drew on the vnaduiſed young King into moſt apparent and manifeſt danger. For Balybeus diuided his horſemen into foure battels, which by turns ſkirmiſhed with the Kings army without intermiſſion, and gaue the Hungarians no leiſure to reſt either day or night, but continually wheeling about, K kept them in ſo ſtrait, that no man could without great danger goe to water his horſe at the ſide of Danubius, which was faſt by, or once to ſtir out of the camp, but were inforced to dig pits for water in places where they lay: with which neceſſity Tomoreus was inforced to put the army in order of battell, and there was now no remedy, but he muſt of neceſſity fight for the honour of his Prince and countrey. His battell was ranged all in length, and his horſmen not altogether (as it was thought) vnfitly placed here and there among his footmen, leſt the Turks (being in number eight to one) ſhould with their multitude compaſſe them round, and ſo inforce them to fight as it were in a ring: for now was Solyman come alſo with his huge army.

The Hungarian tents defended with a ſmall garriſon, were left a little from the army on the right hand, incloſed round about with wagons, one chained to another: neere vnto the which, L Tomoreus, Generall of this vnluckie battell, had not altogether vndiſcreetly placed a troup of choſen horſmen for the defence of the Kings perſon againſt all vncertaine euents of the battell.
But this day (vnlucky to the Hungarian name, but vnto the King himſelfe moſt fatall and vnfortunat) ouerthrew that his purpoſe, deuiſed too late for the ſafety of the kings perſon: for at the firſt encounter, the Hungarians, although they had receiued no harme by the Turkiſh Artillery (being mounted too high, of purpoſe as it was thought, the gunners being for moſt part Chriſtians) were eaſily beaten downe and ouerthrowne, oppreſſed by the multitude of their enemies, eſpecially Tomoreus with the reſt of the prelats and nobility, being almoſt all ſlaine together, and the Hungarian horſmen alſo either ſlain or put to flight. All things going thus to wrack, a company of Turks aſſailed the camp, which was hardly defended by the weak M garriſon. Which thing the troup of the choſen horſemen appointed for defence of the kings perſon, beholding, could not be ſtaid, but that they would needs help them which defended the campe. The young King ſeeing all his army diſcomfited, and himſelfe forſaken of the horſemen which he was in hope ſhould haue guarded him, betooke himſelfe to flight.

But

King Lewis drowned in a ditch.

A But as he was making ſhift for himſelf, thinking to haue paſſed ouer a fenny ditch, his horſe in plunging out, fel backward vpon him into the ditch; where being heauy loden with armor, not able to help himſelf, he was in the middeſt of the filthy ditch in the mud moſt miſerably drowned. Some few horſmen eſcaped out of the battel, the reſt were either ſlain or taken priſoners.
This woſul battel, not ſufficiently to be lamented, as the ground of the miſeries of that worthy kingdom, was fought the 29 day of October, in the year 1526.

Solyman hauing obtained this victory, marched on directly to Buda the regall ſeat of the Hungarian Kings, which was deliuered to him with the caſtle, vpon condition that he ſhould not violate any man either in perſon or goods, and at his departure to leaue the ſame again to the Hungarians: all which things he according to their requeſt faithfully performed. Being B entred into the caſtle, he wonderfully commended the ſame, but lodged not therin, becauſe it is by their antient Law forbidden the Turkiſh Emperour to lodge within any walled place which is not his own. Wherfore he returned and lodged in his camp alongſt the riuer of Danubius.

The heads of the ſlain Chriſtian Biſhops and Captains preſented to Solyman.

Whilſt Solyman thus lay at Buda, ſeuen bloudy heads of the Biſhops and greateſt of the Nobility (ſlain in the late battel at Mohatchz) were preſented to him, all ſet in order vpon a wooden ſtep: wherat he ſmiled, to ſee his courtiers laying their right hands vpon their breſts, and bending their bodies as if they had done them great obeiſance, to ſalute them by name, and in deriſion to welcom them by the names of valiant Popes. But afterwards, when he had more particularly inquired what euery one of them was, it is reported, that he moſt of al deteſted C Ladiſlaus Salcanius the great Biſhop of Strigonium, for his miſerable couetouſneſſe, that being a man of infinit wealth, refuſed to ſpare part therof vnto his ſoueraigne, requeſting the ſame at his great need. Tomoreus he blamed of inconſiderat raſhnes, for that he being a Clergy man, would buſie himſelf ſo far in matters not belonging to his vocation. On the contrary part, he commended Franciſcus Perenus Biſhop of Veradium, a man honorably deſcended, for his wiſe counſel (though it was not followed) for that he had heard it reported that hee as a true prophet, fortelling the common ſlaughter inſuing, had ſharpely ſaid in the Councell, at ſuch time as Tomoreus would needs fight with the Turks, and was not by any means to bee remoued from that his fatal opinion, That hee did foreſee what that their Frier-like Generall would the next day do; and that he would with ſo great an enterpriſe effect no more, but to D make one holyday the more in the Chriſtian Calenders, in remembrance of 30000 Hungarian Martyrs, moſt miſerably ſlain of the Turks in an vnequal battell, for defence of the Chriſtian faith and religion: for at that time, they which willingly expoſed themſelues to death in defence of the Chriſtian faith, were all accounted for Martyrs. Georgius Sepuſius and others, he called raſh fools, that would aduenture with ſo ſmall ſtrength to incounter ſo ſtrong an Enemy.
At ſuch time as the counterfeits of King Lewis and Mary his wife were ſhewed to him, he honourably ſaid, that he was ſorry for the young King, that it was his hard hap to haue ſo vnaduiſed counſellors in a matter of ſo great importance, as to perſuade him againſt all reaſon to fight at ſo great diſaduantage: And that hee came not into Hungary to take his kingdom from him, but only to reuenge the wrongs don vnto him by the Hungarians: and that if E he had eſcaped the danger of the battel, he would aſſuredly haue again reſtored vnto him the Kingdom of Hungary, contenting himſelf with ſome ſmall tribute: and that it ſhould haue bin vnto him honor enough to haue ſaued the nephew of Sigiſmund King of Polonia, his confederat, ſo ſtrongly allyed with the honorable houſe of Auſtria. All which he commanded to be told to Mary the Queen, who was for fear fled from Buda to Poſſonium. Which might perhaps all ſeem to haue bin either diſſemblingly ſpoken, or falſly reported of the equity and courteſie of the barbarous King, if he had not ſhortly afterwards to the ample declaration of his bounty and liberality, without any deſert, giuen the ſame kingdom of Hungary to Ioannes Sepuſius, not born of any Royall bloud, and then retaining the minde of a very enemy. After that, he took away three goodly images of braſſe of antient workmanſhip, which were placed F in the entrance into the Kings Palace, by that renowned King Matthias Corvinus the great fauourer of rare qualities and vertues. These images repreſented the forms of Hercules with his club, of Apollo with his harp, and Diana with her bow and quiuer. All which hee placed in the Tilt-yard at Conſtantinople, as a trophey of the Hungarian victorie. Neuertheleſſe theſe images were ſince taken down by the perſuaſion of the Mufti, and molten (as contrary to their ſuperſtition) and great ordnance made of them. He caried alſo away with him three G pieces of Artillery of moſt excellent and curious work, and certain braſen pillars of chamſered work, which ſupported the chapiters of the gates. He taried at Buda about twenty dayes, in which time to ſatisfie the cruel nature and greedy deſires of his ſoldiers, he ſent out diuers troups of horſmen into the countries therabouts; by whom all the country betwixt Rab and the riuer of Tibyſcus was by that ſudden and vnexpected incurſion ſo deſtroyed, that as it is reported, aboue an hundred and fifty thouſand people of al ſorts were either ſlain or led away into moſt miſerable captiuitie. All which don, he returned again by the ſame way hee came, to Conſtantinople.

Ioannes Sepuſius, Vayuod of Tranſiluania, aſpireth to the kingdome of Hungary.

About the ſame time, Ioannes Sepuſius Vayuod of Tranſylvania, with a great power came now too late into Hungary to haue aided the King: but glad (as was thought) of his death, as H tending to his own aduancement, foraſmuch as he was now (the King being dead without iſſue) a man of greateſt account among the Nobility of Hungary. Wherſore as one of a deep and reaching wit, and in great hope to obtain the kingdom, he began cunningly to labour diuers Noblemen one by one, and inſtantly to requeſt them, that at the next parliament they would not betray the honor of their Countrey, in ſuffering the royall dignity of that antient kingdom to be transferred vnto a ſtranger, of ſuch a nation as haply loued them not. For why, the Hungarians ought well to remember what great calamities they had receiued in former times, in chuſing forrein kings and ſtrangers to rule ouer them, and in following their vnfortunat enſignes againſt the Turks; which thing the woful miſery of times paſt might notably proue, which either Sigiſmundus of Bohemia, or Ladiſlaus the firſt of Polonia, by their vnfortu- I nat battels, once at Nicopolis, again at Columbarium, and laſt of all at Varna, had brought vnto the Hungarians. But to ſpeak, nay once to remember the harmes receiued by the long cowardiſe of Vladiſlaus, or this late raſhnes of his ſon King Lewis, would make any noble mind to bluſh and be aſhamed: vnder whoſe gouernment all military diſcipline, and the glory of Hungary, might wel be thought to be vtterly loſt. And he ſaid there remained of the nobility of Hungary men honourably deſcended of moſt antient Houſes, worthy of the kingdome, who bare noble minds, and were of ſufficient courage, diſcretion and power, in this time of common heauines, to reſtore the honor of the Eſtate, and worthily to defend the Kingdome. Amongſt whom (ſaid he) I would not be accounted ſo baſe minded, or ſo heauy headed, (although there be many which for the honor of their houſes and wealth may ſeem to go be- K fore me) that I will therfore confeſſe, that there is any of them for valour, proweſſe, or fortune, better than my ſelf, either for conducting an army, or gouernment of a Kingdom. For I ſhall be a King of courage and valour ſufficient, if by your fauourable good will I ſhall bee thought worthy of your conſent and ſuffrages. The Vayuod taking this courſe, by his erneſt ſuit and labor had won the good wils of many; and ſo much the eaſier, for that Stephanus Bator (a man of greateſt nobility among the Hungarians) was a little before gon into Bohemia vnto King Ferdinand, who was then greatly buſied, by reaſon of a parliament there ſummoned, in procuring the fauour of the Nobility and commons of that Realme, againſt the time of the Parliament; wherein hee was in good hope to be choſen King, as hee was in ſhort time after. L

King Lewis buried.

At the ſame time the Hungarians were with great ſolemnity celebrating the funerall of their late King: whoſe dead body after the departure of Solyman from Buda, was found whole, by the demonſtration of one Cotriſcus a ſquire of his body, who was preſent when he was drowned; and ſo was brought out of the fens of Mohatez, to Alba Regalis, where it was with great pomp buried among the Sepulchres of the other kings of Hungary his predeceſſors. Which ſolemne funerall once ended, the generall military Parliament (by the authority and voyce wherof the Kings of Hungary were by their antient Lawes and Cuſtomes to be choſen) was called: in the ſhutting vp whereof, John the Vayuod hauing in that common heauines no competitor, nor any of the greateſt nobility which durſt ſtand againſt him, was with the great ap- M plauſe, and a generall conſent of all there preſent, choſen King. Vnto whom forthwith Petrus Perennus came and preſented the antient Crown of the Kingdome of Hungary, which was in his keeping, made after an homely faſhion of pure gold; with which the lawfull Kings of Hungary vſed alwaies to be ſolemnly crowned. It is reported, that it was the Crowne of Stephanus the firſt King of Hungary, and was by an antient Cuſtom alwaies kept in the caſtle

of

Iohn Sepuſius the Vayuod choſen and crowned King of Hungary.

A of Vicegrade. And ſo Iohn the Vayuod was orderly crowned, and conſecrated by the hands of Paulus Biſhop of Strigonium, lately choſe in ſtead of Ladiſlaus Salcanius, ſlaine in the battell at Mugace, and by the hands of Stephanus Brodaricus Biſhop of Vacia, whom he choſe for his Secretary. And vnto Americus Cibacus he gaue the honour of the Vayuod of Tranſyluania, being but a little before choſen Biſhop of Veradium. In his preferment, he was greatly hol-pen vnto the kingdome by the nobility which followed him out of Tranſyluania, men of great account both in peace and warre: among whom deſcended of the Hungarian bloud, were chiefe, Stephanus Verbetius, Paulus Autandrus, Gregorius Peſchenius, Nicholaus Gleſſa, and Ianus Docia. But whileſt this new King is in this ſort buſied in rewarding his friends, and ſtrengthening himſelfe in his kingdome, he was aduertiſed that Ferdinand his competitor of the Hun-B garian kingdome was choſen King of Bohemia: who out of the old courteſie betwixt Mat- thias Coruinus and Fredericus the Emperours great grandfather, alledged great claime vnto Ferdinand king of Bohemia layeth claime to the kingdome of Hungary.

that kingdome, deriued from the time of Ladiſlaus, who was reported to haue beene poiſoned at the time of the ſolemnization of his marriage, through the ambition and malice of Georgius Pogibracius; who, affecting the kingdome of Bohemia, ſhortly after obtained the ſame. And now it ſeemed that the time was come, wherein Ferdinand made greater with the kingdome of Bohemia, and ſtrengthened with the power of his brother Charles the Emperour, not forgetting his right, might vpon good ground lay claime vnto the kingdome of Hungary, vnto him (as he pretended) of right belonging euer ſince the time of Albertus the Emperour.
Neither did Ferdinand beſide the ſtrength of Auſtria and Bohemia, want the furtherance of di-C uers of the Princes of Hungary: hauing in his court many of vnquiet ſpirits, halfe fugitiues, deſirous of change, which enuied at the Vayuods royall preferment (as if it had beene taken from themſelues, more worthy thereof than he) by the raſh and tumultuous fauour of the vulgar people. For beſides Bator, who in moſt mens iudgement might moſt worthily haue requited and obtained the kingdome, there were others alſo almoſt of like nobility and valour, as Valentinus Turaccus, Stephanus Maylatus, Ianus Scala, Gaſper Stredius, Baltaſor Pamphilus, and Feren- tius Gnarius; to whom alſo was ioyned Paulus Bachitius borne in Seruia, a valiant Gentleman, who being entered into the Mahometan religion to auoid the Turkiſh ſlauery, got away vnto the Chriſtians, and hardly eſcaped from the battell of Mohatchz. By the perſuaſion of theſe noblemen, Ferdinand of his own diſpoſition ready enough to claime his right, eſpecial-D ly a kingdome, and truſting vnto his ſtrength in Auſtria, Bohemia, Rhetia, Stiria, and Carynthia, marched directly towards Buda. With whoſe comming, Iohn the new King being wonderfully troubled, as a man beſet with want of all things, hauing neither ſufficient ſtrength whereupon to reſt in his new got kingdome, neither any great aſſurance of the fidelity of his ſubiects, like enough either for feare, or of their naturall inconſtancy, to fall from him, determined not to abide the comming of his enemy to Buda: but exhorting his captaines to follow him, although he were glad to depart and giue place to his euill fortune for a time, with ſuch power as he had brought with him out of Tranſyluania, and ſuch other as he could otherwiſe leuy, he paſſed ouer the riuer to Peſtum: and not daring any where thereabouts to reſt, by long marches paſſed ouer the riuer Tibiſcus, and there incamped at Tocai, which was a ching on, obtained Buda without reſiſtance: where he ſtaied a while, and conſulted with his captaines, Whether he ſhould purſue his flying enemy, or not. But it was quickly reſolued, That the diſcouraged enemy was to be ſpeedily purſued, before he ſhould gather greater ſtrength, or enter into greater policies. Wherefore Ferdinand committed all his army vnto the nobility of Hungary, his friends, whom we haue before named; who marching with all ſpeed poſſible, came to the riuer Tibiſcus: where paſſing ouer vpon a bridge made of boats which they brought with them in waggons for that purpoſe, they came with enſignes diſplaied vnto the caſtle of Tocai, where the King lay with his army in order of battell. But terrified with the ſudden comming of his enemies, and debating with his captaines of the greatneſſe of the F danger, tooke a courſe vnto himſelfe rather ſafe than honourable: for his captaines deſiring nothing more than to ioyne battell, and in manner contemning their enemies, perſuaded him to withdraw himſelfe a little out of the battell, and to keepe him out of danger; and if things fell out otherwiſe than well, to reſerue himſelfe vnto his better fortunes: as for themſelues they would moſt reſolutely fight againſt thoſe traiterous fugitiues, foraſmuch as it were great diſhonour for them, being Hungarians, a warlike people by nature, to refuſe battell being offered by the enemy. Amongſt the chieftains of the Kings army, Ferentius Budo an old captaine of great experience and courage was chiefe, to whom the King deliuered his enſigne with his own hands, and he with great skill ordered his battell, for the number of his ſouldiers: he himſelfe ſtood in the main battell with the Hungarians, placing the Tranſyluanians in the wings. In Ferdinands army, Valentinus Turaccus led the maine battell with the Hungarians, vnder Ferdinands Enſigne; ſtrengthened on the one ſide with troups of horſemen out of Styria, and on the other with the horſemen of Auſtria. But Paulus Bachitius (according to the manner of the Turkiſh wars, wherewith he was well acquainted) with a company of light horſemen lay cloſe in ambuſh in a conuenient place for that purpoſe, a good diſtance off, againſt the left wing of the enemies army, ready as occaſion ſhould ſerue, to take his moſt aduantage. It was not greatly needful for the captaines to vſe any perſuaſions to encourage their ſouldiers, ready enough of themſelues to fight. The great ordnance once diſcharged, the armies came faſt on and joyned battell, where the wings of both battels fought with diuers fortune. The Styrian horſemen were not able to endure the force of the Tranſyluanians, but were put to the worſe. And on the other ſide, the left wing of Bodo his army, conſiſting for moſt part of raw and vnexpert ſouldiers, was by the horſemen of Auſtria ouerthrown. At the ſame time both the main battels (being almoſt all Hungarians) fought with equall courage, and that ſo eagerly, as ſeldome had bin ſeene a more fierce or cruell battell. But by a freſh charge giuen by Ferdinands horſemen, who had now put to flight the right wing of Bodo his battell, all Bodo his army fighting moſt valiantly, was diſordred and put to flight: Bodo the Generall laboring to reſtore the battell, and to ſaue the enſigne to him before by the King deliuered, was by the comming in of Paulus Bachitius with his light horſemen, taken. The other captaines ſeeing all loſt, and paſt hope of recouery, betooke themſelues to flight: all the Kings Artillery and Enſignes were taken by the enemy. The King ſeeing the ouerthrow of his army, for ſafegard of his life fled into Polonia. Ferdinands captaines following the courſe of the victory, entred into Tranſyluania; where the people yeelding themſelues at the firſt, all the whole prouince ſubmitted it ſelfe vnto the authority of Ferdinand. Bodo and the reſt of the noblemen that were taken priſoners, with the enſignes taken from the enemies, were ſent to Ferdinand. But when Bodo hauing his liberty promiſed, could not be perſuaded to renounce his oath giuen to King Iohn, and to beare armes againſt him, he was by Ferdinands commandement caſt into a darke dungeon, where ſhortly after conſumed with ſorrow and griefe, he miſerably ended his life.

The battell of Tocai between the Armies of King Iohn and K. Ferdinand.

K. John flies into Polonia.

Shortly after, Ferdinand (the Hungarians generally ſubmitting themſelues vnto him) was by their common conſent ſaluted King, and crowned with the ſame old Crowne wherewith King Iohn had bin crowned, which the ſame Perenus (a man of little conſtancy) brought vnto him; and with him was alſo crowned Anne his wife, the only ſiſter of the late King Lewis. All which ſolemne ceremonies were celebrated at Alba-Regalis, the vſuall place for the coronation of the Hungarian Kings. Ferdinand by rare felicity thus poſſeſſed of two kingdomes, whereunto he was not borne, returned into Bohemia, and left his deputies for the gouernement of the kingdome of Hungary: theſe were Stephanus Bator, whom he appointed Viceroy, with whom he joined Paulus Biſhop of Strigonium, who had alſo reuolted from K. Iohn; and made Berethſaxtus Secretary, and Alexius Turſonus a Moravian, Treaſurer.

Ferdinand crowned K. of Hungary at Alba Regalis.

King Iohn thus miſerably diſtreſſed, and thruſt out of his kingdome by Ferdinand, fled to Hieronymus Laſcus, a man for his honorable deſcent and learned vertue, of great fame and reputation amongſt the Polonians: who glad of ſo honourable a gheſt, was more carefull of nothing, than with all poſſible kindneſſe and curteſie how to comfort him, wrapt vp in ſo many calamities for the loſſe of his kingdom: he frankely promiſed vnto him all his owne wealth (which was not ſmall) for the recouery of his former eſtate; and that which more was, for the renuing of his former felicitie, the vttermoſt of his wit and deuice, which in the compaſſing of all great matters was accounted wonderfull. This bountiful entertainment of this poore King by Laſcus, was not altogether vpleaſant to Sigiſmund King of Polonia, although (becauſe he would not offend Ferdinand, with whom he was joined in friendſhip and allyance) hee ſeemed to moſt men plainly to forget himſelf, in ſhewing ſo ſmall kindneſſe to K. Iohn, whoſe ſiſter Barbara he had ſomtime maried: which was the cauſe that Laſcus forgat no point of curteſie in entertaining his gheſt, and yet Sigiſmunds credit with King Ferdinand not toucht. But when

A when they had ſpent almoſt a month in conſultation and debating of matters too & fro, Laſcus accuſtomed with his deep wit ſharply to reaſon, & aduiſedly to determine of moſt weighty cauſes, at laſt reſted vpon this one point, That ready help in ſo hard and deſperat a caſe was only to be hoped for of the Turkiſh Emperor Solyman: being of opinion, that he being a moſt mighty Prince, and of an honorable diſpoſition anſwerable to his greatnes, would not reiect the humble prayers of an oppreſſed and exiled king: eſpecially, if that being by his mercy and power reſtored, he could be content for ſo great a benefit to hold his kingdom, as of the bounty of the Othoman kings. For Laſcus ſaw that Solyman (ſo great and proud an Emperor) was not ſo deſirous of kingdomes (whereof he had ſo many as could not eaſily be reckoned, then commanding ouer a great part of the world) as of glory and renown, wherewith he vnderſtood him B to be wonderfully delighted aboue all other Kings of the Eaſt, naturally carried away with that windy vanity. This counſell (as in effect it prooued) was to king Iohn wholeſome and reaſonable, if a man do but reſpect the poore eſtate of a king, ſo greatly wronged, liuing in exile; but reſpecting the Chriſtian common weale, it was vndoubtedly moſt dangerous and lamentable, for one mans particular profit to bring the whole ſtate into moſt horrible and dreadfull danger: but the ſick minds of worldly men, liuing in ſmal hope of doing well, and at the point of deſperation, refuſe no worldly remedies, be they neuer ſo doubtfull or dangerous. And not long after, vpon this reſolution with the king, Laſcus deſirous by noble actions to increaſe the honour of his name, took the matter vpon him, and went as Embaſſador from the exiled King to Solyman to Conſtantinople. The report was, that Sigiſmund did not only not ſtay him, but C ſecretly gaue him his ſafe conduct with letters of credence, wherin he commended him vnto the Baſſa's & other great men in Solymans court, deſcended of the Polonian bloud, as his faithfull and louing ſubiect, ſent thither vpon an extraordinary and ſpeciall embaſſage. Laſcus as ſoon as he was come to Conſtantinople, with wonderfull dexterity had in ſhort time won the fauor, not of the Baſſaes only, but of the other courtiers alſo; preſenting them with ſuch gifts as might for the fineneſſe and rarenes thereof, rather than for the value (as he thought) be moſt acceptable and pleaſing to their wiues: for amongſt that barbarous and corrupted people nothing is better welcome than gifts, whither they proceed of ſimple good wil, or other reſpect, is no great difference. Amongſt the great Baſſa's at that time of greateſt power and authority, was Luſtebeius, or rather Lutz[illegible], who had married Solymans ſiſter; and Abraham borne at Parga, D a baſe village in Acarnania, brought vp in the court from his childhood with Solyman: he was then viſier or chiefe of the Baſſaes, and keeper of the Emperors ſeale, and was by his office to ſubſcribe all ſuch grants or letters as paſſed from the Emperor: by which his great place and the ſpeciall fauor he had with Solyman, he in magnificence, power, and authority, far exceeded all the reſt of the Baſſaes, doing whatſoeuer pleaſed himſelfe; and that with ſuch ſoueraigntie and the good liking of Solyman, that it was commonly ſaid, he was the commander of his thoughts. Laſcus thus inſinuated into the court, and oftentimes talking with the Baſſa's without an interpreter, for that he could well ſpeake the Sclauonian tongue (the familiar ſpeech of the Turkiſh courtiers) earneſtly ſolicited the Kings cauſe, wonderfully commending him: for at his firſt comming, after he had ſaluted Solyman, and was about to haue declared the cauſe E of his comming, he was after the manner of the Turkiſh Court referred to the Baſſaes: for Solyman vſed not to admit any Chriſtian to talke with him in his Court. Laſcus requeſted of Solyman, by the Baſſa's, That king Iohn wrongfully thruſt out of his kingdom by Ferdinand Duke of Auſtria, and the treaſon of certaine of the Hungarians, might by the Turkiſh power be againe reſtored vnto the Kingdome of Hungary, which he would hold by homage of the Turkiſh Emperor, as of right belonging to him, ſince the time that Solyman with victorious hand reuenging his wrongs and ſubduing his enemies, had by law of arms (fortune ſo iudging) gained the ſame. Promiſing that King Iohn, who for his worthineſſe, was by the generall good liking of the Hungarians lawfully choſen to be their King, and ſo after the antient manner of that Kingdome crowned; if he were now receiued into Solymans protection, and by him reſtored, F ſhould neuer forget ſo great a benefit, but alwaies moſt faithfully and thankfully to honor the maieſty of Solyman, paying him ſuch yerely tribute as it ſhould pleaſe him to impoſe, and to make it knowne to all men, that he was his vaſſall. Which thing if it would pleaſe him to grant, it ſhould be no leſſe honour and glory to Solyman himſelfe, than profitable and comfortable vnto the diſtreſſed King. For beſide, that heroicall Kings are compared vnto gods, rather for giuing than receiuing: it was eaſie to be ſeen, how greatly it did concern the profit of the Othoman Kings to be neighboured with a weak and tributary King, rather than with Ferdinand a Prince of great power, lately choſen King of Bohemia, ſupported by the ſtrength of his brother Charles the Emperor, commanding ouer the warlike Nation of the Germanes: which was as much difference as was betwixt the maintenance of a continual heauy war vpon his borders, and the ſafe injoying of a moſt aſſured peace. Beſides, it concerned the Turkes to beware, that ſuch things as they had gotten by the ſword, they ſhould alſo by the ſword defend, and not to ſuffer any one to grow greater than the reſt in riches and power. For it might ſo fal out that Charls, grown to be a Prince of mighty power, might draw the reſt of the Chriſtian princes to join with him in the common cauſe of the Chriſtian religion, & in that quarrel, as the Chriſtian Kings of Europ had formerly done, with vnited forces to ſeek to recouer again what they had before loſt; whoſe force it would be hard to withſtand. Theſe things being ſharply deliuered, and by the Baſſa's again reported to Solyman, who ſtanding at a ſecret window had before heard them, as they were by Laſcus to the Baſſa's declared; it was no great labor to perſuade the Turkiſh Emperor, of himſelf deſirous of glory and ſoueraignty, againe to vndertake the Hungarian war, and to grant King Iohn his requeſt; promiſing according to the ſucces of the victory, to giue him that he deſired, ſo that hee would faithfully performe what he had promiſed, and not ſhew himſelf therfore vnthankful.

Solyman granteth Laſcus his requeſt.

Ferdinand ſendeth an embaſſador to Solyman.

Solymans anſwer to Ferdinands Embaſſador.

In the mean time, Ferdinand vpon great reaſon thinking it neceſſarie by all means poſſible to confirm his poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Hungary, and fearing no force but the Turks, determined to proue Solymans diſpoſition, and to ſeek for his friendſhip; hoping by reaſonable means to compaſſe it, by ſhewing vnto the barbarous prince (not altogether abhorring from the commendation of juſtice) his antient title and claim, and that he was by the antient laws of the country right heir thereof: thinking that Solyman, hauing obtained ſo many victories, and ruling ouer ſo many kingdoms, would now at length giue himſelf to peace, as a man contented with his glory already gotten. His deſire was to be receiued into his friendſhip, and to join with him in league vpon the ſame conditions which Ladiſlaus and his ſon Lewis had for certain years before obtained of the Othoman Kings, and Sigiſmund King of Polonia then alſo with like quietnes enjoied. Wherfore hauing found out a fit man whom he might ſend vpon this embaſſage to Conſtantinople (one Ioannes Oberdanſcus an Hungarian) he furniſhed him accordingly, and gaue him gifts, ſuch as he thought good to beſtow vpon the great Baſſa's. But when Oberdanſcus was come vnto Conſtantinople, he found Solyman harder to be intreated than he had before hoped, and the Baſſa's altogether vnwilling to hear of any league: for although he was courteouſly receiued of Solyman, and moſt patiently heard, whileſt hee both eloquently and diſcreetly before the great Baſſa's deliuered his embaſſage; yet in the ſhutting vp of all, he receiued nothing but a proud and inſolent anſwer. For Solyman ſaid, it was far from the manner of his Aunceſtors, to receiue them into grace and fauour, which had don injury vnto the Othoman name: wherefore that Ferdinand had done impudently to inuade another mans kingdom, and to thinke to hold it vnto himſelfe; forſomuch as his old title and claim which he ſtood ſo much vpon, was altogether extinguiſhed and loſt by the Law of Armes, by his late victory againſt King Lewis. For which cauſes he adiudged him vnworthy of his friendſhip and fauor; purpoſing ſharply to reuenge the wrong he had receiued, & proclaiming War, to come again into Hungary with ſuch a power as ſhould be ſufficient to inuade King Ferdinand either in Auſtria or Germany. Wherefore in ſtead of friendſhip and League, he denounced vnto him all the calamities of War: and ſo commaunded the Embaſſador with ſpeed to depart from Conſtantinople. But Oberdanſcus when he was come backe again as far as Vienna, and had there told the Kings Lieutenants of the threatening words of Solyman, and that he would ſhortly come thither with his army; he was not of any of them beleeued, but reputed for a vaine man. Wherſore to ſhun the hatred of them which miſtooke truth for falſhood, he made haſt to come vnto Ferdinand, who was then at Spires laboring for voices to further his ſuit; for that at the next aſſembly of the States of the Empire, which was then at hand for the coronation of his brother Charles, he himſelf as he wel hoped, was to be choſen King of the Romanes. The newes brought by Oberdanſcus did not a little trouble King Ferdinand, foreſeeing as it were what would happen; for that the Turkiſh Tyrant vſed not lightly to break ſuch promiſes, but to performe them to the vttermoſt. And that more Solyman commeth into Hungary with a great army.

King Iohn commeth to Solyman at Belgrade.

A increaſed his care, he knew he ſhould come in euill time to craue help of the Germans, for the defence of his Kingdome in Hungary, againſt ſo mighty an enemy, eſpecially his brother Charles the Emperor being buſied in his warres in Italy, and he himſelfe wanting money, the only meanes to raiſe an army to withſtand the Turke. The Spring now come, and all things freſh and green, Solyman altering nothing of his former determination, hauing leuied an army of an hundred and fifteen thouſand men, ſet forward from Hadrianople, his Europeian horſemen going before him, conducted by Abraham the great Baſſa, and Achomates Michael Ogli, Generall of the Acanzij or voluntary horſemen: and his Aſian ſouldiers led by Becrambeius Baſſa following after him: he himſelfe with his Ianizaries and ſouldiers of the court keeping in the middle. And marching on in this ſort, came in fifteene dayes to Belgrade, where King B Iohn accompanied with Laſcus and ſuch of the Hungarian nobility as tooke his part, came vnto him, of purpoſe to make himſelfe knowne vnto him which was to protect him; and doing him all the honour he poſſibly could, to requeſt him to proceed to reuenge his quarrell. Solyman with graue and yet friendly countenance, raiſing himſelfe a little from the cuſhion wheron he ſat, gaue him his right hand, proteſting, That nothing could happen vnto him better, or that he more deſired of God, than to be able to relieue diſtreſſed Princes, eſpecially ſuch as were wrongfully oppreſſed by his enemies: wherefore he willed him to be of good comfort, promiſing of his bounty frankly to beſtow vpon him whatſoeuer he ſhould in that warre win with the ſword from the enemy. King Iohn obtained this rare fauor of Solyman by the earneſt mediation of Abraham the commanding Baſſa; whom he had before at Conſtantinople by C his Embaſſador Laſcus ſo woon with gifts and requeſts, that he throughly tooke vpon him the defence of the kings cauſe: wherein Laſcus was eſpecially holpen by Aloyſius Grittus the Duke of Venice his ſonne, who then followed the Turks campe, and was for his fathers ſake and the great ſufficiencie he held himſelfe, had in great reputation amongſt the Turks; and in ſuch fauor with Abraham, who did all in all with Solyman, that he could perſuade him to any thing he would. For this Aloyſius Grittus, borne and brought vp in Conſtantinople, and wonderfull eloquent in the Turkiſh tongue, had by the honourable carriage of himſelfe, and the great port he kept in his houſe, ſo throughly poſſeſſed Abraham (that al commanded) that he would many times bring Solyman himſelfe ouer the hauen to Pera, to ſolace himſelfe in Grittus his pleaſant gardens and banquetting houſes, which he had there moſt ſumptuouſly made after D the Italian manner: whereby to his great profit he obtained to be the chiefe man in receiuing of the Turks cuſtomes.

Solyman enters Buda without reſiſtance, and beſiegeth the Caſtle.

The fame of Solymans comming directly from Belgrade to Buda, ſo terrified the Citiſens of Buda, that they almoſt all forſooke the city and fled vnto other places further off, ſome to Strigonium, ſome to Alba Regalis, ſome to Poſſonium: ſo that at his firſt comming he entred the city (almoſt deſolate) without any reſiſtance: the caſtle holden by a garriſon of Germans, he commanded to be beſieged. The captaine of the caſtle was one Thomas Nadaſtus, a man of great account among the Hungarians, both for the honour of his houſe, and his qualities anſwerable to the ſame, graced with ſingular learning: he perceiuing his ſoldiers diſmayed with the ſight of ſo great an army, and willing to ſurrender vp the caſtle; as beſeemed a valiant cap- E tain, forbad his ſouldiers to haue any talke with the enemy, commanding the great artillery to be bent and diſcharged vpon the Turks: and ſeeing his ſoldiers ſlack and timorous reprooued them of cowardiſe & treaſon, threatning them with ſhamefull death if they did not hold out the ſiege to the vttermoſt, and ſhew themſelues valiant men both for the honor of their country, and of king Ferdinand, whoſe pay they receiued, and of whoſe bounty they were to expect rewards & preferments anſwerable to their deſerts. But they miſdoubting by the running too and fro of the Turks, that the caſtle was vndermined; and ſmelling, or at leaſtwiſe imagining themſelues to ſmell the ſent of the gunpowder, which they ſuppoſed to be in the mine, and doubting to be preſently blown vp, were ſtruck with ſuch a ſudden feare, that neither the feare of future puniſhment, neither the ſhame of ſo foule a fact, nor the reuerence of ſo worthy a F captaine could ſtay them, but that they would needs without further delay deliuer vp the caſtle: which when they could by no meanes perſuade the reſolute captain to conſent to, but that he ſtil with ſtern countenance exclaimed againſt their cowardiſe and treaſon, they leyd hands on him, and bound him hand and foot, and ſo preſently concluded with the enemy to yeeld to him the caſtle, ſo that they might in ſafety depart thence with bag and baggage: which their requeſt Solyman granted. But when the gariſon ſoldiers (in number about 700) were about to depart with their baggage toward Poſſonium, as was before agreed; and the Ianizaries comming into the caſtle, hauing looſed the captain, were about to let him go alſo; Solyman aduertiſed of the trechery of the garriſon ſoldiers, and of the fidelity of the captain; changing his mind, iudged ſuch villanous minded men vnworthy of his mercy, and in deteſtation of their perfidious dealing with their captain, gaue them all to his Ianizaries to be ſlain: but vnto the captain himſelf he offered honorable entertainment; which when he refuſed, Solyman curteouſly ſent him away: holpen therin by the commendation of king Iohn, although his ſiſter was maried to Stephanus Maylat his deadly enemy. Which bloudy execution don by the commandement of the bloudy tyrant, the Turkes ſaid was not only lawfully done, but alſo to the immortal glory of his name in the execution of juſtice. Which might peraduenture ſeeme reaſonable, if the perpetual hatred of that barbarous nation againſt the Chriſtians, gaue not iuſt occaſion to ſuſpect, that it proceeded rather of their antient malice, than of any regard of juſtice. For why ſhould the Germans, who had offended to his great good, and therefore obtained his ſafe conduct, be thought worthy of ſo cruel death? when as Solyman himſelf in puniſhing the perjury of another, ran into wilful perjury himſelf, peruerting the commendation of juſtice which he ſo much deſired, by his moſt bloudy and vniuſt ſentence.

Auſtria ſpoiled by the Turks.

Altenburg taken.

Solyman comes to Vienna.

Buda the chief city of Hungary thus taken by Solyman, he reſolued forthwith to beſiege Vienna the chief city of Auſtria; in good hope, that by the cariage away of that, the other Cities of leſſe ſtrength both of Hungary and Auſtria would without any reſiſtance yeeld vnto him. Wherfore he ſent before, Achomates with the voluntary horſmen, who according to the manner of the Turkiſh wars, running thorow the heart of Hungary, and entring into Auſtria, with fire and ſword, paſſed by Vienna, miſerably burning and deſtroying the Country before him, euen as far as Lyntz. The poor people not knowing where to hide themſelues from the fury of their enemies, nor of whom to craue helpe, fled as men and women diſmaied, carrying with them their beloued children, the vnfortunat pledges of their loue, and what els they could, as things ſaued out of the midſt of the fire. For whatſoeuer fel into the enemies hand, was loſt without recure: the old men were ſlain, the young men led away into captiuity, women rauiſhed before their husbands faces, and afterwards ſlain with their children, young infants were ript out of their mothers wombs, and others taken from their breſts were cut in pieces, or els thruſt vpon ſharpe ſtakes, yeelding vp againe that breath which they had but a little before receiued; with many other incredible cruelties which were then by the mercileſſe Enemie committed. Solyman himſelfe ſhortly after followed theſe fore-runners, and ſetting forward with all his army from Buda towards Vienna, by the way took the Caſtle of Altenburg, whether by force or compoſition is diuerſly reported. Of the garriſon ſouldiers there placed by King Ferdinand, he reſerued 300 Bohemians, whom he commanded to follow his camp. Hee alſo aſſaulted the little city of Neapolis ſeuen times in one day, & was as often repulſed: but being loth to ſpend any longer time about a town of ſo ſmall importance, hee forſooke that, and held on his way to Vienna, whither he came about the ſix and twentieth day of September, and incamped in fiue places round about the City; with ſuch a world of people, that vnto them which viewed his Camp from the higheſt tower in Vienna, it ſeemed that all the ground for the ſpace of eight miles was couered with the multitude of his Tents and people. King Ferdinand, who from the time that he had by his Embaſſadour Oberdanſcus receiued the hard anſwer from Solyman, alwaies ſtood in doubt of his comming; and beſide his own forces (which were no way great enough to oppoſe againſt ſo mighty an enemie) craued aid of the other Chriſtian Princes his Neighbours, eſpecially of the Princes of the Empire. Who granting him aid againſt the Common Enemy, appointed Fredericke County Palatine of the Rhyne and Duke of Bavaria, Generall of their Forces. But whileſt the Germans after their manner, ſlowly ſet forward, and made leſſe haſt than the greatneſſe of the preſent danger required; Solyman comming in the mean time, had ſo belayd the City, that it was not poſſible for the Duke Frederick by any means to get into it, but was glad to ſtay with his Army at Chremſe, about twelue miles from Vienna. A few dayes before, by good hap, vpon the report of the loſſe of Buda, twenty thouſand ſouldiers, horſmen and footmen out of diuers countries, were in good time come to Vienna. Amongſt theſe, the chiefe Commanders were Philip the Paltzgraue Duke Fredericks Nephew (a yong Gentleman of great courage & hope,

Vienna badly fortified.

A ſent thither but a little before with a few companies of horſemen and footmen by Fredericke his vncle, who was comming after with a greater power himſelfe, but was now ſhut out of the city by Solyman) Nicholaus County of Salma, the L. William Rogendorff, ſteward of the Kings houſhold, Ioannes Cazzianer, a noble man of Croatia, and afterwards Gouernor of Vienna: and next vnto them, Nicholaus Turrianus, Ioannes Hardecus, Leonardus Velſius, Hector Ramſacke, men both for their birth and valour of great account amongſt the Germans. The city of Vienna as it was of ſome good ſtrength toward the North, by reaſon of Danubius, ſo in other places it was at that time neither by art nor nature ſtrong. The ditches, ſuch as they were, were altogether drie, and eaſie to be paſſed ouer: the wals of bricke, built round without any flankers, and neither high nor thicke, but after the antient ſimple manner of fortification of cities: for before B that time neither had king Ferdinand, fearing no enemy, neither they of Vienna, who had not of many yeares ſeen an enemy, had any care to fortifie the city: but as men altogether buried in ſecurity, and nothing fearing the comming of ſo mighty an enemy (although they were therof before admoniſhed by Oberdanſcus) had not ſo much as caſt vp any rampire or bulwark, more than at the gate of Carinthia, whereon they might conueniently place their great ordnance: ſo that of a 200 great peeces, and 300 others of leſſe charge, which might haue wonderfully annoyed the enemy, a great part ſerued to no vſe, for want of conuenient place to mount them vpon. Yet as the ſudden comming of the enemy, and the ſhortneſſe of the time gaue leaue, ſuch bulwarkes as they could vpon the ſudden, they caſt vp, and planted their ordnance thereon. The city was diuided into diuers quarters, and to euery part a ſtrong garriſon C appointed for the defence thereof, all the gates of the city were mured vp, except ſuch as were of purpoſe reſerued to ſallie out at. Now had Abraham the great Baſſa incamped himſelfe vpon a high hill, where ſtood a ruinous caſtle, from whence he might ouerlooke all the City; yet ſo, as that he lay out of the danger of gun ſhot. Becrambeius, Solymans great commander in Aſia, lay at the gate called Purgatoria, neer the Church of S. Vlderich. In the third campe towards the riſing of the hils, lay Michael Ogli, towards the Church of S. Vitus. At the Scottiſh gate towards Danubius, lay the Aſapi, with diuers companies of the Ianizaries: which with ſhot out of their trenches, ſuffered no man to appeare vpon the wals in that quarter without moſt manifeſt danger, and poured ſuch ſhowrs of arrows ouer the wals into the city, as if they had fallen out of the clouds; that hardly could any man ſtir in the city vnarmed, but hee was D forthwith wounded. Solyman himſelfe lay neer vnto S. Markes Church, compaſſed about with the Ianizaries and other ſoldiers of the Court, defended alſo with the bricke wals of the gardens thereabouts. Whileſt the Turks were thus incamping themſelues, the Chriſtian defendants oftentimes fortunatly ſallyed out vpon them, and ſlew many of them. In one of which ſallies Wolfgangus Hagen a valiant captain, with certain old ſoldiers of the Spaniards was ſlain fighting moſt valiantly at the gates of the caſtle: and in another skirmiſh Chriſtophorus Setlitz a man of great courage, ſallying out of the city with fiue hundred horſemen, euen vnto the enemies trenches, was intercepted and taken with ſix others of his company; who were al compelled by the Turks to carry ſo many heads of their ſlain fellows vpon poles, and ſo preſented vnto Solyman: of whom he inquired many things as well concerning Ferdinand himſelfe, and E where he was, as concerning the Princes which had the charge of the city, whether they were in hope to defend the ſame againſt his mighty power or not. Whereunto Chriſtophorus aptly and wiſely anſwered, although not altogether ſo truly, That King Ferdinand lay not farre off at the city of Lintz, expecting the aſſembling of a great army: and that the Princes of Germany, Bohemia, Morauia, and of diuers other places were comming to him, with great aid; ſo that if he would but ſtay a little vntill his forces were come together, hee ſhould then ſee whether of them were of greater ſtrength and power: foraſmuch as it would not be long before the King would come and giue him battell: as for the Princes in the City, he ſaid hee knew no more of their minds, but that both they and all the ſoldiers from the higheſt to the loweſt, had ſolemnly ſworne to defend the city, and not to giue it ouer, vnto the laſt man, repoſing F their hope not in the wals and fortreſſes thereof, but in their weapons and valor, being men of great reſolution, and not eaſily to be vanquiſhed or diſcouraged. With which anſwer although Solyman was a little mooued, yet diſſembling his preſent heat, ſaid, he had hitherto made war againſt diuers nations, and alwaies had the victory, whereof he doubted not now alſo: but as for him, and the others taken with him, they knew they were in his power to Solyman releaſeth the Chriſtian Princes without ranſome.

ſaue or kill at his pleaſure:yet to make them know that he could ſhew mercy vnto his vanquiſhed enemies,he frankly granted them their liues and liberty : charging them,that after they were again returned into the city,they ſhould in his name wiſh the defendants of themſelues to yeeld vp the city, which it was impoſſible for them long to defend againſt his mighty power, which neither the ſtrong city of Belgrade, nor the famous city of the Rhodes were able to withſtand;and to accept of ſuch reaſonable conditions as he ſhould grant vnto them;promiſing,that amongſt other things proceeding of his infinit bounty,he would take order, that they ſhould in ſafety depart thence with bag and baggage : in which doing, they ſhould well prouide for the ſafety of themſelues and of their goods,by flying to his mercy in time, before the fury of the war was grown to further extremitie : all which it would be too late to expect after the victory, when nothing was to be hoped for but cruell death, murther, and miſerable deſtruction. Wherefore it were good for them well to conſider of the matter,and not fooliſhly to refuſe that was now frankly offred them of mercy,which they ſhould not afterwards obtaine with any prayers or teares : for why,he was reſolutely ſet down (as he ſaid)not to depart thence before he had taken the city. When he had thus ſchooled them, he gaue to euery one of them three Hungarian duckats,and ſo ſent them away. They being receiued into the city with great ioy,made relation vnto the Princes and great Captaines, of all the threatning and proud ſpeeches of the Turkiſh tyrant:which they took in ſuch diſdaine, that they would not vouchſafe to returne him any anſwer.Solyman not a little diſpleaſed,that his great words were ſo lightly regarded, by way of deriſion ſent word to the City, That if they wanted helpe, he would ſend them the 300 Bohemians, whom he took in the caſtle of Altenburg:to whom anſwer was returned by them of the city,that they needed no help from him, wherfore he might diſpoſe of his priſoners as he thought good.By this, Solyman perceiued, that Vienna was not to be woon with words, nor the defendants to be diſcouraged with great looks ; wherefore he began to vſe his force,and with ſuch ordnance as he had brought with him,to batter the wals: which becauſe it was not great, but fitter for ſeruice in field than for battery, did not much more harme than to beat downe the battlements and ſuch like ſtandings, made of timber and boords in manner of galleries, hanging here and there ouer the wall, for the ſmall ſhot to play out of,a ſimple deuiſe in ſtead of flankers. His great artillery prouided for battery was comming vp the riuer of Danubius,which he daily looked for;but by good hap Wolfgangus Hoder, a forward Captain, hearing of the Turks comming vp the riuer, went out of Poſſonium with certain ſmal veſſels well appointed,and meeting with the Turks,ſet vpon them with ſuch courage and reſolution that he ſlew many of them, and ſunke diuers of their boats and pinnaces, amongſt whom were they which were bringing vp Solymans great pieces for battery to Vienna:which was there all ſunke in the riuer,with the boats that brought it. By this good ſeruice, Solyman was diſappointed of his great artillery, and the city deliuered of a great danger. So Wolfgangus hauing made great ſpoile amongſt the Turks, and loſt ſome few men, returned with victory to Poſſonium. Yet another part of the Turks fleet comming vp to Vienna,at the firſt comming brake downe all the bridges : for a little aboue the city,the riuer of Danubius diuiding his channell, maketh diuers Iſlands, which by ſundry bridges are ioyned together, ouer which lieth the way from Auſtria vnto the city. This fleet ſo kept the paſſage, that no man could without danger either by water or by land go in or out of the city.Solyman hauing loſt all his pieces for battery, and ſeeing how little he preuailed with his field pieces, fell to vndermining of the city, hoping by that means to ouerthrow the wals, and to make a way for his men to enter. This worke,as the Turks chiefe hope, was with wonderfull labour and diligence attempted in fifteene ſundry places : which was not ſo ſecretly done, but that it was by drums laid vpon the ground,by baſons filled with water, and ſounds made into the earth perceiued by the defendants;and ſo with countermines met withal,that moſt part of thoſe works were vtterly fruſtrated,and in them 8000 of his Turks either ſlaine or buried quicke.

Eight thouſand Turks loſt in the Mines.

Solyman to buſie the defendants,that they ſhould not ſo perfectly diſcouer his mines,diuided his army into foure parts,appointing them orderly to ſucceed one after another in giuing alarums in the town,that filling their ears with continuall noiſe, he might keep them alwaies occupied. In the midſt of which hurly burly his mine-workes went forward with all ſpeed poſſible,neither was he in that his expectation deceiued:for one of the mines brought to perfection vnperceiued by the defendants,and ſuddenly blown vp, ſhooke and ouerthrew a great part of the wall neere vnto the gate which leadeth towards Carinthia, whereat the Turkes gaue a great ſhout, as if the city had now bin taken, and withal couragiouſly ſtepping forward, preſſed in on all ſides, by the ruines of the wall to haue entered the breach, charging the defendants with their ſmall ſhot and Turky arrowes as thicke as haile. Who on the contrary part like reſolute men ſtood in the face of the breach, with more aſſurance than the wall it ſelfe, receiuing them with deadly ſhot and puſh of pike, in ſuch furious manner, that the Turks for all their multitude, vnable longer to maintaine the aſſault, began to retyre. Which thing Solyman perceiuing, ſent in new ſupplies, and ſo renewed the aſſault before giuen ouer, but with no better ſucceſſe than before; for hauing receiued a great ouerthrow, as men forgetting both duty and martiall diſcipline, they retired, not expecting any ſigne of retreat. At this aſſault ſo many of the Turks were ſlaine, that the ground neere vnto the towne lay couered, and the ditches filled with their dead bodies. Nothing after the wall was blowne vp in two places more, one againſt S. Clares Church, by which breach being not very great, the Turks ſeeking to haue entred, made a bloudy fight with the Germans which defended that place; which they ſought ſo deſperatly to haue entred, that without regard they thruſt one another vpon the points of their enemies weapons; who gliſtering in good armour, readily receiued them being for moſt part naked men, and ſlew them without number, and ſo inforced them againe diſorderly to retyre, hauing before filled both the breaches with their dead carkaſes. Three daies after enſued a moſt cruell fight, when as another part of the wall (neere vnto the gate of Carinthia, and not far from the firſt breach) was ſo ſuddenly ouerthrowne, that the Turkes thorow the new made breach ſeeing the Christians as they ſtood ready to come to the defence thereof; and likewiſe the Chriſtians them, now approching; for eagerneſſe and haſt on both ſides threw away their pieces and bowes, and came to handy blowes in the middle of the breach, the Turks with their ſcimiters, and the Germans with their long ſwords. At which time, as the Chriſtian captaines encouraged their ſoldiers with cheerefull perſuaſions; ſo the Turkiſh commanders enforced forward their Turks both with words and wounds. The aſſault began ſo terrible, that it was thought a more fierce and cruell fight was neuer ſeene from the beginning of the World; which was with great reſolution maintained by the Turks, for that many of their moſt valiant horſemen forſaking their horſes, thruſt in with their targuets and ſcimiters, or elſe with the launces amongſt the Ianizaries and other footmen, and there fought moſt deſperatly. At laſt, after this furious fight had endured by the ſpace of three houres, and many of the Turks beſt captains and ſouldiers lay dead vpon the ground by heapes; the Turks ſeeing no hope to preuaile, gaue ouer the aſſault, and retyred to their campe.

The Turkes repulſed from the breach.

A moſt terrible aſſault.

The Turks the third time repulſed.

Long and tedious it were to recount euery aſſault giuen during the time of that dreadfull ſiege, with euery particular accident not vnworthy the remembrance, which for breuity wittingly I paſſe ouer. Yet amongſt the reſt, the moſt valiant leader (though afterward vnfortunat) the Lord William Rogendorffe is not to be forgotten, who oftentimes perceiuing many of the Turks ſtragling diſorderly abroad in the country, one day vpon the ſudden ſallied out vpon them with certain troups of horſemen, with ſuch violence, that at the firſt onſet he ouerthrew them, and hauing them in chaſe, did ſuch ſpeedy execution, that of 5300 ſcarce 140 eſcaped his hands: after which time his name became terrible vnto the Turks. Solyman was exceedingly grieued with the often and bloudy aſſaults by him in vaine giuen to the city; but purpoſing now to proue the laſt and vtmoſt of all his forces, he called to him the chiefe Commanders of his army, whom at the firſt he ſharpely reproued as men of no courage, which being many times as good as poſſeſſed of the victory, had moſt cowardly, contrary to the manner of that victorious nation, turned their backes vpon their enemies, in the breaches already halfe woon: wherefore he willed them to plucke vp their hearts, and to make all things ready for a new aſſault, wherein he expected that they ſhould with couragious forwardneſſe and reſolution, recompence their late cowardiſe: for why, he accounted it a great diſhonor to forſake the ſiege begun; wherefore they ſhould reſolue the next day as victorious conquerors to take the city, or elſe there as faint hearted cowards to end their daies. The next day after this heauy charge giuen, which was the fifteenth of October, the great commanders of the Turks army with all their forces aſſailed the city, thruſting their men into the breaches by heaps, as if they would, if no way elſe, yet with very multitude (if it had been poſſible) haue diſcouraged or ouerborne the Chriſtians: they were come to handy blowes, and the fight was in euery place moſt terrible, ble, the Chriſtian defendants ſtill repulſing them with greater courage than they were able to G aſſaile them. Beſides that, to the great aduantage of the defendants, many pieces of their great ordnance skilfully mounted in places moſt conuenient, and continually diſcharged among the thickeſt of their enemies as they preſſed on, made of them ſuch ſlaughter, and ſo cut them off, that being thorowly diſcouraged they ſhrunk backe, and could not by any threats or command of their captaines be thruſt forward; chuſing rather to be ſlaine of their owne captaines (as ſome of them were) than to be rent in ſunder with the murthering ſhot of the Chriſtians. So that the captaines ſeeing now no other remedy, gaue ouer the aſſault and retired, leauing behind them many thouſands of their dead Turks in the towne ditches.

The next day after this aſſault, Solyman deſpairing to win the city, and fearing the comming of King Ferdinand and the County Palatine with a ſtrong army, as it had been to him reported, H conſidering alſo that Winter was now comming faſt on, determined to raiſe his ſiege and to colour the diſhonour thereof, he ſent certaine of the chiefe priſoners which he had taken, richly apparelled, with their purſes full of money, into the city, to tell the captaines, that he came not with purpoſe either to beſiege or take the city, but to reuenge the wrongs done vnto him by his enemy King Ferdinand, and to haue fought a battell with him for the kingdome of Hungary: whom foraſmuch as he could not draw vnto Vienna, he would remoue thence to ſeeke for him, as his capitall enemy; wherefore they ſhould doe well to yeeld themſelues; which if they would, he promiſed not to enter their city, but to receiue both the citiſens and ſoldiers into his protection, reſeruing vnto them their liues and goods, with perpetuall freedome. Which his offer the defendants ſcornfully refuſed, as proceeding of meere deſparation. I The next night following, Solyman with more than barbarous cruelty cauſed all the priſoners in his army to be ſlaine; which pittifull outcries was of the ſouldiers heard into the city, not knowing what the matter ſhould be, vntill that the next day after the departure of the enemy, they found the dead bodies of men, women, and children in all places of the campe wallowed in their owne bloud, a moſt lamentable ſpectacle to behold. Solyman purpoſing to forſake the ſiege, cauſed Abraham the great Baſſa to ſhew himſelfe in order of battell, as if he would haue giuen a freſh aſſault: in the meane time he himſelfe roſe vpon the ſudden with the reſt of his army, and returned towards Buda in ſuch haſt, that he neither put any garriſon into ſuch places as he had taken, neither demanded of them any tribute. After whom the Baſſa followed, keeping himſelfe a daies journy behind him: and ſo in fiue daies he arriued with all his army K at Buda, 32 Germane miles from Vienna.

Solyman raiſeth his ſiege.

80000 Turkes loſt at the ſiege of Vienna.

Solyman reſtoreth the kingdome of Hungary to K. Iohn.

This ſiege was giuen ouer by Solyman about the ſixteenth of October, wherein he is reported to haue loſt eighty thouſand men, amongſt whom was his great Lieutenant of Aſia, with many other of his forward Captains and beſt ſoldiers. Of the defendants few or none of name were loſt; but of the country people it is ſuppoſed that there was aboue ſixty thouſand ſlaine and carried away into captiuity: all the country about Vienna was miſerably ſpoiled, all their trees and vines being by the Turks cut downe to the ground. Solyman according to his promiſe reſtored Buda to King Iohn; who by ſolemne writing acknowledged himſelfe his vaſſal, and to hold the kingdome of Hungary of him as his Lord and Soueraigne. Vnto him Solyman joyned Aloyſius Grittus as his Legat, to help him to prouide for ſuch things as ſhould be needfull L for the defence of that kingdome.

The honourable ſaying of Solyman to K. Iohn.

It hapned one day whileſt Solyman lay at Buda, and had giuen King Iohn with diuers of the nobility of Hungary acceſſe into his pauilion, that he fell earneſtly in hand with King Iohn, to pardon Paulus Biſhop of Strigonium, and Petrus Perenus (who had taken part with king Ferdinand) and to receiue them into his fauor again: which men king Iohn in no caſe liked of, becauſe that they as traitors vnto their Prince and country, forgetting their faith and oath, had performed the like duty to Ferdinand, as they had but a little before done vnto him at the time of his coronation: wherein he ſhewed himſelfe vnwilling to be intreated, ſaid, That their mutable minds fraught with infidelity, would neuer containe themſelues within the bounds of loyalty, but find occaſion to commit ſome fouler treaſon than they had before. Whereunto M Solyman ſtraining his voice a little, as one ſomewhat moued, moſt honourably replied, Can any thing (ſaid he) happen vnto thee in this life better or more honourable, than if by thy kindeneſſe thine enemies ſhall be of all men accounted ingratefull, that is to ſay, men noted with eternall infamy: when as in thy ſelfe the commendation of a good and courteous Prince ſhall for euer remaine? And ſo not long

A long after, fearing the cold of Winter then approching, dangerous for his beaſts for carriage, eſpecially his camels, bred and brought vp in the hot countries of Aſia; he ſet forward to Belgrade, and ſo trauelling through Thracia, returned to Conſtantinople.

All this while that Solyman thus raged in Hungary and Auſtria, Charles the Emperor lately reconciled to Clement the ſeuenth of that name, then Biſhop of Rome, with a ſtrong army beſieged Florence, by his lieutenant Daualus, (who might haue done much againſt the Turkes, if he had been ſo well imploied) labouring by all means to repreſſe the liberty of the citiſens, whereunto they had but a little before aſpired, and to bring them againe vnder the ſubjection of the family of Medices, whereof Clement was the chiefe. Which thing with much adoe he brought to paſſe, inueſting Alexander the Biſhops nephew in the Dukedome of Florence, B and afterward giuing him his baſe daughter in marriage; forgetting his brother Ferdinand in the meane time, thruſt out of the Kingdome of Hungary by Solyman, and the Dukedome of Auſtria waſted by the Turks, with the city of Vienna in danger to haue beene loſt. Which common calamities might well haue moued both the Emperour and the Biſhop, to haue had more regard of, than by oppreſſing the liberty of one free city, to ſeeke how to ſerue their own priuat reſpects.

The yeare following, which was 1530, Solyman with great ſolemnity and triumph, after the Turkiſh manner, circumciſed three of his ſonnes, Muſtapha, Muhamet, and Selymus, at Conſtantinople.

Solyman hardly diſgeſting the diſhonour he had before receiued at Vienna, and oftentimes C ſolicited by King Iohn, for aid againſt Ferdinand, who with greater ſtomacke than power ceaſed not continually to moleſt him: but moſt of all prickt forward with the inſatiable deſire of inlarging his Empire, after the manner of the Othoman Kings, accounting his neighbor princes alwaies his enemies, and their dominions the objects of his victories, and ſpoile for his ſouldiers; raiſed ſuch an army, as for the greatneſſe thereof might worthily haue bin a terror vnto the World: not ſo much purpoſing the protection of king Iohn, which he in ſhew moſt pretended; neither the ſiege of Vienna, as was commonly bruted, as the conquering of Auſtria, Carinthia, Croatia, Styria, and the reſt of King Ferdinands dominions, and ſo afterwards of all Germany. For the accompliſhment whereof, he had in his immoderate deſire prefined vnto himſelfe the ſpace of three yeares, which the great Monarchs of Rome could not performe in D more than ſo many hundreds. It was commonly reported, That the proud tyrant would many times ſay, That whatſoeuer belonged vnto the Empire of Rome, was of right his, foraſmuch as he was rightfully poſſeſſed both of the Imperiall ſeat and ſcepter of Conſtantine the Great, commander of the World, which his great grandfather Mahomet had by law of Armes won from Conſtantine the late Chriſtian Emperour, whom he ſlew at Conſtantinople. And therefore both in his common talke and writings, as oft as he had occaſion to make any mention of Charles the Emperour, he would proudly, and as it were in diſdaine terme him by the name of the King of Spaine, but neuer by the name of Emperour.

The diſcord of the Chriſtian Princes, and the great troubles euen then ariſing in Germany about matters of Religion, did not a little encourage the barbarous tyrant to take in hand this E great expedition. King Ferdinand certainly aduertiſed, that Solyman was in perſon himſelfe ſetting forward with his huge army, ſent vnto him three Embaſſadors; whereof Leonardus Negarola, a noble Gentleman well learned, and ſkilfull in diuers languages, was chiefe, with rich Preſents, and reaſonable offers to intreat with him for peace. Who meeting him vpon the borders of Seruia, were by him courteouſly receiued, and patiently heard: yet obtained of him no other anſwer, but that they ſhould follow his campe, and attend his further pleaſure. The report whereof brought a generall feare vpon all Germany, but eſpecially them of Auſtria, in whoſe freſh remembrance as yet remained the bleeding wounds of their country, their brethren and friends ſlain, their wiues and children led away into captiuity, their goods and cattell loſt, their houſes and fields burnt, and thouſands of other grieuous calamities which they had F endured in the late inuaſion of the Turks. Charles the Emperor had in very good time a little before, for a while well appeaſed the diſſention then ariſing in Germany about matters of religion; putting them in hope of a free and generall Counſell to be holden for the deciding of all ſuch matters: and in a great aſſembly of the States of the empire to be holden at Ratisbon, ſhewing the greatneſſe of the imminent danger, ſo puiſſant an enemy threatning vnto them all the calamities of war,with the manifold miſchiefs like to enſue,if they ſhould in ſo vnfit time G fall at variance amongſt themſelues: offering with great reſolution, to go in perſon himſelfe with all his old expert ſoldiers,in defence of the common Chriſtian cauſe; ſo much preuailed with the Princes of the Empire, and the Embaſſadors of the free States, that they highly commended his forwardneſſe,and all other matters for that time ſet apart,agreed all with one conſent,at a prefixed day to ſend vnto Vienna ſuch warlike forces as they had in any time before ſet forth for the defence of the Chriſtian religion,and the majeſty of the Empire. Wherupon he wrote vnto Alphonſus Vaſtius (his lieutenant Generall in Italy, and one of the greateſt captains of that age) that he ſhould without delay call together the old captains, and to leuy ſo many companies of harquebuſiers as they poſſibly could; and with them and the Spaniſh ſoldiers to repaire forthwith vnto him into Auſtria. He alſo enjoyned Andreas Auria his Admirall, H that he ſhould with like diligence rig vp a ſtrong fleet of gallies and merchants ſhips, and to go againſt the Turks Nauy into Grecia. At the ſame time he ſent for his choiſe horſemen out of Burgondy and the Low-Countries, and many noble Gentlemen and old ſouldiers out of Spaine: for the guard of his owne perſon he entertained twelue thouſand Germanes, ſuch as had longeſt ſerued in his wars in Italy, ouer whom commanded Maximilian Herberſtene and Tamiſius, both famous captaines. At the ſame time Clement the ſeuenth then Biſhop of Rome, although his coffers were greatly emptied by the late Florentine wars, which had coſt him ten hundred thouſand ducats; yet to make ſome ſhew of his deuotion in ſo dangerous a time, with the great good will he bare vnto the Emperour; after he had with grieuous exaction extorted from the clergy a great maſſe of mony (whereunto his rich Cardinals contributed I nothing,as if it had bin a thing vtterly vnlawfull for them,in ſo good a cauſe to haue abated any jot of their pontificall ſhew in the court of Rome) ſent the young Cardinall Hippolitus Medices his nephew, being then about twenty yeares of age, a man indeed fitter for the wars than for the Church,as his Legat vnto the Emperour;accompanied with moe good captaines than clergy men, and his coffers well ſtuffed with treaſure: whoſe comming to Ratiſbone was vnto the Emperour and the Germanes very welcome; for beſides that he was a yong Gentleman of very comely perſonage, and exceeding bountifull, he entertained for thoſe wars (beſides the company he brought with him) eight thouſand Hungarian horſemen, of all others beſt acquainted with the Turkiſh wars.

Strigonium beſieged by King John.

King Iohn vnderſtanding, that the formoſt of Solymans great army were come as far as Samandria K in Seruia, thought it now a fit time to wring from King Ferdinand ſuch townes as he yet held in Hungary; wherefore he ſent Aloyſius Grittus (whom Solyman had left as a helper for his eſtate) to beſiege Strigonium,which is a city of Hungary ſcituat vpon the ſide of Danubius, about thirty miles from Buda,the caſtle thereof was at that time holden with a ſtrong garriſon of King Ferdinands: wherunto for all that Grittus laied ſuch hard ſiege both by the riuer and by land,that the defendants doubting how they ſhould be able to hold out, eſpecially if Solyman ſhould take that in his way,as it was moſt like he would; ſent for relife to Cazzianer, a warlike captaine then Gouernor of Vienna,and General of all King Ferdinands forces: by whoſe appointment certaine ſmall frigots were ſent downe the riuer of Danubius, from Poſſonium,well manned;who ſuddenly ſetting vpon the Turks fleet (which ſo kept the riuer, L that nothing could that way poſſibly be conueied either in or out of the caſtle) ſhould by their vnexpected comming open that way. But Grittus hauing intelligence thereof by certain Hungarians, which though they ſerued King Ferdinand, made no great account to fly ſometime to the one part,ſometime to the other,as beſt fitted their purpoſe; preſently reſolued to ſend his fleet vp the riuer and by his ſudden comming to oppreſſe his enemies,in like ſort as they had thought to haue done him. And the more to encourage his ſoldiers,he promiſed great rewards to all ſuch as ſhould performe any extraordinary piece of ſeruice in that action:and ſo hauing thorowly furniſhed all his fleet with good ſoldiers, but eſpecially with Turkiſh archers, ſent them vp the riuer to ſeeke their enemies: who fearing no ſuch matter, as men ſurpriſed with the ſame miſchiefe they had prepared for others, were at the firſt exceedingly diſmaied; yet M conſidering that they were reaſonably well prouided for their cumming (although they yet wanted ſuch helpe as Cazzianer had appointed to ſend them) they thought it a great ſhame to fly,and therfore putting themſelues in order of battell, came downe the riuer, and with great courage encountred their enemy. There began a ſharpe and cruell fight, many being ſlaine

A and wounded on both ſides: but at laſt they of Poſſonium not able longer to endure the deadly ſhot of their enemies, and eſpecially of the Turkiſh archers, (who with their arrowes ſore gauled both the ſoldiers and the mariners) they turned their backs and fled: in which fight of ſixty frigots which came from Poſſonium, only thirteene eſcaped, with Corporanus the Generall, all the reſt being either ſunke in the fight, or els taken by the enemy, being run aſhore and forſaken by the Poſſonians, truſting more vnto their legs by land, than their oares by water. Beſides this loſſe of the Frigots, there was ſlaine of the Poſſonians almoſt fiue hundred. After this victory, Grittus hoping that they in the caſtle of Strigonium, diſpairing now of reliefe, and fearing the comming of Solyman, would not long hold out, left off to batter or vndermine the caſtle (wherewith he perceiued he little preuailed) purpoſing by lying ſtill, and keeping them of the caſtle from all reliefe, to inforce them in time to forſake the place. B Thus whileſt the diuided Hungarians with their owne hands inconſideratly ſought one anothers deſtruction, with the ruine of their country; Solyman the great enemy of all Christians was ready at their backs to deuoure both the one and the other, as in few yeares after he did.

Much about this time the old Spaniſh ſoldiers in Italy, drawne together by Vaſtius, as the Emperor had before commanded, were come to the Alpes. In this campe, of one ſort of men and other, was aboue 20000, whereof almoſt the third part was not ſeruiceable: for the old ſoldiers enriched with the long wars in Italy, and the ſpoile of the rich country of Lumbardy, wherein they had of late bin billited, brought with them all their old gotten ſpoiles and ſubſtance, not forgetting ſo much as their women, and whatſoeuer elſe ſerued their pleaſure: C for carriage whereof they drew after them a great multitude of carriages and vnneceſſary people, all which ſerued for no other vſe but for the ſoldiers pleaſure, and to conſume victuals. Which their licentious wantonneſſe Vaſtius deſiring to reforme, gaue ſtreit commandement through all the campe, That they ſhould leaue behind them all ſuch vnneceſſary baggage, and appointed what carriages ſhould ſuffiae for euery company. Whereat the ſouldiers began at the firſt to murmure, and preſently after to riſe vp in mutiny: for many of the captains being rich, and diſliking of that long and dangerous expedition, couertly incited the common ſouldiers to cry out vpon Vaſtius the Generall, for their pay already due. Which thing once put into their heads, and the matter ſet on foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one voice ſaid flatly, That they would go no foot further before they had receiued their pay. D Vaſtius, although he well perceiued that tumult to be raiſed by ſome of his enemies, which ſought thereby to lighten his credit, was glad for all that for the preſent to diſſemble the matter, & yeelding to the neceſſity of the time, to content the mutinous ſoldiers with one months pay, promiſing them their full contentment, at ſuch time as they ſhould come vnto the Emperor: and ſo when he had with much ado appeaſed that tumult, he ſet forward into Germany.

Mutiny among the Spaniſh ſoldiers.

Immediatly after the Spaniards followed the Italians, who with ſuch cheerfulneſſe offered themſelues to that ſeruice, that euery captain brought with him twice ſo many in his company as was expected: ſo that Vaſtius, (who before doubtfull of their forwardneſſe in ſo dangerous a war, eſpecially in the aid of the Germans, of whom they had in the late wars receiued great harmes, had by great and earneſt perſuaſions induced diuers of the nobility, and others E of the better ſort, to enter into that honourable action, in hope that they would draw after them great numbers of their friends and tenants, as indeed they did) was now glad to ſend backe againe many of the common ſoldiers, by reaſon of the multitude; and alſo to his great diſcredit, and the offence of many, full ſore againſt his will to diſplace moſt part of thoſe forward gentlemen, whom he had but a little before made captains, who to their no ſmall charge had gallantly furniſhed themſelues according to their degrees and places: for the Emperor had then appointed what number of Italians he ſhould bring; and alſo giuen commandement, That rejecting the reſt, he ſhould commit the leading of them only to thoſe old expert captains, of whoſe valour and diſcretion he had before had good experience. There were Martius Columna, Petrus Maria Rubeus, Philippus Torniellus, Ioannes Baptiſta Caſtaldus, Fabritius F Maramaldus, Pyrrhus Stipicianus, and Camillus Columna, being all men of great worth, and approued faith towards the Emperor.

In theſe Italian companies were fourteen thouſand ſelect footmen, beſide many other braue men who voluntarily reſorted from diuers places to Vienna. After theſe footmen followed Ferdinand Gonzaga with two thouſand horſemen, and certaine troups of Grecians and Spaniſh ards, and with them came many noble gentlemen out of all parts of Italy, who had before bin great commanders, but now ſerued as priuat gentlemen voluntarily without charge or pay; accounting it a great ſhame to tarry at home as cowards, and not to be preſent in that religious war.

The Emperour alſo about the ſame time hauing taken view of his horſemen come out of the Low-countries moſt excellently appointed, and ſhipping his great ordnance, whereof he had bought great ſtore at Nurembergh, departed downe the riuer from Ratisbone to Lyntz. The riuer of Danubius neuer carried ſo many veſſels and ſouldiers ſince the time of the great Roman Emperors, as it did at that preſent: and yet beſides them which went downe the riuer by ſhipping, the pleaſant banks on both ſides were filled with great companies of horſemen and footmen paſſing all alongſt the riuer vnder their colours, with their drums and trumpets ſounding, which altogether made the moſt glorious ſhew that a man could well behold vpon earth.

Solyman commeth into Hungary.

In the meane while, Solyman in ſix and fifty daies march come to Belgrade, thruſt ouer the great riuer Savus by bridges made in diuers places, an infinit number of his horſmen into Hungary; and leauing Danubius on the right hand, turning a little vpon the left, marched directly towards the rich country of Stiria, called in antient time Valeria, and now Stiermarke. By the way as he went he came to the little towne of Gunza, which one Nicholas Iuriſchitz (a man of an inuincible courage) kept with a ſmall garriſon of his owne. This town ſtandeth in a Plaine not far from the city of Sabaria, built ſquare, and but of a ſmall compaſſe, not very ſtrongly walled, a poore obſcure thing, neuer famous till now by the great diſhonour that the Turkiſh Emperor Solyman there receiued. Abraham the chiefe Baſſa (who ſo abſolutely commanded among the Turks, as if Solyman had receiued him into the fellowſhip of his Empire with himſelfe) was very deſirous to ſaue this captain Nicholas, for that he knew him to be a man of great courage, and was familiarly acquainted with him at ſuch time as he lay Embaſſador at Conſtantinople: wherefore he attempted firſt by gentle perſuaſions and large offers, and afterwards by moſt terrible threats, to induce him to yeeld the town to Solyman. But finding him ſo reſolutely ſet downe, that he was neither by faire nor foule means, but only by force to be remoued out of the towne: he incloſed the ſame round about with the huge army of the Turks, and by mines ouerthrew the wals in three places. Which ſudden breach whileſt the garriſon ſouldiers moſt valiantly defended againſt the furious aſſault of the Ianizaries on the South ſide of the towne, the Baſſa planting his field pieces vpon the hils on the North ſide, did from thence grieuouſly annoy the defendants: who fiercely aſſailed by their enemies before, and beaten with the great ordnance behind, were grieuouſly diſtreſſed. Wherwith the worthy gouernor ſomwhat troubled, though not much diſcouraged, ſuddenly of timber and boords raiſed vp a curtain twelue foot high, at the backs of his ſoldiers, wherewith they were ſo couered from the ſight of their enemies, that they could not make any certain ſhot at them, but only at that curtain at all aduentures, not doing any thing ſo great harme as before: and with deſperat and reſtleſſe labour, in deſpight of all the Turks great power repaired the breaches, in as ſtrong manner as at the firſt. In the meane time 200 of the Turks horſmen ſtragling from the campe, and ſeeking after booty in the country as farre as Neoſtat, were by the Hungarian horſemen intercepted, and all ſlaine or taken; whoſe heads the Hungarians brought to Vienna, and the more to encourage the ſouldiers which dayly repaired thither, in token of good lucke ſet them vp vpon ſtakes vpon the wals of the city. Then was it certainly knowne of the priſoners, that Solyman had in his campe fiue hundred thouſand men, and three hundred field pieces, which were not of greater bigneſſe but that a camell might well carry one of them, being taken from the carriage: for why, Solyman purpoſing by deſtroying the country before him, to draw the Emperour vnto battell; had (as they ſaid) brought no greater pieces of battery with him. Which report of the priſoners was alſo confirmed by the Embaſſadours of King Ferdinand, whom Solyman gaue leaue to depart at Gunza, giuing to euery one of them a gowne of veluet and a piece of plate, with letters vnto the Emperor and King Ferdinand his brother; wherein proudly vſurping the title of many kingdomes, he moſt inſolently wrote himſelfe Lord and Soueraigne of almoſt all countries and nations. But the effect thereof was, That he was come into Hungary, to reuenge the wrongs which they had done vnto King Iohn his friend and vaſſall; and would with fire and ſword enter their countries, and by the power of Gunza beſieged by the Turks.

The huge army of Solyman.

Solymans proud letters vnto the Emperor Charles and king Ferdinand.

God

A God and his great Prophet Mahomet, the fauourers of juſt quarrels, giue them battell, if they durſt meet him: wherfore if they would as valiant and couragious princes meet him in the field, he would in one battell end that quarrell with them, and in reward of the victory either win or loſe the Empire of the World. When Solyman had thus a great while lien at the ſiege of Gunza, and thereto giuen diuers ſharpe aſſaults, being ſtill with great loſſe and diſhonor repulſed, he in the ſpace of foure daies caſt vp neere vnto the towne ditch two great mounts of faggots and earth, as if they had bin two great mountains, of ſuch height, that they ouertopped not the wals only, but euen the higheſt towers in the towne (by which wonderfull worke the greatneſſe of the Turks army might eaſily be conjectured:) on of theſe great mounts he caſt vp directly againſt the face of the towne; and the other at a corner of the ſame, to flankier along the wall; from whence he did with his ſhot not only beat them which appeared vpon the wals for B the defence thereof, but them alſo which vpon occaſion went too and fro in the ſtreets. Theſe mounts being with incredible celerity brought to perfection, the town ditch filled vp, & many of the defendants either ſlain or wounded vpon the wals, the Turks gaue a moſt furious aſſault at the place which was before ſhaken with the mine: againſt whom the valiant captaine as need was in that extreme danger, oppoſed all the ſtrength he had left. But the Turks ſtill preſſing on with their infinit multitude, were got vp to the top of the wals with eight enſignes, from whence they had repulſed the defendants: which being all either wounded or wearied, ſhrouded themſelues vnder the defence of their penthouſes, being neither able nor of courage to make further reſiſtance, ſo that the wals were now abandoned, and the towne there left without defendants: when ſuddenly ſuch a great clamor was made by the loud outcries C and lamentation of the women and children and other fearefull people, that the Turks which had recouered the top of the wals, ſtrucken with a ſudden feare, thinking the towne to haue bin full of ſoldiers, ſtood as men aſtonied and diſmaid, wherupon the defendants began againe to take courage, and to ſhew themſelues: at whoſe ſight the Turks poſſeſſed of a needleſſe feare, forſooke the wal, and could not by any perſuaſions or threats of their captains be brought on againe to the aſſault. The towne was that day in all mens judgement defended by the mighty power of God, and not by the ſtrength of man. It grieued the proud tyrant aboue mea-that ſo baſe a towne ſhould ſo long hold out againſt all his power, ſo that oftentimes in his rage he would threaten to raſe it downe to the ground, and not to leaue any ſigne thereof remaining: D which he would vndoubtedly haue in time performed, had not Abraham the great Baſſa (by whoſe counſell he was altogether directed) otherwiſe perſuaded him: who waiting a fit time, when his choler was paſt, told him, that it was not worth his name and greatneſſe, to ſpend his time and forces vpon ſo ſmall a towne of no importance, by raſing wherof he ſhould neither get honor nor profit: for why, no man would maruell, if he with ſo puiſſant an army ſhould take ſo ſmall a thing, eſpecially by long ſiege, wherby the ſtrongeſt places are inforced to yeeld: and when he had ſo taken it, it would be accounted a greater honor for ſo little a town to haue holden out ſo long, than for him to haue with ſo great forces in long time conſtrained it: but if it ſhould otherwiſe fall out, as the chances of war are vncertaine, that he ſhould by any occaſion be conſtrained to leaue it, he ſhould thereby get no ſmall diſhonor: wherfore it E were more wiſedome to ſpare his ſoldiers labor in ſo ſmall a matter, wherof he was not to expect either honour or profit, and for to reſerue him for his greater deſignes, and not vainely to ſpend his forces and time in beſieging of ſo baſe a village, from whence he might now depart with leſſe diſhonor than he could afterwards, when he had proued the vttermoſt of his forces, and yet in the end glad peraduenture to forſake it: wherefore it were more for his honour to raiſe his ſiege, and calling the Gouernor of the town vnto him, to giue him the town as it were of bounty, than to ſpend ſo many good men as he muſt needs caſt away in the winning of it by force: with theſe and like reaſons the Baſſa preuailed ſo much with Solyman, that Nicholas the worthy Gouernor of the town was by a herauld at arms ſent for to come to the great Baſſa, Solyman diſdaining (as it ſhould ſeem) to ſpeak with him himſelf. The Gouernor being ſent for, F though he was grieuouſly wounded, & in ſmall hope of life, yet ſtoutly refuſed to come to any parly, except he were firſt well aſſured both by ſafe conduct & good hoſtages for the ſafety of his perſon, and that nothing ſhould be exacted of him, not befitting his religion & honor: which ſtout anſwer cauſed Solyman & the Baſſa to think, that his ſtrength was not yet ſo weakned, but that he was ſtill able to hold out the ſiege: and thereupon, that he required for his ſafety was forth-forthwith granted, and two men of great acount ſent for hoſtages for him into the city with G Solymans ſafe conduct. Which being receiued, the Gouernor went forth, and was by Abraham the great Baſſa honourably receiued into the campe, and commanded to ſit downe by him in his tent: where he was of him firſt by the way of courteſie demanded, whether he had recouered his old infirmity wherewith he was troubled at ſuch time as he was ſent Embaſſador vnto Solyman at Conſtantinople? After that, whether the wounds he had receiued in the laſt aſſault, were dangerous or not? But laſt of all, and that which moſt concerned the matter, vpon what hope he alone had ſo long and ſo obſtinatly withſtood the mighty Sultan Solyman, when as all his neighbours round about him had ſo willingly ſubmitted themſelues? ſaying further, that he maruelled much why he repoſed any confidence in the lingring King Ferdinand. Whereunto the Gouernor modeſtly anſwered, That he was (thanks be to God) well deliuered of his old diſeaſe, and that his wounds were without danger: but as concerning his holding out, he H ſaid, that he for his great wiſedome knew, that it was the duty of a good ſouldier valiantly to withſtand his enemies, and not to be troubled for any euill hap, or diſcouraged with any chance of war: as for himſelfe, he ſaid, when mans helpe failed, he had repoſed his full truſt in God, by whoſe power he had beene hitherto preſerued, which as he well hoped ſhould neuer faile him at his need: and that King Ferdinand was not ſo far off, but that he would before it were long be there preſent with a great army: wherefore he did not greatly maruell, that he was not relieued before that time, foraſmuch as many lets and occaſion might chance which might hinder the Kings purpoſe, conſidering that fortune alwaies by nature vnconſtant, was in nothing more like vnto her ſelfe in her inconſtancy, than in martiall affaires. The Baſſa won- I dering at the inuincible courage of the Gouernor, ſaid, That although the great Emperor So-lyman might now at his pleaſure vtterly deſtroy the towne, with all that therein was, yet being by nature of a moſt honourable and milde diſpoſition, and a great louer of valiant and couragious men, had commanded him in his name to giue him that towne, and the liues of all them that were in it, as a reward of his valour ſhewed in the defence thereof: yet ſo, that he ſhould ſweare obedience vnto him, and receiue ſome few Turks into the towne, in token that he had yeelded the ſame. The politicke Gouernour knowing that of 800 valiant ſouldiers, he had ſcarcely a third part left, and them alſo ſore weakned with wounds and want of reſt, thought it neceſſary to make his peace in beſt ſort he could: for what could haue hapned vnto him more wiſhedly, than with his great honour to keepe the towne ſtill, and with the loſſe of a few plea- K ſing words to diliuer himſelfe, with ſo many of his friends, from extream feare and perill? and ſo in all his talke ſhewing no ſigne of feare, and with great words ſetting forth the ſtrength of his garriſon (which was indeed brought to an extream weakneſſe) ſaid he was ready at the firſt to haue yeelded vp the towne, for the old acquaintance he had with him at Conſtantinople, but was alwaies letted by the Germans and Spaniards, which were there in garriſon, fierce and cruell ſoldiers, whoſe hard hearts were (as he ſaid) hardly entreated to ſuffer him at that time to come out of the city into the campe: wherefore he could promiſe to be a friend to all ſuch Turks as ſhould paſſe that way, and to relieue him with ſuch things as his waſted country could affoord; and further in token of his ſubmiſſion, to ſet vp one of Solymans enſignes in the chiefe tower of the city: but as for receiuing any Turks into gariſon, in token that he had yeel- L ded vp the towne, he was willing ſo to do, but that he was greatly affraid they ſhould be euill intreated by the Germans and Spaniards, who deadly hated the Turks: whereof it was to be thought, that new wars would eftſoone ariſe. In concluſion he ſo cunningly vſed the matter, that the great Baſſa was contented with this ſmall token of ſubmiſſion, that he ſhould receiue in at one of gates of the city, one of Solymans captains with ten Ianizaries: which being done accordingly, and they courteouſly for a while entertained and again diſmiſſed, the great Baſſa held himſelfe with that ſimple ſubmiſſion well contented: when as the Gouernor had neither German nor Spaniard as then in garriſon. So when Solyman had with his great army lien at the ſiege of Gunza by the ſpace of 28 daies, and in that time to his great loſſe aſſaulted the ſame thirteene times, he roſe with his army, glad of a little fained ſubmiſſion for the ſafegard of his M honor: and leauing Vienna on the right hand, whither moſt part of the Chriſtian army was aſſembled, tooke the way on the left hand into Carinthia, and ſo came to the riuer Mure, and from thence to the city Gratia. This turning of Solymans out of the way from Vienna, where he knew his enemies lay, put all feare out of the minds of the Chriſtians, which they had

A before not without cauſe conceiued, inſomuch that he but a little before feared as a Prince of great pride and power, ſhamefully repulſed at the little town of Gunza, and now ſhunning his enemies at Vienna, began to grow into contempt as if he had beene running away for feare.
Which diſgrace the Turks ſought by diuers excuſes to couer, as that the ſtrong city of Neo-ſtat lay betwixt him and Vienna, which could neither without much difficulty be taken, nor danger left enemy behind him: beſides that, Winter began to approch, which cauſed him (as the Turks gaue it out) to content himſelfe with the ſpoile of the rich countries betwixt the riuers of Sauus and Dranus, and ſo in good time to returne againe to Belgrade. But they which ſeemed to ſee further into the matter, were of opinion, That Solyman vnderſtanding by his eſ-pials, and ſecret aduertiſement from his friends, That the Princes of Germany had with one B conſent joined their forces with the emperors, brought out of Italy, Spain, and the Low countries, which at his ſetting forth he leaſt feared; and that the Chriſtian army in number great, conſiſted not of raw ſouldiers, but for the moſt part ſuch as had been trained vp in wars, men both for courage and skill nothing inferiour to his Ianizaries and beſt men of war; choſe rather to take the ſpoile of the country, as he might with ſafety, than to aduenture his perſon and ſtate to the hazard of a moſt doubtfull and dangerous battell.

Caſon ſent with 15000 horſmen to ſpoile Auſtria

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Michael-Ogli by the commandement of Solyman, ſent Caſon with 15000 of his voluntary horſemen (who in Solymans expedition againſt Vienna, had run through the country of Auſtria as farre as Lyntz) charging him without ſtay to ſpoile all the country far and neere which lyeth betweene Danubius and the Alpes, thereby to learne C what he could of the ſtate and ſtrength of the Emperors campe; and by doing all the harmes he could poſſibly, to leaue a moſt lamentable remembrance of the Turks being in Auſtria. Ca-ſon was of himſelfe forward enough, and deſirous of the ſpoile: but ſo much the more, for that he was by the former road into that country become both famous and rich: wherefore diuiding his horſemen into three companies not far diſtant one from another, he ſuddenly oppreſſed an infinit multitude of all ſorts of people in the fields and country villages as he went; all which he either ſlew without mercy, or carried away as miſerable priſoners. Thouſands of men and women tied together in chaines and ropes, were by the cruell Turks enforced to run as faſt as their horſes; the country villages were all burnt downe to the ground, and in them the poore children of the Chriſtians, whoſe parents were either ſlaine or carried away cap-D tiues: ſo that all the country euery way almoſt for the ſpace of a 150 miles, was couered with ſmoke and fire, within three miles of Lyntz, where King Ferdinand then lying, was glad to get himſelfe further off to Strabinga, where his brother Charles the Emperour lay. This cruell Turke according to his charge, hauing with fire and ſword without compaſſion wrought all the woe he could poſſible vpon the poore Chriſtians, and now loded with the ſpoile of the country and multitude of priſoners, began to returne the ſame way he came, thinking to finde Solyman either at the ſiege of Gunza, where he left him, or neerer hand at Neoſtat comming towards Vienna. But he as is aforeſaid, riſing with ſmall honour from Gunza, and fearing the power of the Chriſtians, was quite gone another way as far as Gratia, the Metropoliticall city of Stiria, ſtanding vpon the riuer of Mura; which turned to the vtter deſtruction of Caſon and E all his followers: for as ſoone as it was perceiued by the burning of the countrey all about, that the Turks were come neere to Lyntz, the Chriſtian captaines with their companies went out of the campe, ſome one way ſome another, as was thought moſt conuenient for the meeting with of theſe miſchieuous Turks, which neuer reſted in one place: wherin they vſed ſuch diligence in taking the paſſages, that it was not poſſible they ſhould eſcape vnfought withall.
Foure companies of Spaniſh and Italian horſemen vnder the leading of Lewis Cone a valiant captaine, firſt lighting vpon them in a valley neere vnto Neoſtat, and deſperatly charging them, were by the Turks for moſt part ſlaine: But Caſon perceiuing how he was one euery ſide laied by the Chriſtians in the vallies betwixt Neoſtat, Sabaria, and Veſprinium, the night following with more than barbarous cruelty ſlew foure thouſand of the Chriſtians he had be-F fore taken priſoners, becauſe he ſhould not be hindered by them in his flight; and diuiding his army into two parts, about midnight began to ſet forward, vſing the benefit of the night to haue eſcaped from his enemies out of theſe vallies wherein he was incloſed. One part of this army led by Feriſes taking the way Southward, did with incredible labour cut a way tho-row the thicke and ouergrown woods (a thing thought altogether impoſſible), and ſo with little or no loſſe came to Solyman into Styria. Caſon with the other part of the army breaking G out of the valley of Storamberg, chanced vpon the Palatine (Generall of the forces ſent from the German Princes) who with ten thouſand footmen and two thouſand horſemen, and certaine field pieces brake the battell of the Turks, and ſlew of them a great number: in which conflict Caſon his chiefe enſigne was taken. He fighting moſt valiantly in the rereward, to giue others time to eſcape, was himſelfe there ſlaine: whoſe gallant head-piece preſented afterwards to the Emperour, confirmed the report of his death. They which eſcaped from the Palatine, in their flight fell into the hands of Lewis, and the Marqueſſe of Brandenburg, by whom they were ſlaine like beaſts. The Hungarian horſemen led by Valentinus Turacus, fighting vpon them which fled from Lewis and the Marqueſſe, had the killing of them for the ſpace of ſeuen miles; and of all others did vpon them the cruelleſt execution, following them hard H at the heels with their freſh horſes, and fiercely inſulting vpon them in their owne language.

4000 Chriſtian captiues murdered by Caſon.

Thoſe few diſperſed Turks which eſcaped the fury of the Hungarians, fell into the hands of the country people about Veſprinium and the lake of Balaton, which came out on euery ſide in hope of ſpoile, who ſhewed them ſmall fauour: ſo that of 8000 which were with Caſon, it was thought not one returned to Solyman.

Caſon diſcomfited by the Palatine, and ſlaine.

The ſlaughter of the Turks.

The Emperour vnderſtanding that Solyman was gone as farre as Gracia in Stiria, called his chiefe captains together into the caſtle of Lyntz, to know their opinions, whether it were beſt to follow the enemy into Stiria or not. The cities of Lyntz, Gracia, and Vienna, are ſcituat almoſt in forme of a triangle: but from Lyntz to Gratia is three good daies journey of bad rough way by horſe. Some ſaid it was beſt to fight with the Turks in that vneuen mountaine I country, where the Turks chiefe ſtrength conſiſting in the multitude of his horſemen, ſhould ſtand him in ſmall ſtead, but ſhould be inforced to try his battell with his footmen, wherein he was inferiour to the Chriſtians. This counſell although it had in it many difficulties, yet for that it proceeded from the moſt approued captains, ſo moued the Emperour, that he preſently ſent Apomius a Spaniard (the moſt famous captaine Antonius Leua his lieutenant) to take view of that paſſage: who ſhortly after returned againe to Lyntz, bringing word that all the country as he went was deſolate and for feare forſaken of the inhabitants: but concerning the place of the enemies abode, he could learne no certainty. Whereupon it was by generall conſent concluded, that they ſhould all goe to Vienna, whither all the ſtrength of the Germans was already aſſembled, there to take a generall view of the army, and to giue the enemy K battell if he ſhould againe returne. Some there were of great courage which openly diſliked of that going to Vienna; ſaying, that the Emperour ſhould rather in that diſtreſſe of the prouinces of Stiria and Carinthia purſue his enemy, than turne out of the way to Vienna. But others of greater judgement, whoſe opinion preuailed, ſaid, it was one thing to inuade and another thing to defend: ſo that the Emperour might with honor enough encampe himſelfe in the fields of Vienna, and from thence to expect and deride the baſe expedition and vaine brags of his proud enemie, who a far off challenged him into the field, and then like a coward durſt not come neere him.

Charles the emperour his power at Vienna.

The Emperor comming to Vienna, and taking a generall view of the army, found therein two hundred and ſixty thouſand men, whereof 90000 footmen, and 30000 horſemen were L accounted old expert ſoldiers, and of them many whole companies and bands, of ſuch as had before bin Generals, Captains, Lieutenants, Antients, or other officers and men of marke in other armies, and now were content to ſerue as priuat men. It was thought that ſo many worthy captains and valiant ſouldiers, were neuer before in the memory of man aſſembled together into one camp: for the Princes and free cities had not ſent thither common ſoldiers, but their choſen and approued men; ſtriuing as it were amongſt themſelues, who ſhould ſend the beſt. All the flowre and ſtrength of Germany from the riuer of Viſtula to the Rhene, and from the Ocean to the Alpes, was by the Princes of the Empire and free cities either ſent thither, or of themſelues voluntarily came thither. A thing neuer before heard of, that all Germany ſhould as it were with one conſent, be glad to take vp arms for their common ſafety, in defence M of their honor and liberty; eſpecially againſt people brought out of the furtheſt parts of Aſia, Syria, and Ægypt. Beſide the great number of Spaniards, Italians, and Burgundians; the Bohemian campe lay not farre off, ſtrengthened with them of Silicia and Morauia. There were alſo ſome troupes of Polonian horſemen, not ſent thither by publike authority, but ſeruing

A as voluntary men: King Sigiſmund winking thereat, who as he was carefull not raſhly to breake the league he had made with Solyman; ſo leſt he ſhould ſeeme careleſſe of the Chriſtian common cauſe, by notable diſſimulation left place for ſuch of his ſubjects as would (as if it had been without his knowledge) to ſhew their valour in the moſt honourable war.

The order of the Chriſt.an army.

The Chriſtian army ready to receiue the enemy, lay in a great field neere vnto Vienna, in this order: three great ſquadrons of pikemen, ſtanding one ſquadron a great way diſtant from another, were ſo placed againſt the enemy with like and equall front, that all the horſemen diuided into two parts, might well be receiued into the great ſpaces betwixt the three ſquadrons: for it was not thought conuenient to oppoſe ſo ſmall a number of horſemen in open field without the footmen, againſt almoſt 300000 of the Turks horſemen. The right wing of B the horſemen was led by the Emperour himſelfe, and the left by King Ferdinand. Before and behind, and on euery ſide of the three ſquadrons of pikes, ſauing in thoſe places which were left open for the horſemen, about thirty paces off, were placed twenty thouſand nimble harquebuſiers ranged in length, and but fiue in a ranke; ſo that whileſt the firſt diſcharged, the ſecond, and after them the third, and ſo the reſt readily and orderly comming on, might without let deliuer their bullets vpon their enemies: neither was it thought any diſaduantage to place them ſo thin, for that if they found themſelues by the enemies oppreſſed, they might eaſily retire amongſt the pikes, ſtanding faſt at hand. Before the harquebuſiers was planted the great ordnance, whereof the Emperour had ſuch ſtore, and ſo well placed, that he could therewith (as with a moſt ſure trench) haue compaſſed in his whole army. Only the Hungarians, men C well acquainted with the manner of the Turkiſh fight, choſe to lie in the open field in two great wings, vnder the leading of their two valiant captaines Valentinus and Paulus. Many noble gentlemen beholding this goodly army, wept for joy, conceiuing a moſt aſſured hope of victory, if the proud enemy durſt with all his forces joyne in battell. But Solyman, who by all means ſought with his great number of horſemen to keepe the wide and open fields, certainly aduertiſed both of the Emperors ſtrength and the manner of his lying, got him ouer the riuer of Mura, and at Marpurge by bridges which he made on the ſudden, paſſed ouer the great riuer Dranus. And ſo he which that Summer held almoſt all the World in ſuſpence, with the doubtfull expectation of the ſucceſſe of that war; hauing with all that his huge power wherewith he threatned the World, done nothing at all worth the remembrance, but was in euery D place either ouercome, or els ſhamefully repulſed; left Stiria, and returned the ſame way he came, directly betwixt the riuers of Sauus and Dranus, to Belgrade and ſo to Conſtantinople; leauing here and there ſome remembrance of his barbarous cruelty, and ſtill looking behind him if the Emperour were not at his heeles: at ſuch time as a few Dalmatian and Croatian horſemen did ſtill purſue the taile of his army. It is reported, that he carried away with him 30000 Chriſtians into Captiuity, beſides many thouſands of poore country people ſlaine by the mercileſſe Turks; but eſpecially by Caſon and his followers: and ſo to his eternall infamy was twice in the ſpace of a few yeares driuen out of Germany. The Emperor vnderſtanding of Solymans departure, determined with all ſpeed to returne into Italy; although King Ferdinand his brother moſt earneſtly intreated him before his departure, in ſo fit a time to imploy thoſe E great forces againſt King Iohn, who now as it were forſaken of Solyman, might eaſily with ſo puiſſant an army haue bin thruſt not only out of Buda, but alſo quite out of the Kingdome of Hungary, wherein he was by Solyman as his vaſſall placed. But the Emperour, for that Winter began now to approch, and the plague was got into the camp, yea, euen into his court, continued in his former purpoſe of departing into Italy: yet yeelding ſo far vnto his brothers requeſt, as to leaue behind him all the Italians, who joyned with King Ferdinands owne forces, were thought ſufficient for the accompliſhment of the Hungarian war.

Solyman returneth.

Ouer theſe Italians, one Fabritius Maramaldus was by the meanes of Alphonſus Victius appointed Generall: but no order taken for the paiment of their wages, whereby the ſouldiers might be the more incouraged to take in hand that war, and alſo kept in obedience. Which F thing at the firſt much offended the minds of the other captains, thinking themſelues diſgraced by the preferment of Maramaldus, a man of no greater account than themſelues: but as ſoon as it was known abroad, the vnder captains & officers of the bands, led with the credit and fauor of their old captains, ſaid plainly, That they would not go into Hungary, except either King Ferdinand would in perſon goe himſelfe, or elſe one of the great Commanders, Vaſtius

or Leua were appointed for their Generall: and the common ſouldiers ſaid flatly, that they would aske leaue to depart, except they had three moneths pay, which they knew well they ſhould neuer get of that poore King, already brought vnto great wants. Vaſtius to appeaſe this mutiny, trauelled greatly with his ſoldiers, perſuading them to remember the faith of ſouldiers, and by their conſtant perſeuerance to maintaine the honour they had got by their cheerfull cumming: telling them, That valiant ſouldiers neuer wanted pay, furniſhing themſelues by their victories with all things neceſſary from the enemy. And as for Maramaldus their Generall, they had no juſt cauſe to miſlike him, being an old captain of great experience, for courage and policy not inferior to any the greateſt Commanders, and placed by the Emperours owne appointment as a man moſt ſufficient, whoſe judgement they ought not in any caſe to diſlike. When Vaſtius had with theſe and ſuch like reaſons well appeaſed the tumultuous ſouldiers, and was gone out of the camp into Vienna, to take further order for the remedying of all difficulties, night the nurſe of ſedition came on, whoſe darkneſſe excluding all modeſty and feare, gaue further ſcope and place vnto the mutinous ſoldiers inſolency. By chance there was at that time brought out of the city into the campe, very courſe, hoary, mouldy bread; which ſome of the ſoldiers hauing brought, and thruſting it vpon the points of their ſpeares, ſhewed it vnto their fellowes in great choler, railing againſt King Ferdinand, which in his own kingdome in the beginning of the war had made no better prouiſion, but with ſuch corrupt and peſtilent bread to feed them being ſtrangers, which were only for his defence and quarell to aduenture their liues. And but a little before, a certaine Spaniard, being but a common ſouldier, comming into the Generals tent, and caſting the like bread downe at the feet of Vaſtius, bitterly curſing the Emperor and King Ferdinand, had raiſed a wonderfull tumult: wherefore the Italian ſoldiers flocking together out of their tents, gaue many hard ſpeeches concerning their pay, their victuals, and the difficulties of the Hungarian war. There one Titus Marconius of Volaterra, a man of a troubleſome ſpirit, but reaſonably well ſpoken, was by the other ſouldiers ſet vp vpon a great heap of ſaddles, that he might be the better heard, and by diuers ſeditious captains requeſted frankly ro ſpeake his mind, ſo far as he thought concerned the ſafety and welfare of them all. Where it is reported that he ſpake vnto them in this ſeditious manner as followeth:

The ſeditious oration of Titus Marconius, to the mutinous Italians:

And ſhall the Spaniards (ſaid he) beloued companions and fellowes in armes, as you haue heard, go into Italy? and to our great hurt againe returne into their old Wintering places? and that which I am aſhamed to ſay, as notable gueſts lie with our wiues? and we Italians as baniſhed men fight this Winter with yce and ſnow in Hungary? and that forſooth for a moſt beggerly King, and him alſo to the Hungarians a forrener and meere ſtranger, againſt a naturall borne Prince, of his ſubjects well beloued and ſtrongly backt with the power and wealth of the Turkiſh Emperor? And that which might juſtly grieue any couragious mind, vnder the conduct of Maramaldus, who oftentimes blinded with anger and haſty cruelty, hath ſo furiouſly thruſt vs thorow with his ſword, that he ſeemeth not more to deſire the name of a captaine for any thing, than for the killing and murthering of vs now his ſouldiers. Neither can I beleeue that you, who haue oftentimes beene captaines and antients your ſelues, will be ſo mad, as to ſerue vnder a common captaine, without hope of any pay, of any prouiſion, of victory, or returne. Truely it delighteth me not ſo much to haue come hither for the honour of the Italian name (no more reckoned of than a ruſh) although I haue eleuen times ſerued; as it doth this day aſhame me to ſee this ſhamefull end of the warre, ended before it was well begun. But in Regall dignity is no ſhame, nor equity in rewarding the ſouldier: for Kings now adaies make account of ſouldiers onely according to their neceſſity; this is it alone that giueth vs pay, this is that getteth vs loue, this is it that maintaineth our reputatation: all which, peace once by victory obtained, leeſe their grace. So fareth it with vs at this preſent (fellow ſouldiers) the Emperour and his brother King Ferdinand, *deliuered from the feare of a moſt dangerous warre, to eaſe themſelues of this multitude of vs, ſeeke to thruſt vs into Hungary as beaſts to the ſlaughter, by the ſpending of our bloud hoping to purchaſe vnto themſelues victory; and by the loſſe of vs to take no harme themſelues, though the Turks and Hungarians ſhould with ſword and famine vtterly deſtroy vs, ſhut vp with the yce of Danubius, and the ſnow of the Alpes. But peraduenture you vnderſtand not theſe deuiſes, no more than you vnderſtand what this terrible and bloudy * comet, ſhooting his beames towards Italy, portendeth. Verily it is not fatall either to* Solyman or Cæſar, but rather threatneth vnto vs death and deſtru- deſtruction: for they with like counſell full of ſafety and diſcretion, would not open any way vnto their own deſtinies, but warily withdrew themſelues one from another, & ſhunned all the dangers of the field. Wherfore if it were lawfull for them, without any blemiſh of their Maieſties, ſo notably to prouide to keep themſelues out of danger, when as on each ſide half the world lay as a reward of the victory; ſhall not wee look to our ſelues, that we be not thruſt thither, from whence appeareth no hope of return, but with vtter deſtruction; when as we may do it without offence, and by good right, eſpecially ſeeing no pay is offered vs. Thus you ſee what a goodly end is made of this notable war, wherin only we the Italians, in ſtead of commendation and reward, reap iniury and diſgrace; and are peraduenture of purpoſe exiled into Hungary, that this flour of Chilualry being drawn out of Italy, and placed far out of the way, Colonies of Spaniards and Germans may be placed in our ſteads. Truly it ſeemeth hard dealing, to be ſent out of the way into a barbarous country, where we ſhall find all hoſtility, and no place of reſuge to receiue vs beeing diſtreſſed. Beſides this, we ſhall alſo whether we will or no, feel how heauy and intolerable it will be both to our bodies and minds, to endure the miſeries of this Winter and dangerous war: and in the mean time, with no ſmall hearts grief, imagin what things our children, our brethren, our kinſmen, yea our wiues, ſuffer at home of the Spaniards and Germans. Wherfore, worthy companions, it concerneth vs more at this time to haue a good foreſight, than valiantly to fight. The occaſion preſented vnto vs for our ſafety and welfare, ſtands vpon a tickle point, it muſt be don without delay, and we muſt hye vs hence before the Spaniards truſſe vp their baggage; and ſo preuenting the Emperors formoſt companies, come firſt our ſelues into Italy: for if we ſhall ſtay but a little to conſult vpon the matter, Vaſtius and our other proud Commaunders will preſently be here, the very betraiers of the Italian bloud, who for their own gain & our miſchief haue brought vs into theſe ſtreits; who I know will moſt erneſtly intreat vs, and with many ſubtilties ſeek to ſeduce vs, by offering vs great pay, with whatſoeuer els we ſhall require; which will all proue but words. But you, if you be men, refuſe to talk with them, as with your common enemies, or rather in reuenge of their old iniuries kill them. Here wanteth not in this aſſembly valiant men, for courage and integrity of life their betters far; who can lead you forth, order your battell, and fortunatly vſe this your courage and forwardnes. Wherfore if you be wiſe, ſet forward reſolutely, and good fortune no doubt will attend you in your haſt: for the full accompliſhment of your deſire conſiſteth in your haſt only.

Marconius had no ſooner made an end of this mutinous ſpeech, but the tumultuous ſoldiers in euery band began highly to commend and approoue the ſame, and by and by ſuch a confuſed noiſe was heard thorow all the aſſembly, as vſeth to riſe amongſt the diſcontented vulgar people, ready to riſe in arms. But the drums preſently ſtriking vp a march, they made no longer ſtay, but without delay pluckt vp their enſignes, and forward they go directly toward Neoſtat. In this tumult, in ſtead of their old captains, which either were not preſent, or refuſed to go with them, they choſe others to be their leaders; who once named by the ſeditious multitude, might in no caſe without danger refuſe to take the charge vpon them, were they neuer ſo vnwilling. Theſe were Montebellius, Nerius, Melcarius, Sanctius, and the two twins of Millan, called Glußani; who drew after them eight thouſand ſoldiers: the reſt partly for ſhame, & partly for fear, ſtayd ſtill with Maramaldus the new appointed Generall. When they were thus gon, Vaſtius and diuers other great Captaines hearing thereof in the City, poſted after them ſix miles, and at length ouertaking them, requeſted them to ſtay, and not to diſhonour themſelues with ſo foul a fact; telling them that their pay was ready for them: and omitting nothing wherewith they might haue bin mooued to ſtay, mingled their prayers with grieuous threats. But they reſolutely ſet down, would neither hear nor ſtay; but as men inraged with fury and their own guilty conſcience, with ſtern looks diſcharged ſome ſmal ſhot vpon them. Whileſt Vaſtius would there haue ſtayd the company, and did what hee poſſibly could by threatning and otherwiſe, to haue terrified their leaders, and to haue brought them backe, hee was oftentimes in danger to haue bin ſlain. In the end he was glad to forſake them, and to return as he came. King Ferdinand by this ſudden departure of the Italians, for that time diſappointed of all his hope of recouering the kingdom of Hungary from King Iohn; in great choler wrot to his ſubiects of Styria and Carinthia, wherby the Italians were to paſſe, That they ſhould ſhew them no maner of curteſie in their paſſage: wherupon inſued great hurt on both ſides. Yet for all that, theſe Italians in deſpight of what could be don, at length recouered Tiliaventum in the borders of Italy, where they disbanded themſelues, and returned euery man 8000 Italians in mutiny, forſake their Captaines and return into Italy to his own dwelling,leauing King Ferdinand vnto his own forces. The Emperor alſo breaking G vp his army at Vienna,and purpoſing now as before to return into Italy, appointed Ferdinand Gonzaga to go formoſt with the light horſmen,with whom alſo he went himſelſe. After him followed Vaſtius with the Spaniards: two daies after came the Cardinall,whoſe traine was of all the greateſt: laſt of all followed the mercinary Germanes: in which order he returned in ſafety into Italy.

Charles the emperor returnes into Italy.

This was the end of thoſe wonderful preparations made by the two great Monarchs Solyman and Charles the fifth, in the yeare 1532: which held the world in great ſuſpence with the fearfull expectation of ſome maruellous alteration; and ſo much the more, for that at the ſame time appeared a great blazing ſtar by the ſpace of 15 daies. All which for all that, God ſo appointing,ſorted to far leſſe harm than was of moſt men feared.

Auria goeth againſt the Turks.

H Now whilſt Charles the Emperor was thus in arms againſt Solyman in Auſtria, Andreas Auria by his appointment,with a fleet of 35 tall ſhips,and 48 gallies,wherein he had imbarked 25000 ſouldiers well appointed,did in the meane time wonderfully annoy the Turkes in Peloponeſus. With this fleet Auria departing from Meſſana in Sicilia,and paſſing alongſt the coaſt of Italy into the Ionian, neer to the Iſle of Zacynthus met with Vincentius Capellius the Venetian Admiral,with a fleet of ſixty gallies ſet forth by the Venetians in defence of their territory: who offered vnto Auria all poſſible kindnes,but excuſed himſelf that he could not join with him in that war againſt the common enemy, by reaſon of an old league betwixt the Turks and the Venetians,which Solyman had but a little before renued. So that at that time the Venetians ſtood as men indifferent betwixt Charles the emperor and Solyman,offering like I kindnes to both,but taking part with neither, yet in readines to fall out with either, if they ſhould by ſea or land offer any injury to their State: wherin they bare themſelues ſo indifferent,that it was thought that they at one and the ſelfe ſame inſtant aduertiſed Auria, that Hymerales the Turks Admiral lay with his fleet of 60 gallies euill appointed in the Bay of Ambracia,where he might eaſily be ſurpriſed;and gaue likewiſe warning to him of the comming of Auria with a ſtrong fleet,wiſhing him in time to prouide for his better ſafety, by retyring his fleet into ſome other place of more aſſurance;which he preſently did: for knowing himſelf too weak,he departed from Ambracia to the ſtrong hauen of Calcide. Which thing with other like wel conſidered,might giue iuſt cauſe to any Chriſtian heart to bewail the ſtate of that time, wherin the Chriſtian Princes being either in mortal wars amongſt themſelues, or K intangled by Solyman with leagus of no aſſurance,omitted the faireſt opportunitie that could haue bin wiſhed for the abating of the Turks greatnes: for if the Venetians joining their forces with Auria, had in time purſued the Turkiſh Admiral, it was like that not only all Solymans power at ſea had bin vtterly diſcomfited, but alſo moſt part of Grecia,mindful of their antient empire and liberty,and then ready to haue rebelled, and joined hands with the Chriſtians,might haue bin recouered out of the Turkiſh thraldom; yea and the Imperial city of Conſtantinople greatly indangered, few or none being left for the defence thereof, beſide yong Ianizaries and effeminat Eunuchs,the heartleſſe keepers of the Turks concubines; Solyman himſelf being then far off in Hungary,and hauing drawne with him the greateſt ſtrength of his empire. L

Corone beſieged by Auria.

Auria taking his leaue of the Venetian Admirall,with much honour done at ſea on both ſides; was ſhortly after aduertiſed that the Turks Admiral was fled to Calcide. Wherfore now out of hope to do any good againſt him, hee directed his courſe to Corone, which is a ſtrong city vpon the coaſt of Peloponeſus,about twelue miles diſtant from Modon,with purpoſe to beſiege it: which when he had wel viewed,and conſidered of the ſtrength therof, hee laid ſiege thereto both by ſea and land, battering it moſt terribly at one time with 14 great pieces of artillery by land,and 150 by ſea,ſo that a more terrible battery had not been lightly heard of. For all that, the Turks valiantly ſtood vpon their defence, and manfully repulſed the Italians, which vnder the leading of the County of Sarne aſſaulted the city by land. The Turks garriſons lying about in the country of Peloponeſus, did what they might to haue re- M lieued the city; who by the valor of the County were diſcomfited, and Zadares their chief leader ſlain: whoſe head with others of the ſlain Turks were ſet vpon ſtakes, to the terror of the defendants.

At length the Turks wearied with aſſaults,and terrified with the thundring ſhot which neuer ceaſed,and driuen alſo from their greateſt ſtrength towards ſea, by the deſperat aſſault of certain reſolute Chriſtians,whom they had now full ſore againſt their wils receiued as it were into their boſomes; fearing alſo to want victuall and pouder,if they ſhould longer hold out without any hope of reliefe,yeelded the City and Caſtle to Auria,vpon condition that they might in ſafety depart thence with bag and baggage. Corone thus taken, and a ſtrong garriſon of Spaniards there placed, and the Chriſtian Greeks which dwelt in the city ſworn vnto them, Auria put to ſea with his fleet,and ſayling againe by Zacinthus,came to Patras another antient city of Peloponeſus, which he eaſily took and ranſacked: for the Turks diſtruſting the ſtrength of the City,had ſtrongly intrenched themſelues neere vnto the Caſtle; which place alſo,together with the Caſtle,they in ſhort time yeelded to Auria;couenanting,that they,and eſpecially their wiues, might with their garments onely depart in ſafety into Ætolia: which was by Auria ſo preciſely performed,that when three thouſand of them paſſed along through the army of the Chriſtians, ranged on both ſides, and ſome of the ſouldiers began rudely to handle ſome of the women, and to take from them ſome of their jewels, he cauſed them preſently,to the terror of others,to be hanged. Auria leauing his army at Patras,with commandment to follow him by land,ſailed along the coaſt of Peloponeſus,vntill he came to the ſtreit of Naupactum, now called Lepanto, which is the entrance into the gulfe of Corinthia, parting Peloponeſus from Ætolia, with a ſtreit ſomwhat narrower then the ſtreit of Helleſpont. Vpon this ſtreit ſtood two Caſtles,the one called Rhium, vpon the coaſt of Peloponeſus,and the other Molicreum in Ætolia,which Bajazet had wonderfully fortified,and ſtored with ordnance for the keeping of that ſtreit. Auria threatning all extremity to the Captaine of the Caſtle on Peloponeſus ſide,if he did inforce him to plant his battery,ſo terrified him,that he without delay yeelded vnto him the caſtle;couenanting only, That he and his ſoldiers might in ſafety depart thence: which granted,and the Turks departed, Auria gaue the ſpoyle of the Caſtle vnto his ſoldiers which came with him by ſea:wherby he ſo offended the minds of the other ſouldiers which came by land from Patras, that they were about to haue forſaken him. The other Caſtle vpon Ætolia ſide was not ſo eaſily taken,being valiantly defended by a garriſon of old Ianizaries,appointed for the keeping thereof. Yet in the end by fury of the Ordnance a breach was made,whereby the Chriſtians forcibly entring,ſlew three hundred of the old garriſon ſouldiers, not taking any one to mercy: the reſt fled into a ſtrong tower into the midſt of the Caſtle, where ſeeing no remedy but that they muſt needs fall into the hands of their enemies,they deſperatly blew vp themſelues, and the tower,with a great part of the Caſtle, with gunpouder, in ſuch ſort, that it ſeemed all the ſea coaſt to haue been ſhaken with an earthquake;and the gallies which lay a bow ſhoot off, were almoſt ouerwhelmed with ſtones blown out ſo far off. The great Ordnance taken in this Caſtle was valued at 70000 duckats; whereof certaine pieces of a wonderfull greatneſſe, with Arabian letters written vpon them, were afterwards by Auria brought to Genoa; & in remembrance of the victory,mounted vpon the bulwark at the mouth of the hauen. All theſe things thus happily atchieued, Auria ſtrongly fortified the city of Corone,ſtoring it both with munition and plenty of victuall,committing the defence thereof to Mendoza a valiant Spaniard, with a ſtrong garriſon of Spaniards; promiſing of his owne charge to relieue him whenſoeuer he ſhould need, if the Emperour ſhould defer to do it. The ſtreit of Naupactum laid open, Saluiatus with the gallies of Malta ſcoured all alongſt the gulfe of Corinth, doing great harm to the Turks which dwelt on both ſides of the gulfe,ſpoiling and terrifying them euen as far as Corinth. Not long after, Winter now approaching, Auria receiuing letters from the Emperour, of Solymans departure out of Hungary, returned with his fleet loaded with the ſpoyle of the Turks, to Naples,and ſo from thence home to Genoa.

Auria returned into Italy.

In the beginning of the Spring following(which was the yere 1533)it was riſely reported that the Turks were comming with a great fleet toward Peloponeſus:and not long after, Mendoza Gouernour of Corone, by letters aduertiſed Peter of Toledo, Vizroy of Naples, That he was both by ſea and land hardly beſieged by the Turks; and that he would to the vttermoſt of his power valiantly defend the city,ſo long as he had any prouiſion of victuall: Wherefore he moſt earneſtly requeſted, That if the Emperour would haue the towne kept, he ſhould in time ſend him reliefe, whereupon the oppreſſed Græcians taking heart, were like enough to rebel, and to help to expulſe the Turks quite out of Peloponeſus. But aboue all things he G forgot not to craue ſpeedy aid of Auria, and to put him in mind of the faithfull promiſe he had made, to relieue him at his need. Vpon this news, Charles the Emperor commanded Auria his Admiral to rig vp a conuenient fleet for that ſeruice, promiſing forthwith to ſend vnto him twelue Gallies which he had new built in Spain. He alſo requeſted the Knights of Malta to aid him with their Gallies againſt that Common enemy. Wherfore Auria hauing with wonderfull celeritie rigged vp thirty tall ſhips, and as many gallies, came to Naples to take in his ſouldiers. There the old Garriſons of the Spaniards, which for want of pay were riſen in mutiny againſt the great commander and General Vaſtius & the Viceroy, and had ranſackt the city of Averſa, and don no little harm all about in the country of Campania, were againe pacified by a pay giuen vnto them, and preſently imbarked for Corone, vnder the command H of Rodericus Macicaus their Generall: at which time alſo Frederick of Toledo the Viceroyes ſon with a company of braue Gentlemen went abord, vowing their ſeruice to the ſacred war. The Knights of Malta came thither alſo with their gallies. Whilſt theſe things were doing, Auria to incourage them of Corone, for fear leſt they diſpairing of help, ſhould fall to ſome hard Compoſition with the Turks, ſent Chriſtopher Palavicine (a reſolute young Gentleman of an inuincible courage) with a moſt ſwift Gally to Corone: who by day light paſſing thorow the middeſt of the Turkes fleet, ſafely recouered the hauen, to the great ioy of the beſieged Chriſtians: and ſhortly after, when he had well viewed all things, with the ſtrength and manner of the Enemies lying, and filled the minds of the Defendants with aſſured hope of ſpeedy reſcue, about noon time of the day he ſuddenly brake out again through the middeſt I of his enemies, and as it were miraculouſly eſcaped in ſafety, for all that they could doe, although they ceaſed not to giue him chaſe ſo long as they were in any hope to haue ouertaken him. Auria departing from Naples, came to Meſſana, where beeing certainly informed of the Enemies force both by ſea and land, with the number of their Gallies, and ſeeing that the chief hope of relieuing of the City conſiſted in celerity, ſtayed not for the Gallies which he expected out of Spain, but held on his courſe towards Grecia. For it was told him, that the Enemies fleet dayly encreaſed, by the comming in of the Turkiſh Pyrats; and that Aſſan-Beg (otherwiſe called the Moor of Alexandria) an arch Pyrat was ſtill looked for, in whoſe good directions the Turkiſh Captains repoſed the greateſt hope of their victory. When he was come as far as Zacynthus, he was informed by the Venetians, that Luſtibeius Baſſa (or rather Lutzis Baſſa) the Turks great Admiral, and Solymans brother in law, with Solyman of Acarnania, and the Moore (men for their skil at ſea of great fame and reputation) lay before Corone, with eighty gallies manned with diuers companies of the old Ianizaries: ſo that it was thought a matter of exceeding peril for him to aduenture to relieue the town, except he took the aduantage of ſome proſperous gale of wind. Wherfore Auria to haue yet more certaine knowledge of the enemies fleet, ſent before him Chriſtopher Palavicine with one Gally, againe to view the manner of the enemies lying: Who paſſing the promontorie of Acrytes, ſaw al the Turks great fleet lying in very good order before the City; and ſo returned to Auria, confirming that which the Venetians had before reported; and that the Turks fleet was greatly encreaſed, and lay ready as it ſhould ſeem to giue him battel ſo ſoon as he ſhould approch the L City. For all that, Auria nothing diſmaid with the greatnes of the Turks fleet, made no ſtay, but ſtil kept on his courſ, & with a fair gale of wind paſſing the promontory Acrites, came directly towards Corone. Two great Gallions, of all the fleet the moſt warlike ſhips, came formoſt; wherof the one was Auria's own, which he had built with a wonderfull charge; and the other was of Sicilia. Theſe two great ſhips were appointed by Auria to turn a little vpon the left hand; and at ſuch time as the Enemie ſhould ſet forward from the ſhore, to caſt anchor betwixt both the fleets; that as occaſion ſhould ſerue, they might as out of two ſtrong Caſtles beat the Turks gallies with their great Ordnance, wherewith they were for that purpoſe wonderfully ſtored. Next vnto theſe great Gallions followed the other warlike ſhips with ful ſails: after whom came the gallies in three ſquadrons, wherof Salviatus had the leading of M the right wing, which conſiſted of the Biſhop of Romes gallies, & them of Malta. In the left wing and neer to the enemy commanded Antonius Auria: and in the midſt was Auria himſelf. At the firſt ſight of the Chriſtian fleet the Turks moued not from the ſhore, but diſcharged their ordnance at them afar off, and then began to ſet forward and to draw neerer; eſpecially the Auria ſent to relieue Corona.

The order of Auria's fleet before Corona.

A the Moor, who with greater courage than the reſt aſſailed the ſide and rereward of the fleet: for the Chriſtians keeping their courſe right forth to Corone, & turning nothing to the left hand, as was before appointed, ſeemed as if they fled; and ſo much the more, for that the gallies in the right wing, for fear of the Turks great ordnance, did ſet a great compaſſe farther off into the ſea, and many of the middle ſquadron and of the left wing alſo, had diſorderly thruſt themſelues in among the ſhips, although they had receiued little or no harme of the enemies great ſhot.

The Chriſtians fleet diſordred.

In this confuſion of the Chriſtian Navy, the Moor requeſted Lutzis the Admiral not to let ſlip ſo fair an occaſion, wherein the Chriſtian fleet might eaſily haue bin ouerthrowne. But whilſt Lutzis doth ſlowly and conſideratly ſet forward, Auria in the mean time had put his B fleet again in order, and with a fair wind was come to Corone. Two of the ſhips by the way falling one foul on another, ſtaid behind, being not able to keep way with the reſt: about which all the Turks gallies preſently flockt, and took the leſſer of them, killing all the Spaniards they found therin. Out of this they boorded the greater, and with a bloudy fight had woon the forecaſtle and waſt of the ſhip: when Auria, accounting it no ſmal diſhonour to haue his ſhips ſo ſurpriſed at his heels, cauſed all his gallies to turne againe vpon the enemy to reſcue thoſe ſhips. The Turks ſeeing that, & with the Weſterly wind by little and little fallen down ſo far with the ſhips, that they were come within the danger of the ſhot of the Towne, began with great ſtir to forſake the ſhips, and to betake them to their oars, and ſo in maner of flight withdrew themſelues: whom Auria purſued a great way to Modon, thundring in their poups C with his great ſhot, which he liberally beſtowed among them: whilſt in the mean time Antonius Auria came to reſcue the two diſtreſſed ſhips. There the Spaniards which but a little before had hardly maintained their cloſe fights, began now as men reuiued, to ſhew themſelues, & couragiouſly to make reſiſtance: and they which came with Antonius Auria to their reſcue, entring with wonderfull celerity on euery ſide, ſlew and tooke 300 Ianizaries, which with great courage had entred thoſe ſhips, & were there left by the ſudden departure of their fellows. Amongſt whom was taken one Ioſuphus an old captain of 1000 Ianizaries; to whom Auria after he was come to Corone, gaue a fair ſuit of apparel and a chain of gold, and ſo ſet him at liberty without any ranſom: therby to prouoke the Turks to the like kind of curteous dealing toward the Chriſtians. Aſſam-Beg the pyrat, and the other captains of the Turks fleet, D wonderfully blamed Lutzis the Admirall, for that hee would not then fight with the Chriſtians, when he was therto earneſtly requeſted, both by the captains and ſoldiers in general, and had a fair opportunitie of victory offered, at ſuch time as the Chriſtians fleet was diſordred. But he excuſed himſelf, ſaying, That it was giuen him in ſpeciall charge by Solyman the Emperor, That he ſhould in any caſe reſpect the ſafety of his navy, and not to come vnto the haſard of a battel. The Turks which beſieged the city by land, vpon the approch of the Chriſtian fleet forſook their trenches and fled. At which time Mendoza the gouernour ſallying out, took great ſtore of victuall and warlike prouiſion, which the Turkes had for haſt left behinde them. So Auria to his great honor hauing driuen the Turks from Corone both by ſea & land, furniſhed the city with ſtore of corn, wine, victual, pouder & ſhot; and commited the defence E therof to Maricaus & the companies of the mutinous Spaniards which he had brought from Naples. Comforting the Greeks, and exhorting them, patiently for a while to endure thoſe calamities of war: ſaying, that the Emperor would the next year make war againſt the Turks both by ſea and land in Peloponeſus, and free them from their bondage. And ſo imbarking the old garriſon of the Spaniards, departed from Corone, and came before Modon, where he lay as it were brauing the Turks great Admiral, hoping therby to draw him out of that ſtrong harbor to battel. But when he ſaw that the enemie could by no meanes be allured out of his ſtrength, or aſſailed as he lay, he departed from thence to Corcyra, and ſo back again to Meſſana in Sicilia.

Within a few dayes after, Aſſam-Beg the Moore of Alexandria, and moſt famous Pyrat, F lying in wait for the merchants ſhips of Venice comming out of Syria with merchandiſe, by chance met with Hieronymus-Canalis vpon the coaſt of Creet: Where in the night time was fought betwixt them a fierce and cruell battell; wherein of the Moores thirteene Gallies, foure were ſunke, three taken, and the reſt hauing loſt moſt part of their Rowers, fled to Alexandria. thouſand other Turks. Of all that were taken, there was ſcarſly one ſaued but the Moor himſelf,who grieuouſly wounded in the face,for ſafegard of his life was glad to diſcouer himſelf: for the Venetians maintaining their ſtate by trade and traffique,do of all others ſhew leaſt fauor to pyrats. When the Moor had made himſelf known vnto Canalis,there was great care taken for the curing of his wounds,and either of them began with notable diſſimulation to excuſe the matter to other;ſaying,That they were both deceiued by the likenes of their gallies, and miſtaking of their friends for enemies: when as for all that, they knew one another right well. For the Moor ſaid,That he took thoſe Venetian Gallies to haue bin part of Auria his fleet: and Canalis excuſed himſelf,by ſaying that he miſtook him for Barbaruſſa, who a few years before had ſurpriſed three of the Venetian gallies. Yet the Venetians doubting how Solyman would take the matter,by their embaſſador ſought to excuſe what was don,as a thing hapning by error and miſchance. Of which excuſe Solyman accepted,and ſaid moreouer,That Canalis had don wel and ſoldier-like,to repulſ by force the wrong that was offered him. Three of the Emperors gallies ſtaying behind the reſt of the fleet,were neer vnto the promontory of Palinurus,vpon the coaſt of Apulia,intercepted and caried away by Sinan,ſyrnamed the Iew, a notable pyrat of that time alſo.

The garriſon ſoldiers of Corone deſire of their Generall to be brought to ſome ſeruice.

Macicaus Gouernour of Corone goeth out to ſurpriſe Andruſſa.

The Winter following,the Spaniards and Greeks in Corone began to want victuals,eſpecially wine and fleſh,for the Turks had ſo blocked vp the city,that nothing was to be had out of the country: wherfore the ſoldiers requeſted Macicaus their gouernor and Generall,to lead them forth to ſome piece of ſeruice againſt the enemy,forſomuch as they were not to expect any reliefe elſwhere before Aprill; wiſhing rather valiantly to die like men in fight againſt the Turks,than to languiſh within thoſe dead walls for want of victuall. But Macicaus mindfull of his charge, ſought by reaſons to diſſuade them from that purpoſe;ſhewing them what an offence it were, raſhly to depart out of the city committed to their charge, which might be vnto them dangerous, although they ſhould ſpeed neuer ſo well; and that thoſe wants, which they rather feared than felt, would well enough be ouercome by ſparing and patience; and therfore told them plainly,that he was reſolutely ſet downe to keep the city for the Emperour,and to endure all hardnes,rather than to incurre the infamy,That he had forſaken the City,and betrayed his Garriſon. Yet for all this,the matter was ſo vrged by Didacus Tovarres and Hermoſilla,both great Captains,and by the general importunity of the ſouldiers, that Macicus was inforced to yeeld to their deſire, and to promiſe them to go:yet proteſting withall, That he did it altogether againſt his will,rather inforced that perſuaded vnto that,wherof he had no great hope of ſucces. Amongſt other that were ſo forward in that action, was one Barbatius a moſt valiant Greek,who could perfectly ſpeak the Turks language,and of all others beſt knew the by-waies and ſecret paſſages of the country: he vndertooke to bee their guid,and by priuat waies to bring them to the enemies vndiſcouered in the dead time of the night,when as they feared no ſuch matter. So Macicaus commending the cuſtody of the city to Liſcanius and Mendeſius,with charge that they ſhould ſuffer no man to go out of the City after his departure,for fear of giuing any knowledge vnto the enemy, ſet forward about ten a clock at night toward Andruſſa, Barbatius being his guid;who ſhunning the common beaten waies,brought them by ſecret and vncouth paths that night halfe the way to Andruſſa. But vpon the riſing of the Sunne, he brought them into a ſecret wooddy Vally, where they reſted and refreſhed themſelues all that day,and ſetting forward again that night, came to Andruſſa before day. In this town,which was of no great ſtrength, lay one Caranus a warlike Captain,with three thouſand footmen,wherof the one half was of the Ianizaries; and in the ſuburbs lay Achomates with a thouſand choſen horſmen, with which garriſon the Turks kept all that ſide of Peloponeſus in awe. Macicaus brought by his guid vnto the place where his enemies lay,went directly to the town to haue ſurpriſed it: Hermoſilla in the mean time ſtanding ſtil with certain troups of Spaniards ouer againſt the place where the horſmen lay. But this could not be done with ſo great ſilence,but that ſome of the horſe-boyes beeing awak, diſcouered them by the fire in their matches; who firſt awaked the negligent watchmen,& afterwards raiſed an alarm in the ſuburbs. Wherupon Hermoſilla couragiouſly ſet vpon the horſmen, being altogether vnready, and ſlew many of them before they could arme themſelues, and ſet fire alſo vpon the ſtables wherin the Turks horſes ſtood, with the extraordinarie rage wherof many of the Turks periſhed,with their horſes and armor. Great and terrible was the

A noiſe raiſed vpon the ſudden in the ſuburbs ; but eſpecially of the horſes,which burnt as they ſtood faſt tied in the ſtables,or by chance breaking looſe, ranne vp and down with their tailes and mains of a light fire:by occaſion whereof an alarm was raiſed in the town, and the Turkes got to the wals before the Spaniards could enter. Macicaus himſelf laboring to breake in at a poſtern, was ſhot in the head with a ſmall ſhot and ſlain:diuers others neer him were there alſo ſlain. The Turks perceiuing the ſmall number of their enemies,ſallied out vpon them and inforced them to retyre to Hermoſilla, who had already made great ſpoil among the horſmen; by whoſe skilfull direction the Spaniards retired in ſo good order,making many ſtands,with their harquebuſiers all drawn into the rereward,that ſuch of the Turkes as were moſt forward to purſue them,did by their death cauſe the reſt to make leſſe haſt. Achomates with ſuch of B his horſmen as had eſcaped the fire,haſted thither alſo,bringing with him 200 harquebuſiers which he had cauſed his horſemen for haſt to take vp behinde them vpon their horſes : but whilſt he ſought eagerly to be reuenged vpon his enemies,and with too much heat preſſed on with the formoſt,he was ſhot into the body with a bullet and ſlain. So the horſmen hauing before receiued a great loſſe as they lay in their lodgings , accounting it in their good haps that they were not there al ſlain,and hauing now loſt their captain,ceaſed any further to pur-ſue their enemies,but returned. The Spaniards and Greeks although they were wearied both with their long march and euill ſucces, retired ſtil as reſolute men ready to fight, and ſo returned to Corone. Preſently after,the Turkiſh gariſon remoued from Andruſſa to Megalopolis,now called Londarium. After whoſe departure the Chriſtian ſoldiers of Corone came C thither and buried the dead bodies of their ſlain fellows (which til then lay vnburied) and brought back with them the head of Macicaus their late General,which the Turkes had there ſet vp vpon a long pole,which they honorably buried at Corone. Not long after,the plague began to grow hot in Corone , ſo much the more grieuous , for that it came accompanied with many other hard difficulties. For which cauſes, the Spaniards as men at once inforced with many extremities,imbarked themſelues with all the great Ordnance, and ſuch Greekes as would go with them,in certain ſhips which came with corn out of Sicily,and ſo departed, leauing the town empty for the Turks to come vnto.

Corone forſaken by the Spaniards.

It was commonly reported, that the Spaniards left Corone not without ſecret conſent of the Emperor;which was the rather thought to be ſo, for that they which forſook the place re-D ceiued therby no diſgrace;and the Emperor himſelf had offered to giue the Town to Clement Biſhop of Rome, the Venetians, and the Knights of Malta, who all refuſed to receiue it, as loth to be at ſo great a charge in keeping a place ſeruing to no greater purpoſe;the very cauſe why the emperor was ſo willing to part with it. Now Clement the great Biſhop had by means of Aloyſius Grittus made a motion of peace,to haue bin concluded for ten years betwixt Soly- man and the Chriſtian Princes,and therupon the Town to haue again bin deliuered vnto the Turks. Which peace Solyman was not altogether vnwilling to grant,being then wholly bent to inuade the Perſian. Ferdinand was alſo in good hope, that his brother Charles the Emperor would for the yeelding vp of that towne,haue couenanted with the Turke ſome great matter for his benefit in Hungary;which was thought would alſo eaſily haue bin granted. But whilſt E the Emperor drawn diuerſly with the conſideration of his honor in keeping it,and of his profit in giuing it vp,ſtood too long in reſoluing; the town in the meane time was by the Spaniards(their neceſſities daily increaſing)abandoned,and ſo left vnto the Turks for nothing.

Solyman now purpoſing to turn his forces againſt the Perſians,of whom he had in the frontiers of his dominion receiued great hurt, eſpecially in Comagene, renued the league he had with the Venetians and ſome other Chriſtian princes : but of all other his affairs with the Chriſtians, he was moſt carefull of the intereſt he had already gotten in Hungary:for it was reported, That King Iohn his Vaſſall, induced by the continuall ſolicitations of his ſubjects, was deſirous of peace with King Ferdinand, vpon condition that he might quietly enioy the kingdom during his life : and after his deceaſe, it to remaine vnto King Ferdinand and his F heirs. Wherfore Solyman,that nothing ſhould be there done in his abſence without his knowledge,ſent Aloyſius Grittus the duke of Venice his ſon(of whom we haue before ſpoken)a man both for the honor of his houſe,the good cariage of himſelfe,and the ſpeciall commendation of Abraham the chief Baſſa,in great credit with him;with commiſſion as his lieutenant to be aſſiſtant vnto king Iohn, in ſuch magnifical ſort, as that without him the king might conclude nothing in matters of ſtate, concerning either peace or wars, with other the Chriſtian princes. With this proud Commiſſion of the grand Seigniour Grittus entred into Tranſylvania, then a part of the Hungarian kingdom (much about the ſame time that Solyman ſet forward from Conſtantinople againſt the Perſian) attended vpon with ſeuen thouſand perſons of one ſort and other, amongſt whom were Vrbanus Batianus, and Ianus Docia, two famous Hungarian captains with their companies, and many of the Turks Ianizaries alſo. At his firſt comming, to make his authority the more known, he ſent out his proud Commaund vnto the great men and gouernors of the cities of that warlike prouince, charging them forthwith to repair vnto him as great Solymans Deputy, authoriſed by him to hear and determine all the controuerſies and matters of ſtate concerning the Kingdom of Hungary. At that time Americus Sihachus Biſhop of Veradium, a man of great nobility and power, withall ſingularly wel qualified, was Vayuod or gouernor of Tranſylvania, an honor next vnto the King. Hee vnderſtanding that Grittus was come into his prouince, and making ſmall haſt to welcome him, as one not greatly mooued at his comming, or much regarding the commandement of Solyman; wonderfully offended Grittus; who deſired nothing more than at his firſt entrance to haue confirmed the opinion of his authority in the minds of the vulgar people, by the preſt and ready attendance of the Vayuod. But it was reported, that the ſtout Biſhop vpon a Chriſtian zeal deteſted the friendſhip of the Turks, and could not wel brooke that they ſhould be too much acquainted in his prouince, for fear leſt that fruitful country abounding with men and horſes, ſhould by one means or other fall into their hands. Grittus was come to Baxovia, when he vnderſtood that the Vayuod was comming with a great train, and lay about ten miles off, incamped with diuers gallant troups of horſemen, in warlike maner appointed: for the Biſhops of Hungary being wonderfull rich, were by old cuſtom bound to keep great numbers of horſmen, which as occaſion ſerued, they vſed to bring into the field againſt the Turks; accounting it great honor, with their religious hands to defend the cauſe of Religion. But then eſpecially the Nobility of the country wel appointed reſorted on euery ſide, in curteſie to honour and countenance their great Biſhop and gouernor, at whoſe commandement they were: inſomuch as the Biſhops retinue made ſhew of a good army. Which thing mooued Grittus exceedingly, that he ſhould be inforced contrary to his expectation, to parly with the Biſhop in the open fields as with an enemy in the ſight of all their followers. Herof roſe envy, a deadly miſchief always repining at another mans honour; when as the one ſwelling with Turkiſh pride could abide no equall; and the other jealous of his honor, could by no means indure any ſuperior in ſuch place as he had the ſoueraignty of. When theſe two great men had met together in the open field, and there dined more like enemies than friends, without any ſhew of friendſhip or good will; Grittus inwardly chafing at his bare entertainment, couertly threatned to be reuenged vpon all ſuch as ſhould make ſo light account of his authority: and immediatly as he departed from the banquet, taking his Turkiſh cap from his head (which was after the Turkiſh maner made of a high faſhion, of rich ſables) and opening it with both his hands, ſaid, This Cap will not hold two heads, and therfore it muſt be fitted to one, and ſo put it on again. Ianus Docia, one of the Hungarian captains his followers (who deadly hated the Vayuod, for that hee long time before, for a malapert ſpeech in a great aſſembly, gaue him a blow with his fiſt) took hold of that ſpeech of Grittus, as a fit occaſion for him to worke his reuenge, and ſayd; Your Honour maketh a fit compariſon; neither can this prouince contain two equall Gouernors or Commanders, nor you euer enjoy your power and authority, except you do this day with ſpeedy and manly reſolution defend both Solymans credit and your own. You know not this proud beaſt Americus, whoſe pride and inſolency if you but ſay the word, I will quickly pull down: for he hateth Solyman, he regardeth not the King, and of you he maketh no account at all; for why, he aſpireth vnto the majeſty of a king, and ſaith that the Vayuodſhip of Tranſyluania well beſeemeth a King; for that in this countrey Decebaldus the Dacian ſomtime reigned, whom the warlike Emperour Trajan with all the force of the Roman Empire hardly ſubdued. No man can more proudly or arrogantly ſet himſelf forth than he, neither more craftily or cunningly diſſemble to ſerue his own turn. Indeed he hath for faſhion ſake preſented your Honor with a few ſimple preſents, and giuen you his hand alſo, better known for his falſhood than his faith; to the entent that when you are once paſt his country, he may ſcof and jeaſt at your Decrees. Verily he deadly enuies

A your honor and felicity, and grudgeth in his heart that you ſhould ſet down the laws of peace and warre in Hungary: and wheras he doth manifeſtly aſpire vnto a kingdom, he feareth you aboue all others, leſt you ſhould trouble his deſignes, abate his credit, and chaſtiſe his inſolencie. Verily, he that thus malignes your happines, and contemneth your authority, is not to be ſuffered, but by good reaſon to be taken away: thereby at this your firſt entrance to defend the credit of your Commiſſion, and honor of your name. For nothing is more dangerous than a faithleſſe Companion and a ſecret enemy, eſpecially when you ſhall leaue him at your back behind you: for when he ſhall as occaſion ſerues ſhew forth his hidden malice, he ſhall ſo much the more ſlily and deſperatly indanger your perſon. Grittus inraged with this ſpeech more than before, thought it beſt to make haſt, and to vſe his authority to the full: hee commended Docia, and promiſed in ſhort time to requite his good will towards him, eſpecially if he would by B ſome notable attempt abate the Biſhops pride. It is reported, That Grittus gaue him no other charge but to take the Biſhop, that ſo he might after the Turkiſh manner haue ſent him in chains to Conſtantinople, and beſtowed the honor of the Vayuod vpon Hieronymus Laſcus the Polonian, who in hope of that honorable preferment vnto him promiſed by King Iohn, had don him great and faithful ſeruice, as his embaſſador both to Solyman, and to the French king.
But when King Iohn perceiued that hee could not conueniently without manifeſt danger place him (being a Polonian, who could ſcarſe ſpeake the Hungarian language) Gouernour ouer ſuch a warlike people; he as it were inforced by neceſſity, preferred this Americus the biſhop of Veradium, a man of them both reuerenced and feared. Which ſo grieued Laſcus, (a man of great ſtomack and experience, and therunto excellently learned) that he would neuer C admit any excuſe of the Kings, but euer after complained that he was by the King deluded.
Neuertheles he kept himſelf within the bounds of loyaltie, and enioied certain lands & towns which the King had giuen him in the borders of Polonia: but eſtranged from him in minde, he was now becom one of Grittus his followers, hoping of his better preferment by his means vnto Solyman; and for that cauſe was not ſo forward to do the King ſuch ſeruice as he had in times paſt. Now by the commandement of Grittus, a ſtrong company of Turkiſh horſemen, and certain troups of Hungarians, were deliuered to Docia; who ſecretly departing that night from Baxovia, came ſuddenly to the Vayuods camp; hauing a little before by his Hungarian ſpies learned that he lay in the open fields in his tent, by reaſon of the great heat, without any Watch or gard, attended on only by his pages and houſhold ſeruants, as a man without fear; D and that all the reſt of his retinue lay diſperſed in the Countrey Villages round about. All which ſerued ſo well for Docia his purpoſe, that the Vayuod ignorant of his death ſo nigh at hand (who rather contemned than feared his enemies) was ſuddenly oppreſſed by Docia his ſouldiers: ſo that whilſt he was yet lying in his bed, and ſcarcely wel awaked by his Chamberlains and the noiſe of the enemy; Docia ſuddenly breaking into his tent, cut off his head as he lay. All they which lay neere, amaſed at the ſuddennes of the matter, fled away for fear, and left their horſes and other things for a prey vnto the Turks and other of Docia his followers.
Docia hauing don ſo great an outrage, returned to Grittus, preſenting vnto him the Vayuods head, which he brought in his hand by the ear. Laſcus was then preſent, but altogether ignorant of the murther, who as a man mooued with natural compaſſion in ſo ſudden and horrible E a fact, and forgetting all former grudges (as in like caſe it oftentimes chanceth) ſtood as one diſmayed, nothing reioycing at the vnworthy death of his enemy. To whom Grittus turning himſelfe, ſaid, Laſcus, Doeſt thou not know this ſhauen pate? truely it is a great mans head, but of ſuch a one as was very ambitious, rebellious, and proud. To whom Laſcus replied, Truly though I loued him not, yet I thought it not ſo whilſt it ſtood vpon his ſhoulders; diſallowing therin the cruelty of the fact. Which thing Grittus perceiuing, began to repent him of that was done, and ſaid openly, That although he was worthily ſlain, yet he could haue wiſhed rather to haue had him taken priſoner. The report of this horrible murther once bruted abroad, the Biſhops kinſmen and friends, yea almoſt all the people of that prouince, roſe vp in arms againſt Grittus to reuenge the death of that reuerend Biſhop, whom liuing they had F both loued & feared. Neuer did any people in reuenge of a common wrong riſe in arms with greater deſire, more heat, or quicker ſpeed: ſo that in few days there were aſſembled together 40000 horſe and foot, vnder the leading of Stephanus Maylat a valiant Gentleman, who of all other moſt honored the Biſhop, and in that common grief took vpon him as Chiefe, the perſecuting of the authours of ſuch inhumane cruelty. Grittus perceiung how grieuouſly the matter was taken, with the danger he was in, began to doubt with himſelfe what courſe were G beſt for him to take. To go forward, and to fall into the hands of the furious people, the ſame was preſent death; and to return and leaue the honour of the deputation he had with ſo great expectation of al men taken vpon him, was vnto his aſpiring mind no leſſe torment than death it ſelf. Thus perplexed, he with all ſpeed got himſelf with his followers to the ſtrong towne of Mege, in hope to ſhroud himſelf vntil the rage of the country people were either of it ſelf appeaſed (as it oftentimes falleth out in ſudden tumults) or els til he ſhould be relieued by King Iohn, or the Turkes Sanzacks which had the charge of the frontiers of the Turkiſh Empire.

The townſmen of Mege ſeeing Grittus accompanied with ſo many Turks, ſhut the gates againſt him: yet at length by the perſuaſion of the two Hungarian Captains Docia and Baiana, they gaue him leaue to enter into the baſe Towne, hauing before retyred themſelues and H all their ſubſtance vnto the higher town, which in maner of a ſtrong Caſtle commaunded the lower. Here whilſt Grittus with all carefulnes fortifieth the place, and diſpatcheth truſty meſſengers vnto his friends abroad for aid; his enemies with hideous noiſe and outcries approching the town, at their firſt comming attempted to haue ſcaled the Walls and rampiers therof. Which thing whilſt they diſorderly did, with greater fury than diſcretion, they were eaſily repulſed, and many of them ſlaine by the Turkes Ianizaries and harquebuſiers. After which loſſe, by the direction of Maylat their Generall they withdrew themſelues out of the danger of the ſhot, and incamped on euery ſide of the town; hoping, as the truth was, that the enemy vnprouided of victual, could not long hold the place, but muſt of neceſſity ſtarue with famin, or yeeld it vp. In the mean time Grittus reſolutely induring all the calamities of a man I beſieged, fel ſick, and ſo much the more, for that he could hear nothing of any aid he expected from his friends. For King Iohn glad in his minde of the diſtreſſe of the Ouerſeer, or rather competitor of his kingdome; and alſo knowing that he could not without great diſcontentment of his ſubjects oppoſe himſelf againſt ſuch a multitude, riſen vpon ſo iuſt a cauſe; yet for faſhion ſake ſent certain troups of horſmen to his relief: who not altogether ignorant of the Kings minde, made ſuch haſt as men that purpoſed not to come in time to doe him good.
As for the Turks Sanzacks of Belgrade and Samandria, they enuying at his honor, flatly refuſed to depart from their charge to relieue him, without expres command from Solyman himſelf: and Laſcus (before one of Grittus his chief followers, but now a beholder of his diſtreſſe) when he had a little before departed from him to procure him ſome reliefe, as hee promiſed, K did now in his extremity forſake him alſo. The citiſens of the vpper town (who a great while had ſtood looking on from aboue as men indifferent) perceiuing the full reſolution of their countrymen to be reuenged, and the difficulties wherwith the Turkes were incloſed, aſſailed them alſo from the high town. Grittus thus beſet on euery ſide, offered vnto the Tranſylvanians a great maſſe of mony to ſuffer him to paſſe farther into Hungary: but their furious minds more deſirous of reuenge than mony, were not to be moued with any gold. In fine, hee ſent rich jewels to the gouernor of Moldavia his friend, to be ready at a certain hour when he purpoſed to ſally out of the town, to receiue him with certaine troups of horſemen; ſo if it were poſſible to ſaue himſelf and his children. Grittus (whether it were vpon a doubtful hope, or vrged by inevitable deſtiny) ſallying out of the town at the appointed time, with Solymans commiſſion L in his hand, and miſſing of the Moldavian, fell vpon Francis Schenden the late Biſhops nigh kinſman, and Maylats familiar friend; who furiouſly running in vpon him with tumultuous ſpeech, violently caught from his head his rich cap of Sables, and with his horſemen took him, being weak with ſicknes, and making no reſiſtance. His followers, eſpecially the Turks, incloſed on euery ſide, were either ſlain or taken. But Grittus himſelfe being brought to the Generals Tent, beſet round with his armed enemies, and there examined, Why he had commanded the Vayuod to be ſlain; erneſtly proteſted that he neuer commaunded any ſuch thing, and that it was don without his knowledge. Which his anſwer ſerued not his turne, all the people crying out againſt him with one voice, that he ſhould as a ſacrifice be offered vnto the Vayuods ghoſt. Wherupon he was by Maylat deliuered again to Francis Schenden to be executed, M who without delay cauſed his head to be ſtruck off. The Nobilitie and the Vayuods kinſmen (after the maner of that people) dipped ſome part of their garments in his bloud, the longer to keep in mind the remembrance of the reuenge. This was the ſhamefull end of Aloyſius Grittus the Duke of Venice his ſon, Solymans Deputy in Hungary, with whom hee was Grittus beheaded.

A in ſuch credit as neuer was any Chriſtian abounding in wealth and worldly felicity: but climing too faſt vp the euil ſtaued ladder of ambition, ſuddenly fel and neuer roſe more. The executioner ſtripping his dead body, found about him ſo many pretious ſtones and jewels as were valued at forty millions of ducats. And not long after, Laſcus ſent for by the King to Buda, was ſtreitly examined vpon torture, concerning Grittus his Commiſſion and purpoſes, and was in great danger of his life: but at laſt by the interceſſion of Sigiſmund King of Polonia, he was ſet at liberty, and ſo fled out of Hungary vnto Sigiſmunds court in Polonia: after he had long time wearied himſelf, and aduentured his life in the Hungarian ſtate. Docia the author of this tragedy was by the furious people afterwards rent in pieces and ſo periſhed.

The riches ſoūd about Grittus.

The ſame time that Grittus went from Conſtantinople into Hungary, Solyman the Turkiſh B Emperor dreading no danger out of Europ, took in hand two great expeditions both at one time; the one by land into Aſia againſt the Perſians, and the other by ſea into Africke againſt the Moors: promiſing to himſelf in his inordinat deſires, the monarchy of the whole world in ſhort time, if he might ſubdue theſe two great Nations, whom he had already in hope deuoured. But foraſmuch as all canot be told at once, which was at one time in diuers places ſo far diſtant don, omitting for a while the expedition made in perſon himſelf againſt the Perſians, we wil firſt declare what he did by his lieutenants againſt the Moors. Hariadenus, ſyrnamed of the Chriſtians Barbaruſſa (who ſucceeding his elder brother Horruccius in the kingdome of Algiers in Africk, had by many victories ſo inlarged the kingdom before gotten by his brother, that his name and power was now become terrible both to the Chriſtians & wild Moors, C and his fame grown great in the Turkiſh court) was the chief author and perſuader of Solyman to inuade Africk. But it ſhal not (as I think) be far from our purpoſe, briefly to relate by what means thoſe two Mytilene brethren, baſely born, crept out of a ſmal galliot vnto the majeſty of great Kings; that herin they which come afterward may alſo admire the wonderfull changes and chances of theſe worldly things, now vp, now downe, as if the life of man were not of much more certainty than a ſtage play.

Soliman purpoſeth to inuade Perſia and Affrick at once.

Theſe two brethren Horruccius and Hariadenus, born at Mytilene in the Iſland of Lesbos, weary of the poor and baſe eſtate they led at home with their father a renegat Grecian; ſtealing a little galliot, committed themſelues & all the hope of their good fortune to ſea, where by chance they conſorted themſelues with Camales a moſt famous pyrat of that time; vnder D whom Horruccius the elder brother for his forwardnes became a captain: and growing rich by many purchaſes, and alſo ſtrong with gallies and ſlaues which he had at ſundry times taken; and at laſt conſorting himſelf with Haidin, Sinan the Iew, Salec, and other leſſe pyrats (who afterward became men of great fame and account) ouer whom he commanded as an arch pirat, came ſeeking after purchaſe as far as Mauritania. At which time Selymes King of Iulia Cæſarea, now called Algiers, was in arms againſt his brother Mechemetes competitor of the kingdom; who aided by the Numidians, now commonly called Arabians, put his brother in great doubt of his eſtate. Selymes glad of the comming of Horruccius and the other pyrats his followers, with a great maſſe of mony paid before hand, induced Horruccius and the reſt to take vpon them the defence of him and his kingdom againſt his brother. Which thing E Horruccius ſo happily performed (eſpecially by the means of his harquebuſiers, as then no ſmal terror to the wild Moors and Numidians) that in ſhort time he repulſed that ſauage people, and ſet Selymes at peace in his kingdom. Horruccius being a man of a ſharp wit, and by nature ambitious, noting in the time of his ſeruice the Kings milde and ſimple diſpoſition void of all diſtruſt; and that the naked Moors were no ſoldiers, but a light and vnconſtant people, alwayes at variance among themſelues; and that the wandring Numidians liuing barely, diuided into many factions, were eaſily by reward to be won, or by force conſtrained; ſuddenly falſified his faith, and villanouſly ſlew Selymes the King, as hee was bathing himſelfe, miſtruſting nothing leſſe than the falſhood of the pyrat: & in the ſame hurle, murdring ſuch as he thought would withſtand his deſire, and with bounty and cruelty ouercomming the reſt, ſo wrought the matter, F that he was by general conſent choſen king of Algiers. Thus of a pyrat become a king, he ſhortly after by policie ſurpriſed Circello (a famous city about 60 miles diſtant from Algiers) by his ſoldiers ſent thither in the habit of Merchants. After that, he by his brother Hariadenus, no les valiant than himſelfe, troubled all the Mediteranian ſea from Algiers with his gallies, & al his neighbors: himſelf by land with daily incurſions leauing nothing vntoucht, which might by force or policy be had; ſo that his power daily increaſed, men of ſeruice continually reſorting vnto him, as the chiefe man in all thoſe parts. Not thus contented, he to enlarge G his kingdome, draue the Spaniards out of Bugea, a city famous both for the great trade thither, and for the Mahometan ſchoole ſometime their kept: at the taking whereof he loſt his right hand with a ſhot, and in ſtead thereof euer after vſed a hand of yron, wherewith he obtained many worthy victories againſt his enemies: for neere to Algiers he ouerthrew an army of the Spaniards, with Diego de Vara their Generall. And ſhortly after, at ſuch time as Hugo Moncada returning out of Italy with the old Spaniſh ſouldiers, landed in his country, he enforced him againe to ſea; where he with all his expert ſouldiers either periſhed by ſhipwrack, or driuen on ſhore, were ſlain or taken priſoners by Horruccius, and thruſt into his gallies. At laſt hauing in ſundry battels ouercome the King of Tremiſſa, Charles the Emperour his confederat, H and thruſt him out of his kingdome, he ſtirred vp both the Chriſtians and Numidians againſt him: ſo that comming to take Ora and Portus (two ſtrong holds kept by garriſons of Spaniards ſent thither to aid the King of Tremiſſa) he was by them and the Moors at the firſt repulſed, and afterwards quite ouerthrowne: where moſt part of his army being ſlaine or taken priſoners, he with a few of his friends ſought to ſaue themſelues by flight ouer the deſart ſands; and ſeeing himſelfe hardly purſued by his enemies, ſcattered many pieces of gold vpon the ſands as he fled, thereby to haue ſtaied their haſty purſuit: but they more deſirous of him than of his gold, followed ſo faſt, that at laſt they ouertooke him, and without further delay ſtrucke off his head, which was afterwards ſent into Spaine, and carried vpon a lance through all the townes and cities along the ſea coaſt; to the wonderfull rejoycing of the people, vnto I whom he had in former time done great harme.

Horruccius ſlaine, and his head carried about in Spain.

Hariadenus ſyrnamed Barbaruſſa, ſucceedeth his brother Horruccius in the kingdome of Algiers.

After the death of Horruccius, Hariadenus inferiour to his brother neither in courage nor martiall proweſſe, by the generall conſent of the ſouldiers tooke vpon him the kingdome of Algiers. He, made heire not only of his brothers kingdome, but of his vertues and haughty thoughts, and of the ſyrname alſo of Barbaruſſa, began forthwith to aſpire vnto the Empire of all that part of Affricke; accounting what he had already gotten, too little and too baſe to anſwer his deſires. Wherefore he entred into armes, and became a terrour both to the Moores and Numidians; holding peace with ſome, and wars with others, as beſt ſerued his purpoſe:
and with his gallies robbed and ſpoiled the coaſts of Spaine, Sardinia, and the Iſlands Baleares; fortune ſo fauoring him in all his enterpriſes, that he became both famous & fearful to all K his enemies. He ſlew Hamet, a great commander among the Numidians, and chaſed Benchades and Amida, two of their greateſt Princes, out of the country: and with like fortune at ſea, ouercame Hugo Moncada, a famous Spaniard, who ſore wounded, had much ado to ſaue himſelfe by flight, when he had loſt diuers of his gallies. He alſo in battell at ſea ouerthrew Rodericus Portundus, Admirall of Spaine: in which fight the Admirall and his ſon were both ſlaine, and ſeuen of his gallies taken: in token of which victory, he ſent part of the rich ſpoile there taken, with the Admirals enſigne, as a preſent vnto Solyman, whereby he became famous in the Turks court; but much more, after he had repulſed Auria from Cercenna, and taken two great Genoway ſhips which were comming to Auria loaded with men and munition; the loſſe whereof filled the city of Genoa with much ſorrow. All things ſorting thus according to his deſire, L and his name become no leſſe terrible in Spaine, Italy, Sicily, and the Iſlands of the Mediterranian, than it was in the greateſt part of Affricke; Solyman grieued with the loſſe of Corone, Patras, and the caſtles vpon the ſtreits of Lepanto, taken from him by Auria, Himerales his Admirall being ſhamefully put to flight: by the counſell of his Baſſaes, but eſpecially of Abraham the chiefe Baſſa, ſent Embaſſadours vnto him to Algiers; offering him the greateſt honours of his court, and to make him Admirall of all his fleet, if he would forthwith repaire vnto Conſtantinople: for why, he was the only man in all mens judgements, who for his yeres and great experience at ſea, as well as for his inuincible courage, and glory of his late atchieued kingdome, was to be compared with Auria, and to be oppoſed againſt the Chriſtian fleet. Sinas a great man in Solymans court, was with this embaſſage ſent, and ſpeedily tranſported M to Algiers by Mangalis, a famous pyrat, then Gouernour of the Rhodes; who at his landing, was honourably receiued by Barbaruſſa, and audience giuen him. Barbaruſſa vnderſtanding the cauſe of his comming, was exceeding glad thereof, preſently conceiuing no ſmall hope of obtaining the Monarchy of Affricke, if hee might once come to Solymans preſence, and

His wonderfull ſucceſſe.

Solyman ſends for Barbaruſſa.

A and at large ſhew vnto him the ſtate of Affricke, and power of the Chriſtians, with their continuall diſcord amongſt themſelues. Wherefore without further delay committing the protection of his ſon Aſanes (then about eighteene yeares old) and the gouernment of the new gotten kingdome to Ramada and Agis, two of his nigh kinſemen and aſſured friends, of whoſe fidelity he doubted not: he with forty of his owne gallies in moſt warlike manner appointed, ſet forward with Solymans Embaſſadour towards Conſtantinople: where by the way he met with a fleet of Gonoway ſhips bound for Sicily for corne, which after a ſharpe a cruell fight he tooke and burnt. After that, landing by night in the Countrey of Elba, not farre from Naples, hee ſuddenly ſurpriſed Rhium a rich city; where loading his gallies with the wealth thereof, and carrying away with him all the inhabitants into captiuity, he arriued at Conſtantinople B in the yeare 1533, where he was by the great courtiers brought to Solyman, of whom he was joyfully receiued, if it were but for the preſents which he gaue him: which were faire boyes and young maidens ſumptuouſly apparelled, eunuchs, and wild beaſts of Lybia, as Lyons, Leopards and ſuch like. But after he had certaine daies diſcourſed at large with his great Baſſa's, of the ſtate of Affricke, the ſtrength of the Chriſtians, and how the wars were to be managed, he was afterwards by them ſeldomer ſent for, and offering himſelfe into their company, was hardly admitted: for enuy (the inſeparable companion of growing honour) had quickely ouertaken him in the Court, ſo that many men letted not openly to ſay, It had not bin the faſhion of the Othoman Kings, to prefer pyrats (the worſt kind of theeues) to the honor of their great Admirall; and that there wanted not, neither euer would want men both vertuous C and valiant in the Turks court, which could with great honour maintaine and augment the glory of the Turkiſh Empire both by ſea and land; whereas he had againſt all right and conſcience, by ſhameful treachery intruded himſelfe into another mans kingdom in Affricke, and there perſecuted the Mahometan Princes and people, being of no religion himſelfe, as one that was borne of a renegate Greeke, and had from his youth liued as a mercileſſe pyrat, and common enemy of mankinde. By which ſpeeches Barbaruſſa perceiued in how euill time Abraham Baſſa his beſt friend, and by whoſe meanes he was ſent for, was abſent from Court; who at that time was gone into Comagena, and Wintred at Aleppo, with purpoſe (as Solymans forerunner) with the firſt of the next Spring, to paſſe ouer Euphrates againſt the Perſian. After long ſuit and much expectation, Solyman anſwered Barbaruſſa by Ajax and Caſimes two of the D great Baſſa's, That all the matter concerning him ſhould be referred to the diſcretion of Abraham the chiefe Baſſa, for that he was by his counſell eſpecially ſent for out of Affricke: wherefore if he did expect any thing, he ſhould repaire vnto him in Syria, that according to his graue judgement all things might be ordered. Barbaruſſa thus reiected into Syria, although he well perceiued that it tended to his no ſmall diſgrace; yet in hope by ſufferance to obtaine another kingdome, ſeemed contented with the anſwer, and reſolued forthwith to take vpon him that long and painefull journy: which the old king luſtily performed, and ſo poſting by land thorow Aſia the leſſe, and trauelling ouer the mountain Amanus, then couered with deep ſnow, came in the dead time of Winter to Aleppo in Syria, where he was honourably receiued by the great Baſſa, and heard at large, to his ſo good contentation and liking, that he deemed E him of all others the fitteſt to command the Turks power at ſea; and to that purpoſe writ commendatory letters in his behalfe to Solyman: wiſhing him for his ſufficience to place him as the fourth with the other three Baſſa's of his counſell. After Barbaruſſa was againe arriued at Conſtantinople with theſe letters, and that it was once knowne how effectually the chiefe Baſſa had commended him to Solyman, it was a world to ſee how on the ſudden the face of the court was changed vpon him, euery man either for friendſhip or flattery began now to ſpeake of his praiſes, and to extoll his worthineſſe: who was now in all mens mouthes but Barbaruſſa! ſo great was the power and authority of the chiefe Baſſa, that being abſent, yet was his approbation of all men accounted ſufficient to prefer whom he pleaſed; and his letters lawes to the reſt of the court. Barbaruſſa had brought with him from Algiers, one Roſcetes the elder brother F of Mulcaſſes king of Tunes, who wrongfully driuen into exile by his yonger brother, had liued certain yeres at Algiers, but now by the perſuaſion of Barbaruſſa was come with him to Conſtantinople, to craue aid of Solyman againſt the oppreſſion of his brother. Him Barbaruſſa oftentimes ſhewed vnto the great Baſſa's, and in his diſcourſes with them concerning the conqueſt of Affricke, ſet him out as a moſt fit inſtrument for ſubduing of the kingdom of Tunes, as a man whom the people more affected than they did Muleaſſes the vſurper. After long deliberation G and conſultation had with the Baſſaes concerning the inuaſion of Affricke, Barbaruſſa now admitted vnto the preſence of Solyman, in theſe or like words perſuaded him to that war, for the entrance whereunto we haue thus far digreſſed.

Barbaruſſa his ſpeech to Solyman to perſuade him to inuade Tunes.

What thing the Prieſts with loud voice vſe to pray for, at ſuch time as the Othoman Emperors enter into the Temple to pray, the ſame thing do I alſo wiſh vnto thee moſt mighty Solyman; which is, That thou ſhouldeſt remember, thy progenitors by Iuſtice and Religion to haue got for thee this Empire, than which, more magnificent and richer the gods haue not giuen to any: Fortune hath neuer deceiued them that troad that way, and thou hitherto haſt ſo traced their ſteps, that thou haſt eaſily ſurmounted their fame and glory, adminiſtring Iuſtice to thy ſubjects; and inflamed with the hope of eternall praiſe, making H continuall war againſt the enemies of our religion, the true office of a zealous Prince. By this meanes is Belgrade taken, Rhodes won, the King of Hungary ſlaine in battell, Germany twice harried and burnt: ſo that Charles, whom the Chriſtians would make equall to thy ſelfe in power and valour, with the great aid almoſt of all the Chriſtian Nations, terrified with the noiſe of thy army, ſhunned battell. But foraſmuch as Empires, be they neuer ſo large, or victories be they neuer ſo glorious, can neither ſatisfie the greatneſſe of an heroicall mind, or glut the ſame with glory; thou haſt therefore ſent before thee thy victorious enſignes againſt the Perſians and Parthians, that thoſe Nations who haue wickedly fallen from our Rites, purified as it were by thy ſacred armes, may be again reclaimed to the antient rites of our religion. But be this vnto thy greatneſſe, moſt honourable to attept, and glorious to performe: let it only be lawfull for me now grown an old man in the middeſt of arms & dangers, to declare what is expedient, and briefely to open I ſuch things as I haue by long experience learned to concerne the augmenting of thy fame and Empire elſewhere. Neither would I haue you to take this as preſumptuouſly ſpoken of me: for Fortune hath enough, yea, and more than enough fauoured my deſignes, whom from a poore cottage and bare hope, ſhee hath promoted to glorious victories, great riches, yea, vnto the title and majeſty of a King. But vnto theſe things the gods could giue me nothing better, than to be called for of thee, and ſent for, in Counſell to diſcourſe of matters of greateſt importance: wherefore my aduice ſhall be vnto thee faithfull, and with experience confirmed; which although it be all that it ſeemeth old men can do, yet in my ſound body remaineth ſuch ſtrength, that I dare both promiſe and performe vnto thee my good ſeruice at all aſſaies both by ſea and land. For vnto this only courſe haue I bent my ſelfe day and night from my youth, following the purpoſe and counſell of my valiant brother Hortuccins, (who to extend the bounds of our religion, perſecuted K the Chriſtians both by ſea and land) deſiring nothing more, than that thy fleet and power might once be joyned with my forces and direction, and ſo vnder thy good hap, to be either a commander, or elſe commanded: foraſmuch as it grieueth me not to be commanded by my betters. Of which my deſires if the gods ſhall make me partaker, the Spaniards ſhall ſhortly be driuen quite out of Affricke, thou ſhalt heare that the Moores are gone ouer into Spaine, to repoſſeſſe the kingdome of Granado; That Tunes and Numidia are at thy command; and not to ſpeake of Sardinia, and Corcyra, that Sicilia is ours: which once taken, we ſhall ſterue vp Italy, and on euery ſide diſtreſſe it with our fleet, being now weake and brought low by the diſcord of the Princes, and that part thereof both toward Sicilia and Macedonia ready to ſubmit it ſelfe vpon any condition, ſo it might caſt off the Spaniſh yoke. Thinke not, that either that ſtrength or vnity is now in Italy, which was when thy great grandfather Mahomet hauing taken Hydruntum, L brought a great feare, not vpon Italy on, but vpon other the Chriſtian nations alſo: for by the good ſucceſſe of that war, which all the Chriſtian Princes could hardly withſtand, he had vndoubtedly taken the city of Rome, and ſo according to right and reaſon, againe vnited the Empire of the Eaſt and of the Weſt, as they were before in their antient glory. But he ſuddenly left the World, rapt to Heauen, that hee might leaue to thee (according to the appointment of the fatall Deſtinies, & reuolutions of the heauens) this work of abſolute perfection. And yet my purpoſe is not, by putting thee in hope of ſo great and rare a triumph, to interrupt or hinder thee for turning thy power into the Eaſt, againſt thy old and irreligious enemies, deſeruing all extremities: for thy nauy ſhall be ſufficient for me, whereof thou ſhalt haue no need in thy wars ſo far within land; that whileſt thou art conquering Aſia, Affrica the third part of the World may in the meane time be brought vnder thy ſubjection alſo. Where before all other things, Muleaſſes is to be M driuen out of Tunes; a man of inſatiable couetouſneſſe, vnſtaied luſt, horrible cruelty, hated both of God and man; who hauing by trechery ſlaine eighteene of his brethen, or that which worſe is, cruelly burnt out their eies, doth ſo raigne alone, that he left him neither kinſeman nor friend. For being as vnthankefull as perfideous, he hath murthered all his fathers friends, who with great trauell had preferred him to the kingdome, ſo to make ſhort payment for ſo great deſert. With this beaſt we muſt haue to do, whom whileſt no man loueth, all men wiſh to periſh. The Numidians trouble him with dayly inuaſions, whoſe injuries the infamous coward endureth with ſuch ſhame and reproach, that it ſhould ſeeme he had rather to ſuffer them, than reuenge them. And yet this effœminate daſtard holdeth in chaines many valiant Turks, and acknowledgeth not your imperiall name, whereunto all men on euery ſide ſue for grace: and which is not to be ſuffered, exceedingly fauoureth the Spaniards of Tripolis, to the intent that Agis and Moſes, two valiant Turkiſh captaines, may be driuen out of the city. This wilde beaſt diſarmed of his clawes and teeth, we ſhall eaſily deſtroy, if it be but for that we haue with vs Roſcetes his brother, whom the Numidians wiſh and long for: him muſt we vſe, if it be but for a ſhew, ſo ſhall the thing we deſire, be without bloud effected, as ſoone as we ſhall but preſent our ſelues before the gates of Tunes. Then ſhall it be at your pleaſure, to appoint whom you will haue to gouerne the Numidian kingdome: it ſhall be vnto me glory enough, when the greateſt part of Affricke conquered, ſhall be peaceably deliuered into your hands at your returne with the triumphs of Perſia. But by the way as I returne, I aſſure you vpon mine own priuat, ſo to vſe the matter, that the Chriſtians ſhall alſo haue good cauſe to bewaile their calamities: and if I hap to meet with Auria, he ſhall haue ſmall cauſe to rejoyce of the miſchiefe he hath done: for him alone I challenge to perſecute, as my proper and peculiar enemy, both for the remembrance of the harmes we haue receiued at his hands, and for the deſpight I haue at his fame; who once taken out of the way, thē ſeas ſhall be open onely to you and your fleets. And beleeue me, he that ſhall be able to command the ſeas, ſhall eaſily alſo ſubdue the kingdomes by land.

But Solyman, who after the manner of wiſe Princes, vſed well to conſider, and afterwards with ripe judgement to reſolue of ſuch matters as he had with attentiue eare hearkened vnto; commending Barbaruſſa for his forwardneſſe in his ſeruice, for that time brake vp the counſell. Not long after, a decree was made, according to Abraham the great Baſſa's aduice, That Barbaruſſa ſhould be joyned as fourth with the other three chiefe Baſſa's of Solymans counſell, and be made great Admirall; ſo that all the Iſlands, ports, and people all alongſt the ſea coaſt thorowout Solymans Empire ſhould be at his command, and that it ſhould be lawfull for him to take vp ſuch mariners and ſoldiers for ſeruice at ſea, as pleaſed him in what place ſoeuer. This being ſolemnly proclaimed, Solyman with his owne hand deliuered him a ſcepter and a ſword, willing him by worthy deeds to performe what he had promiſed. After which, Ajax and Caſſimes the two great Baſſa's, with the Captaine of the Ianizaries, brought him with exceeding pompe, from the Court to the Nauy: at which time was carried before him all the tokens of his new obtained honour. And toward the maintenance of that warre at ſea, he had deliuered vnto him out of Solymans treaſures, eight hundred thouſand duckets, and eight hundred Ianizaries.

Barbaruſſa is made Solymans great Admirall.

But foraſmuch as much it was that he did in the ſeruice of Solyman, and more is of him hereafter to be ſpoken; it ſhall not be amiſſe here to preſent vnto the view of the World the ſterne, but liuely countenance of this ſo famous a man (who liuing kept all the Mediterranian in feare) as it is by Boiſardus expreſſed, together with the Elogium following.

For that thou cauſeleſſe did'ſt to them ſo great and open wrong.

He ſpoileth the coaſt of Italy.

Barbaruſſa ſped of that he deſired, ſtaied not long after at Conſtantinople, but departing out of Helleſpontus with eighty gallies and certain galliots, ſhaped his courſe towards Italy, leauing Amurathes (a ſea captaine) with twelue gallies to tranſport Solyman and his army, ready to ſet forward againſt the Perſian, ouer that narrow ſea into Aſia. Who after he had ſo done,ouertooke Barbaruſſa at Methone, who holding on his courſe to Affricke, and ſuddenly paſſing the ſtreit betwixt Italy and Sicily, brought a great feare vpon both the Countries; M but paſſing by the Bay of Hippona alongſt the coaſt of the lower Calabria, he ſet vpon the towne of Saint Lucidius,called in antient time Tempſa: which although it ſtood vpon a rocke and was reaſonable well walled; yet ſuch was the violence of the Turkes aſſault, that it could not be defended but was taken,with ſo much more hurt to the inhabitants, for that the Major

A Major of the towne, to keepe the people from flying away, had lockt vp the gates on the other ſide of the city, from the enemy. From thence he with rich ſpoile and many priſoners went to Citrarium, where he had learned of his priſoners, a fleet of gallies was in building. This town forſaken of the inhabitants for feare, he tooke without reſiſtance, ranſacked it, and burnt it, where he alſo fired ſeuen gallies not yet altogether finiſhed. But after he was come with his fleet as far as the Iſland Capri, within the ſight of Naples, ſuch a terror was ſtrucke into the minds of all that dwelt alongſt that coaſt, That it was thought, if he had landed and gone directly to Naples, the Neapolitans would for feare haue abandoned the city. But holding on his courſe, he came to Prochita, which he tooke and rifled: ſo paſſing by the port of Caieta, (which he might eaſily haue taken) he came to Spelunca, a town in the hithermoſt part of the B Kingdome of Naples. They of the Towne diſmaied with the ſudden arriuall of ſo great a fleet, yeelded the ſame without reſiſtance. The enemy entring the towne, tooke twelue hundred priſoners. Pelegrinus a chiefe man amongſt them of Spelunca, was fled into the Caſtle: him Barbaruſſa commanded to yeeld, which if he would preſently do, he promiſed to let him go free; but if he ſhould ſtand vpon his defence, he threatned in ſhort time to make him repent his fooliſh hardineſſe, with the vtter deſtruction both of himſelfe and the towne. The fearefull gentleman without delay came out of the caſtle, and fell downe at his feet; who according to his promiſe gaue him his liberty, and with rare curteſie reſtored to him his wife, his ſonne, and niece, whom he had taken priſoners; who receiued them with many teares falling from their eies for joy.

C The ſame night alſo 2000 Turks came from the fleet, through the rough and buſhy mountaines, to the city Fundi, ten miles diſtant from Spelunca, in the vttermoſt borders of the kingdome of Naples, conducted as was thought by certaine Italians of that country; who a few yeares before taken at ſea, and ouerwearied with the heauy burthen of the Turkiſh ſlauery, had reuolted to the Mahometan religion. But ſuch was the ſuddenneſſe of their comming, and their celerity in entring the city, that Iulia Gonzaga the Paragon of Italy, and the chiefe priſe which they ſought after, had ſcarce time to get to horſe halfe naked, and ſo with much difficulty to eſcape into the mountaines. It is reported that Barbaruſſa (which thing he himſelfe afterwards ſeemed not to deny) moued with the fame of her incomparable beauty, and wonderfull perfection, deſired exceedingly to haue taken her as a Preſent for Solyman. The D citiſens were for moſt part either ſlaine or taken priſoners by the Turks, who loaded with the ſpoile of the city, returned againe to the fleet. Another part of Barbaruſſaes fleet came to Tarracina, which the Turks tooke forſaken of the inhabitants, who for feare were all fled into the mountains, except ſome which for age or ſickeneſſe could not ſhift for themſelues, whom the Turks ſlew, and ſpoyled the churches. Barbaruſſa thus ſcouring along the coaſt of Italy, and newes thereof daily brought to the city of Rome, ſtrucke ſuch an exceeding terrour into the minds of the citiſens, that it was verily thought if he had come a little further to Oſtia, they would generally haue forſaken the city. But he hauing well performed his promiſe made to Solyman for vexing the Chriſtians, and before reſolued of a greater matter he had to do; when he had watred at Pontia, paſſed ouer into Affrick with ſuch celerity, that he was arriued there E before it was thought that he was departed from the coaſt of Italy. For Barbaruſſa to deceiue Muleaſſes king of Tunes, and to take him vnprouided, had giuen it out, that he would burn and ſpoyle the coaſts of the Chriſtian countries, eſpecially of Italy, Liguria, and Spain, in reuenge of the harme done by Auria at Corone and Patras. Which thing Muleaſſes the rather belieued, vnderſtanding his proceedings vpon the coaſt of Italy. The Venetians hauing alſo at the ſame time at great charges prepared a great fleet, did in ſome part leſſen Muleaſſes feare, That Barbaruſſa would imploy his forces for Affricke: for then what ſhould the Venetians haue needed to haue had ſo great and chargeable a preparation. But that which aboue all other things brought him into ſecurity, was for that he had by his ſecret eſpials certainly learned, that his brother Roſcetes was kept at Conſtantinople, as a priſoner at large, vnder ſafe keeping: which F made him to thinke, that Barbaruſſa's forces were not prepared againſt him; for he knew that he could not be impugned, or his ſtate more indangered by any other means, than by producing the competitor of his kingdome, to whom his guilty conſcience doubted, that both the citiſens of Tunes and the Numidians were for moſt part well affected.

This Muleaſſes of whom we now ſpeake, and whom afterward we ſhall by occaſion often remember, Muleaſſes King of Tunes.

member,was lineally deſcended of the antient Kings of Tunes; who without interruption of diſcent,or mixture of forreine bloud,had by the ſpace of 954 yeares mightily ruled the great kingdome of Tunes,from Tripolis to Bugia,almoſt 800 miles alongſt the Mediterranean,and into the Main as far as the mount Atlas:and for the long continuance of their ſtate,and largeneſſe of their kingdome, were worthily accounted the moſt reuerend and mighty amongſt the Mahometan Kings of Affricke. His father Mahomethes, when he had with much glory, and more pleaſure,reigned 32 yeares, perceiuing the end of his life to approch, had purpoſed to haue appointed Maimo his eldeſt ſonne (whom for his haſty aſpiring he then held in durance) to ſucceed him in his kingdome: but ouercome with the importunity of Lentigeſia his wife,a woman of a haughty ſpirit, who had by reward made a ſtrong faction in the Court for her ſonne Muleaſſes,he altered his former purpoſe, and appointed him his ſucceſſor:by whom (as it was thought) the ſmall remainder of his owne old yeares was ſhortened; Maimo the right heire of the kingdome in priſon,preſently murthered; ſeuenteene of his other brethren vnmercifully executed; and three other, Barcha, Beleth, and Saeth, with more than barbarous cruelty with a hot yron of their ſight depriued; only Roſcetes the ſecond brother, and Abdemelech,eſcaping the hands of their vnnatural brother,fled to Morhabitus a great Prince amongſt the Numidians: whither alſo their brothers malice perſecuted them, ſeeking by many practiſes to haue taken them away,and at laſt for a great ſumme of mony to haue had them deliuered into his hands. Which mony the Numidian receiued, but ſuffered the diſtreſſed Princes, as if they had eſcaped againſt his will, to fly further to another Numidian Prince a friend of his,called Benticſes: where Muleaſſes by like practiſes as before, ſought to haue deſtroyed them, or to haue got them into his owne power. Thus chaſed by their brothers endleſſe malice, from Prince to Prince, and from place to place, they for their more ſafety fled at laſt to the city of Biſcaris,farre into the maine land: where Abdemelech as one weary of the World gaue ouer all, and betooke himſelfe to a ſolitary life, and became a melancholy Mahometan Monke. But Roſcetes curteouſly entertained by Abdalla Prince of that city, found ſuch fauour in his ſight, that he gaue him his daughter in marriage, and long time honourably maintained him as his ſonne in law, with ſuch carefulneſſe, that for feare of Muleaſſes practiſes, he was ſeldome permitted to eat any other meat but ſuch as the Prince or his wife had before taſted of. Muleaſſes thus reigning and raging, and yet not contented with the death of ſo many of his brethren, proceeded further, and murthered diuers of their children alſo.

The ingratitude of Muleaſſes.

He cauſed alſo the Manifet and Meſuar,men of greateſt authority in all the kingdom, his fathers graue counſellors,and his chiefe friends, by whoſe meanes eſpecially he had aſpired vnto the kingdome, to be cruelly tortured to death, fearing their greatneſſe; or rather as ſome thought grieuing to ſee them liue, to whom he was ſo much beholden, and therefore rewarded them with ſuch ſharpe payment. And by the inſtigation of Lentigeſia his mother, cauſed diuers of his fathers other wiues and concubines to be ſhamefully murthered, enueighing oftentimes againſt his father,that as an effœminat Prince,had for his pleaſure maintained 200 wiues and concubins in his houſes of delight, by whom he had begot ſo many ſons competitors of the kingdome, that he had left him (as he ſaid) a laborious and endleſſe piece of worke, to deſtroy ſo great a brood.

Roſcetes viſeth againſt his brother Muleaſſes.

Roſcetes aided by his father in law and the other Numidian Princes, to whom the name of Muleaſſes, both for his cruelty againſt his owne bloud, and injurious dealing againſt his neighbors was become odious; paſſing ouer the riuer Bragada, with a great army, neere vnto Tunes met with Muleaſſes his army, conducted by Dorax a valiant captaine, brother to Lentigeſia: where in a ſharpe conflict he ouerthrew his brothers Army, and enforced Dorax with them that were eſcaped out of the battell, for ſafegard of their liues to fly into Tunes. Roſcetes purſuing the victory,came and preſented his army before the gates of the city,in hope that the citiſens (whom he knew for the moſt part to hate the vſurping tyrant) would vpon the ſight of him, in right their King, with ſo great an army, raiſe ſome tumult in the city, and let him in. There he lay by the ſpace of twenty daies, ſtill expecting ſome innouation; in which time the more to alienate the minds of the people from Muleaſſes, and to ſhew how vnable he was to protect them, he burnt and deſtroied all the Oliue and fruit trees, which grew moſt plentifully and pleaſantly all alongſt the country, from the ruines of old Carthage, to the walls of Tunes: which was vnto the citiſens, whoſe greateſt poſſeſſions lay there, a moſt heauy and lamentable ſpectacle. But Muleaſſes had ſo attempered their minds with faire ſpeeches,

and

A and large promiſes of recompenſing euery man to the full ; for all ſuch harme as they ſhould ſuſtaine for his brothers fury in the country : and beſide that, had the city in ſuch ſtrong poſſeſſion by reaſon of his ſoldiers, that the citiſens either would not or could not reuolt to Roſcetes.
The Numidian Princes weary of that long and vaine expectation, according to the leuity of that nation, accounting it no ſhame after victory once gotten to depart, began one after another to ſhrinke away to their owne dwellings, perſuading Roſcetes alſo to prouide for himſelfe whilſt he had time, and to attend his better fortune. Wherefore he fearing to be betraied by the Numidians, or circumuented by his cruell brother, fled to Barbaruſſa, then reigning at Algiers in great glory, where he was honourably entertained ; and there remained vntill ſuch time as by his perſuaſion he went with him as is aforeſaid to Conſtantinople, to craue helpe B of Solyman, by whom he was detained in ſafe cuſtody : although it was in policy giuen out by Barbaruſſa, that he was in the fleet, and that he ſhould by Solymans power be reſtored to his fathers kingdome at Tunes.

Roſcetes forſaken of the Numidian Princes, he flyeth to Barbaruſſa.

This was the ſtate of the kingdom of Tunes, at ſuch time as Barbaruſſa with Solymans great fleet, contrary to all mens expectation, ſuddenly departing from the coaſt of Italy, landed in Affricke at Biſerta, a famous port of the kingdome of Tunes. They of Biſerta weary of the gouernment of Muleaſſes, and of themſelues deſirous of change, as ſoone as they heard the name of Roſcetes, forthwith draue out their Gouernor, and receiued the Turks into the towne.
For Barbaruſſa had before ſent certaine of Roſcetes his familiar friends aſhore, which bare the people in hand, that he was in the fleet, but not able to come yet on ſhore, for that he was (as C they ſaid) ſea-ſick, and troubled with an ague. Biſerta thus poſſeſſed by Barbaruſſa, he preſently departed thence, and ſailing by Vtica, thirty miles diſtant from Biſerta, and ſo keeping alongſt the coaſt, and paſſing the promontory of Carthage, came before Guletta, a ſtrong caſtle within the Bay of Tunes, ſo placed vpon a ſtreit, that it commandeth all the paſſage by ſea vnto the city Tunes. Before this caſtle, Barbaruſſa in token of friendſhip, diſcharged all his great ordnance, which they of the caſtle anſwered with like : but being required to deliuer it vp to Roſcetes, they ſaid it ſhould be alwaies at his command that ruled in the city of Tunes.
The newes of Roſcetes his ſuppoſed comming, flying ſwiftly by land from Biſerta to Tunes, and the great fleet once diſcouered, ſet all the city on an vprore : for the citiſens were in great expectation of their new King, both for the loue of Roſcetes, who had alwaies ſhewed himſelfe D to be of a mild and bountifull nature ; and alſo for the hatred of Muleaſſes, whoſe tyrannous and couetous gouernment they thought they had too long indured. Neither was he ignorant what report ran of himſelfe, and how he had loſt the hearts of his ſubjects ; which was euidently to be ſeene in the eies and countenances of the chiefe men of the city. And that which more increaſed their hatred, was for that he had not according to his promiſe to them in time of his diſtreſſe, made them any recompence for their goodly houſes and Oliue gardens, deſtroied in the country by Roſcetes in the former wars : wherefore at ſuch time as he came now out of the caſtle, and in the greateſt aſſembly of his people, began to perſuade them to play the men, and to continue conſtant in their obedience, promiſing vnto them ſuch reward as they knew he was neuer able to performe, they all departed and left him alone : yea, ſome of E them vnder the colour of friendſhip, and amongſt them Abdahar, then Meſuar (which was chiefe officer next vnto the King) perſuaded him to giue place to his hard fortune, and forthwith to fly, for by chance it was at the ſame inſtance in euery mans mouth, that the Turks were euen at hand : which thing cauſed Muleaſſes, forſaken of his ſubjects, of himſelfe fearefull, and worthily doubting to be betraied, to fly in ſuch haſt out of the city, that he left behind him both his treaſure and jewels, which afterwards came into the hands of his enemies. The firſt that reuolted was Abezes, a man of great authority ; and Fetuches, captain of the caſtle ; both renegate Spaniards. Fetuches preſently after the flight of Muleaſſes, brought out Roſcetes wife and children, whom Muleaſſes had long time kept in priſon, & to welcom their father, placed them in the Kings royall ſeat. Abezes alſo forthwith aduertiſed Barbaruſſa of Muleaſſes departure, F and with what longing the people expected their deſired King, wiſhing him without delay to repaire vnto the city : and for a preſent ſent him a goodly Barbarian horſe, richly furniſhed, and diuers others for his other chiefe captains. Hereupon Barbaruſſa without longer ſtay ſet forward with fiue thouſand Turks, which he had already landed, and comming to the city, was of the citiſens joifully receiued. But after long looking, when they could no where deſcry Roſ- cetes their ſuppoſed king, and heard nothing but the name of Solyman and Barbaruſſa, doubled and redoubled by the Turks in their military acclamations, as they marched thorow the city towards the caſtle; they began to diſtruſt as the truth was, that in ſtead of their new King whom they ſo much deſired, they had receiued the Turkiſh gouernment, which they vtterly deteſted. Which ſuſpition once confirmed by certaine of Roſcetes friends (whom Barbaruſſa had brought with him of purpoſe to delude the people) who grieued to ſee the ruine of their natiue country, ſpared not for feare of the preſent danger to tel their friends and acquaintance as they went, That they did in vaine looke for Roſcetes, whom they had left in bonds at Conſtantinople: it was a wonder to ſee, how ſuddenly the minds of the people were changed, how ſpeedily they ran to their weapons, and how furiouſly they aſſailed the Turks, now fearing no ſuch matter, and were not as yet all got into the caſtle. The chiefe leader of the citiſens in this tumult, was Abdahar the Meſuar, who but a little before vpon the comming of the Turks, by augmenting the danger, and the vnfaithfulneſſe of his ſubjects, had perſuaded Muleaſſes to fly; but now perceiuing himſelfe deceiued of his expectation for the comming of Roſcetes, and repenting of that he had done, ſought by all meanes to driue out the Turks, and to recall Muleaſſes. And the more to animate the people, as he ſtood on high, from whence he might beſt be heard, he cried vnto them with a loud voice:

The citiſens deceiued of their expectation, riſe againſt the Turks.

We are moſt villanouſly betraied (worthy Citiſens) for Roſcetes, whom we expected for our lawfull King lamenteth his miſery in chains, in priſon at Conſtantinople: and we except we preſently play the men, and valiantly fight for our liberty, ſhall for euer ſerue as ſlaues to theſe forreine and mercileſſe pyrats. The preſent danger of our eſtate telleth vs, that we muſt preſently and without delay take the occaſion offered. Wherefore let all men that meane not to ſerue as ſlaues, and to be bought and ſold as beaſts, take vp armes againſt the faithleſſe Turks. I my ſelfe will be your leader: let vs therefore all with one conſent, with heart and hand reuenge this ſhamefull trechery, defend our country and liberty with the antient honour and liberty of the Numidians.

There was now no time to ſtay, euery man had betaken himſelfe to his weapons; Muleaſſes was againe ſent for, who yet ſtaied in the ſuburbs, expecting what ſhould happen; many of the Turks were ſlain before they were aware, or feared any thing; all the city was filled with outcries and clattering of weapons; the number of the citiſens was ſuch, as might eaſily haue expulſed the Turks, had they been but reaſonably armed, or well conducted, which in a matter ſo ſudden, and with men altogether ignorant of ſeruice, was not poſſible. Yet they, armed with fury, and encouraged with the multitude of themſelues, ſwarmed vp as thicke as was poſſible, one of the bulwarks of the caſtle, which they knew was eaſieſt to be gained, where the Turks had ſet vp one of their enſignes; and with the multitude of their darts and arrowes ſo ouerwhelmed the Turks, that they were glad to forſake the place, and to retire further into the caſtle to a place of more ſtrength: from whence and all alongſt the curtaine of the wall, they without intermiſſion diſcharged their great artillery and ſmall ſhot amongſt the thickeſt of the naked Moores, making of them a wonderfull ſlaughter. Barbaruſſa although he was a man of an inuincible courage and great experience, all his life time well acquainted with deſperat dangers (the dreadfull ſteps of aſpiring minds) yet ſurpriſed with the ſuddenneſſe of the aſſault, ſhut vp in a place whereof he yet knew not the ſtrength, and not prouided of victuall for three daies, was with the due conſideration of theſe difficulties, not a little troubled: which his care was by the diſordered fury of his enemies, and knowne valour of his owne ſouldiers greatly diminiſhed; eſpecially when he ſaw his owne men ſtill fighting, as men full of hope and courage, and the Moores as men halfe diſmaied with the wounds and ſlaughter of their friends, ready to retire. Howbeit by the comming in of Muleaſſes and Dorax, the aſſault twice before giuen ouer, was againe at both times renewed, with no leſſe deſperat fury than at the firſt, and the Turks hardly charged. In this dangerous aſſault Halis of Maliga, a renegat Spaniard, but a moſt expert ſouldier, turning himſelfe to Barbaruſſa, ſaid, Muleaſſes returned into the city.

If thou wilt ſaue thine honour, and hold this fort, we muſt ſally out vpon this enemy; which hauing neuer ſeene a ſet battell, but only acquainted with light skirmiſhes, will not be able to endure our charge at hand but ſhall in a moment know the price of their fooliſh hardineſſe; who as braine-ſicke men could neither indure the gouernment of their cruell King, ne yet thankefully receiue the authors of their deliuerance and liberty.

This motion of the Spaniard, confirmed by the generall approbation of the chiefeſt captaines, A taines, Barbaruſſa commanded Halis the author of that counſell, with certaine other captaines and their companions, at one inſtant to ſally out at two ports of the caſtle: which they ſo reſolutely performed, that in ſhort time a wonderfull number of the naked Moores lay dead vpon the ground.

Abdahar the Meſuar himſelfe, was there ſhot thorow with a bullet and ſlaine: whereupon the aſſault was quite giuen ouer, the Moores retiring by companies backe into the city, and the Turks ſtill purſuing them: where in the ſtreets for certaine houres, was fought a moſt cruell and bloudy battell. At laſt the citizens ouercome, forſooke the open ſtreets, and betooke them to the refuge of their houſes; not ſo carefull of their king, as of themſelues, their wiues, and children. And Halis with the reſt, wearied with the ſlaughter of his enemies, and ouercome B with labour, heat, and thirſt, returned with victory vnto the caſtle. It is reported that there was aboue three thouſand of the citizens ſlaine that day, and thrice as many hurt. Muleaſſes thus diſcouraged, & vtterly deſpairing to recouer the city, hardly eſcaped his enemies hands, by the good helpe of his vncle Dorax, with whom he fled ouer the riuer Bagrada, and came in ſafety to Conſtantina (called of old time Cyrtha) the antient ſeat of the Numidian Kings, but then a part of Dorax his dominion; where he was honourably maintained and protected vntill the comming of Charles the Emperour into Affricke. The night enſuing this battell, and the flight of their King, was reſtleſſe both to the citiſens and the Turks, each of them for feare of other ſtanding vpon their ſtrongeſt guard.

The citiſens of Tunes diſcomfited by the Turks.

Muleaſſes flieth

The next day, the citizens diſcouraged with the loſſe of ſo many of their kinſemen and C friends, and hauing no King now for whom they ſhould fight, craued pardon of Barbaruſſa for their raſh attempt, excuſing it by the name of loyalty to their antient Kings; offering to ſubmit themſelues vnto him with all faithfulneſſe. Which their offer he willingly accepted, knowing that he was not able to keepe that place with his ſouldiers three daies, for lacke of victuall: ſo that all his hope and victory gotten, might eaſily be ouerthrowne and brought to nought, if the citiſens moued either with deſperation or deſire of reuenge, ſhould ioyne with the other Numidian Princes, and beſiege him in the caſtle. Whereupon a generall peace was granted, and by ſolemne oath on both ſides confirmed, whereby the citiſens expreſly bound themſelues to the obedience of Solyman, and to Barbaruſſa as his lieutenant. All things thus ſet in order in the city of Tunes, and new magiſtrates and officers by him made, he laboured by D all means to win vnto him the Numidian Princes: which when he had eaſily brought to paſſe by gifts and rewards with thoſe needy Princes, of themſelues prone enough vpon light occaſions to make or break the bonds of friendſhip, he ſent Aſan-aga an eunuch, and Halis the Spaniard, with the Ianizaries, and certaine pieces of great ordnance, to take in the other cities of the kingdome of Tunes: which they in ſhort time performed, being in all places peaceably receiued, only the city of Caruenna held out a while, yet afterwards for feare of further harme receiued the Turks garriſon. But to leaue Barbaruſſa King of Algiers and Solymans great Admirall, thus poſſeſſed of the kingdome of Tunes; and Muleaſſes in exile at Conſtantina, vntill he be again reſtored vnto his kingdome by Charles the Emperor, as ſhall be hereafter declared: let vs againe returne to the wars at the ſelfe ſame time vndertaken by Solyman in perſon E himſelfe in Perſia, perſuaded thereunto (as we haue before ſaid) by Abraham the great Baſſa. Of whom a few words, that they which ſhall hereafter liue, may in him as in others, ſee in what ſlippery place they ſtand, and what ſmall aſſurance they haue, which forſaking God, run headlong after theſe worldly vanities; and ſwelling with the fauours of great Princes, are in a moment when they leaſt feare any ſuch fall, ſuddenly ouerthrowne, and become the miſerable ſpectacles of of mans fragility, in the height of their ſuppoſed bliſſe.

The citiſens of Tunes yeeld themſelues to Barbaruſſa.

This great Baſſa called of the Turks Ibrahim, of vs Abraham, was borne in a poore country village neere vnto Perga, a towne in that part of Epirus which was called Buthrotia: who in his childhood was taken from his Chriſtian parents, by ſuch as by authority did take vp the tribute children of the Chriſtians for the Turkiſh Emperour. A tribute of all tributes moſt F grieuous. He was of countenance amiable, of feature comely, actiue of body, wel ſpoken, pleaſantly conceited, and ſharpe of wit; ſo that he in ſhorter time than was thought poſſible, to the admiration of many, learned both to ſpeake and write the Arabian tongue, and other languages vſed in the Turks court, and could ſkilfully play vpon ſundry kindes of inſtruments. And being yet a boy, ſerued Scanderbaſſa, a man of great authority and power, in the time of

Selymus the Emperor, in whoſe ſeruice he was inſtructed in the Mahometan religion: but gi- G uing himſelfe to all manner of curioſity and neatneſſe, he was wonderfully fauoured by the great Lady his miſtreſſe, and by her commended to her husband Scanderbaſſa, as a fit page to temper his melancholy and wayward diſpoſition, with his pleaſant conceits and deuices: wherein the Tetricall Baſſa finding him to excell, gaue him as a rare gift to Solyman the ſon of Selymus, his grandfather Bajazet yet liuing: who tooke in him ſuch pleaſure, that the old Emperour cauſed him to be brought vp in the Court, in all Princely qualities with Solyman (who was of like yeares vnto him) as his companion and playfellow. Where he ſo framed himſelfe vnto the young Princes diſpoſition in all points, that he was of him alwaies exceedingly beloued, and afterwards promoted to all the honours of the court, and made one of the Baſſaes, giuing vnto him in marriage the only daughter and heire of Scanderbaſſa his maſter, then dead, H with an exceeding great dowry. And after that made him Gouernor of Caire: where he had not long remained, but he was againe ſent for to the Court, as the man which gaue thereunto life, without whoſe company Solyman was as one halfe dead. At length he made him Viſier, which is the chiefe of all the Baſſaes, and Preſident of his Councell, the greateſt honour in the Turkiſh Empire next vnto the Emperor himſelfe. And to honour him yet more, he deliuered him his priuat ſignet, wherewith the Turkiſh Emperours neuer vſed to truſt any but themſelues: he might at his pleaſure grace and diſgrace whom he would, in Court or elſewhere. What he commanded was done, and whatſoeuer he did was taken for well done. He might without the Emperours knowledge giue any office, yea, the gouernment of whole Countries and Prouinces vnto his fauorits: his credit with the Emperor was ſo great, that he did what he I liſt, and no man durſt preſume to aske any reaſon why. And to ſay all at once, he wanted nothing of the majeſty of an Emperor, but the name only; in ſtead whereof, he was commonly called, The Great Commander of all the Emperors forces. His houſe in Conſtantinople was of all other moſt ſtately, wherein was daily to be ſeene ſuch a multitude of his gallant followers, and ſuch a World of wealth and royall furniture, as that it might worthily be compared with the palace of a great Prince. Neither was he partakers of Solymans counſels in his weighty matters of ſtate onely, but of his ſecret delights and pleaſures alſo: if he were preſent, all was well; if he were away, nothing pleaſed: to be ſhort, he ſo poſſeſſed this great Emperor, that men commonly ſaid, The ſoule of Solyman liued in Abraham. Whereat many of the great men of the court ſecretly repined; but eſpecially Solymans mother, and Roxolana his faire Con- K cubine whom of all women hee held deereſt. His liuely and majeſticall countenance thou maiſt here behold.

Abraham Baſſa perſuadeth Solyman to make warre vpon the Perſians,

This great commander, which might at all times be bold to ſpeake what he thought, vnto Solyman, ſought many times in his priuat diſcourſes betwixt them two, to perſuade him to forbeare to vſe his forces any further againſt the Chriſtians, ouer whom he had ſufficiently already triumphed; and to turne them vpon the Perſians, by whom he was daily injured. Alledging to him, that the Germans were a ſtrong and warlike people; who as they both in language and manners differed from the Hungarians, ſo were they alwaies at variance with them, and F thereſore much cared not though they were by him ſubdued: but if he ſhould begin to inuade any part of their country, he ſhould then ſoon ſee that inuincible nation with their vnited forces vp in armes, ready to make ſtrong reſiſtance. And to prouoke Charles the Emperor (of all the Chriſtian Princes the mightieſt) were not good, who of himſelf was able to bring into the field moſt puiſſant armies of valiant ſouldiers out of his owne dominions: beſides the wonderfull concourſe of moſt reſolute men out of all parts of Chriſtendome, which would not ſpare to lay downe their liues at his feet in that war; which was of them accounted moſt religious. Yea what ſtrength both of horſe and foot might be raiſed and brought to the battell by the two brethren Charles and Ferdinand, onely might (as he ſaid) euen then be plainely perceiued, when as they valiantly defended Vienna, beſieged by vs with great power. Neither did Charles afterward, as it ſeemed, and as the Chriſtians commonly vaunt, feare to haue aduentured the fortune of a maine battell with you: who although I doubt not but he ſhould haue beene ouercome by you ſo great a monarch with ſo puiſſant an army, a thing peculiar to your owne good fortune; yet I cannot deny, but that the victory againſt ſuch expert and reſolute ſouldiers, ſo ſtrongly armed as their manner is, muſt haue beene bought with a great deale of our bloud. Theſe things in my opinion may reaſonably perſuade you to let the Chriſtians alone, by ciuile wars to weaken one another, that ſo afterwards they may become a prey vnto vs without any danger of ours. So that in my judgement the Perſian war is to be taken in hand, rather than the wars in Germany, and eſpecially for that you haue ſufficiently enlarged the bounds of your Empire Weſtward, which you haue extended euen vnto Nations very far diſtant. So that it is now a great matter to defend ſo much as you haue already gotten; and therefore partly for the difficulty of the defending thereof, and partly vpon an honourable contempt, according to the infinite bounty of your heroicall inclination, haue thought good to beſtow whole kingdomes vpon ſtrangers, yea, halfe your enemies. Wherefore how much more glorious ſhould it be now vpon juſt occaſion to ſeeke for that which joyneth vnto your owne confines; and may therefore eaſily be vnited vnto your owne Empire: if you according to the example of your grandfather and father ſhall force your ſelfe to driue that accurſed and abhominable race of Hyſmael out of Aſia. For it ſhall be a great glory vnto the name of the Othoman Kings for euer, if you ſhall after your wonted manner zealouſly reſpect the cauſe of religion: a worke of incomparable fame, if the authors of a moſt deteſtible ſuperſtition ſhall by you be chaſed quite out of Aſia. For what more juſt or honourable cauſe can there be to make war, than to profeſſe your ſelfe the defender of the diuine precepts of our great Prophet Mahomet, againſt the wicked and irreligious impugners thereof? And by the way to reuenge and vtterly to deſtroy the capitall enemies of your anceſtors; which was the laſt prayer of your father Selymus. Can you endure them which rule ſo inſolently, that they account euery one that is neere them their enemies and prey, and dare alſo with their pilfering inuaſions prouoke your ſelfe, liuing contented within the bounds of your owne Empire, in peace both in Europe and Aſia? and they (forſooth) ſuch as haue by moſt horrible wrong crept into the royall ſeat of the moſt lawfull and noble Kings deſcended of the bloud of Vſun-Caſſanes? Who after their wonted maner ſtill liue by rapine and robbery? Beleeue me, Noble Emperour, if you ſhall vpon a zeale to your religion, with your victorious hand take away this ſtaine and plague of Aſia, there ſhall vndoubtedly be erected vnto you ſo glorious and magnificent a trophy in the middeſt of Perſia, as may be compared, yea, preferred before the Triumphs of your victorious father Selymus. For it is not ſo much to haue deſtroied the Mamalukes (by condition ſlaues) and the proud Sultans of Ægypt and Syria, as to haue ſubdued the Perſians, famous in antient time for their martiall proweſſe, who ſo oftentimes vanquiſhed by Alexander of Macedon, gaue vnto him the name of Great. Solyman prickt forward with many ſuch diſcourſes, daily ſounded in his eares by the Baſſa, began to yeeld to his perſuaſion. Whereof Abraham himſelfe greatly rejoyced: for it was thought by many, that hee did neuer in heart renounce the Chriſtian religion, but was onely in outward ſhew a Turke, and in heart a Chriſtian. Which was the rather conjectured, for that he maruellouſly fauoured and protected the Chriſtian Merchants, furthered by all meanes the leagues of the Chriſtian Princes with Solyman, and laboured alwaies to turne his forces from them vpon the Perſians. And the more to whet him forward, the Baſſa had cunningly inſinuated into his acquaintance one Mulearbe of Damaſco, a man in that time famous in Conſtantinople, for the opinion the people had generally conceiued of his holineſſe and profound knowledge in the ſecret cauſes of things, and the art of Magicke; vſing him as a Prophet to fill the ambitious minde of Solyman, with aſſured hope of proſperous ſucceſſe: which thing the hypocriticall wiſard, after the manner of ſuch deceiuers, ſlily performed, propheſying vnto him all happineſſe in ſo religious a war, and ſo much (as he ſaid) pleaſing God. This the Baſſaes purpoſe was much furthered alſo by Vlemus a noble and valiant Perſian, who hauing married the great Perſian King Tamas his ſiſter, was reuolted from him to Solyman, fearing to be called to account for the extortion wherewith he had grieuouſly

A oppreſſed the countries whereof he had the gouernment; and being wonderfully countenanced in Solymans court by the great Baſſa, did after the maner of diſloyall fugitiues perſuade Solyman by all means he could to take that war in hand, diſcouering vnto him the power, ſtate, and ſtrength of the Perſian kingdom (which he could wel do) and plotting vnto him the eaſieſt way for the conquering therof; offering alſo vnto him the vttermoſt of his deuoir. So Solyman filled with the vain hope of the conqueſt of Perſia, yeelded fully vnto the perſuaſions of the great Baſſa, and gaue out his commiſſions into all parts of his empire, for the raiſing of a mighty army for the performance of ſo great an enterpriſe; commanding all his captaines and men of War to be ready at the City of Nice in Bithynia, at a certaine day appointed.
Which his purpoſe, although it was mightily impugned by his mother, and the fair Roxolana B his beſt beloued, as that which altogether proceeded from the Baſſa (the one alledging, with what euil ſucces his grandfather and father before him had attempted that ſame Warre; the other aſſailing him with her paſſionat affections: but both of them indeed repining at the honor of the Baſſa, and in their hearts diſdaining, that ſo great a monarch ſhould at the pleaſure of his ſeruant be led vp and down the world ſo far from their company. For which cauſe they did what in them lay to haue ouerthrown the purpoſe of Abraham, and to haue altered Solymans former determination) yet ſo ſtrong was the Baſſa's credit with his great Lord & Maſter, that all theſe great ladies deuices and prayers were as womens affectionate paſſions rejected, and the Baſſa's counſell (to their no ſmall griefe) in all things regarded.

Solyman reſolueth to goe againſt the Perſians.

Abrahams credit maligned by Solymans mother and Roxolana.

The time appointed being come, and all things in readines, Solyman ſent Abraham the Baſſa, C and Vlemas the Perſian before him into Syria with a ſtrong army, to be ready with the firſt of the Spring to inuade the Perſian King. Which thing the Baſſa gladly took vpon him, and comming into Syria, wintred with his army at Aleppo: whither Barbaruſſa came vnto him for his letters of credence to Solyman, as is before declared. The Spring now approching, Abraham ſent Vlemas the fugitiue Perſian Prince before him with the light horſmen, the fore-runners of his army, into Meſopotamia as his guid, becauſe the country was to him beſt known; following not far after himſelf with his Army. And marching ſtill forward in that manner, came at length without reſiſtance vnto the famous city of Tauris in Armenia the greater, called in antient time Ecbathana, as is probably by ſome conjectured; a great and rich City, but vnwalled, and of no ſtrength: where the Perſian Kings for the pleaſantneſſe of the place and D freſhnes of the air vſed commonly to be reſiant in the heat of the year. From whence Tamas the Perſian King was as then abſent, buſied in wars againſt Kezien-Baſſa a Prince of the Coraſine Hyrcanians. So that the Citiſens of Tauris deſtitute of all helpe, yeelded themſelues and the City vnto the Baſſa at his firſt comming. Tamas the Perſian King vnderſtanding what had hapned at Tauris, drew neer with his power, warily expecting to haue taken the Turks at ſome aduantage, and ſo by policy to haue defeated his enemies, whom he was too weake to meet with in plain battel. Which thing the wary Baſſa well perceiuing, for more aſſurance, by ſpeedy Currours aduertiſed Solyman of the taking of Tauris, and of the enemies purpoſe; requeſting him with all ſpeed to repair with his army to Tauris. Solyman was then come far on his way with a very great Army, not by the way of Ancyra, Sebaſtia, Amaſia, the borders E of Trapezond, and ſo ouer Euphrates at Arſenga, into Armenia, as his father Selymus had done before him, becauſe that way was thought longer and more troubleſome: but quite another way, on the right hand from Nyce in Bithynia, to Iconium, and by Cæſaria to Malathia, where is the notable paſſage ouer the riuer Euphrates, burſting out by the vallies of the mountaine Antitaurus, from whence the plaines of Meſopotamia (then part of the Perſian Kingdome, begin to open themſelues: through which countrey Solyman marched peaceably with his army, paying the poore countrey people for whatſoeuer he tooke; and ſo in foure and fiftie dayes march, came from Nice in Bithynia, to the city of Coim in Armenia the greater, which is ſuppoſed to be built in the ruines of the famous and antient city Artaxata.
But hearing ſuch newes as is aforeſaid from the Baſſa, he doubled his march, and ſo in ſhort F time after came and ioyned his forces with the Baſſa at Tauris. Tamas (who yet dayly expected the comming of the Georgian light horſmen) vnderſtanding that Solyman was comming againſt him with a world of men, thought it not good to abide the comming of ſo puiſſant an enemy, but with delay to weary him out, that drew ſuch a multitude of people after him; and by taking him at all aduantages, to cut off his people, ſpent with long trauell, wanting victuall, and falling into diuers diſeaſes; as it commonly chanceth to populous armies in G ſtrange countries, where the change of the aire, with the ineuitable neceſſity alwaies attending vpon a great army, moſt times cauſeth grieuous and contagious diſeaſes. Wherefore Tamas to ſhun the comming of Solyman, retyred further off into Sultania, about ſix daies journy from Tauris. Whereof Solyman hauing knowledge, departed from that rich City without doing any harme therein; following after Tamas into Sultania, to joyne battell with him if he could poſſible: leauing behind him for haſt, a great part of his carriages and baggage, with fiue hundred Ianizaries, and three of his Sanzacks with their companies. The city of Sultania was in antient time one of the royall ſeats of the Perſian Kings, but ruinated by the Scythian Tamerlane, retained no ſhew of the antient majeſty, but only in the churches by him ſpared.

Neere vnto this city Solyman lay incamped many daies, expecting that the Perſian King (in H reuenge of the injuries to him done, and for the ſafegard of his honour) ſhould at length come out of the mountaines, and ſhew himſelfe in plaine field, and giue him battell. Which was a thing ſo far from Tamas his reſolution, vpon the due comparing of his owne ſtrength with his enemies, that he retired in ſuch ſort, that Solyman could by no means learne what was become of him, or which way to follow him.

Solymans army diſtreſſed with tempeſt.

The country neere vnto the city of Sultania, wherein Solyman lay incamped at large, is on euery ſide inuironed with hugy mountains, whoſe tops are to be ſeene a far off, alwaies couered with deepe ſnow: theſe mountaines were in antient time called Nyphates, Caſpius, Coathras, and Zagrus, taking their beginning no doubt from Caucaſus the father of mountaines; and joyning one to another, ſome one way, ſome another, do diuide moſt large and wide countries. I Whileſt Solyman in thoſe vaſt and plaine fields moſt fit to fight a battell in, expected the comming of Tamas, ſuch a horrible and cruell tempeſt (as the like whereof the Perſians had neuer before ſeene at that time of the yeare) fell downe from thoſe mountains (which was ſo much the more ſtrange, for that it fell in the begining of September) with ſuch abundance of raine, which froſe ſo eagerly as it fell, that it ſeemed the depth of Winter had euen then of a ſudden been come in: for ſuch was the rage of the bluſtring winds, ſtriuing with themſelues as if it had bin for victory, that they ſwept the ſnow from off the tops of thoſe high mountains, and caſt io into the plaines in ſuch abundance, that the Turks lay as men buried aliue in the deep ſnow, moſt part of their tents being ouerthrowne and beaten downe to the ground with the violence of the tempeſt, and weight of the ſnow; wherein a wonderfull number of K ſicke ſouldiers and others of the baſer ſort which followed the campe, periſhed; and many others were ſore benummed, ſome their hands, ſome their feet, that they loſt the vſe of them for euer: moſt part of their beaſts which they vſed for carriage, but eſpecially their camels, were frozen to death. Yea, Solyman himſelfe was in great danger to haue beene ouerwhelmed in his Tent, all the Tents round about him being ouerthrowne with the violence of the tempeſt.
Neither was there any remedy to be found for ſo great miſchiefes, by reaſon of the helliſh darkeneſſe of that tempeſtuous night, moſt of their fires being put out by the extremity of the ſtorme: which did not a little terrifie the ſuperſtitious Turks, as a thing accounted of them ominous. And that which troubled them no leſſe than the miſeries of the tempeſt, was the feare of the enemy, whoſe ſudden comming they deadly feared: vntill that after ſo tedious L a night the ſun breaking out the next morning, with his cheerefull beams reuiued many, before ready to giue vp the ghoſt for cold, and gaue comfort vnto them all in generall, by diſcouering the open fields cleere of their feared enemies. It was a dreadfull thing to haue ſeene what miſery that one night had brought into the Turks camp: the ground lay almoſt couered with bodies of the dead; and many liued but ſo, as that they accounted the dead more happy than themſelues. Many of the Turks vainly thought, that horrible tempeſt was brought vpon them by the charmes and inchantments of the Perſian Magicians: whereas it was vndoubtedly by the hand of him who bringeth the proud deuices of Princes to nought.

Solyman troubled as well with the ſtrangeneſſe of the accident, as the loſſe he had receiued, M after he had a little refreſhed his diſcouraged ſouldiers, roſe with his army, and tooke his way on the left hand into Aſſyria: Vlemas the Perſian perſuading him thereunto for many cauſes, but eſpecially by putting him in hope of the taking of Babylon; for that Mahometes a friend of his was Gouernour thereof. But he when the matter came to prooſe, was not to be woon either by promiſe or reward, to betray the City. Wherefore Solyman reſolued to take A it by force: neither did his fortune fail him therin: for as ſoone as Mahometes vnderſtood that Vlemas was at hand with the fore-runners of the Turkes army, and that Solyman with all his power was comming after, (who as he thought would neuer haue come ſo far) hee not prouided to withſtand ſo mighty an enemy, and not beloued of the Citiſens, fled out of the City. Solyman comming, in ſhort time after was receiued without reſiſtance. The City of Babylon, commonly called Bagdat, riſe out of the ruins of the old city of Babylon, ſo much ſpoken of in holy Writ: from whence it is not far diſtant, ſtanding vpon the riuer of Tygris, which not far beneath falleth into the riuer Euphrates. In this famous city is the ſeat of the great Calyph, the chief Mahometan Prieſt, whom all the Mahometan Princes haue in great reuerence, and hath an old prerogatiue in the choice and confirmation of the Kings of Aſſyria B and the Sultans of Egypt: of which Calyph Solyman according to the old ſuperſtitious maner, receiued at his hands the Enſignes and Ornaments of the Aſſyrian Kings, and with great bounty won the hearts of the people, and therupon reſolued to ſpend that Winter there, billiting his army in diuers places of that fertil country. The other cities of Aſſyria and Meſopotamia alſo, namely Caraemida, Meredinum, Orſa, and Aſanceſa, hearing that Solyman had without reſiſtance taken Babylon, yeelded themſelues and receiued his Garriſons. Yea the fame therof was ſo great, that Embaſſadors came to him as far as Ormus (a city in the mouth of Euphrates where it falleth into the Perſian gulf, famous for the great traffique out of India thither) ſuing vnto him for peace. Thus the antient city of Babylon, with the great countries of Aſſyria and Meſopotamia, ſomtimes famous kingdoms of themſelues, and lately part of C the Perſian kingdom, fel into the hands of the Turks, and became prouinces vnto the Turkiſh Empire in the yeare 1534. Where Solyman after he had ſpent that Winter in great joy and triumph, according to the manner of the Turkiſh gouernment, placed a great Commaunder (which they by a proud name call the Beglerbeg, which is as much as to ſay, Lord of Lords) and vnder him diuers others for the gouernment of theſe Countries by parts, which they call Sanzacks, who are euer at the command of the Beglerbeg. Whilſt he thus wintred at Babylon, he cauſed Aſhender Zelibi (which is to ſay, Alexander the Noble) his great Treaſurer for the Wars, to be hanged, for that he had vnfaithfully dealt in his office; and confiſcated all his goods.

Babylon, with the Countries of Aſſyria and Meſopotamia yeelded to Solyman.

Tamas hearing that Solyman was come to Babylon, returned to Tauris: Of whoſe ſpeedy D comming the Ianizaries and other captains there left by Solyman vnderſtanding, fled in haſte out of the City, leauing all ſuch things as were committed to their cuſtody, for a prey to the Perſian ſoldiers.

Tamas comes to Tauris.

Solymans army being mightily increaſed by the comming of the great Baſſa of Caire vnto him, with the Sanzacks of Alexandria, Iudæa, Syria, and Comagena; by the perſuaſion of Abraham and Vlemas, the Spring now wel come on, departed from Babylon again toward Tauris, with purpoſe either to draw Tamas to battel, or els to his eternal infamy, to ſacke that his Regal city before his face. But Tamas aduertiſed of his comming, and knowing himſelfe too weake to giue him battel, forſook the City, and fled into the mountains of Hyrcania, deſtroying all the Country before him as he went, and carrying away the inhabitants, leauing no-E thing to relieue the Turks ſouldiers, if they ſhould purſue him. Solyman vnderſtanding that Tamas was again fled, ſent Vlemas with all the choice horſmen of his Army to ouertake him if it were poſſible, and to fight with him. But when he had followed him two or three dayes journy, and ſtill found the Country deſolate as he went, yeelding neither forrage for his horſes, nor relief for his men, and ſaw no hope to ouertake the King; he began as a prouident Generall to forecaſt the extremities like to befall in his return thorow thoſe deſolat Countries with the Enemy at his heels; and therupon in time retyred backe again to Solyman, declaring vnto him what had happened. Who fretting in his mind, that the Perſian King was not to be drawn to battell, marched forthwith to Tauris, entering it without reſiſtance, the Citiſens ſubmitting themſelues vnto him: whoſe liues ſpared, he gaue that rich city as a prey vnto his F ſoldiers, who left neither houſe nor corner therof vnranſacked, abuſing the poor citiſens with all maner of inſolencie; euery common ſouldier without controlment fitting himſelfe with whatſoeuer beſt pleaſed his greedy deſire or filthy luſt. Tamas had in this city a moſt ſtately and royal palace; ſo had alſo moſt part of the nobility their ſumptuous & rich houſes, which by the commandment of Solyman were all raſed down to the ground, and the greateſt part of the beſt citiſens and beautiful perſonages of all ſorts and conditions, at his departure thence carried away captiues. Solyman contenting himſelf to haue don the the Perſian King this diſgrace, in ſpoiling this his rich and royal City, returned againe toward Meſopotamia, deſtroying all the countries as he went, killing the very beaſts and cattell, therby the more to impoueriſh the Perſians, wiſhing to leaue nothing to them but penury and miſerie. He was ſcarce paſt Coim and the Calderan fields (famous for his fathers victory againſt Hyſmael) but that certain troups of Perſian horſemen were in the tail of his Army, and had taken away ſome of his baggage, and ſlain diuers of the ſick and ſtragling ſouldiers, and with their often skirmiſhes did not a little trouble his whole army. Beſides that, it was noiſed thorow all his camp, That Tamas himſelf was comming after him with a greater power of horſemen, taken vp in Iberia, Albania, Parthia, Media, and Armenia, and would be at their backes before they could get out of Armenia. For which cauſe he appointed the two great Baſſa's of Cair and Syria (for ſo they were called) and Vlemas the Perſian, with 18000 good ſouldiers to follow him in the rereward of his Army, to receiue and repreſſe the ſudden aſſaults of the Perſians, if need ſhould require: and ſo ſtil kept on his march vntil he was come to Amida, now called Caraemida, an antient city of Meſopotamia. In the mean time Tamas the Perſian King was returned to Tauris with a mighty Army, in hope there ſuddenly to haue ſurpriſed his enemy, ſurcharged with the pleaſures of ſo rich a city: but finding him gon, and beholding the miſerable deſolation and ſpoil he had made in the city; mooued with indignation, hee reſolued to purſue him whitherſoeuer he was gon, and was now on his way as far as Coim. Where vnderſtanding that Solyman was gon ſo far before that he was hardly to bee ouertaken, and finding the noble gentlemen in his army vnwilling in their heauy armor to vndertake ſuch a purſuit, as could not be performed without the wonderful toil of themſelues, and moſt aſſured loſſe of their goodly horſes; alledging, that they were prouided to fight a battel, and not to trauel ſo long a journy (all which Tamas now that his choler was ouer, knew to ſtand with good reaſon) he changed his former determination, thinking it beſt there to ſtay, and not to follow the purſuit of his enemies any further: vntil that Delimenthes one of his noblemen (alwaies more forward than the reſt) offered with fiue thouſand choſen horſemen to ouertake ſome part of the Turks army, and to do on them ſome good ſeruice. Which his offer Tamas gladly accepted, commending him greatly for the ſame, promiſing him moſt honorable reward, and ſo in haſt ſent him away.

Delimenthes with 5000 Perſians purſues the Turks.

He forthwith taking the wel known and neereſt way, vſed ſuch expedition, that hee was in hope to ouertake the rereward of the Turks Army (marching not far now before him) about the foot of the mountain Taurus, as indeed it fel out at a place called Bethlis. This Bethlis is a famous town in the confines of the Perſian kingdome where it bordereth vpon Meſopotamia, ſtanding in a pleaſant vally, by which runneth a little riuer falling out of the mountaine Antitaurus; and had a caſtle kept with a garriſon of Perſians. In this vally the two Baſſa's of Cair and Syria (conducted by Vlemas) thinking they had now bin paſt all danger of the enemies purſuit, ſtaid with the rereward of the army to refreſh their wearied ſouldiers; vpon certain knowledge that Solyman with the reſt of his Army was already come in ſafety to Amida in Meſopotamia. And therfore lay as men ſecure, without any ſuſpition of the comming of the Perſians, whom they had not ſo much as heard any thing of in long time before. But Delimenthes vſing moſt faithfull and diligent eſpials of that country people, by that time hee was come within one daies journy of Bethlis, vnderſtood certainly where the Turks lay, weary of their long trauell, as men without fear, keeping little or no watch in their camp. Wherupon he determined in the dead time of the night following to aſſail them in their Campe; and by ſecret meſſengers gaue knowledge both of his comming, and of this his purpoſe, to the Captain of the caſtle of Bethlis; requeſting him at an appointed houre vpon ſigne giuen, readily to ſally out with his garriſon vpon that ſide of the Turks Camp which was towards the Caſtle. Which his venturous deſignement was ſo furthered both by the darkenes of the night, and the aboundance of rain which fell at the ſame time, as if it had been wiſhed for, that hee was got with all his reſolute followers within the Turks Campe, before they were aware of his comming. Where the inraged Perſian ſouldiers, as Wolues amongſt Sheepe, did ſuch ſpeedy execution amongſt the ſleepy Turkes, that the two great Baſſa's, with Vlemas, had much ado to get to horſe and ſaue themſelues by flight. And ſuch was the fury of the Perſians Delimenthes aſſaileth the Turks camp by night, and maketh a great ſlaughter.

A ſians,and the greatnes of the ſudden fear increaſed by the darknes of the night,that the Turks not knowing which way to turn themſelues,or what to do,were ſlain by thouſands,ſome ſleeping, ſome half waking, ſome making themſelues ready to fight,and ſome to fly : few of all that great army eſcaped the ſword of the Perſians. Of the fiue great Sanzacks that were in the army,three were ſlain,and one taken. Eight hundred Ianizaries ſeeing themſelues forſaken of their chieftains,laid down their harquebuſes and other weapons,and yeelded themſelues vpon Delimenthes his word. The fierce mountain people alſo, who formerly had ſuffered great iniuries of the Turks,after the death of Aladeules their King, had now ioyned themſelues to the Perſians,and notably reuenged their wrongs:to whoſe ſhare all the baggage of the Turks camp fel for a prey. It might then wel haue bin ſaid of the Turks,which the Poet ſpeaketh of B the night wherin Troy was ſackt :

Quis cladem illius noctis qui funera fando explicet? ——

That nights ſlaughter was ſo great, that it is of the Turks vntill this day accounted amongſt their greateſt loſſes:and the victory ſo welcome to the Perſians,that in memorial therof they kept that day(being the thirteenth of October)as one of their ſolemne holy-daies for many years after. Delimenthes returning all bloudy with the ſlaughter of the Turks, and loded with their ſpoils,was of Tamas ioyfully receiued,and honorably rewarded.

Solyman diſcouraged.

This ouerthrow reported to Solyman by the two great Baſſa's and Vlemas, as men that had hardly eſcaped the ſhipwracke,ſo daunted his proud conceits, that he reſolued in himſelfe to C return home,and no further to proſecute that vnfortunat war; the euill euent wherof his mother (as he ſaid)had more truly preſaged than had the cold Prophet Malearbe: but ſecretly in mind diſpleaſed with Abraham the great Baſſa; by whoſe perſuaſion hee had taken in hand that dangerous expedition. By the way as he went he was met at Iconium by Barbaruſſa & Sinan Baſſa, ſyrnamed the Iew, a man for his ſkil at ſea in reputation next to Barbaruſſa. Theſe two great perſonages,lately come from Algiers to Conſtantinople with the remainder of his fleet, met him ſo far by land, to ſhow their ioyfulnes for the conqueſt he had made of Meſopotamia and Aſſyria: & to excuſe them for the loſſe of the kingdom of Tunes,which won by Barbaruſſa in the beginning of the Perſian war, was before the end therof again wrung out of his hands by Charles the emperor,and reſtored to Muleaſſes,as ſhal be herafter declared. They D with great humility declared vnto him the whole proces of that War,and with what ſucceſſe they had indured the force of Charles the Emperor himſelf in perſon; ſhewing him plainely, that there wanted neither valor in the ſoldiers, nor direction in them the Commanders, but only fortune, which as it mightily reigneth in all mens actions, ſo eſpecially in matters of war. Solyman gratiouſly accepted of their excuſe,and curteouſly took them vp proſtrat at his feet,commending them for their valor in their euil haps, in a plot ſo well by them laid, more than he did the victory of others,got by good fortune, not grounded vpon any good reaſon: willing them to be of good cheer,ſaying that he would in ſhort time find occaſion for them to recompence that diſgrace,and again to ſhew their approued valor. After long trauell hee came to the ſtreit of Boſphorus,where Abraham the Baſſa going before him, had in token of E triumph cauſed the ſhore all along the place where he ſhould go aboord the gally prouided for his tranſportation,to be couered with Perſian ſilk for him to tread vpon:from whence hee paſſed with much triumph ouer to his palace at Conſtantinople.

Abraham the great Baſſa in diſgrace with Solyman.

Enuy,the fatal and cruel companion of Princes immoderat fauours, had with her prying eies ſuddenly diſcouered in court Solymans changed countenance vpon the great Baſſa, & began to ſhew her ghaſtly face. They which before were moſt ready to do him all honour poſſible, yea and to haue laid their hands vnder his feet,ſought now by all ſecret means to work his diſgrace and confuſion. But of all others,the two great ladies, Solymans mother and the faire Roxolana,ceaſed not by daily complaints to inſence Solyman againſt him: the mother,for that he had by his perſuaſions,contrary to her mind and her ſuperſtitious obſeruations, drawn her F ſon into the dangers of the Perſian war. And Roxolana,for that he moſt honoured and ſought the preferment of Muſtapha, Solymans eldeſt ſon by another woman:wheras ſhe aboue al things laboured by all ſubtill means to prefer BajaZet her own ſon vnto the empire after the death of Solyman his father. Which her deſignement ſhe perceiued to be much croſſed by the great credit which the Baſſa had with her Solyman; and therfore did what ſhe might both to bring him out of ſauor, and to work his deſtruction. But that which moſt impaired his credit with Solyman, was the common report raiſed of him by his enemies, that he being in heart a Chriſtian, did in all things fauor the Chriſtians (a thing moſt odious among the Turks, and had for that cauſe craftily perſuaded Solyman to take in hand the vnfortunat Perſian war. And that which moſt increaſed the ſuſpition, was, that he about that time had cauſed one Mark Nicolas a Venetian merchant (who had not without the ſuſpition of ſome, oftentimes come vnto him with letters and ſecret meſſages whilſt he lay at Babylon) to be taken in the night and murdered in Conſtantinople, and caſt into the ſea, becauſe he ſhould not diſcouer any thing that might be hurtful vnto him. Abraham thus brought in diſgrace with Solyman, was (after the maner of the Turkiſh tyrannie) bid to a ſolemn ſupper in the Court about the 14 of March, after which time he was neuer more ſeen. It is reported, That after ſupper Solyman fel inio a great rage with him, charging him bitterly, That he had miſgouerned the ſtate, inuerted his Treaſures to his own priuat, and as a traitor had ſecret intelligence with the Chriſtian princes his enemies: for proofe whereof Solyman with ſterne countenance ſhewed him his owne letters, which had by chance bin intercepted; oftentimes asking him in furious maner, if hee knew not that hand, if he knew not that ſeal. All which the Baſſa, lying proſtrat at his feet, humbly confeſſed, & with many tears craued of him pardon. But his hard heart was not by any tears to be mooued: for the ſame night as he was ſlumbring vpon a palat in the Court, ouercome with heauines, an eunuch cut his throat with a crooked knife, which Solyman for that purpoſe had deliuered vnto him with his own hand. He was murthered ſleeping, becauſe Solyman had in former time of his fauor ſworn vnto him, that he would neuer kil him whilſt he liued. By which oath the great Mahometan prieſt ſaid he was not ſo bound, but that he might kill him ſleeping, foraſmuch as men by ſleep depriued of ſence, are for that time not to be accounted as liuing, but as dead; mans life (as he ſaid) conſiſting altogether in liuely actions. It is reported, That after Solyman had looked vpon the dead body, and bitterly curſed the ſame, hee cauſed a great weight to bee tied vnto it, and ſo caſt it into the ſea. His treaſure and goods (which were almoſt infinite) were the next day all ſeiſed vpon for the Emperour, and a ſmall portion therof appointed for his poore wife to liue vpon. His death was no ſooner knowne, but that the vulgar people deuiſed of him infamous ſongs, and ſlanderous reports, as a Traitor moſt iuſtly condemned: and in further deſpight, with mire and ſtones defaced the Trophies of the Hungarian victory, which hee had in a ſtately maner erected before his houſe in Conſtantinople. This was the woſull end of Abraham the great Baſſa, who whilſt he ſtood in fauor with his prince, was of all others accounted moſt fortunate, wanting nothing but the name of the great Sultan: but afterwards falling into diſgrace, became the ſcorn of fortune, and the lamentable ſpectacle of mans fragility. He was murthered the fifteenth of March, in the year 1536.

Abraham Baſſa murdred in the Court by Solymans commandement.

The cauſes that moued Charles the Emperor to inuade Tunes.

How the kingdom of Tunes was by Barbaruſſa the Turks great Admiral taken from Mulaſſes, we haue already told: but how the ſame was again taken from him by Charles the emperor a little before the returne of Solyman out of Perſia, remaineth now to be declared. It was commonly reported, and not without iuſt cauſe feared, that Barbaruſſa poſſeſſed of the Kingdome of Tunes, and ſupported by the power of Solyman, would the next ſummer not content himſelfe with the ſpoil of the coaſts of Spain, Sardinia, and Italy, as hee had in former times, but with all his forces inuade Sicilia, the garnary and ſtore-houſe of Italy, and from thence attempt to conquer the kingdome of Naples, which it was thought hee in his immoderat deſires had longed much after. To repreſſe this his barbarous inſolencie, and to worke the ſafety of the frontiers of the Chriſtian kingdomes (much ſubiect to the rapines of Turkiſh pyrats) Charles the Emperour reſolued in perſon himſelfe with a puiſſant army to paſſe ouer into Africk, whilſt Solyman was yet buſied in the Perſian wars, and by force of armes to diſpoſſeſſe the tyrant of his new gotten kingdom in Tunes. For accompliſhment wherof, he cauſed ſoldiers to be leuied in all parts of Spaine, and came down to Barcelona with eight thouſand footmen and ſeuen hundred horſemen, far ſooner than was by any man expected: amongſt whom were many of the nobility of Spaine, with their followers moſt gallantly appointed: but eſpecially Ferdinand of Toledo Duke of Alva; whoſe forwardneſſe in that honourable action, with the deſire he had to reuenge the death of his father Garzias, ſlaine before by the Moores at Girapolis, gaue great hope euen then vnto his Countrymen, That hee

Andrew Auria the Emperours Admirall, Alphonſus D'aualus Vaſtius Generall of the land forces.

In the meane time Andrew Auria the great Admirall, vnto whom only for his approued fidelitie and long experience the Emperour had fully communicated what he had with himſelfe before purpoſed, had with wonderfull diligence and celeritie rigged vp a great fleet of ſhips and gallies ſo furniſhed with all manner of warlike prouiſion, as might well haue ſufficed a great army: whereunto he ioyned alſo his owne fleet of 17 gallies and three galeaſſes, wherein he had imbarked the floure of Genoa and Liguria, who with exceeding cheerfulnes had voluntarily offred themſelues to follow him their old General in that great expedition.
With this great preparation Auria came to the Emperor at Barcelona. Thither came alſo Lewis the King of Portingals brother (whoſe ſiſter Iſabel, Charles the Emperour had married) B with twenty fiue Carauels, ſhips which the Portingals vſed in their Indian voyages, amongſt whom was alſo one huge Galeon, all ſhips well appointed and fit for ſeruice, wherin were imbarked 2000 Portingals, beſide mariners: there alſo arriued ſixty ſaile of tall ſhips, ſent out of Flanders and the low-countries, wherin were a great number of condemned perſons, whoſe liues were ſpared that they might ſerue in the gallies. Vnto this war Paulus the third of that name, then Biſhop of Rome, ſent ten gallies vnder the conduct of Virginius Vrſinus: the great Maſter of Malta ſent thither his fleet alſo. At the ſame time that all this preparation was in making in other places, that worthy Chieftaine Alphonſus D'aualus Vaſtius, whom the Emperor had appointed Generall of all his forces at land, had by the Emperours commandement taken vp fiue thouſand new ſouldiers in Italy, which were led by Hieronimus Tutauilla, Countie C of Sarne, Fredericke, Caracke, and Auguſtine Spinola, all famous Captaines. The old Spaniſh garriſons which lay in Lombardie, the Emperour commanded to be ſtreitly looked vnto, that none of them ſhould leaue their places to go into this new expedition, but to remaine there ſtill vnder their Generall Antonius Leua: which worthy Captaine although hee would faine haue had him with him, as of all his great Commanders the beſt; yet he thought it good to ſpare him, both for that he was much troubled with the gout, and alſo for that it was neceſſarie (as he thought) to leaue ſuch a valiant captaine with his garriſons in the countrey, ſo neer vnto the French and Swiſſers, whom he durſt not ſo well truſt as to diſ-furniſh that countrey either of ſo great a Commander, or of the wonted garriſons. At the ſame time Maximilian Eberſtein, an old Commander, came to Vaſtius with eight thouſand Germans, ouer the Tridentine D Alpes to Millaine, and ſo to Genoa; amongſt whom were diuers noble Gentlemen, who then as voluntary men ſerued of their owne charges. With theſe Germans and the fiue thouſand Italians, Vaſtius imbarked himſelfe at the port called Portus Veneris, in Liguria: hauing before perſuaded them, with patience to endure the tediouſneſſe of the ſea, and to comfort themſelues with the hope of the victory in Africke; where they ſhould fight in the quarrell of God, and for the Emperor, who did neuer forget his religious and valiant ſouldiers. So ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Italy, he came to Naples, where the Viceroy and diuers others of the Nobilitie had of their owne charges, euery man acccording to his deuotion or abilitie, built or furniſhed ſome one gallie, ſome moe, for that ſeruice. It was a wonder to ſee with what cheerfulneſſe the Gallants and luſty youths of Naples and all that part of Italy, came E and offred themſelues to Vaſtius; ſo that it ſeemed there was none left behind in Naples: for he had with ſingular courteſie ſo won the hearts of the old ſouldiers and luſty youths of that Kingdome, that both the one and the other thought it a moſt honourable thing to adorn, the one their before deſerued penſions, and the other their firſt entrance into martial affairs, with the participation of ſo notable a victorie. But whileſt euery man was thus buſied in ſetting forward, certaine mutinous ſouldiers (weary of the ſea, and fearing the dangers of ſo long a voyage) began to caſt many perils, to find fault with their ſmall wages, and to diſcourage the multitude, perſuading them with ſeditious ſpeeches to forſake their colours, and to run away: for redreſſe whereof, Vaſtius cauſed the authours of that mutinie to be taken and thruſt into ſacks, and in the ſight of the whole fleet to be caſt into the ſea. So Vaſtius departing with F his fleet from Naples, came in few dayes to Palermo in Sicilie. The Emperour alſo looſing from Barcelona, came to the port of Mago in the Iſland of Minorca, and from thence to Caralis in Sardinia, whither Alphonſus Vaſtius was a little before come with all his fleet out of Sicilie. Not long after, the Emperour, now that all his forces were come together, paſſed ouer from Sardinia into Africke, and with a faire Weſterly winde put into the Port of Vtica,which is of the ſeafaring men called Farina. In the entring whereof,the Admirall Galley,wherin the Emperour himſelf was,by great miſchance ſtrook vpon a ſand, and there ſtuck faſt: which ſo much the more troubled the Emperour, for that his father Philip by like miſhap had like to haue bin caſt away vpon the coaſt of England, as he was ſailing out of the Low countries into Spain. Howbeit by the good direction of Auria ſhe was quickly got off the ſand again,and entred with the reſt,to the great rejoicing of the whole fleet. So preſently departing again from Vtica,and ſailing alongſt the coaſt,he doubled the promontory of Carthage,yet famous for the ruins of that proud city,and came to anchor before a Caſtle, which of a Wel beneath it,is called by the name of Aquaria,or the Water Caſtle. The Moors,who from the hils of Vtica and their Watch-towers had taken view of the Chriſtian fleet, and of the courſe it held; aduertiſed Barbaruſſa, That the Chriſtians were comming againſt him with an innumerable fleet: for there was of one ſort and other almoſt 700 ſail,whereof 82 were great gallies,which gallantly garniſhed with flags and ſtreamers,made ſhew of moe than indeed they were,and wonderfully terrified the enemy. But that troubled Barbaruſſa moſt, that he was by meſſenger vpon meſſenger certainly informed, That the moſt mighty Chriſtian Emperor Charles was in perſon himſelf in the fleet,with ſuch a world of people, that it ſhould ſeem he had left none in Spain,and Italy that were able to bear Armes. Which newes was brought by certain Mahometan ſlaues,who getting looſe in the Gallies, had by night ſwam aſhore, and reported the certainty of the Emperors comming. For the proud Turk, a great contemner of the Chriſtian forces, neuer thought that the Emperor would haue aduentured his perſon to the dangers of the ſea,and chances of war,eſpecially in an vnknown, barren and ſcorching country,but would rather haue attempted to do ſomething by his Lieutenants, or by Auria his Admiral ſeek to ſurpriſe ſome baſe places alongſt the ſea coaſt,but not to come directly for the regal city of Tunes. In which opinion hee was chiefly confirmed by Aloyſius Praſenda a Gentleman of Genoa,who being taken at ſea, was kept as a priſoner at large in Tunes. Of whom Barbaruſſa had learned many things concerning the ſtate of Italy,the manners of the Chriſtians, and ſtrength of the Emperour: craftily feeding him with the hope of liberty,if he would truly declare vnto him ſuch things as he deſired to know. Wherfore now in his rage he cauſed him to be brought before him,charging him bitterly,that he had craftily and perfideouſly told him lies for truth, concerning the Emperour; and therefore commanded him to be forthwith executed. When hee had thus with the vnworthy death of a guiltleſſe Chriſtian, ſomewhat mitigated the griefe of his light beleefe, he forthwith began to caſt with himſelfe, how he might beſt withſtand his puiſſant Enemy. And firſt of all calling to Counſell his ſea Captaines (in whom for their approued valour he repoſed the moſt confidence) he ſhewed vnto them, That they as valiant men,acquainted with the dangers attending vpon honourable actions,were not to doubt of the victory,foraſmuch as hee ſaw it as good as already gained; for the ſame reaſons for which he had before perſuaded himſelf,that the Emperor(if he had not bin half mad)would not haue vndertaken ſo doubtfull and deſperat a war.

Barbaruſſa encourageth his ſoldiers.

For who is there (ſaid he) that knows the country (not to ſpeak of our own forces) which would not reaſonably think our enemies ſhould in ſhort time know the price of their ambitious deſire and raſh attempt? which in a moſt vnſeaſonable time of the year,the days being now at the longeſt,and the ſun in his greateſt ſtrength,are come to fight in a country ſcorched with heat,and altogether without water; where the very ſand riſing with euery blaſt of wind, flying into their eies and faces, ſhall no leſſe trouble them than their enemies? Shall we think that they,which as I hear for the moſt part are freſh water ſoldiers,and ſurcharged with heauy armor,can eaſily march forward,or retyre,or yet keep their ground,as the diuers occaſions of battell ſhall require: when as the deep and hollow burning ſands vp to the mid leg,will not ſuffer them to keep any order of array? How ſhall they be able by any meanes to abide the force of our Turkiſh footmen,or the often charging of the nimble Numidian horſemen? And if there be ſo many of them as they ſay there is, where can they get victuall to feed ſuch a multitude, if we do but protract the war. Aſſuredly (moſt valiant and couragious Chieftaines) wee ſhall erect a moſt rare and incomparable trophy in this country of Africk: when as Charles the rich and great Emperor of the Chriſtians, ſhall either be here ſlain in battell, or elſe fall into our hands as a rich prey. For myne owne part I will notably prouide, that you ſhall want neither weapons, victuall, nor ayd, during the time of this Warre. I will open the

A the old armories, broch my ſtore, and bring forth my treaſures. The Numidian princes now our friends, I will without delay entertain with great pay, and ſuch preſents as ſhall be to them moſt welcome. As for the citiſens of Tunes, you know how eaſily they are to be kept in obedience, and brought on againſt the enemy for ſmall pay, and hope of reward. But this one thing is it that I moſt earneſtly require of your approued valor, That you moſt valiantly defend the ſtrong caſtle of Guletta, as the ſureſt defence not of this city only, but of the whole kingdom; and eſpecially our navy, which there lieth in ſafe harbor: for that piece will our enemies with all their forces firſt aſſail. Wherfore as worthy men neuer to be vanquiſhed, keepe that for Solyman and me: ſo that it being vainly attempted by our enemies, and reſolutely defended by you, the Chriſtian Emperor there failing of his purpoſe, and ſhamefully foiled, ſhall now begin to diſpaire, not of the taking of the city of Tunes, but of his own return and ſafety.

When he had thus ſaid, the ſea captains anſwered with one conſent, that they would moſt willingly and cheerfully perform whatſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe him to command: And in confirmation therof, promiſed him not to do any thing which beſeemed not moſt valiant & reſolute men. Among theſe ſea captains, Sinan of Smyrna a Iew, who had loſt his right eye, was both for his age and long experience in military affaires, of greateſt account: next vnto him was Haidinus of Cilicia, for his furiouſnes in fight ſyrnamed of the Italians Cacciadiabolo; and Salec of Ionia; which two had before in a great battel at ſea ſlain Rodericus Portendus great admirall of Spain, and taken his ſon Iohn priſoner, and ſeuen great Gallies: after theſe was Tabacches of Laodicea, and Giaffer a valiant Captaine of the Ianizaries; all which were notable

C pyrats, and then men of great fame. The ſtrong caſtle of Guletta ſtandeth in the bottome of the Bay of Carthage, vpon a point of the land, where the ſea by a narrow ſtreit runneth on the Eaſt ſide of the caſtle into the lake of Tunes: which being in a maner round, is about twelue Italian miles ouer; but now that Caſtle is parted from the Maine on the Weſt ſide alſo, by the ſea that way let in. Which chargeable work was by Barbaruſſa begun, but giuen ouer again by him; perſuaded by ſome, that the ſea comming in that way, would in ſhort time fill vp the lake with ſand. But was afterwards for all that perfected by others: ſo that now it ſtandeth in maner of an Iſland, in the mouth of the lake, diuided from the firm land by two narrow ſtreit paſſages; the one on the Eaſt, and the other on the Weſt; yet ſo that it commandeth both. This caſtle Barbaruſſa had before ſtrongly fortified both with men and munition, as the

D key of that kingdom: but now vpon the comming of the emperor he put into it his moſt expert and reſolute captains before named; wel foreſeeing, that in defence therof lay the ſafety of his Navy, which then lay within the lake, as in a moſt ſure harbor; and alſo the greateſt hope he had for the holding of the city of Tunes, whereon depended the whole ſtate of that kingdom. The Emperor lying at anchor with all his fleet vnder the ſhore, gaue generall commandement, that his ſoldiers ſhould with as much ſpeed as was poſſible be landed with the long boats: which was ſo orderly done, that the Moors terrified with the hideous cry of the ſoldiers making toward land, and not able to abide the ſhoures of ſmall ſhot, were eaſily beaten from the ſhore, whither they were come downe in great multitudes; and ſo ſuffered the Chriſtian ſoldiers to land quietly. The firſt that landed were the Spaniſh companies, after

E them the Italians, and laſt of all the Germans; whom Vaſtius Generall of the army cauſed preſently to incamp themſelues, ſtreitly commaunding, That no man ſhould ſtraggle from the camp further into the land, vntil the horſmen and great artillery were all landed. The Emperor himſelf bearing victory in the cheerfulnes of his countenance, landed alſo. In the meane time certain Companies were ſent out by the Generall to view the places nigh hand, and to ſeek out the ciſterns and fountains of freſh water thereabout, which ſometime ſerued the famous city of Carthage: with whom the Moores, but eſpecially the Numidian horſemen, a ſwift, ſubtle, and painfull kind of ſouldiers, oftentimes and in many places ſuddenly skirmiſhed: and though they were but naked men, yet taking all the aduantages they could of the places to them wel known, with their arrows and darts furiouſly aſſailed them vnawares, and Amongſt whom was Hieronymus Spinnula a Ligurian Captain, who ouerthrown by a Numidian horſman, had his head cut off and carried away by the ſame nimble horſman, before hee could bee reſcued. The like miſhap befell Fredericus Carettus a noble Gentleman, who going with Vaſtius to view the places therabouts,was faſt by his ſide ſuddenly ſlain with a ſmall ſhot.All which G nimblenes and fiercenes of the enemy could not for all that ſtay the Emperour, but that hee would needs with a ſmall troup of horſmen, in perſon himſelf take view of the places therabouts, euen in the ſight of the Numidian horſmen,which were in euery place to be ſeen pricking vp and down the country in troups; although he was many times requeſted by his graue counſellors, to leaue that ſeruice for his inferior captains,and not to expoſe himſelfe vnto ſo great danger both of his perſon and of the common ſafety. Vaſtius had now brought vp the army neer to the caſtle of Guletta,ſtil caſting vp a rolling trench as he came neerer therunto; therby to keep his men out of the danger of the enemies ſhot:which work was not don only by the pioners and gally ſlaues,but by ſoldiers of all ſorts;yea many of the captains alſo layd their hands to the ſpade and mattock : for why,the Emperor was there a continual beholder, and a cheerful commender of euery mans labour and forwardneſſe : and the buſie enemy was H euer ready to take the aduantage, if any thing were by negligence omitted, oftentimes ſallying out euen vnto the very tents of the Chriſtians,there giuing vnto them proud words of defiance.

When the army was to be marſhalled,and euery commander to be appointed to the place of his charge in this ſiege of Guletta; the County of Sarne (a man famous both for the honor of his houſe,and for the good ſeruice he had lately done againſt the Turks at Corone) requeſted of Vaſtius the General,to haue the charge of the mount neereſt to the caſtle,which as it was a place of moſt danger,ſo was it alſo of greateſt honor. Whereat the old Spaniards (after the maner of their proud nature) much repined. Vpon the top of this mount the County ſet vp his rich tent in the enemies eie,and there lay with the Italian companies ouer whom I he commanded. He had not there lien long, but Salec one of the Turks famous captains,with a companie of the gariſon ſoldiers ſallied out of the caſtle directly vpon the mount whereon the Count lay,and by making ſhew as if he would deſperatly haue aſſailed the ſame,raiſed a great alarme againſt the Italians; yet ſo, as after certaine vollies of ſhot diſcharged on both ſides, he began to retyre as if he had bin therto conſtrained. Which thing the County perceiuing, being a man of greater courage than direction,in great rage with bitter words reproued certain captains who were not ſo forward in the purſuit of the Enemy as hee would haue had them;and in his fury ran down from the mount,the reſt for ſhame following him,and ouertaking the enemies,ſlew diuers of them.The crafty pyrat now ſeeing the County drawn out of his ſtrength into the plain ground, and perceiuing himſelfe ſtrong enough to incounter him, K ſuddenly turning himſelf about, ſaid to his ſoldiers,The aduantage you wiſhed to haue of your Enemies is now offered, they are now in your danger; wherfore ſhew your ſelues valiant men,and ſuffer not one of theſe proud freſh-water ſoldiers to eſcape aliue or vnwounded. Which he had no ſooner ſayd, but they preſently made a ſtand,and ſo hardly charged them from whom they but euen now ſeemd to fly,that the Italians not able longer to indure the fight,betook themſelues to flight.
The County himſelfe (with Belingerus his kinſman) fighting valiantly in the formoſt of his companies was ſlain:many others indured the like fortune : others flying backe again to the mount,were there ſlain by the Turkes; who reſolutely entred into the trenches with them ſo far,that they caried away with them the plate and riches of the Counties tent. Neither was there any of the Spaniards which lay neereſt vnto them,and might eaſily haue reſcued them, L that would once ſtir out of their places to help them. For it is reported, that they were nothing ſorry for the ouerthrow of the Italians,foraſmuch as the county had ſo arrogantly craued of the General the moſt honorable place,which he ſo euil held. His head and right hand were cut off,and ſent by Salec to Barbaruſſa.This ouerthrow much grieued the Italians,whom Vaſtius comforted with cheerful ſpeeches; imputing all that loſſe neither to the valour of the enemy,or cowardiſe of the Italians,but only to the raſhnes of the County,whom he ſaid worthily to haue paid the price of his inconſiderat forwardnes. But the Spaniards he ſharply reproued as mercileſſe men, who vpon ſo light an occaſion had giuen cauſe for the Italians to haue them in diſtruſt. The Turks in the mean time by the often ſhooting off of their great ordnance,ſhewed the ioy they conceiued of this victory. M

The Spaniards reioicing at the Italians ouer-throw, are thẽſelues foiled by Tabacches.

It oftentimes ſo falleth out,that whilſt men laugh at their neighbors harms,their owne is not far off : and ſo it fel out with the Spaniards. For Tabacches another of the pyratical captains, ſhortly after ſallying ſuddenly out of the caſtle in the dawning of the day,was got vp to
the

A the top of the trenches wherin the Spaniards lay, before they were aware of his comming, and there ſlew ſome as they were aſleep, ſome idlely ſitting fearing no harme, others as they were arming themſelues, and with their ſudden cry cauſed the reſt which lay neer vnto that place, ſhamefully for fear to fly out of their trenches: where the Turkes taking ſuch traſh as they there found, and hauing ſlain and wounded many, amongſt whom was one Mendoza a captain; and carying away with them the enſigne of Sarmentus which ſtood vpon the top of the trench, returned with victory. The alarm raiſed in the army was ſuch, as that the Emperor himſelfe came running to the place in his Armor, ſeuerely reproouing them of cowardiſe which had forſaken the place, and grieuouſly offended with them which had kept ſuch negligent watch againſt ſuch an enemy, as was not for wylines, agility, and courage, to be ſlightly regarded of B the beſt and moſt expert ſoldiers. This diſgrace of the Spaniards wel comforted the Italians, to ſee the old ſoldiers no leſſe ouertaken in their negligence, than they had bin in their vnaduiſed forwardnes.

This tumult appeaſed, Vaſtius called into his tent the Colonels and chief Captains of the Spaniards, to whom he ſpake in this maner:

Vaſtius ſpeech to the Spaniſh Captains.

Friends (ſaid he) elſwhere alwaies valiant, who together with mee, haue by your inuincible proweſſe gained vnto our Emperor many moſt glorious victories; you ſeem vnto me at this time to haue need to be called vpon, and to be put in remembrance of your wonted and approoued valour; for as far as I can ſee, the remembrance of your antient fame is in you growne altogether cold, your hands are become faint for C fear, and that which I am ſory and aſhamed to ſay, you are grown I know not how, altogether out of order, and heartleſſe, ſhewing no courage for the ſubduing of theſe naked Pyrats. Yeſterday (as many ſay) you ſmiled at the vnskilfull and vnfortunat forwardneſſe of your friends, which they bought dear; but to day they worthily laugh at your degenerat careleſſe negligence: ſo that it concerneth you in honor, to blot out this ſo foul and publique a diſgrace, by ſome notable and worthy exploit. Wherefore I exhort you, and I ſtreitly charge and command you, that with all ſpeed you prepare both your minds and weapons for the atchieuement of ſome new honor; that if the proud enemy ſhall again preſume to come forth and aſſail your trenches, you ſhall forthwith break out vpon him and beat him backe againe euen to the gates of Guletta. Perhaps good fortune will ſo attend your valiant and reſolute purſuit, that you may together with their diſordred men enter ſome of their rampiers, wherin we ſee their whole hope conſiſteth. Which if it ſhall D otherwiſe fall out than is hoped for, you ſhall by this your notable deuoir wonderfully content the Emperor your Soueraign, and me your General, and withall couer your late diſhonor.

The Turks ſally againe out of Guletta.

Wherunto they all anſwered, That they would ſo bear themſelues againſt the Enemy, as that he ſhould not deſire greater courage or contempt of danger, in men deſirous of honour and commendation.

It was not long, but that the Turks incouraged with their former ſucces, after their woonted maner ſallyed out again, conducted by Giaffer Captaine of the Ianizaries, a man of great courage and ſtrength of body: who with the Ianizaries and certain companies of Mooriſh E archers, about noon time of the day iſſuing out of the caſtle, aſſailed the vttermoſt trenches, hoping in that broiling heat to find the Chriſtians in their ſtations negligent and vnprepared: wherin he was nothing deceiued: for the Spaniards that burning hot time of the day kept ſuch negligent watch, that Giaffer with his Ianizaries and archers was got vp to the top of the rampiers, and diſcharged their ſhot and arrows vpon the Chriſtians in their trenches, before they were wel aware of his comming. But vpon the ſtriking vp of the drum, certain Companies of harquebuſiers brake out vpon them in two places at once, as Vaſtius had before commanded; whom he ſeconded with a company of halberdiers, keeping in readineſſe his ſquadrons to reſcue his harquebuſiers, if they ſhould be inforced by the enemy to retyre; and in that order expected the euent of the skirmiſh, which was moſt valiantly maintained on both F ſides. For the Ianizaries, although they were inforced to giue ground, yet as men not vſed to fly, and ſtanding vpon the honor of their order, withſtood the Chriſtians with no leſſe reſolution than they were by them charged; vntill that Giaffer their leader, deſperately fighting amongſt the formoſt of the Ianizaries, was at once ſhot in with two bullets and ſlaine. Whoſe dead body the Ianizaries laboring to carry away, endured a moſt cruell fight, many being on both ſides ſlaine vpon his dead carkaſſe: yet at length they were inforced to flie, and ſo fiercely followed by the Spaniards, that they of Guletta, when they had receiued in the foremoſt G ſhut out almoſt a fourth part of their own men, for feare the Chriſtians ſhould together with them haue entred the caſtle. Didacus Abila, one of the Spaniſh enſigne-bearers, aduanced his enſigne vnto the top of one of the enemies rampiers, and was there ſlaine, but his enſigne ſaued by one of the ſouldiers of the ſame band. The Chriſtians receiued more loſſe in their retreat, then they had in all the fight; for the Turks from their rampiers then diſcharged their ſhot as faſt as they could vpon them, which they could not before doe without the like danger to their own mingled amongſt them. This days work well abated the pride of the Turks, and gaue good hope to the Chriſtians, that the Caſtle would without any great loſſe be gained: for being neer vnto it, they perceiued it not to be ſo ſtrong as they had ſuppoſed. H

The Emperor hauing ſpent a a few dayes in conſultation about his farther proceeding, and preparing of things for the ſiege, reſolued without further delay with all his forces to aſſault the caſtle, perſuaded thereunto by many reaſons: firſt, by the cheerfulnes of his owne ſoldiers, & the courage of his enemies ſore danted in the laſt skirmiſh, which he was loth they ſhould againe recouer by the comming of new ſupplies; beſides that, hee was informed that diuers companies of the Numidians were comming to Tunes, entertained by Barbaruſſa, whoſe ſtrength was like daily to increaſe: but that which moued him moſt to haſten the matter, was, for that his men began to grow ſickly in his camp, being all the day time ſcortched as it were with the feruent heat of the Sun, and well neere ſtarued in the night with cold and exceeding dewes wherewith they were commonly wet to the skin; neither was there either good water, I or freſh victuall by any meanes to be had in that ſandie and barren ſoile, for the reliefe of the ſicke, other than that was brought out of the fleet; for all the water thereabout was moſt vnpleaſant and exceeding brackiſh, ſo that both ſicke and whole were glad when they could get a crab to quench their extreme thirſt: although the Emperour did what he might to remedy theſe extremities, and much reliefe was in good time ſent both from Sicilia and Naples: the bisket alſo in the ſhips, eſpecially in the Spaniſh gallies, was growne hoary and vnwholſome.
Wherefore he began to place his battery about the fifteenth of Iuly, which was defended all alongſt with Gabions, and cask filled with ſand, for that the countrey ſoile in that place yeelded neither earth nor turfe to do it. Auria appointed to batter the Caſtle by ſea, diuided his gallies into three ſquadrons, which orderly ſucceeding one another, ſhould by turns beat the K ſame: his great ſhips rid at anker, and out of their forecaſtles thundred with their great Ordnance.
And Vaſtius at land had diuided his army into three battels; Spaniards, Italians, and Germans, euery ſtation by themſelues, in ſuch ſort, as that they might indifferently be partakers both of the danger of the aſſault, and of the glory of the victory. There was neuer ſtrong place in the memory of man (ſince guns, that fatall engine were firſt inuented for the deſtruction of mankind) aſſailed with greater force, greater preparation, or induſtry. The great ordnance in manner of a great earthquake, ſo terribly roared and thundred, that the earth ſeemed not only to tremble and quake vnder mens feet, but euen by and by to rent in ſunder and ſwallow them vp, and the ſea which was euen now quiet and calme, began to riſe aloft, and to rage & fome as if it had bin in a great ſtorm: at which time the air became thick & the skie darkned L with the ſmoke of the great artillery: from the breake of the day vntil noon, roaring cannon and culuering neuer ceaſed: ſo that the Vamures were beaten down, the caſtle made ſaultable, & the wals ſo ſhaken, that in many places the Turks canoniers, together with their cannons lay buried in the ruins thereof. Which thing perceiued, they which were before appointed to giue the firſt aſſault, vpon ſignall giuen by the Emperor, preſently vpon the ceaſing of the great Artillery, aſſailed the breach, and others with their ſcaling ladders ſcaled the wals: which was done with ſuch courage and reſolution, that the Turks when they had done what they poſſibly could for the defence of the place, by caſting down darts, wild fire, and ſuch like things vpon the Chriſtians as they were climbing vp; at length as men deſpairing longer to hold the place, & ouercome with a greater fortune, turned their backs & fled. Sinan & the reſt M of the captains by a wooden bridge, fled out at the further ſide of the caſtle, into the main, and ſo alongſt the left ſide of the lake by land to Tunes, not looking behind them for haſt: which way moſt part of his men followed him alſo. The reſt were either ſlain or driuen into the lake, where ſeeking to haue their liues by ſwimming, they were either ſlain in comming to land, by Guletta aſſaulted by the Chriſtians.

A the Spaniſh horſemen, or elſe in their ſwimming ſhot at pleaſure by the harquebuſiers, ſo that all the lake was as it were couered with the dead bodies of the Turks and Moores. The Emperor with ſmall ſhot thus gained the caſtle of Guletta, with all the warlike prouiſion therein, and with it all Barbaruſſa his great fleet and ſtrength at ſea, which he for the more ſafety had before put into the lake: which as it was vnto the Emperor a thing moſt pleaſant, ſo was it vnto Barbaruſſa and his pyrats the greateſt griefe and loſſe poſſible, hauing at once loſt all their power at ſea, which but a little before was no ſmall terror to all the frontiers of the Christian countries and Iſlands in the Mediterranean.

Guletta woon, and Barbaruſſa his fleet taken.

Barbaruſſa troubled and terrified with ſo great a loſſe, with a ſterne and ſcornefull countenance receiued the Iew and the reſt of the captains fled from Guletta, reuiling them bitterly B in his rage, and calling them faint hearted cowards, which had in ſo ſhort a time giuen ouer ſo ſtrong a place. Whereunto Sinan anſwered for them all, in this ſort:

Barbaruſſa rageth.

Hairadin (ſaid he) ſo long as we were to fight with armed men, we did as thou well knoweſt, and our enemies cannot deny, what well beſeemed vs and thy magnificent fortune. But when we were to withſtand the Diuell and his infernall furies, which came againſt vs with flames of fire, and earthquakes, things of extreame terrour and danger; it ought not to ſeeme ſtrange vnto thee, if we ſought to eſcape the vncouth fury of the immortall enemies of mankinde, to do thee ſeruice in thy better fortune, in defence of this thy city and kingdome. Neither do we account it any diſgrace to haue eſcaped that danger, as men that minde againe to fight: out of which thou, a moſt antient and expert Commander (if I may frankely ſpeake vnto C thee the truth) if thou hadſt been there preſent, wouldſt haue accounted it no diſhonor, but very good diſcretion to haue eſcaped in ſafety.

The ſhort anſwer of Sinan the Iew vnto Barbaruſſa.

Barbaruſſa repreſſing his fury, began in a more temperat manner to requeſt them euery one particularly, as valiant and couragious men to ſtand faſt vnto him in that war againſt their enemies the Chriſtians: telling them, that he well hoped, that after the great ſupplie of the Mooriſh footmen and Numidian horſemen were once come (which were now at hand) the enemy ſhould not long rejoyce of the taking of Guletta. After that, he forthwith conuerted all his ſtudy and endeauour, to prepare ſuch things as were needfull for the war, bringing forth his treaſures, and bountifully beſtowing the ſame amongſt the Moors and Numidians, thereby to D confirme the friendſhip of ſuch as well affected him, and with his new bounty to win the hearts of ſuch as yet ſtood doubtfull.

In the mean time Muleaſſes the exiled king, with a ſmal retinue of his friends and followers came from the furtheſt part of Numidia, into the Emperors campe; the Emperor ſitting in a royall ſeat in the midſt of his pauillion, whereinto Muleaſſes was admitted, with a myter vpon his head, in a garment of greene and blew changeable ſilke: he was of a tall and manly ſtature, of colour tawny, but ſo ſqint-eyed, that he ſeemed ſpitefully to looke vpon them whom he beheld: whom after he had kiſſed the Emperors right hand, and had ſet himſelfe downe with his legs gathered cloſe vnder him, vpon a carpet ſpred vpon the bare ground, after the manner of his country, he by an interpreter ſpake vnto the Emperor as followeth.

Muleaſſes commeth to the emperour.

Thou art come in armes into this country, and art now almoſt conquerour of the ſame, (thrice mighty Emperour) prouoked thereunto not by any deſert of mine, for that our different religion ſo required; yet as I verily thinke, not without the appointment of the moſt high God, whom both thou and I do with like deuotion worſhip, to take reuenge of the moſt perfidious and cruell tyrant and pyrat, the mortall enemy of mankinde; whom I foreſee as good as already vanquiſhed, now that Guletta is taken and his nauy ſurpriſed. So that I hope he ſhall in ſhort time by thy reuenging hand, at once receiue the juſt guardon of all his former villanies: which ſhall be ſo much the more to my comfort, for that I hope the fruit of thy rare felicity and glorious victory will redound in great part to me, being reſtored by thee into my fathers kingdome: which I as a poore exiled Prince moſt humbly requeſt of thy juſtice and bounty. For it ſhall be F vnto thee a thing moſt honourable and profitable, if thou ſhalt receiue into thy protection me, a King royally diſcended of a moſt antient progeny, ſtrengthned with the great alliance of Numidians and Moores. Neither do I refuſe either to pay thee tribute therefore, or to acknowledge my ſelfe vaſſall vnto thee the Chriſtian Emperor. Of which my fidelity there can be no greater aſſurance, than the thankefull remembrance of ſo great a benefit receiued; which ſhall for euer remaine vnforgotten of me and my poſterity,

The Oration of Muleaſſes vnto Charles the emperour.

euen for that eſpecially, that I deteſt and abhorre the name of an vnthankefull man; and do well by experience G finde, how much my ſtate may be confirmed, and the minds of my people to me aſſured, by the garriſons ſo neere at hand in Sicilia and Sardinia.

The Emperours anſwer to Muleaſſes.

Wherunto the Emperor anſwered, That he was come ouer into Affricke to be reuenged of the injuries which Barbaruſſa had many times done vpon the frontiers of his dominions, and to root out the pyrats, of all others moſt miſchieuous: which his good purpoſe had by the goodneſſe of Chriſt his Sauior taken ſo good effect, that he doubted not in ſhort time by the taking of Tunes to obtaine a perfect victory; which once gained, he would then kindly grant him all things which ſhould ſtand with the conuenience of his affaires, and the vſe of his victory: ſo that he would not falſifie his faith, which he might juſtly ſuſpect, if he repoſed not H a ſpeciall truſt, that the remembrance of ſuch a benefit would for euer remaine in his heroicall mind: and was further aſſured, that the ſame power which ſhould reſtore him his kingdome of curteſie, could alſo take it from him againe, if his vnthankefulneſſe ſhould ſo deſerue.

The behauior of Muleaſſes.

Muleaſſes in the preſence of the Emperor vſed ſuch a grauity and grace in his ſpeech & geſture, as well declared, that he had nothing forgotten his former eſtate: but towards the Generall and the other great Captaines he vſed all manner of curteſie, ſo that he rid vp and down with them gallantly mounted, mannaging his horſe, and charging and diſcharged his launce with ſuch agility and skill, as ſhewed him to be a very good horſeman, and of great actiuity.
At other vacant times he would ſubtilly reaſon with learned men, after the manner of Auerrois, of the nature of things, of the motion of heauen, and power of the ſtarres. By the Emperours I commandement he had a Tent appointed for him, and honourable allowance for his diet. Vaſtius and the reſt of the chiefe Commanders of the army vſed him with all honor, and at ſuch time as he was deſirous to ſee the campe, curteouſly brought him into all places of it, that he might himſelfe ſee what mounts they had in ſhort time caſt, what abundance there was of great artillery, what ſtrong watch and ward was kept, what a number there was of braue and warlike ſouldiers of diuers nations, differing much one from another in language, countenance, and manner of furniture: and further demanded, Whether that puiſſant army which the Emperour had brought ouer to his great good, were in his judgement ſufficient to ſubdue the enemy? Where aboue all things Muleaſſes wondered at the number and order of the great ordnance: and next vnto that, at the wonderfull plenty of things to be bought and ſould in K the market place, and at the modeſt quietneſſe of the ſouldiers in buying the ſame. Not long after, the expert Captaines by diligent enquiry learned of him many things well ſeruing for their better proceeding in that war, eſpecially of the diſpoſition and ſtrength of them of His opinion and counſell concerning the preſent warre.

Tunes, of the ſcituation of the city, of the nature of the walls, and fortification of the Caſtle, of the Wels and Ciſternes in the ſuburbes, and what ſtrength the Moores and Numidians were of, which Barbaruſſa had entertained. In concluſion, he aſſured them (as afterwards it fell out) that Barbaruſſa would neuer truſt to the ſtrength of the wals, which would eaſily be ouerthrowne with the great artillery; but would in a great brauery with enſignes diſplaied bring all his forces into the field, of purpoſe to terrifie the Chriſtians with the ſight of the multitude of his raſcall ſoldiers, and to breake their array with his Numidian horſemen, who with L hideous and terrible cries, after the manner of that nation, would not faile to aſſaile them: and yet for all that would neuer bring into the battell his Turkiſh footmen (in whom he repoſed his greateſt confidence, and whom he deſired moſt to ſpare) but would as a crafty and ſubtill Turke, by oppoſing of the Moores, whom he held in ſmall regard, try by their bloud what might be done without the danger of his owne men. But as he told them, nothing could be more ſtrange vnto the Moores his countrymen, or that they were more affraid of, than in a ſet battell to fight with that enemy whoſe ſquadrons comming orderly on in gliſtring armour, with long pikes, might ſcorne and eaſily ouerthrow the naked archers of the Moores, and the vnarmed Numidian horſmen: and that our men ſhould find nothing more grieuous or troubleſome, than the ſcorching heat of the Sun, and the thirſt riſing thereof; which might eaſily be M remedied by plenty of water, which by ſlaues and ſmal boats might eaſily be brought in casks and bottles from the fleet alongſt the lake, and ſo diſtributed amongſt the army: although not far from the walls of the city were certaine old conduit heads which would yeeld them great plenty of water, if the malicious enemy did not to his owne hurt and others, poyſon

A the ſame. Theſe things orderly reported to the Emperour, confirmed the hope he had before conceiued of the deſired victory: ſo that wholly bent thereupon, and carefully forecaſting all things, he reſolued forthwith to depart from Guletta, and with all his power to beſiege Tunes.

But whileſt he was preparing things neceſſary, ordering his ſouldiers, and diſcouering the enemies purpoſes, his ſouldiers had dayly diuers skirmiſhes with the Numidians; ſo that once the skirmiſh was like to haue come to a juſt battell: which began in this ſort; The Moors had planted certain field-pieces amongſt the Oliue gardens, wherewith they ſhot continually into the campe: for remouing whereof, the Emperor leauing the Italians, with certain companies of the old Germans and Spaniſh ſoldiers, for the keeping of his campe and trenches, went B forth with his horſemen and the reſt of his army: ſending before him Montegius, Generall of the Spaniſh horſemen, who for moſt part were but raw ſouldiers, ſuch as were of the Noblemens ordinary ſeruants and followers, not before acquainted with the wars. Theſe light horſemen with diuers fortune skirmiſhed a while with the enemy; but when they ſaw themſelues to be hardly charged, and Montegius their Generall grieuouſly wounded, they turned their backs, and in the ſight of the Emperor ſhamefully fled to the men at armes which were comming after them. The manner of the enemies fight was, to giue at the firſt a fierce and deſperat charge, and vpon the encounter giuen, of purpoſe to retyre, auoiding thereby the ſudden force of their enemies, and by and by to turne againe vpon them with a freſh charge. The Emperour ſeeing the flight of his light horſemen, came on couragiouſly with his men at armes; C by whoſe comming in and valiant encounter the Turks and Moores were put to flight, and the field pieces wherewith they had before annoyed the campe, taken. In this skirmiſh the Emperour in perſon, as he ſtood formoſt in his armed troups, gaue the ſignall of battell himſelfe, by crying with a loud voice, Saint Iames, Saint Iames, whom the Spaniards take for their Patron; and ſo charging the enemy, performed the part not only of a couragious Chiefetaine, but of a reſolute and valiant ſouldier alſo; reſcuing with his owne hand Andreas Pontius a noble gentleman of Granado, whom vnhorſed and ſore wounded, the enemy was ready preſently to haue ſlaine, had not the Emperor by his comming in ſaued him: deſeruing thereby the Oken garland, which the Romans by the name of Ciuica Corona, gaue as an honour to ſuch as had in battell ſaued a citiſen.

The Spaniſh light horſmen put to flight.

The Emperour reſtoreth the battell, & with his owne hand reſcueth Andreas Pontius of Granado.

D About the ſame time it fortuned, that thirty thouſand Moores came vpon the ſudden to haue ſurpriſed a little tower ſtanding vpon a hill neere vnto the ruines of old Carthage: wherin the Emperor had placed certaine ſoldiers for the keeping thereof, becauſe it was neere vnto his campe. Before theſe Moores went a Numidian Prieſt, who bellowing out certain ſuperſtitious charmes, caſt diuers ſcroles of paper on each ſide the way, wherein he curſed and banned the Chriſtians: and now they had with fire and ſmoake brought the Chriſtians in that tower to great extremity, when the Emperour himſelfe comming to their reſcue with certaine companies of horſemen and footmen, ſlew the conjuring Prieſt, with others, and put the reſt to flight. The diſcomfiture of the Spaniſh horſemen cauſed many men to thinke, that if the Emperor ſhould come to a ſet battell with the enemy, he ſhould finde his horſemen too weake, E both for that they were but few in number, and not to be compared with the Numidians. For which cauſe, and diuers others, certaine of the Emperours graue counſellors, but none of the beſt ſoldiers, wiſhed him not to proceed further in that dangerous war, but with ſpeed to returne out of Affricke, for as much as he had won honour enough by the taking of Guletta, and ſurpriſing the enemies fleet: whereby he had to his immortall praiſe, and the common good of Chriſtendome, deliuered all the frontiers of the Chriſtian countries in the Mediterranean, from the danger and feare of thoſe moſt cruell pyrats; beſides that, the flix began to rage in his campe, whereof many of his ſouldiers fell ſicke and died daily. Whereas on the contrary part, the mighty Numidian Princes, ſuch as were Muleaſſes old enemies, were reported to come in dayly to the aid of Barbaruſſa. Theſe vnſeaſonable ſpeeches the Emperour thought F good to repreſſe betime; reaſoning againſt the authors thereof with great grauity, as againſt men who with more feare doubted of the ſucceſſe of things, and the euent of the victory, than beſeemed them, whom for their conſtant reſolution, and good opinion conceiued of their diſcretion, he had choſen to be of his moſt ſecret counſell.

The Emperour aduiſed by his Counſellors to returne home.

Saying, That he deſired not of them that their needleſſe and diſhonourable labour, wherein they ſhould ſhew themſelues more carefull of his perſon than of his honour: for as much as thoſe things which they G now alledged, ſhould haue bin ſaid before the war was taken in hand, now by good hap halfe ended: before he euer paſſed ouer into Affricke. For he might (as he ſaid) haue reſted quietly in Spaine, and haue eaſily neglected and rejected the injuries done vpon the ſea coaſts, and the complaints of his ſubjects; but he was (as they well knew) for moſt vrgent cauſes come thither: whereas he was reſolued to ſatisfie the expectation of the World with a notable victory; or if God ſhould otherwiſe appoint, there to end his daies with honour. Wherefore he willed them to ceaſe further to flatter him that was no way diſmaid, or to poſſeſſe the minds of his valiant ſouldiers with a vaine forboding feare, and with reſolute minds, together with him their chiefetaine, againſt the next day to expect what the fortune of the field ſhould appoint for the full accompliſhment of that war. For he was (as he ſaid) ſet downe to giue the enemy battell; or if he refuſed the ſame, to batter the walls of Tunes, not doubting but that God would ſtand on his ſide in ſo good H and ſo godly a quarrell.

The Emperor marcheth toward Tunes.

The Emperour leauing a ſufficient garriſon in the caſtle of Guletta, commanded the breaches to be repaired, and the great ordnance there taken to be laid vpon carriages, which before after the old rude ſea faſhion lay bound in great vnweldy pieces of timber, with yron rings faſtned thereunto, and could not handſomely be handled or remoued to and fro. After that, when he had cauſed the country to be well viewed all about, which betwixt the Oliue groues and the right ſide of the lake giueth a direct paſſage vnto the City of Tunes; he ſet forward with his army in ſo good order, that he ſtill marched as ready to fight, for feare of the policies and ſudden aſſaults of the enemy. On the left hand marched the Italians next vnto the lake; on the right hand the Spaniards neere vnto the Oliue groues, which in the manner of a I great wood ran all alongſt the country, from the ruines of Carthage, almoſt to the wals of Tunes: in the midſt betwixt both marched the Germans; next vnto them followed the great ordnance; and after it the carriages of all the army. In the vauntgard was Vaſtius, whom the Emperour had made Generall of the army, and eſpecially for that day: in the rereward was the Duke of Alba with certaine troups of choſen horſemen: in the middle of the main battell was the Emperor, and by his ſide Lewis his brother in law the King of Portugals brother. The Italians were conducted by the Prince of Salarne, the Spaniards by Alarco an antient captain, and the Germans by Maximilian Eberſtein. But the Emperor in his armor ceaſed not to ride from ſquadron to ſquadron, with cheerefull countenance and full of hope, recounting vnto them the former victories which they had gotten for him: and telling them, that he did that K day expect of them a moſt honourable daies ſeruice, foraſmuch as they were to fight againſt the naked enemies of the Chriſtian religion: wherefore they ſhould with reſolute minds ſet down themſelues to endure the weight of their armor, the painfulneſſe of their march, the heat of the Sun and ſand, and the tediouſneſſe of the thirſt ariſing thereof; vntill they might joyne battel with their enemies, where they ſhould vndoubtedly by the goodneſſe of God (in whoſe quarrell they fought) obtaine the victory: in the meane time they ſhould with patience ouercome all difficulties, comforting themſelues with the vndoubted hope of a moſt rich prey, which they were to expect of the ſpoile of a rich city. Whereunto euery ſquadron anſwered with a great ſhout, that he ſhould not trouble himſelfe with thoſe matters which he had before L rehearſed, but to aſſure himſelfe, that they his ſouldiers would moſt patiently endure all exrtemities, and not deceiue the expectation he had conceiued of their wonted valour, but by valiant fight to make him Emperor, not of Affricke but of Aſia alſo.

Now Vaſtius had withdrawn two companies of harquebuſiers out of the Spaniſh ſquadron, to ſkirmiſh with the Moores who continually followed in the taile of the army: whom, by thoſe harquebuſiers and certaine troups of horſemen deputed to that purpoſe, the duke of Alba notably repulſed in the rereward.

The ſoldiers for greedineſſe of water diſordered their march

The army was now come vnto the Ciſternes of freſh water, which Muleaſſes and others which well knew the country, had before told them of; which as ſoon as the ſouldiers almoſt fainting vnder the weight of their armor, with the ſcorching heat of the Sun, and extremity of M thirſt, deſcried afar off; they for deſire they had to quench their thirſt, forthwith forſooke their colours, and diſorderly ran as faſt as they could to thoſe ciſternes: Vaſtius the Generall, to the vttermoſt of his power laboring in vaine both by faire meanes and foule to haue ſtaied them; who ſaw by that diſordernes of the ſouldiers, a great aduantage offred vnto the enemy, which then

A then was not far off. But when the Generall could neither with words or blowes preuaile any thing with them, the Emperour himſelfe was glad to haſt thither, with his preſence and authority to haue kept them in order: yet ſuch was the force of their intollerable thirſt, that neither the ſight of the Emperour, nor all that he could do, could remedy the diſorder; ſome fainting in the ſand for lacke of drinke, and ſome other for greedineſſe ready to burſt their bellies at the fountains; ſo that the Emperor was faine with his truncheon to beat them away. Amongſt the reſt, one Sullius Cicero of Arpinus, a famous captain, died at the ciſterne ſide with drinking too much. This extremity for want of water ſeemed juſtly to haue happened vnto them, foraſmuch as Vaſtius the day before had by generall proclamation thorow the campe, commanded that euery ſoldier ſhould carry with him a bottle of wine or water at his girdle: B although he cauſed ſo much water as he conueniently could, to be carried in great caskes for the common reliefe of the army, whereof the Germanes had the greateſt part; ſome almoſt ready to giue ouer for thirſt, were glad to get a draught of cold water of their fellowes which had it, for two duckets.

A draught of water ſold for two duckets.

This diſorder being with as much ſpeed as was poſſible reformed, and the Army againe brought into order, the Emperor held on his march towards the enemy: for Barbaruſſa with a wonderfull multitude of horſemen and footmen, and a number of enſignes (the inſtruments of vaine feare and fooliſh brauery) gallantly diſplaied after the manner of the Moores, was come about three miles from the city, and with certaine field-pieces (as Muleaſſes had foretold) went about to haue broken the battell of the Chriſtians: which Pieces although they were often- C times diſcharged, yet did they little or no harme by reaſon of the vnskilfulneſſe of the Canoniers. Vaſtius in like manner, and for like purpoſe had commanded the great ordnance to be brought into the front of the battell: but perceiuing what time and toile it required to haue it done (for that it was drawne but by ſtrength of men, and the wheels of the carriages ſunk deep in the deuouring ſand, and the ſhot and pouder which the Mariners and gally-ſlaues caried altogether vpon their ſhoulders, came but ſoftly on) he ſuddenly changed his purpoſe, and told the Emperor, That he thought it not beſt to ſtay for the great artillery in that cheerfulneſſe of his army when euery man deſired battell, but to commit all to the valour of his reſolute men, and his own good fortune, which euer fauored his noble attempts: leſt whilſt we ſtay (ſaid he) too long vpon our great ordnance (which doth not alwaies ſerue to great purpoſe in ſudden D battels) our enemies gather courage in the time of this our vnneceſſary delay; and this exceeding cheerfulneſſe of our ſoldiers (the moſt ſure token of vndoubted victory) by deferring of time grow cold. Whereunto the Emperor, deſirous of battell, and filled with good hope, joyfully anſwered; Vaſtius, if thou ſo think it good (which I alſo like well of) in Gods name giue the ſignall. That ſhall I by and by do (ſaid he) but firſt it is reaſon that you which ſway & command a great part of the world, learne at this time to obey him, whom to his great charge and ſhame, you, laying aſide the imperiall majeſty of your ſelfe, haue for this day made Generall and commander of ſo mighty an army: wherefore (ſaid Vaſtius) I will now vſe my authority, and command you, ſith I may not ſo requeſt you, to depart from this place, and to get you into the midſt of the battell neere vnto the enſignes; leſt by ſome vnlucky ſhot, the whole eſtate of E the army be brought into extreame perill by the danger of one mans life. Whereat the Emperor ſmiling, willed him to feare no ſuch thing; ſaying moreouer, That neuer Emperour was yet ſlain with a gun. For all that, he departed out of the place as he was commanded, and went into the middle of the battell. Wherupon the ſignall of battell was by the ſound of the trumpet, and ſtriking vp of the drum, preſently giuen, and the enemy (with more haſte than the extream heat of the day required) furiouſly charged by the Emperors horſemen, who to auoid the danger of the great artillery, made all the haſte they could to come to handy blowes. In the formoſt of theſe horſemen was Ferdinand Gonzaga, a moſt valiant noble man, who then ſerued the emperor without charge: he being ſomwhat before the reſt, at the firſt onſet ſlew with his lance a great captain of the Moors, & preſently with his ſword ſo troubled them that were F next, that he opened a way for them that followed him, to break into the enemies battell. The harquebuſiers alſo diſcharged ſo faſt vpon the enemy, that 300 of them lay dead vpon the ground before the joyning of the battell: which the reſt of the footmen ſeeing, forſooke their great ordnance, and fled backe to Barbaruſſa. Who long endured not the force or ſight of the Chriſtians; but grinding his teeth for ſorrow and griefe of mind, turned his horſe, and with his his Turks retired into Tunes. For now that his deſignes had in the beginning taken ſo euill G ſucceſſe, he thought it not beſt to aduenture all in one battel; knowing right well, that the emperours army could not long endure the inconueniences of the intollerable heat, and want of many things, eſpecially of freſh water: which fed him with hope, that he ſhould out of theſe his enemies diſtreſſes picke ſome fit occaſion of aduantage, if he could but a while defend the city of Tunes. The Numidians and Moores, who in great troups and companies had alwaies houered about the Emperors army, without doing any thing worth reporting, retired themſelues into the ſuburbes, gardens, and other places neere vnto the city.

Barbaruſſa flyeth to Tunes.

The Emperor glad of the flight of his enemies, which were thought to haue bin in number 100000, incamped with his army that night in the ſame place where they before lay; determining the next day to batter the wals of Tunes. In the meane time Barbaruſſa, ſurpriſed H with an exceeding feare, and diſtracted with many cares, and now become more cruell than himſelfe, had in his mind purpoſed a fact full of exceeding and inhuman cruelty; which was, at once to haue killed all the Chriſtian captiues in the caſtle of Tunes: fully reſolued to put the ſame in execution, had not Sinan the Iew diſſuaded him from that moſt execrable fact; proteſting ſuch a practiſe to be vnſeemely for a man of valour, famous for his many victories, and carrying with him the majeſty of a King; whereas he would ſhortly after wonderfully repent him for doing ſo ſhamefull a fact: the acting whereof, What was it elſe (as the Iew ſaid) but a manifeſt demonſtration of his extreame feare and deſperation? which two things were moſt dangerous to him, that was to maintaine ſo doubtfull a war, and would much deface the glory of his former life: wherefore he ſhould doe well to beware, that by the fame of ſuch a I moſt horrible fact, he did not prouoke Solymans heauy diſpleaſure againſt him: who deuoid of all humane cruelty, had vſed both to deteſt and reuenge ſuch outrages. Wherfore he ſhould ſuffer the Chriſtian captiues to liue bound in their fatall chaines, ſo long; as it were their fortunes; who being well kept, and vnarmed, might ſhortly after ſerue him to good purpoſe, and could no way without moſt certain danger moue themſelues, if they ſhould vnaduiſedly luſt after their vnlucky liberty: for by them, the expected victory could neither be giuen to the enemy, nor taken from him, or yet ſo much as hindered. At which ſpeech the tyrant was aſhamed, and ſo ſparing the liues of the poore wretches, went out of the Caſtle, into the greateſt church of Tunes, whither he had cauſed to be aſſembled all the chiefe men of the city, to tell them what he would haue done for the defence of the city, and now by perſuaſion to encourage K them to fight: from whom, as men by him holden in diſtruſt, he had but a little before the comming of the Chriſtians, taken all manner of armor and weapons.

Barbaruſſa in mind to kil all the Chriſtian captiues, is diſſuaded by Sinan the Iew.

Whileſt Barbaruſſa was thus buſied, the moſt joyfull and happy day appeared to thoſe miſerable captiues; by fortunes change, no leſſe blacke and diſmall to the Turks and Moores. For that hainous purpoſe of the cruell tyrant could not long be couered or kept ſecret: ſo that a conſtant report of a danger ſo imminent, was run thorow the whole caſtle, euen into deep dungeons; by the compaſſion of certaine manumiſed ſlaues, who deteſting the ſauage cruelty of Barbaruſſa their maſter, and touched with deuotion, had in heart returned to their old and true Chriſtian religion; incouraging by ſecret ſpeeches the chiefe of the captiues with whom they were acquainted, to lay hand now vpon their liberty. L Amongſt theſe well minded men was one Francis a Spaniard, whom Barbaruſſa had from his youth brought vp as his minion, hauing him alwaies in great eſteeme by the name of Memis; and another called Vincentius Caterinus of Dalmatia, an eunuch. Theſe two venturing a moſt memorable and godly attempt, ſet open the priſon doores, and gaue inſtruments vnto the poore priſoners, ready to take the occaſion offered; who boldly ſtarting vp, brake off their chains and gyues, and ſo by the great goodneſſe and mercy of God, about 6000 poore naked Chriſtians, armed with that came firſt in hand, but eſpecially with ſtones, brake forth ſuddenly vpon the Turks that were in the caſtle. Ramadus a renegate Spaniard captain of the caſtle, ſtirred vp with the vnexpected and terrible noiſe of ſo many priſoners breaking their yrons, with a few ſoldiers whom he had ſuddenly called vnto him run to the caſtle gate, where one of the priſoners (a luſty young man of Sicilia) had M with one of the bars of the gate ſtrucke downe one or two of the Warders, and hauing bolted the gate, was become maſter thereof: him Ramadus ſlew, and opening the gate, made way for himſelfe and his few followers, with whom he went to Barbaruſſa, to carry him the newes of that his hard miſchance. But the Chriſtians now looſed from their bands, and hauing ſuddenly

The Chriſtian captiues breake priſon, & driue the Turkes out of the caſtle of Tunes.

A denly ſlaine diuers of the Turks,poſſeſſed themſelues of all the caſtle,brake open the armory, and ſo ſeizing vpon the kings treaſure,armor,and prouiſion, from a high turret gaue ſignes of victory to the Chriſtian army by ſmoake and falſe fires made with gunpouder; and laſtly by diſplaying of Sarmentus his enſigne,which (as we haue before declared) was by Tabacches taken from the top of the trenches at the ſiege of Guletta.Theſe ſignes although the Chriſtians in the army could not well perceiue, as being too far off, yet by the fugitiues which came oftentimes out of Tunes to the Emperor and Muleaſſes, they were both perſuaded, that ſome great tumult wts riſen amongſt the enemies. Wherefore the Emperor ſent two of his captains with their companies,who going as neere as they could to the city and the caſtle, ſhould diſcouer what the matter was. In the meane time, Barbaruſſa almoſt mad for anger, in his fury B blaſpheming his vain gods,and bitterly curſing and banning the Iew, for diſſuading him from killing the captiues,came to the caſtle gate,with tears ſtanding in his eys pittifully requeſting the late Chriſtian captiues(which then ſtood vpon the top of the wals and the gate,with weapons in their hands)that they would forthwith let him in,faithfully promiſing them their liberty, with a generall and free pardon for all that they had done. But they mindfull both of their former and preſent fortune,and moued with juſt hatred,caſt ſtones at him,and with many opprobrious words rejected his requeſt: ſo that he inraged with ſorrow and madneſſe, ſhot at them with his owne hand, and ſeeing all paſt remedy, and the city not poſſible now to be kept,ſhamefully betooke himſelfe to flight. After him followed the Turks, in number ſeuen thouſand, with purpoſe to fly to the city Hippona, now called Bona, famous with the Biſhopricke C of that reuerend Father and great Diuine Auguſtine. For there(as in a moſt ſure harbor) had Barbaruſſa left fourteene gallies in the lake neere vnto the city, to ſerue his turne whatſoeuer miſchance ſhould happen: but the tacklings,ſailes,oares,and ordnance, he had laied vp in the caſtle faſt by,which was kept with a garriſon of his owne.

Tunes yeelded to the Emperor.

The Emperour vnderſtanding that Barbaruſſa with his Turks was fled, came with all his army vnto the gates of Tunes, where the magiſtrates of the city were ready to ſubmit themſelues vnto him,and to deliuer him the kies of the city; only requeſting of him,that he would keep his ſoldiers incamped without the city,and not to ſeeke the vtter ſpoile and ruine thereof: promiſing,that the ſouldiers ſhould want nothing that was there to be had. Muleaſſes alſo carefull of the ſafety thereof,earneſtly intreated the Emperor in the citiſens behalfe. But he, D although he was of his own honourable diſpoſition ready enough to haue granted what they requeſted; yet for that he did not without cauſe, doubt of the Moores fidelity, and that the paiment of the mony which they of Tunes had by Muleaſſes promiſed for the paiment of the ſoldiers wages, was by them craftily delaied, expecting ſtill the vttermoſt deuoire of Barbaruſſa, he could not by any means be perſuaded to promiſe them any certainty of their ſafety: moued alſo ſo to do by the diſcontented ſpeeches of his ſoldiers, who ſpared not to ſay, That they ſhould be hardyl and vnkindly dealt withall, if after ſo long trauell and ſo much paines taken both by ſea and land,they ſhould be defrauded of the reward of the victory, ſith nothing but only the hope of the preſent ſpoile did relieue and feed them, being poore and miſerable, hauing ſcarce clothes to couer their nakedneſſe, and their bodies ſpent with long labour and E thirſt: ſo that the Moores of Tunes,enemies of the Chriſtian religion, and the perpetuall receiuers of moſt horrible pyrats,might worthily rejoyce of the Chriſtians victory;and the conquerors themſelues for euer bewaile their owne calamities and miſeries. Whileſt the Emperor ſtood thus in doubt what to reſolue vpon,Vaſtius with a ſmall company came to the caſtle gate,and was with wonderfull joy receiued by the Chriſtian captiues. But as he was viewing the wealth and prouiſion laid vp in the caſtle, a Ligurian captiue diſcouered vnto him where certain treaſure lay hid: for Barbaruſſa had there caſt into a well 30000 duckats ſowed vp in bags,which Vaſtius getting eaſily out,obtain'd them of the Emperor of gift,as he whoſe good ſeruice had well deſerved them. The caſtle thus won by a ſtrange chance,and the captiues taking the ſpoile thereof,the ſoldiers could no longer be ſtaied,but that they entred into the city F by heaps,running after the ſpoile into euery part therof; the citiſens fearing no ſuch matter, and calling in vain vpon the faith of Muleaſſes: the old ſoldiers at the firſt entrance ſlew many.
The Spaniards and Italians ſought moſt after the ſpoile; but the Germans deſiring more to glut themſelues with the Mahometan bloud, fill'd all places with dead bodies, without regard of ſex or age; ſo that the prophane temples of their vain prophet, ſwam with the bloud of them that were fled into them. Which furious execution continued vntill ſuch time as the Emperor G moued with the pittifull requeſt of Muleaſſes, cauſed proclamation to be made, That no man ſhould vpon paine of death hurt any citiſen, or take any priſoners: yet for all that, it could not otherwiſe be, but that many young men and women were by the mariners (which were come to the ſpoile of the city) carried away to the fleet.

Muleaſſes for a little mony redeemed diuers which he knew, out of the hand of ſuch as had them priſoners: amongſt others, one of his wiues, whom he ſometime held deareſt, was ranſomed for two duckats. The Emperor entering into the caſtle, commended the captiues, who were the occaſion of that ſpeedy victory: and giuing to euery one of them mony, ſet them at liberty, promiſing vnto them ſhipping and prouiſion to bring them home euery man into his owne country. Vnto the two manumiſed ſeruants of Barbaruſſa, which were the authours H of breaking the priſon, he gaue mony and apparell, & afterwards learned of them many things concerning Barbaruſſa his purpoſes, and ſecret diſpoſition. In the ſpoile of the caſtle, Muleaſſes lamented the loſſe of three things eſpecially: firſt, the antient Arabian bookes containing the interpretation of the Mahometan law, and the acts of the Kings his predeceſſours; the loſſe whereof, Muleaſſes (in the hearing of P. Iouius, out of whom this hiſtory is taken) ſaid (as he reporteth) that he would moſt gladly if it had bin poſſible, haue redeemed with the price of a city: then the precious ointments and perfumes, with the wonderfull ſtore of ambergrize, muske, and ciuet, worth much gold: all which, Barbaruſſa as a rude and rough man had made no reckoning of. And laſt of all, the rare and rich colours for painting, which lying by heapes, were by the ignorant ſoldiers, ſeeking for that might yeeld them preſent mony, fooliſhly neg- I lected and troden vnder foot, ſeruing no man to good. In this caſtle were found diuers headpieces and other armor of the Chriſtians, namely, of the French, who with Lewis their King, had about three hundred yeares before beſieged that caſtle: which armour had beene vntill that time there kept by the Moores in remembrance of that victory againſt the Chriſtians.

Three things eſpecially lamented by Muleaſſes in the ſpoile of the caſtle of Tunes.

Barbaruſſa in the meane time was come to the riuer of Bagrada, which the Moores call Maiordech, which he eaſily paſſed ouer, though he was purſued by certaine Numidian horſemen, whom Muleaſſes had raiſed of his old friends, and of the followers of his vncle Dorax, and ſent them to purſue the Turks: but Barbaruſſa ſo marched with his harquebuſiers and archers placed in the rereward, that the Numidian horſemen durſt not come neere him, and ſo in ſafety came to Hippona, as he had before purpoſed. Yet in paſſing the riuer Bagrada, he loſt Haydin K of Smyrna, that famous pirat: who being a fat man, and wearied with the heat of the Sunne and painefulneſſe of the journy, dranke ſo much, that he died preſently vpon the banke of the riuer. When Barbaruſſa was come to Hippona, he reſted his men two daies: then calling them together againe, he comforted them with good words; perſuading them, that whatſoeuer miſchance had hapned, they ſhould impute it not to the valour of the enemy, but to the trechery of the ſlaues: exhorting them, as valiant men patiently to indure that frowne of Fortune, and by ſome notable exploit to win againe her fauour: for he was againe determined to put to ſea with the fleet he had, and to go preſently from thence to Algiers, where after he had with new ſupplies increaſed his power, and augmented his fleet, and better aduiſed himſelfe, he would take an attempt in hand anſwerable to their deſires, and not vnbeſeeming his own credit and L eſtimation. It is reported, that neuer vanquiſhed and beaten captaine was with more cheerefull acclamation anſwered by his ſouldiers, than he was at that preſent; they all with one conſent moſt willingly requeſted him to command whatſoeuer pleaſed him, which they would neuer refuſe to vndertake, were it neuer ſo heauy or dangerous, ſo that they might be brought to ſome notable exploit. Barbaruſſa vſing this exceeding cheerefulneſſe and forwardneſſe of his ſoldiers, did with with wonderfull celerity weigh vp the 14 gallies which he ſunke in the lake, and forthwith rigged them vp, and furniſhed them for all aſſaies: and vpon the very brinke of the lake caſt vp a mount of earth, whereon he placed certain pieces of artillery for defence of the harbour; not vainely conjecturing, that the Chriſtian fleet would in ſhort time come thither to impeach his going out: pointing therein as it were at the purpoſe of the Emperor and M Auria his admirall, who were of opinion, that by ſending part of the fleet thither, thoſe gallies might be drown'd in the harbor with the great ordnance, before they could be rigged and made ready. Vnto this piece of ſeruice Auria appointed one Adam, a captaine of Genoa, a man of no great skill in matters at ſea, but yet of great wealth & credit, and the Admirals nigh kinſman:

Barbaruſſa flieth to Hippona, and there comforteth his ſouldiers.

Auria ſendeth certaine gallies to intercept Barbaruſſa.

A he with certaine galliots and foureteene gallies, ſet forwards towards Hippona, promiſing vnto himſelfe a moſt certain and eaſie victory, hoping to purchaſe vnto himſelfe great honor of the vnprouided enemy: for that he thought to haue taken Barbaruſſa buſie in ſetting forth of his fleet. But after he was paſt Biſerta, and come neere to Hippona, he was certainly aduertiſed, that Barbaruſſa had with incredible celerity rigged vp his gallies and fortified the harbor, by planting great ordnance vpon the mount he had there raiſed. With which newes he wonderfully troubled, changed his purpoſe, perſuaded by the other captaines of the gallies, in no caſe to aduenture to fight with him, becauſe the Spaniſh, Sicilian, and Neapolitan gallies were but weakly manned, many of the ſouldiers being for greedineſſe of the ſpoile, gone aſhore without leaue at Tunes: ſo that he ſhould at great diſaduantage fight with the Turks, being mo in B number and deſperatly bent. Wherefore he vpon good aduice preſently changed his former courſe, and returned to the fleet for more aid. Barbaruſſa (as it was afterwards knowne) ſtood a good while in doubt, whether he ſhould in hope of victory purſue thoſe gallies, foraſmuch as they were in number no more than his owne, or elſe to perſiſt in his former purpoſe of going to Algiers. Vnto which opinion all the vnder captains inclined, being altogether ignorant of the weakneſſe of the Chriſtians: and ſo letting ſlip a faire occaſion, leauing a ſmall garriſon of Turks in the caſtle, he departed from Hippona & ſailed along the coaſts to Algiers. When Adam was returned againe to the fleet, and had done nothing, many of the Chriſtian Princes were wonderfully offended, that by the negligence of ſome who were hardly to be commanded, and by the vnrulineſſe of others who without leaue was gone aſhore, ſo faire an occaſion C of the deſired victory, was neglected. For this thing only wanted vnto the Emperors rare felicity in that war: for if thoſe few gallies had bin taken from the cruell enemy, or ſunke in the ſea, there had been no meanes for him to haue eſcaped; being verily thought that the Numidians in number infinit, and deadly enemies vnto the Turks, would with often skirmiſhes out of their knowne places of aduantage, haue ſo cut him off in his long and painfull trauell by land, that they would altogether haue made an end both of him and his followers before he could haue come to Algiers. Auria angry both with himſelfe and thoſe whom he had put in truſt, and yet not out of hope to ouertake his enemy; with his owne gallies and ſome other of the beſt ſhips went to Hippona: but finding Barbaruſſa gone, he took the city and ouerthrew the wals thereof: but in the caſtle which he by force tooke from the Turks, he placed Aluarus D Gometius with a ſufficient garriſon, and ſo returned vnto the Emperor. This Gometius, although he was a moſt valiant captain, yet became ſo infamous for his auaritious dealing both with the enemy and his friends, that for feare how to anſwer ſuch things as he knew would be laid to his charge, he became the infamous executioner of himſelfe. The caſtle was afterwards by the cammandement of the Emperor, raſed downe to the ground, for that it was not without a maruellous charge to be kept. After that, a counſell was holden concerning Muleaſſes, whom the Emperour placed again in the kingdome of Tunes, there to reigne as his anceſtors had don before him; paying him yearly by the name of a tribute, two Faulcons, and two Numidian courſers: with condition, that he ſhould for euer honour the Emperour, and be a friend vnto all Chriſtians, and an vtter enemy vnto the Turks. Beſides that, That he ſhould E from time to time defray the charges of a thouſand Spaniards and more, to be left in garriſon in the caſtle of Guletta; by holding whereof, the Emperour kept as it were the keies of that kingdome at his girdle. The Emperor hauing thus honourably driuen Barbaruſſa & the Turks pyrats out of Tunes, taken from them their gallies, deliuered the Chriſtian countries (al along the ſea coaſt into the Mediterranean) of a great feare, and reſtored Muleaſſes again to his kingdome, ſayled into Sicilia, where he was in great triumph receiued at Panormus and Meſſana, from whence he paſſed ouer to Rhegium in Italy, and from thence by land to Naples. Thus was the kingdome of Tunes taken by Barbaruſſa and the Turks; and by Charles the Emperour recouered againe out of their hands the ſelfe-ſame time that Solyman was in perſon himſelfe in wars againſt the Perſian: whom Barbaruſſa accompanied with Sinan the Iew, after this ouerthrow F met at Iconium in his returne out of Perſia, well excepting of their excuſe, as is before declared.

Barbaruſſa eſcapeth to Algiers.

The kingdom of Tunes is by the emperour reſtored to Muleaſſes.

The Emperour returneth with victory into Italy.

Solyman as well of his own ambitious diſpoſition, as following the manner of the Othoman 1537 kings, deſirous by all meanes to increaſe the glory of his name, and to inlarge his Empire, determined with himſelfe to take away from the Portingals all their traffick into the Eaſt Indies.

It grieued him to heare, that the Chriſtian religion ſhould begin to take root amongſt thoſe Pagan kings, which had not long before receiued the Mahometan religion: Beſides that, he was credibly informed, that the Portingals in theſe late wars he had againſt the Perſians, had aided them with certain harquebuſiers, and alſo had ſent them workemen to ſhew them both the making and vſe of great artillery. But that which moued him moſt of all, was for that the Portingals by their trafficke into the Indies, had cut off all the trade of merchandiſe into the gulfe of Arabia, whereby the riches of the Eaſt were wont to be tranſported vnto Caire, and ſo to Alexandria, from whence they were afterwards by the Venetian Merchants and others diſperſed into all parts of Europe: but now were carried by the great Ocean into Portingall, and from thence conueied into all parts of Chriſtendome, to the great hindrance of his tributes and cuſtoms of Ægypt. For theſe cauſes and at the inſtance of Solyman Baſſa an eunuch, borne in Epirus, and then Gouernour of Ægypt; Solyman cauſed wonderfull preparation to be made, for the building of a great fleet in the red ſea, to go againſt the Portingals. All the timber whereof was cut downe in the mountaines of Cilicia, and ſhipped in the bay of Atralia in the bottome of the Mediterranean, from whence it was by ſea tranſported to Peluſium, and ſo vp the riuer of Nilus to Caire; where after it was framed and ready to be ſet together, it was with infinit labour, and no leſſe charge, carried by land with Camels thorow that hot and ſandy country, from Caire to Suetia, a port of the Red ſea, called in antient time Arſinoe. From which place eightie miles, diſtant from Caire, the ancient Kings of Ægypt, ſeeking by vaine and wonderfull workes to eterniſe the memory of themſelues, had with incredible charge cut through all that maine land; ſo that veſſels of good burthen might come vp the ſame from Arſinoe to Caire: which great cut or ditch, Seſoſtris the rich king of Ægypt, and long after him Ptolomeus Philadelphus, purpoſed to haue made a great deale wider and deeper, and thereby to haue let the Red ſea into the Mediterranean, for the readier tranſportation of the Indian Merchandiſe to Caire and Alexandria. Which mad worke, Seſoſtris preuented by death could not performe: and Ptolomeus otherwiſe perſuaded by skilfull men, in time gaue ouer: for feare leſt by letting in the great South ſea into the Mediterranean, he ſhould thereby as it were with another generall deluge haue drowned the greateſt part of Grecia, and many other goodly countries in Aſia, and with exceeding charge, in ſtead of honor, haue purchaſed himſelfe eternall infamy. Yet by the ſingular induſtry of Solyman the Eunuch, who with ſeuere commandement inforced all the people of the countries therabouts to the furtherance of the building of that fleet; he had with wonderfull celerity in ſhort time new built eighty tall ſhips and gallies at Arſinoe, and furniſhed them with men, and all things elſe needfull for ſo long a voyage. At which time he vpon a quarrell pickt without cauſe, but not without the good liking of Solyman, moſt iniuriouſly confiſcated the goods of the Venetian merchants at Alexandria and Caire, and thruſt the marriners into his gallies as ſlaues. With which fleet in moſt warlike manner appointed, Solyman the Baſſa, accompanied with Aſſan-Beg, commonly called the Moore of Alexandria, a moſt famous pyrat and an excellent ſea-man, ſet forward againſt the Portingals: and ſailing thorow the Red ſea, and ſo Eaſtward by the gulfe of Perſia, came at length as far as the great riuer Indus; where with all his power he aſſaulted Dium a caſtle of the Portingals, ſcituate vpon the mouth of that great riuer: but in concluſion, after he had many daies beſieged the caſtle both by ſea and land, and tried the vttermoſt of his ſtrength, he was ſo repulſed by the Portingals, that he was glad to forſake the ſiege, & leauing his great ordnance behind him for haſt, returned backe againe to Aden, a city of great trade in Arabia Fœlix: where diſcouraged with the euill ſucceſſe he had againſt the Portingals, becauſe he would be thought to haue done ſomething, he allured the king of that rich city to come vnto him, vpon his falſe faith before giuen for his ſafe returne: but as ſoone as he had him aboord, he like a periured wretch hanged him vp at the yards arme of his Admirall gally, and ſo ſurpriſing the city, enriched himſelſe with the ſpoile thereof. The like barbarous cruelty he vſed at Zibyth, another famous port of Arabia, where the pilgrims of the Eaſt do commonly land when they after the manner of their ſuperſtition come to viſit the temple of their falſe prophet at Mecha: the king of which place together with all his nobility he cruelly murthered, contrary to his faith giuen; and ſo trauelling himſelfe by land to Mecha, as if he had been ſome deuout pilgrim, ſent backe his fleet by the Moore to Suetia, hauing performed againſt the Portingals nothing at all.

The treacherous dealing of Solyman the eunuch Baſſa with the kings of Arabia

A At the ſame time Solyman by the perſuaſion of Lutzis and Ajax (the Baſſaes of greateſt authority about him, now that Abraham was dead) turned all his forces from the Perſians, as men agreeing with him in the chiefe points of his Mahometan ſuperſtition, with purpoſe to conuert the ſame vpon Italy: whereunto he was earneſtly ſolicited by Iohn Forreſt the French Kings Embaſſador, then lying at Conſtantinople of purpoſe to incite Solyman againſt Charles the Emperour, aſſuring him that he was not of ſuch power, as at one time to defend Apulia againſt him, and the Dukedome of Millaine againſt the French King, who (as he ſaid) was determined that Summer to inuade that part of Italy. And to further the matter, about the ſame time one Troilus Pignatellus, a noble gentleman, ſometime commander in Charles the Emperors army, but then exiled out of Naples, fled vnto Solyman; and foraſmuch as he was a man B of name, and like to do him great ſeruice in the inuaſion of Apulia, as one which knew the country well, and promiſed vnto him good ſucceſſe in that wars, was by Solyman honourably entertained amongſt his Mutfaracas: which is a certaine company of horſemen for their approued valor, choſen out of all nations; hauing the free exerciſe of their religion whatſoeuer without controllement, and are onely bound to attend vpon the perſon of the great Turke when he goeth to warre. The cauſe of his reuolt was, for that the Viceroy of Naples had executed Andrew his brother, one of the Knights of the Rhodes. But being now growne into great fauour with Solyman and the Baſſaes, and oftentimes called to counſell in the preparation of that war, caſting off all naturall loue of his country, ceaſed not by all meanes to perſuade Solyman to inuade the ſame; aſſuring him, that the people of Apulia and Salerne, oppreſſed with C grieuous tribute and exactions by the Emperors officers, would at the firſt reuolt, eſpecially if they ſaw any of the French nation to cleaue vnto. And that which moued him more than all the reſt, the antient Turks told him into what a feare al Italy was ſtrucken, at ſuch time as Achmetes the Baſſa hauing taken Hydruntum, had vndoutedly conquered not only the kingdome of Naples, but the city of Rome alſo, and all the reſt of Italy, had not the vntimely death of Mahomet his great grandfather interrupted the courſe of that victory. Which perſuaſions wrought ſuch effect in Solyman, that he, once fully reſolued for the inuaſion of Italy, made ſuch expedition both by ſea and land, that he himſelfe in perſon was come with two hundred thouſand men vnto Aulona, the moſt conuenient port of Macedon for the tranſporting of his army, before it was thought in Italy that he was ſet forward from Conſtantinople: where he D had not long ſtaid, but Lutzis Baſſa his Admiral, accompanied with Barbaruſſa, ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Peloponeſus and Epirus, and ſo paſſing by Corcyra, where Hieronimus Piſaurius, Admirall of the Venetian fleet lay with his gallies (after mutuall ſalutation done after the manner of ſea, by ſhooting off their great pieces in token of friendſhip) put into the hauen of Aulona alſo. Solyman not purpoſing to loſe any time, and hauing Italy now in his ſight, commanded Lutzis and Barbaruſſa to paſſe ouer with the fleet vnto Otranto, and to proue the minds of the people; that if the firſt enterpriſe fell out well, he might preſently follow after with all his army. With them went alſo Troilus Pignatellus, as forward to the deſtruction of his country, as any of the reſt. He knowing that the great Cities of Hydruntum and Brunduſium were kept with ſtrong Garriſons of Charles the Emperour; leauing Hydruntum on E the right hand, directed the Turks to a Towne vpon the Sea-coaſt, eight miles off, called Caſtrum, neere vnto which ſtandeth a caſtle vpon a hill then belonging to Mercurinus Catinarius: who being a man vnacquainted with warres, and terrified with the ſudden comming of the Turks, and perſuaded by Troilus, yeelded vp his Caſtle, vpon condition, That the Turks ſhould offer no violence or injury vnto him or his, either in body or goods. Vpon which condition the Towne of Caſtrum was alſo deliuered vnto them. But the Turkes, eſpecially the greedy marriners, being got into the Caſtle and the Towne, moued neither with the intreaty of Troilus, nor the commandement of Lutzis and Barbaruſſa, rifled the Towne and Caſtle, and carried away with them Mercurinus himſelfe, with all the floure of the people, to their gallies as priſoners. But Lutzis aſhamed of ſuch faithleſſe dealing, preſently ſet Mercurinus at liberty againe. F At the ſame time alſo, Solyman had by night ſent ouer certaine troupes of light horſemen, in great Palendars: which running all alongſt the ſea coaſt from Tarentum to Brunduſium, carried away with them both the people and cattell, and whatſoeuer elſe came in their way by the ſpace of forty miles. So that all that Countrey of Salentinum, now called Otranto, was filled with feare and danger; and had not there ſtaied, but was like enough to haue ouerwhelmed all Italy, by the comming ouer of Solyman with his whole army, had not the raſhneſſe of one Venetian captaine by vnexpected chance turned that tempeſt from the Italians vpon the Venetians themſelues.

Alexander Contarenus, a valiant captain of the Venetians, meeting with certain of the Turks gallies, which would neither vaile their top ſailes, nor in token of reuerence and friendſhip, diſcharge any of their great ordnance, as of duty they ought to haue done in thoſe ſeas, where the Venetians commanded; offended with their proud inſolency, fiercely aſſailed them, and in fight ſunke two of them: wherein Vſtamenes Gouernour of Callipolis, a man of no ſmall reputation among the Turks, was reported to haue periſhed. Which outrage don by Contarenus in a moſt vnfit time (to the great hurt of the Venetian eſtate, as it appeared afterward) was imputed to his owne priuat grudge which he bare againſt the Turks, for that they intercepted a ſhip of his as ſhe was comming out of the Eaſt countries laden with rich merchandiſe; ſo that it was thought, that he to pleaſe himſelfe in reuenging of his own priuat injury, regarded not what in that dangerous time might enſue thereof to the common ſtate.

A little before the comming ouer of the Turks into Italy, Andreas Aurea the Emperours Admirall lying at Meſſana in Sicilia, vnderſtanding that Solyman was come with his army to Aulona, and that his fleet was arriued there alſo, put to ſea, directing his courſe towards the Iſlands of Caphalenia and Zacynthus, hoping (as indeed it fell out) to meet with the taile of the Turks fleet: for there according to his expectation he chanced vpon diuers of the Turks victuallers, whom he eaſily tooke. The marriners he chained in his owne gallies for ſlaues, and furniſhing his fleet with the victual, which was not for him prouided, fired the ſhips. Whileſt Aurea was thus beating too and fro in the Ionian ſea, it fortuned that Solyman ſent Iunusbeius his chiefe interpreter, a man whom he made no ſmall account of, with two gallies on a meſſage to Lutzis his Admirall. This proud Turke comming neere vnto Corcyra, where the Venetian Admirall lay with his fleet, offered ſcornefully to paſſe, without vailing: which his pride tending to the diſgrace of the Venetians, certaine of the Venetian captains not enduring, ſet vpon him with ſuch fury, that the Turks were enforced to run both their gallies on ſhore vpon the coaſt of Epirus, neere vnto the mountaines called Acroceraunij, where hauing eſcaped the danger at ſea, they fell almoſt all into the hands of the cruell mountaine people, liuing for the moſt part by theft, and waiting for wracks, as hawks for their prey: by theſe ſhauers the Turks were ſtript of all they had, and Iunusbeius with much adoe redeeming himſelfe out of their hands returned to Solyman. Aurea ſailing alongſt the ſea coaſt, chanced vpon theſe gallies, and finding them ſore bruſed, ſet fire on them.

Iunusbeius with two gallies, driuen by the Venetians vpon the Acroſeraunian rocks.

For theſe vnkind parts, the Turks were wonderfully offended with the Venetians, and grieuouſly complained of them to Solyman: although the Venetian Admirall laboured by all means he could to appeaſe Iunus beius, and to excuſe the matter as a thing done by great ouerſight on both ſides. Vpon theſe ſmall occaſions, the Turks ſought to breake off the league with the Venetians; which fell out ſo much the ſooner, for that about the ſame time Auria ſailing vp and down the Ionian ſea, and diligently looking into euery harbor to intercept ſuch as ſtragled from the Turks fleet, hapned by night to light vpon 12 of Solymans great gallies neere vnto Corcyra, all filled with his Ianizaries and choiſe horſemen of the court, the beſt ſoldiers of the Turks, who had by land ſent their horſes to the camp by their lackies, and were comming themſelues with the Ianizaries by ſea. Auria falling vpon theſe gallies, had with them a cruell and deadly fight: for they as reſolute men, wiſhing rather to die than to yeeld to their enemies, with inuincible courage maintained a moſt bloudy fight againſt Auria with his 30 gallies excellently appointed, vntill ſuch time as moſt part of them were ſlain, and the reſt ſore wounded; who ſeeing no remedy, but that they muſt needs come into the hands of their enemies, threw their ſcimiters ouerboord, becauſe thoſe choice weapons ſhould not come into the hands of the Chriſtians. In this conflict, Auria loſt alſo many of his beſt ſoldiers: yet hauing got the victory, and poſſeſſed of the gallies, he ankered neere vnto Corcyra, there to take view of his own harmes and the enemies: but whilſt he rid there at anker, he was aduertiſed, that Barbaruſſa was comming againſt him with 80 gallies. Wherefore knowing himſelfe too weake to encounter ſo ſtrong an enemy, he departed thence, and returned againe to Meſſana to repaire his fleet. Solyman thorowly chafed with the loſſe of his gallies and beſt ſouldiers, and with the double injury done vnto him by the Venetians, fell into ſuch a rage, that he

curſed

A cursed Barbaruſſa, as one who in theſe wars had done him no good ſeruice; and thundred out grieuous threats againſt the Venetians; ſaying he was vnder the colour of an ancient league, by them deceiued and greatly abuſed, and that they were ſecretly confederated with Charles his enemy, and had for that cauſe (as they had alwaies) holpen Auria with intelligence, and all things neceſſary, receiuing him into their harbors, and by their eſpials giuing him knowledge of the order of his fleet, that ſo he might at his own aduantage ſurpriſe his gallies, as he had already done. Vnto which fire, Ianusbeius his Interpreter, Barbaruſſa, and Ajax, laid new coles, more and more increaſing the tyrant, who was of himſelfe ſufficiently inflamed; perſuading him by all means they could, to breake the league with the Venetians. Wherein Ianusbeius ſought to reuenge his own priuat iniuries, and the other two after their greater profit and credit, gaping after the ſpoile of the Iſlands neer hand, eſpecially of Corcyra (now called Corfu) B Zacynthus and Cephalenia, all ſubiect to the Venetian ſeigniory; finding the wars in Italy more dangerous and difficult than they had before imagined. For the French King came not then into Italy, as was by them expected: and it was commonly reported, That Petrus Toletanus Viceroy of Naples, hauing put ſtrong garriſons into the towns all alongſt the ſea coaſt, was comming himſelfe with a great army: beſide that, the horſemen ſent out from Aulona, ranging about in the countrey of Salentum for ſpoile, were many times cut off by Scipio Tomucius a noble gentleman there Gouernor for the Emperor. Wherefore Solyman changing his purpoſe for the inuaſion of Italy, in his mad mood proclaimed war againſt the Venetians: and riſing with his army from Aulona, & marching alongſt the ſea coaſt till he came ouer againſt Corcyra, he incamped neer vnto the mountains called Acroceraunij, where the fierce and wild C people inhabiting the high and rough mountaine of Chimera, a part of the Acroceraunian mountains, by the inſtigation of one Damianus a notable theefe, and very perfect in the blind and difficult paſſages amongſt the rocks and woods in thoſe deſolate mountains, conſpired to attempt a moſt ſtrange and deſperat exploit, which was, by night to ſpoile Solyman in his own pauilion. Theſe beggerly wild rogues liuing for moſt part by murther and robbery, altogether without law or any maner of religion, in hope of ſo great a prey, and to become famous in killing one of the greateſt Monarchs of the world in the midſt of his ſtrength, garded with ſo many thouſands of his ſoldiers; were not afraid of any danger, how great ſoeuer, hoping in the dead time of the night to ſteale into the camp vndiſcouered, and there ſo to oppreſſe Solyman ſleeping in his tent. Which (as was by many afterwards ſuppoſed) they were like D enough to haue performed, to the aſtoniſhment of the world, had it not bin by chance diſcouered: for when they had put all things in readineſſe for that purpoſe, Damianus ringleader of theſe deſperat ſauage people, by ſecret waies ſtealing downe the broken rockes of thoſe huge mountains, and comming very neer the camp, to view the ſtanding of Solymans pauilion, with the order of the Turks watch, was by the crack of a bough eſpyed by the Ianizaries, where he ſtood in a tree prying all ouer the camp: and being there taken, and afterward put to torture, and confeſſing what he had intended, was by the commandement of Solyman torne in pieces. Wherupon he forthwith ſent a great part of his army vp into the mountaines, which hunting after theſe wild people as if they had bin wild beaſts, ſlew many of them, and by Solymans ap- E pointment did what they poſſibly could to haue quite deſtroied them, as an infamous people, enemy to all men.

Solymã conuerteth his forces from the Italians againſt the Venetians.

Solymã in danger to haue bin ſlain in his tent in the midſt of his army.

When Solyman had thus fully reuenged himſelfe vpon this barbarous nation, he purpoſed to inuade the Iſland of Corcyra, now called Corfu, part of the Venetian Seigniory: ſending before Barbaruſſa with his great Artillery, whom he had but a little before called out of Italy with his forces, Piſaurus the Venetian Admirall in good time perceiuing the tyrants purpoſe, ſtrengthned the garriſons in both the Caſtles of Corfu, with new ſupplies of good ſouldiers ſent out of the gallies: and knowing himſelfe vnable to incounter with the Turks great fleet at ſea, withdrew himſelfe farther off from the Iſland, into the gulf of the Adriatick, to the intent to ioine his power with Ioannes Veturius, who kept that ſea with another fleet of the Venetian F gallies, and ſo with ioyned forces to defend the Venetian coaſts againſt the Turks: whom he thought himſelfe ſtrong enough for, with the help of Veturius and of Auria, whoſe comming was dayly expected. Solyman ſending a great part of his army out of the Main, into the Iſland, burnt and deſtroyed the country villages, leading away a wonderfull number of poore country people into moſt miſerable captiuity. Ajax the Baſſa, and Barbaruſſa, in two ſmall pinnaces came as neer vnto the city of Corfu as they poſſibly could, to ſee which way they might moſt conueniently lay ſiege vnto it: but perceiuing the great ſtrength thereof, being wonderfully fortified, and throughly manned, they aduertiſed Solyman, that it was a place impregnable. Aloyſius Ripa and Simon Leonius, two Senators of Venice, were then gouernors of Corfu, who not without cauſe ſtanding in doubt of the great ſtrength of the Turks both by ſea and land, cauſed the city ſuburbs (which were very great and ſumptuouſly built) to be pluckt down, for fear that the Turks ſhrowding themſelues in them, ſhould more eaſily beſiege the town. This was a woful and lamentable thing to behold, when as at the ſame time a man might haue ſeen the magnificent houſes of the Venetian Merchants, built in time of long peace both for profit and for pleaſure in euery place of the Iſland, and ſet on fire by the Turks. But the regard of the publique ſtate in ſo great a danger, made all thoſe goodly things which went ſo to wrack, to be lightly accounted of in compariſon of their liues and liberty; foraſmuch as thoſe loſt things might with new charge be again in ſhort time recouered.

The two Venetian Gouernours aforeſaid, fearing a long ſiege, and not prouided of victuall to ſuffice ſuch a multitude as were got into the City, for any long time; vſed a heauy and ſharp remedy, by turning a great number of weak people and children vnable for ſeruice, out of the city; of whom many, ſpecially children, died in the town ditches in their mothers arms, vnder the wals of the city, not daring to go any further for fear of the enemy, who had faſt by, in places conuenient caſt vp great mounts, and planted his Ordnance againſt the city. Onely the caſtle called S. Angelo, ſtanding in the middle of the Iſland, about fifteen miles from the city of Corfu, being valiantly defended by the Inhabitants againſt the aſſaults of the Turks, haply ſaued aboue three thouſand poor people which fled thither from the fury of the Turks, who in all other places of the Iſland had made all deſolate. The Turks the more to terrifie them of Corfu, taking a hill not far from the city, couered the ſame with their tents, and from the rock called Maripetrus, ſhot with their great ordnance into the town: ſome of them in the meane time ſtanding cloſe in the ruines of the ſuburbs, did with their harquebuſies kill or wound them which appeared vpon the wals: the gallies alſo did oftentimes out of their proweſſe diſcharge their great pieces againſt the city, to the greater terror than hurt of the defendants. Solyman perceiuing that he did but loſe his labour in beſieging the city (as he was told at the firſt by his great captains, Lutzis, Ajax, & Barbaruſſa) determined now to raiſe his ſiege, and to return to Conſtantinople, greatly aſhamed that he had no better ſped, neither in Italy, nor at the ſiege of Corfu. But when he was about to haue departed, it was told him how vnfaithfully ſome of his ſoldiers had dealt with them of Caſtrum in Italy, who yeelding themſelues vpon the Turks faith to them giuen for the ſafegard of their liberty and goods, were neuertheles moſt iniuriouſly ſpoiled of all that they had, and carried away into bondage: which fact, as tending to the diſhonor of his name, and the deterring of others from yeelding, Solyman took in ſo euill part, that for amending therof, he cauſed the authors of that fact to be put to death, and the captiues of Caſtrum to be diligently ſought out, and ſent home againe into their countrey; well deſeruing therin the commendation of a moſt iuſt Prince. The Turks left the ſiege of Corfu, and departed out of the Iſland about the twelfth of September, in the yere 1537; carrying away about ſixteen thouſand of the Iſland people into perpetuall captiuity. So Solyman riſing with his army, marching through Acarnania and Ætolia, returned through Macedonia to Conſtantinople: hauing in this his expedition done great harme both in Italy and Corcyra, but yet nothing increaſed his empire or honour.

Good Juſtice don by Solyman

The Turks depart frō Corfu, and cary away with thē aboue 16000 Chriſtians into captiuitie.

Before his departure, calling vnto him Lutzis his Admirall, he commanded him alſo to returne with his fleet to Helleſpontus: who paſſing by Zacynthus, and landing ſome of his men in the night, took diuers of the countrey people priſoners. But vnderſtanding that the City it ſelfe was both ſtrong and well manned, he departed thence to Cythera, where vnfortunately attempting to haue taken the caſtle, and diſappointed of his purpoſe, he made what ſpoyle he could vpon that Iſland, and with 800 priſoners returned into Ægeum to Ægyna, a rich and famous Iſland, and well peopled both with mariners and other Inhabitants. Approaching the Iſland, he by his meſſengers ſent before vnto the Gouernour of the City, attempted firſt by faire means, and afterwards by threats, to haue had the City yeelded vnto him: and not ſo preuailing, but perceiuing them to ſtand vpon their defence, he landed his men, and gaue the ſignall

A nall of battell; which they of the Iſland refuſed not, but manfully met him, and at the firſt incounter ſlew many of his men. Wherwith the Admiral grieuouſly offended, and ſtil landing freſh men, euen with his multitude oppreſſed them of the Iſland, being but few in number, and weary of long fight, and ſo inforced them to retyre into the city.

To be reuenged of this injury, the Baſſa cauſed certain great pieces of ordnance to be landed, and a battery planted againſt the City: by force whereof he had in ſhort time in diuers places opened the walls, and then with all his power aſſaulting the breaches, forthwith tooke the city, which after he had rifled, he burnt it down to the ground, raſed the wals, and put euery man to the ſword. As for the women, he gaue them without reſpect vnto the luſt of his ſoldiers and mariners; whom afterwards together with the boies and young children he ſhipt into B the country neer Athens, to be from thence conueyed vnto Conſtantinople, into moſt miſerable ſeruitude.

Ægina with other Iſlands of the Egeum ſpoiled.

Ægina thus vtterly raſed, he with much like force and cruelty raged vpon them of Paros and the other Iſlands therabouts, killing the old men and ſuch as made reſiſtance, & thruſting the reſt into his gallies. Shortly after he came to the Iſle of Naxos, where all the Iſland people were for fear of his comming fled out of the country into the city, where landing his men he made hauock of whatſoeuer came to hand. And in the mean time ſent a meſſenger to the Duke, to wil him to yeeld himſelf and his city into the obedience of the Turkiſh Emperour Solyman. Which meſſenger admitted into the city, and brought before the duke, in blunt and plain terms, without further circumſtance, deliuered his meſſage thus:

If thou wilt without more ado yeeld thy ſelf, thy city and territory, to the Conſtantinopolitan Emperor, thou ſhalt deſerue his fauor, and ſo ſaue thy ſelfe with that thou haſt. But if thou, otherwiſe aduiſed, ſhalt now refuſe this grace, thou ſhalt neuer haue the like offer, but for euer vndo thy ſelfe, thy wife & children, thy citiſens, and ſubiects in generall. Here is preſent a moſt mighty fleet, with moſt valiant and victorious ſoldiers, furniſhed with all the habiliments of war requiſit for battell or ſiege. Be warned by them of Ægina, Paros, and other thy neighbor Princes of the Iſlands. Thy hap is good, if thou be not miſaduiſed, and (warned by other mens harms) wilfully refuſe to remedy thy owne; and when thou mighiſt be ſafe, wilfully caſt away thy ſelf.

A blunt ſpeech of a Turk ſent to the Duke of Naxos.

D This ſaid, he was commanded by the duke to ſtand aſide, and a while to expect his anſwer: who with the chief of his ſubjects there preſent, but much troubled, and all full of heauineſſe and ſorrow, conſulted what anſwer to make. But after they had according to the weightineſſe of the cauſe, and neceſſity of time fully debated the matter, it was generally agreed, That forasmuch as they were not themſelues of power to withſtand ſo furious an enemy, neither to expect for help from others, they ſhould therfore yeeld vnto the preſent neceſſity (which otherwiſe threatned vnto them vtter deſtruction) & reſerue themſelues vnto better times. Wherupon anſwer was giuen vnto the meſſenger by the Duke, That he was ready to yeeld himſelf vnto Solyman as his Vaſſal, and of him as of his Soueraign to hold his ſeigniory for the yearly tribute of 5000 duckets. Of which offer the Baſſa accepted, receiuing in hand one yeares E tribute. So was that notable Iſland yeelded vnto the Turkiſh obeiſance the 11 of November Anno 1537. From whence Luteis the proud Baſſa, laded with the rich ſpoil of the Countries and Iſlands he had paſſed by, returned to Conſtantinople with his fleet.

Naxos becomes tributary vnto the Turks.

Not long after, this great Baſſa (then next in credit and authority to Solyman himſelfe) fel at ods with his wife Solymans ſiſter; for that he, after the vnnaturall manner of that barbarous people, kept in his houſe a moſt delicat youth, in whom he took more delight than in his wife. Which ſhe being a woman of great ſpirit, not able to indure, and knowing her husband by marying of her, to haue bin from baſe degree aduanced vnto the higheſt honors the Emperor her brother could heap vpon him; in great rage reproued him with moſt bitter words; ſaying, That ſhe had maried him to be of him beloued, and vſed as his wife, and not contemp-F tuouſly abuſed by his minions. Wherwith the Baſſa moued, gaue her a blow on the eare, and cauſed her as a fooliſh and vnquiet woman to be ſhut vp in her chamber. But ſhe not brooking ſuch abuſe, came weeping to Solyman her brother, & complaining of her husband, requeſted to be diuorced from him, who made no more reckoning of her. And with her complaint ſo inſenced Solyman, that he took from him his Seal, and thruſt him out of all his honourable promotions, and had vndoubtedly put him to death, had not the remembrance of his old loue G and friendſhip ſtaied his fury: yet hauing vtterly diſgraced him, he baniſhed him the Court, into Macedonia, where he ſpent the remainder of his life like a poor priuat man. Of whom Boiſardus thus writeth:

Quæ tibi cum molli res eſt pollute Cynedo: Cum cubet in Thalamis regia nympha tuis?
Ex humili fortuna loco te evexit in altum Ex alto major ſæpe ruina venit.

On dainty Boyes, thou filthy man, why doſt thou fix thyne eye; H Whilſt princely Dame of royal bloud doth in thy chamber lye?
From baſe eſtate, to honors hight blind fortune did thee call,
And ſet thee vp with princes great, to work thy greater fall.

The Turks and Venetians ſpoil one another.

Solyman thus fallen out with the Venetians, as is aforeſaid; to intangle them with Wars in diuers places at once, commanded his Lieutenants in euery place bordering vpon the Venetian Seigniory, to vex and moleſt them with all hoſtility, which they did accordingly. In Peloponeſus Caſſimes beſieged Nauplium and Epidaurus, two ſtrong Cities of the Venetians. Barbaruſſa landing his men in Dalmatia, ſurpriſed the antient city of Botrotus, belonging to the Venetians, caried away the Citiſens, and raſed the City. Obroatium another city of the I Venetians in Dalmatia, called in antient time Argirutum, with the Caſtle of Nadin, were taken by Vſtref, Solymans Lieutenant in Illyria.

The Venetians thus inuaded on euery ſide, requited them again with the like. Piſaurius and Veturius the Venetian Admirals landing their men, beſieged Scardona a city of the Turkes in the borders of Dalmatia, which they took by force, put the Turks to the ſword, & ouerthrew the wals of the city, becauſe it ſhould be no more a refuge vnto the Turks. They ſent alſo another of their captains called Gabriel Ribeus, to beſiege Obroatium; who vpon the comming of Amurathes one of Vſtrefs Captaines, cowardly fled, and in flight loſt moſt of his men. For which his cowardiſe Piſaurius cauſed his head to be ſtrook off aboord the Admiral gally. And Camillus Vrſinus, appointed by the Venetian ſtate gouernor of Iadera, a ſtrong Town vpon the K frontiers of their territory in Dalmatia, took from the Turks the town of Oſtrovizza, which he burnt down to the ground. He recouered alſo Obroatium, which was a little before loſt; and by commandement from the Senat vtterly raſed it, as a place not well to be kept againſt the Enemy.

The ſame Autumn that Solyman hauing waſted Corcyra, returned to Conſtantinople, and the Venetians held wars with the Turks for the towns and caſtles in Dalmatia; King Ferdinand receiued ſuch an ouerthrow at Exek by the Turks, as a greater or more ſhamefull vnto the name of the Chriſtians was hardly ſeen in that age; if the loſſe of the choice ſouldiours and Captains of four great Nations, with the ſhameful flight of the General, be well conſidered. After the battell of Mohatcz, wherin King Lewis was loſt, the Turks hauing gotten the L victory, kept vnto themſelues that part of Hungary which is called Poſſega, becauſe thereby they had a fit paſſage from Belgrade farther into Hungary. The two great Riuers of Sauus and Dranus running almoſt with equall diſtance from the Weſt, taking with them diuers other ſmaller Riuers, before they fall into the great Riuer of Danubius Eaſtward, do on both ſides incloſe this countrey of Poſſega, being a rich and plentifull Countrey, and wonderfully well peopled. It bordereth vpon the Prouinces of Croatia and Corbania, which in times paſt were in continuall warres with the Turkiſh Garriſons there by in Illyria, and alſo in Boſna.

Mahometes Gouernor of Belgrade.

At that time one Mahometes a moſt valiant captain of the Turks was gouernor of Belgrade: to whom for his approoued valour and wiſedome Solyman had committed the keeping of M thoſe Frontiers, and the protection of the kingdom of Hungary in the behalfe of King Iohn. He the year before had ſo vſed the matter, that what by force, what by policy, hee had taken from the Chriſtians aboue thirty ſmall Caſtles in the Countrey (which was ſometime a part of the patrimony of the Deſpot of Raſcia) and had ioined them to the regiment of Boſna.

One

An euill aſſured League.

A One of theſe caſtles amongſt the reſt, called Exek, for the commodious ſcituation therof he ſtrongly fortified, as that which might giue him paſſage ouer the riuer Dranus into Hungary; from whence he ſet infinit preys out of King Ferdinands country neer vnto him. Yet was there at that time a certain league betwixt Solyman and Ferdinand, which notwithſtanding after the old cuſtom of thoſe Countries, for the exerciſe of the garriſon ſoldiers, did bear with the taking of booty, and light ſkirmiſhes, without any breach thereof: ſo that it were done without any great power or field pieces. Which wrong-named peace Mathias & other kings of Hungary had of long time vſed with the Turks, doing them with their nimble light horſemen no leſſe harm than they receiued. But the Germans now vſing no ſuch light horſemen, but ſeruing vpon great horſes, and charged with heauy armour, receiued great hurt by thoſe B light ſkirmiſhes; the Turks with their light horſes eaſily ſhunning their charge, and again at their pleaſure charging them afreſh, when they ſaw the heauy German horſes almoſt wearie and ſpent: by which means the German horſmen were oftentimes by the Turks light horſemen ouerthrown, and ſo either ſlain or taken. King Ferdinand not wel brooking theſe continual injuries, and grieued in mind at the league which Solyman had to his profit made with him at his going into Perſia; finding the ſame both vnprofitable and hurtfull to himſelfe, determined to take vp arms, with purpoſe that if he could driue the Turks out of the Countrey of Poſſega, then forthwith to paſſe ouer Dranus, and to go directly to Buda againſt king Iohn.
It ſtil ſtucke in his minde, how that kingdome was taken from him by Solyman, and that more was, as it were in diſgrace of him and the Houſe of Auſtria, beſtowed vpon a ſtranger, which C had neither right therto, nor was any way royally deſcended. Yet there were ſome that wiſhed him, not raſhly to enter into arms againſt ſo mighty an Enemy, as was not to be vanquiſhed but by the vnited forces of all the Chriſtian Princes of Europ. For they foreſaw, that Soliman ſo prouoked, would not put it vp, but for the hatred he bare againſt the Chriſtians, and for his honour, ſeeke more cruell reuenge: as he had of late don againſt the Venetians, with whom vpon a light occaſion he had broke an antient League, for ſinking one or two of his gallies; for which he would admit no excuſe or ſatisfaction. All this Ferdinand knew to bee true: yet all the people of his dominions lay ſo earneſtly vpon him to take that war in hand, that they ſaid plainly, they would neuer bear arms more againſt the Turks, if he omitted that occaſion. For they of Carinthia, Stiria, Croatia and Noricum, ſubiect to the inuaſion of the D Turks, & daily receiuing great harms, thought the Turks might eaſily be driuen out of Poſſega, forſomuch as Mahomet es had no great power, nor like to haue any greater, Autumn now

K. Ferdinand breaks League with the Turks

1. So King Ferdinand, with the wonderful rejoicing of his ſubjects, cauſed ſoldiers to be taken vp in all parts of his kingdom, ſending for moſt of his nobility and beſt captaines, as to a Religious War: and in a very ſhort ſpace had raiſed a good Army, yet ſuppoſed of greater ſtrength than number, as conſiſting moſt of ſelect men. The footmen were for moſt part Germanes; to whom were joined as wings certaine Companies of Italians, harquebuſiers, whom Lewis Lodronius, a valiant captain, and General of the footmen, had raiſed in Rhetia and thoſe parts of Italy which lie neer vnto the Alps. The horſmen were of Bohemia, Sileſia, Morauia, E Stiria, Carinthia, and ſome alſo out of Hungary, all conducted by their ſeueral captains. All theſe horſmen were in number 8000, but the footmen were 24000 ſtrong, with great ſtore of artillery of all ſorts. This army for the experience and valor of the ſoldiers, was thought ſufficient to haue met the greateſt army of the Turks in field, if it had been conducted by a politique General, and (as he had at other times bin) fortunat: which was one Iohn Cazzianer a nobleman of Croatia, whom as one of great experience, and famous for the late defence of Vienna, King Ferdinand had made General of his Army. For Ferdinand by the aduice of his beſt friends neuer vſed to aduenture his perſon vnto the danger of any battell, eſpecially againſt the Turks, by whom many Chriſtian Kings had in former time bin vanquiſhed and ſlain; but performed all his wars by his lieutenants: which he was thought to do not ſo much for want F of courage, as moued with the fatal miſhap of ſo many Chriſtian Kings. Mahometes gouernor of Belgrade vnderſtanding of this preparation made againſt him, ſent for diuers companies of the garriſon ſoldiers which lay vpon the borders neer hand; hee required aid of the Gouernours of the Turks prouince thereabouts, and was eſpecially holpen by Vſtref Gouernour of Boſna, who of all Solymans Lieutenants in Europ, was able to bring into the field moſt good horſemen;he ſent him Amurathes a famous Captaine with a great companie of gallant horſemen,vnto whom were joined certain companies of footmen of the wild and mountain people of Dalmatia,entertained for pay ; which rough and rude kinde of people were gouerned and kept in order by certain companies of Ianizaries drawn out of the garriſon towns as farre as Belgrade and Samandria. After whom followed many out of Servia and Raſcia, ſome for pay,ſome for prey : the Turks Receiuer liberally paying to ſuch as were willing to ſerue, two months pay before hand. Neither wanted he aid of the Hungarians from Buda. So that the Turkiſh gouernors on euery ſide putting to their helping hands,Mahometes had in ſhort time gathered ſuch an army,as for number and ſtrength was not much inferior to King Ferdinands, and reſolued to expect the comming of his enemies at Exek. Cazzianer was now come as far on his way as Caprunza,a town vpon the riuer Dranus ; hauing before well and conueniently prouided for the victualling of his army,if they whom he put in truſt,and had taken the matter vpon them,had with like ſpeed and diligence performed their charge : for they were the chief men of all the Countrey ; who all followed the direction of Symon Biſhop of Zagrabia ; who inflamed with zeal aboue meaſure, or elſe for want of judgement deceiued, had promiſed to ſerue the whole Campe with plenty of victuals at a very low rate. Which thing the Country people which were to bring in the victual,ſome by wagon,ſome by boats along the Riuers,many difficulties now ariſing,were not able to perform:which was not to be remedied by reaſon of the neerneſſe of the enemy;and alſo for that Mahometes with ſmal gallies in both Riuers,and his troups of horſmen pricking vp and down the country,did either ſtay the country people from bringing of victuall, or els allured them for a greater price to bring it to his own Camp,where they receiued ready money. Cazzianer ſetting forward from Caprunza, hardly came in ten dayes to the Caſtle of Veruza, which is about forty miles diſtant from Caprunza ; being inforced to make ſhort marches, by reaſon of the troubleſome carriage of ſome great pieces of Artillery for battery. The wiſer ſort began euen then to miſdoubt the want of victuals, both for the reaſons before alledged, and for that ſuch victuall as they looked for came not, although they marched very ſoftly : ſo that they were then inforced to ſpend ſuch victuall as they had prouided,not for the beginning, but for the difficulties of a long protracted War. Wherof Cazzianer wrot ſharply to the Biſhop,and to the others who had taken vpon them the charge of prouiding victuall for the Army ; commanding them to vſe all poſſible diligence and ſpeed,and not to let the hope of a moſt aſſured victory to be loſt through their negligence , for want of victuall, rather than the valour of the enemy. In the mean time Cazzianer thought good there to ſtay,and to expect the comming of victuall,ſending before him Paulus Bachitius with a thouſand Hungarian light horſmen,and certain companies of Italian harquebuſiers,as far as the Caſtle of Zopia, to the intent he might of ſuch priſoners as he could take,learn ſomthing of the enemies purpoſe. The Turks in the Caſtle of Zopia deſcrying the comming of Bachitius, and thinking the whole Army of the Chriſtians had bin at hand,ſet fire on the Caſtle, which they thought they could not keepe, and by boats fled down the riuer Dranus. Yet for all their haſt,Bachitius took ſome of them in their flight,of whom Cazzianer learned that which he before knew by his own eſpials, That Mahometes and the Turks lay incamped at Exek, with a full reſolution to giue him battell. Cazzianer ſetting forward again,ſtill keeping alongſt the riuer of Dranus,came in eight daies to the caſtle of Walpo:where by the way he was glad to ſtay ſeuen daies at the riuer Craſſus,which falleth into Dranus, vntill ſuch time as a bridge was made for the tranſporting of his Army, for that the riuer was not to be waded ouer : in which time Cazzianer entred oftentimes into counſell with the other Captains, what courſe to hold for the better proceeding in that war. Where diuers men were of diuers opinions : ſome ſaid it were beſt to leaue Exek , and to beſiege a caſtle of the enemies thereby, called Villach. Others more waty than the reſt,were of opinion, That it were better there to ſtay vntil the reſt of the aid and victuall,which they expected dayly,were come. But the greater number (which alſo preuailed) vrged the firſt determination, of going directly to the enemy at Exek, for that longer delay would but breed further danger ; and there was in the Camp (as they ſaid) both ſtrength and victual ſufficient for the obtaining of the victory,if they would make an end of their needleſſe Conſultations, and not protract the Warre vntill that Winter were come on : wherby they did nothing elſe but cauſe moſt of the ſoldiers to think that they were afraid to meet the Enemy , and ſecretly

A to ſteal back again into their countries. Wheras if they would like reſolute men march on forward againſt the enemy, who at other times truſting moſt vnto his multitudes, and now hauing no great power, would neuer abide the ſight of the Chriſtian Army, bringing with it ſo much Artillery, but forthwith forſake the place and neuer ſhew his face: foraſmuch as the Chriſtian men at Armes would (as they ſaid) eaſily breake thorow and ouerthrow the naked Turkiſh horſmen, if they durſt abide the field. The yong ſouldiers, who had neuer made proof as yet of the Turks maner of fight, did with ſuch cheerfulnes like of this reſolution, that they thought two daies ſtay a long delay of ſo ready and eaſie a victory. Wherfore it was reſolued vpon preſently to ſet forward, and therupon the Army was muſtred: where vpon view taken there was found to be 10000 horſmen (for diuers troups of Germans were come vnto the B Camp after the time of the firſt ſetting forward of the Army) a more gallant company of horſmen, both for the ſtrength of the horſes, and goodly furniture of the men, had ſeldom bin ſeen in an Army ſo ſuddedly raiſed. But the footmen, ſelected out of all the prouinces, were greatly diminiſhed, being now in number ſcarce 8000 ſtrong: for many were ſick in the camp; others weary of the long journy, lingring behind were ſtoln away: and generally al they that were left, moyled with dirt and myre by reaſon of the deepnes of the rotten way, wet thorow with rain, and almoſt ſtarued with cold, and therto pinched with hunger, were thought ſcarce able to endure the hardneſſe of the preſent War. After that, commandement was giuen, that euery ſoldier ſhould carry with him three dayes victuall; and proclamation made, That no man ſhould vpon pain of death take any Turke priſoner, although he yeelded himſelfe, or C charge himſelf with any ſpoil before the battel were fully ended; for that the Captains would afterwards diuide the ſpoil of the enemy amongſt the ſouldiers. This proclamation made thorow the camp, they ſet forward towards Exek, and the third day they came to a certain valley about three miles from Exek, where the incamped. The next day a company of Turks ſhewed themſelues, who were by the great ordnance repulſed. The day following, the enemy ſallied out of the Towne, and skirmiſhed oftentimes with the Chriſtians: in which skirmiſhes many were ſlain on both ſides, but more wounded of the Chriſtians; for that the Turks had politiquely mingled certain Ianizaries, harquebuſiers, and archers, with their horſemen; who, vſed to that maner of fight, ſore gauled the Chriſtian horſemen. For which cauſe the Generall forbad all ſuch light skirmiſhes, as purpoſing to keep his ſtrength whole againſt the D generall day of battell: commaunding his Cannoniers ſo to place the great Ordnance as might moſt annoy the enemy if he ſhould ſhew himſelfe by troups within the danger of the ſhot: which was ſo wel performed, that the Turks ſallying forth receiued thereby great hurt, the great ſhot flying through the midſt of their companies. The ſame day Symon Biſhop of Zagrabia came into the Camp with his horſmen, and a certain prouiſion of victuall; whereby the fear of the want before conceiued, was wel eaſed. Mahometes perceiuing that the Chriſti-ans were not longer to be drawn to thoſe harmful skirmiſhes, but that he muſt bring himſelf within the danger of the great ſhot, to annoy them by another means, ſent many ſmall Boats manned with harquebuſiers and ſmall pieces of ordnance, into the lake neer vnto the Campe, ſo to keep the Chriſtians from watring there, and with thoſe ſmall pieces ſhot oftentimes in-E to the camp. Neer to the vally where the Chriſtians lay, was a hill, wherupon ſtood a village, wherin were placed certain Companies of Turks, to skirmiſh as occaſion ſhould ſerue with the Chriſtians: for diſplacing of whom, the whole Army was ſtraitway put in order of battel, and the great Artillery bent vpon them, that they ſhould not with their light skirmiſhes, after the Turkiſh manner of fight, trouble the order of the Army. Which thing the Turks per-ceiuing, and that they were not able to hold the place, ſet fire on the towne, and ſo retyred to Exek. The Chriſtians keeping on their march, came to the top of the hill, for whence they might ſee Exek ſtand about two miles off in a fair plain neer to the bank of Dranus: all which low ground betwixt the hil and Exek was ſo ſubiect to the caſtle, that it was thought a matter too ful of danger, to attempt that way to batter the caſtle, and expoſe the army to the ine-F vitable fury of the enemies ſhot. Wherfore deſcrying a riſing ground on the farther ſide of the city, equal with the top of the wals, they thought it beſt to remoue their camp thither, & on that ſide to plant their battery againſt the city. But to come to that place was thought very troubleſome; for they muſt ſet a compaſſe three miles on the right hand thorow a forreſt by a foul and troubleſom way, before they could come to the place they deſired: for the army was

was not ſo great to beſiege the city round; wherin were not (as is reported) aboue 16000 men, neither was there ſuch ſtore of victuals in the camp, but that the Army was like ſoon to feel the want therof, without a continual ſupply, which would hardly be had, the enemy ſtil beſetting euery paſſage, and with his light horſmen ſcouring about all the country, of purpoſe to keep them from victual. For which cauſe ſome were of opinion, that it was beſt to ſtay where they were, till ſuch time as both more aid and better ſtore of victuals were come to them: but others of the contrary mind, ſaid the enemy was but barely ſtored with victual himſelfe, and therefore could not long hold out. Which they ſaid they vnderſtood by certain Chriſtian fugitiues; and that Mahometes had put his chief ſubſtance into certain boats, to be conueyed down the riuer, as purpoſing to fly, and would not hold out the ſiege aboue three daies. As for the forreſt, they thought it might wel enough be paſt thorow, if they would couragiouſly ſet forward. Beſides that, the time of the year ſuffered no delay, winter comming faſt on, and except ſome notable thing were don quickly, they ſhould be inforced by the very time of the year to return with ſhame, without doing any thing. This opinion was beſt liked of, as more honorable, and better beſeeming men of valor, than to ly ſtil in one place: wherupon the next day the Army remoued, and in good order marched thorow the forreſt. Which thing Mahometes quickly perceiuing, preſently ſent out a thouſand light horſmen, and certain companies of Ianizaries, harquebuſiers, to trouble the Chriſtians in their paſſage: who by a neerer & wel known way ouertaking the Army, ſuddenly charged the rereward, wherin the Italians and Bohemians marched. The Bohemians quickly fled, and the Italians had much ado to endure the charge: but being relieued by the Carinthian men at arms, they notably repulſed the Turks, and put them to flight. So the army with ſmall loſſe paſſed the forreſt, and came to the place they deſired: where after they had incamped themſelues, and in good order placed all things needful for the ſiege, they in ſeemly order offered the enemy battel; but he keeping himſelfe within the town, ſhot at the Chriſtians with his great ordnance: and they to requite him, with two great pieces which they had placed vpon the hil, ſhot thorow both the wals of the Town and the bulwark alſo, to the great terror of the defendants. The Chriſtians in the mean time hauing ſtood almoſt al the day in order of battel in ſight of the enemy, vainly expecting when he ſhould come forth to giue them battel, returned at night into their Camp. For Mahometes vpon great conſideration kept in his ſoldiers, although they were moſt deſirous to fight; vnderſtanding right wel of the want of victual in the Chriſtian camp; and beſides that (as the fugitiues reported) beeing ſtreitly commanded by letters from Solyman, That he ſhould not vpon pain of a moſt ſhamefull death forſake the place, but to defend it to the laſt. Now the Chriſtians deſirous of battel, being thus delayed and deceiued of their expectation, had in a few daies ſpent the ſmal ſtore of victuals they had, and began to feel a general want: nor was there any apparant means how they ſhould be relieued. So that euery man began to feare ſome general miſchief to enſue. When Balthazar Pamphilus a noble Hungarian, and a Captain of great experience, ſitting in counſel with the reſt, entred into this ſpeech:

The Turks skirmiſh with the Chriſtians paſſing the forreſt.

Mahometes wiſely refuſeth to fight with the Chriſtians, offering him battell.

Captains (ſaid he) we do all that we do, vnaduiſedly: for whilſt we conſult at large how wee may ouercome our enemies, the ſtrength of our army is in the mean time ſo weakned for want of victuall, that the ſouldiers are neither well able to ſtand on their legs, nor to hold their weapons in their feeble hands: and generally euen they which are of greateſt courage begin now to quaile, and deſpairing of battell, ſee that they muſt miſerably and ſhamefully periſh for want. Wherefore in my opinion wee ought firſt and aboue all things moſt ſpeedily to prouide for this want, which ſo grieuouſly pincheth vs, and preſently to remoue hence vnto the caſtle of Hermande, that with the prouiſion therof, which is not like to be little, we may refreſh our whole army; and ſo relieued, to proceed further as occaſion ſhall require.

Balthazar his counſel for relief of the army

This caſtle was about ten miles from Exek, whereinto many of the Turks had conueyed their wiues and children, and chiefeſt ſubſtance, being kept with a ſmal garriſon of 20 Turks. Faſt by the caſtle was a pretty little walled town without flankers, after the maner of the old fortifying: which town and caſtle Balthazar ſaid would eaſily be won. This his counſel was wel liked of all men, and he himſelf ſent with certain Companies of ſouldiers to take in the town. Wherin fortune ſo fauoured him, that it was at his firſt comming ſurrendred vnto him; but when he had it, he found not therein any ſuch ſtore of corne or victuall as hee had hoped for:

Balthazar taketh the town of Hermande.

A for; yet he took there certain veſſels of wine, to the great relief of the weak ſouldiers. Vpon the news of the taking of this town, the camp remoued from Exek about ten a clock at night, but ſo diſorderly, that the ſoldiers ſcarce knowing their own enſignes, ſeemed rather to haue fled for fear, than marched for ſpoil. Yet the Turks for all that moued not out of Exek, miſdoubting ſome deceit, and loth to attempt any thing raſhly in the night. When the Army was come to the town, the captains took order that the victual there found was equally diuided amongſt the ſoldiers: and the next morning battery laid againſt the Caſtle, which thoſe few Turks valiantly defended half a day, and then by compoſition yeelded it. But when the caſtle was taken, there was found in it but two barrels of meal, and other two of Millet. Then might a man haue ſeen the captains themſelues hanging their heads, as men ſtrucken with a B ſudden fear; who in ſtead of a great prey, & victual to haue ſerued many daies, ſound nothing but a few women & children, and ſcarce ſo much victual both in the town and caſtle as would ſerue the army two daies. Yet they diſſembled the matter, and fed the ſoldiers with hope of better ſtore after the bridge was once repaired, that they might paſſe the riuer of Bodrog, which ran by the town: which bridge the Turks had before, for their own defence, broken, by plucking vp of certain piles, and taking away of the planks; wherfore the carpenters being ſet on worke, and euery man putting to his helping hand, the bridge was with continual labor in 3 daies repaired. The fourth day the wagons and ſmaller pieces of Ordnance paſſed ouer the bridge, and after them ſixe of the great pieces for battery; but the bridge ouercharged with the ſeuenth, which was of a wonderful weight, and much greater than the reſt, began to break: C ſo that the captains were inforced to break that fair piece of ordnance, & ſo by pieces to cary it away, that the enemy ſhould not get ſo great a ſpoil. All things being thus wel paſt ouer, the piles were again cut down, and the planks ſtruck off, to the intent the enemy ſhould not that way purſue them; and other way there was none, but to fetch a compaſſe about the great Lake, which was many miles about. Here the captains began to conſult, whether it were beſt to break the great pieces of Ordnance, that ſo they might more ſpeedily march away, or not.
Of which opinion was Cazzianer himſelf, promiſing of his own charge to new caſt them. As for the ſcaling ladders and other like things prouided for the ſiege, they burnt, becauſe they ſhould not come into the enemies hand, or trouble themſelues in their march. But moſt of the Captains were of opinion, that it was not beſt ſo diſhonourably to breake thoſe goodly D pieces, the greateſt ornament and defence of their Country; but to hold on their march thorow Poſſega, vntil they came to Iuvanea, where they ſhould find great ſtore both of Corne and wine: which town with the caſtle of Gara faſt by it, ſtored with all manner of prouiſion, they ſaid would eaſily be taken before the Turkes could poſſibly come ſo far about the Lake from Exek: and that it were a great ſhame ſo to returne without doing any thing. Cazzianer thus perſuaded, ſet forward, and with great toil (by reaſon of the deepnes of the way, and heauines of the great ordnance) came by night to Iuvanca, which was but three miles off; where the Turks hauing with incredible celeritie paſſed a long journey, arriued at the ſame time alſo.
Neer vnto this caſtle was a little town out of which all the Turks were fled: the towneſmen being Chriſtians, opened the gates and receiued in the ſouldiers; who there filled themſelues E abundantly with wine, and could hardly be driuen out thence by their captains to the Camp.
The ſame night the Turks burnt the ſame town, and whatſoeuer the Chriſtians had left therin; and euery man betook him to his armor in the camp, for the enemy was then at hand, and in the dawning of the day began hotly to skirmiſh in diuers places with the Chriſtians, but eſpecially in that quarter of the camp where the Bohemians lay. Wherwith Petrus Raſchinius general of the Bohemians being grieued, ſet vpon them with a troup of his beſt horſmen, and inforced them to fly: but the Turks after the maner of their fight quickely returning againe, and relieued by the comming in of their fellows, beſet the Bohemians on euery ſide, and ſlew many of them. Raſchinius the Generall fighting moſt valiantly, was there ſlain with his followers.
The Chriſtian captains purpoſing to retyre home, placed on each ſide of the army four F ranks of wagons for defence on both ſides. In the vauward were placed the weak & ſick men, yet ſo, that in the front of the army were certain companies of luſty tall ſouldiers: but in the rereward was placed the greateſt ſtrength both of horſe and foot. The army thus marching as it were on both ſides intrenched, as it oft times met with wooddy hills hindring their way, ſo did the ſame fitly ſerue the Chriſtians, that the Turks could not well aſſaile them in their march, both before and behind. Which thing Mahometes perceiuing, ſent before certain companies G of Ianizaries and nimble footmen which knew the country and paſſages wel, with certain falcons and other ſmall pieces, to take the ſtreits wherby the army was to paſſe, and ſo to gaul them in their paſſage; and when they could keep the place no longer, to fly back to another, and ſo from place to place: and in the open places he had his troups of light horſemen, which were euer buſie in one place or another of the army. By which meanes the Chriſtians in their march receiued much harm; which grieued them the more, for that no great power of the Turks was any where to be ſeen together, but ſtragling companies; which as they were commanded, ſomtime would come on with a fierce charge, and by and by retyre again, & with their arrows and falcon ſhot from places of aduantage aſſail them. From one of theſe ſtreits ſomwhat bigger than the reſt, Paulus Bachitius one of the Hungarian Captains, in whome the H ſoldiers generally repoſed their greateſt truſt, was ſlain with a falcon ſhot, with diuers others of the valiant Hungarians; who ſeeing there a greater number of the Turkes than they had ſeen in other places, thought to haue don ſome good ſeruice vpon them. His death brought a general fear vpon the whole army, foraſmuch as then and at other times without him they neuer had any good ſucces againſt the Turks. Yet in that skirmiſh, the Hungarians to reuenge the death of their Captain, did with ſuch force repulſe the enemy, that they cauſed him after he had loſt many of his men, to run away and leaue his ſmall pieces behind him. But ſuch was the weaknes or cowardiſe of the Chriſtian footmen, and the agility of the Turkes, eſpecially the Ianizaries, that they with their ſhot out of the woods ſtaid the Hungarian horſmen from the purſuit of their fellowes, and recouered their ſmall field-pieces before they could be caried I away by the Chriſtian footmen; wherwith they did again fore-run the Army, ſtill troubling it as before. The Chriſtians beſet with theſe dangers, and almoſt ſpent for want of victual; ſeeing no means to relieue their weak bodies, nor any hope to comfort their fainting ſpirits, did generally fear ſome extream calamitie to enſue: and ſo much the more, for that it was reported, that Mahometes ſtil expected freſh ſupplies from Belgrade, Samandria, and Nicopolis: and many of the Hungarian light horſmen ſtole away from them, as careful of their own ſafety. Neither did they ſee any comfort in the diſmaid captains, who at other times were wont with cheerful and couragious ſpeeches to relieue the ſouldiers, if they ſaw them any thing diſcouraged. But when they were come into a fair open field neer to a town called Gara, they were aduertiſed, That the Enemy had in the woods before them, wherby they were K to paſſe, cut downe great trees croſſe the waies, ſo that neither their great Ordnance nor wagons, nor yet their horſmen could poſſibly paſſe that way, but that they muſt needs breake their order.

The fearfull reſolution of the Chriſtians to eſcape the Turks

This once bruted thorow the army, filled them all with heauineſſe and deſperation; and ſo much the more, for that Ladiſlaus Moreus, and others which knew the country well, ſaid there was but two waies to eſcape; the one thorow the Woods about ten miles ſpace to Walpo, which by reaſon of the trees cut down croſſe the waies by the Turks, was not to be paſſed, but they muſt needs leaue behind them their great ordnance and carriages; the other towards the caſtle of Zenthuerzebeth, which was in Ladiſlaus Moreus his Countrey, certaine miles diſtant from Gara; by taking of which way, the enemy by reaſon of the ſtreitnes of the paſſage, muſt L of neceſſitie be inforced to giue ouer his purſuit. Yet for all that, it was in Councell reſolued vpon, to take the way thorow the Woods of Walpo, for that there was there victualls enough, and in the Caſtle of Walpo was kept money ſent from King Ferdinand, ſufficient to pay the ſoldiers for all that Winter. And ſo leauing the great Ordnance behind them, and burning the pouder and whatſoeuer els could not wel be caried on horſebacke, to ſet forward with all ſpeed: as for the trees, they ſaid they would bee wel enough remooued, and the way opened by the pioners and wagoners. Wherfore euery captain was commanded to haue his ſoldiers in readines to ſet forward vpon ſigne giuen, which was by the ſound of a ſhalm or hoboy, which when it ſhould be giuen, was referred to the diſcretion of the General. There were many which wonderfully diſliked of this reſolution, and ſaid openly, that the enemy was fewer M in number than their horſmen, and pinched almoſt with like want of victual: beſides, That the Turks durſt neuer in iuſt fight incounter with the Chriſtian men at arms, but like theeues aſſail them vpon a ſudden at ſome aduantage, and by and by be gon again; and that the towne of Gara where the enemy lay incamped, was not ſo ſtrong but that it might be won: wherfore

all

A all things were to be proued, and ſome great matter to be attempted of valiant men, pinched with wants: for that to run away, would be not only a diſhonor vnto the Captains themſelues who ought always to prefer their honor before their liues, but alſo dangerous to them, which reſpected nothing but life. And if they ſhould ſet forward in the night, many would be loſt in the woods, and valour in the darke could not be knowne from cowardiſe: beſides that, the Turks (as they ſaid) lay ſo nigh, that it was not poſſible to depart without their knowledge, eſpecially if they ſhould burn the powder, or break the great Ordnance. For which cauſe they thought it better to fight a battell with them, and not to beleeue the falſe reports of new ſupplies come with them, and that God would vndoubtedly giue them aid, which were ready to lay down their liues for their Religion and glory of the Chriſtian name. After all this, they B began to conſult what was now to be done with the ſick and wounded ſouldiers, which were before carried in waggons or among the other baggage of the army: for it was like, that ſo great a multitude of ſick and wounded men, vnderſtanding what was decreed concerning the departure of the army, would as miſerable forſaken men, fill the camp with lamentation and mourning, which it was thought would be alſo increaſed by the weeping and wailing of them which ſhould neuer afterwards ſee their brethren, kinſmen, fellows, or friends, ſo miſerably and ſhamefully left behind and forſaken: the noiſe whereof, muſt needs come to the ears of the Turks, which lay within a ſmall gun ſhot. Wherefore it was determined, that theſe ſick and wounded ſoldiers ſhould be carried vpon the waggons and cart horſes, and that ſuch as were not able to ſtay themſelues, ſhould be holden vp by others of more ſtrength riding behinde C them vpon the buttocks of the horſe. In fine, to color the matter, they which were ſo deſirous to go, ſaid that this their manner of departure grounded vpon good reaſon, was not to be accounted a ſhamefull flight (as ſome would tearm it) but a right honeſt and neceſſary manner of retiring: foraſmuch as they were ſtronger than their enemies in horſmen, and equall alſo (if not ſtronger) in footmen, although they were ſore weakned with ſicknes. Whilſt theſe things were in counſell diuerſly diſcourſed, and the reſolution ſet down as is before ſaid, the matter was brought to this paſſe, that euery captain with troubled iudgement conceiued in himſelf ſecret cogitations, far from the common good; and without regard of ſhame & diſhonor, bethought himſelfe how he might betake himſelfe to flight, the vncertain hope of deſired life.
On the contrary part, Mahometes vſing moſt certain ſpies, and aduertiſed euery houre of al the D diſtreſſes of the Chriſtians, and therefore preſaging his future victory; did by moſt diligent watch and troups of horſmen, beſetting the paſſages far and neer, moſt vigilantly attend euery motion in the Chriſtian camp: of purpoſe, that when the army ſhould riſe and ſet forward, he after his wonted manner might in the ſtraits (fit for his purpoſe) ſet vpon them being diuided and diſperſed one from another, as they muſt needs in thoſe troubleſome paſſages: for he had ſo placed his horſmen and footmen in the known tracts of thoſe woods, that he had ſhut vp the Chriſtians as it were in a toile. It was now almoſt midnight, & the army taking no reſt, ſo carefully expected the ſigne of ſetting forward, that euery little delay ſeemed to moſt men both tedious and dangerous: ſo that many great captains vpon a cowardly conceit would ſtay no longer, but haſted to depart, and to go before the reſt, without any leaue of the general: the E beginning of this miſcheuous departure, is reported to haue bin begun by the common Hungarian horſmen, which knowing the paſſages & waies through the woods, made haſt to Walpo.
Ladiſlaus Moreus diſhonorably following their example, went the other way to his Caſtle Zenthuerzebeth. After them followed in great haſte the Stirian horſemen, without regard of ſhame, led by Iohn Hunganot their Generall, who was appointed to haue guarded the rereward; Simon Biſhop of Zagrabia fled in like manner, knowne by his great lanthorn wandring in the wood: yet with leſſe ſhame than the reſt, becauſe he being a clergy man, thought it not to belong to his vocation to put on armes, or to go into battell. In the mean time it was fearefully told to Cazzianer, That the Hungarian horſmen were fled, and that Ladiſlaus & Hunganot, with the Stirian troups were gon alſo, and that al the reſt of the army not expecting the appointed F ſignall, were in like manner vpon flying: with which report, the cowardly and diſmaid Generall was ſo terrified, that he preſently got to horſe, quite forgetting the ſignall he ſhould haue giuen (for that he thought all the reſt, as he afterwards ſaid, to haue been gone before) and as he was vnarmed, betooke himſelfe to flight, leauing behind him for haſte his Tent ſtored with plate and other rich furniture. In this tumult of them which ſo diſorderly fled, Lodronius march,both before and behind. Which thing Mahometes perceiuing,ſent before certain companies of Ianizaries and nimble ſootmen which knew the country and paſſages wel,with certain falcons and other ſmall pieces, to take the ſtreits wherby the army was to paſſe,and ſo to gaul them in their paſſage;and when they could keep the place no longer, to fly back to another,and ſo from place to place : and in the open places he had his troups of light horſemen, which were euer buſie in one place or another of the army. By which meanes the Chriſtians in their march receiued much harm ; which grieued them the more, for that no great power of the Turks was any where to be ſeen together, but ſtragling companies;which as they were commanded,ſomtime would come on with a fierce charge,and by and by retyre again,& with their arrows and falcon ſhot from places of aduantage aſſail them. From one of theſe ſtreits ſomwhat bigger than the reſt,Paulus Bachitius one of the Hungarian Captains,in whome the ſoldiers generally repoſed their greateſt truſt,was ſlain with a falcon ſhot,with diuers others of the valiant Hungarians ; who ſeeing there a greater number of the Turkes than they had ſeen in other places,thought to haue don ſome good ſeruice vpon them. His death brought a general fear vpon the whole army,foraſmuch as then and at other times without him they neuer had any good ſucces againſt the Turks. Yet in that skirmiſh,the Hungarians to reuenge the death of their Captain,did with ſuch force repulſe the enemy,that they cauſed him after he had loſt many of his men,to run away and leaue his ſmall pieces behind him. But ſuch was the weaknes or cowardiſe of the Chriſtian footmen,and the agility of the Turkes,eſpecially the Ianizaries,that they with their ſhot out of the woods ſtaid the Hungarian horſmen from the purſuit of their fellowes,and recouered their ſmall field-pieces before they could be caried away by the Chriſtian footmen ; wherwith they did again fore-run the Army,ſtill troubling it as before. The Chriſtians beſet with theſe dangers, and almoſt ſpent for want of victual ; ſeeing no means to relieue their weak bodies , nor any hope to comfort their fainting ſpirits, did generally fear ſome extream calamitie to enſue : and ſo much the more,for that it was reported,that Mahometes ſtil expected freſh ſupplies from Belgrade, Samandria,and Nicopolis : and many of the Hungarian light horſmen ſtole away from them,as careful of their own ſafety. Neither did they ſee any comfort in the diſmaid captains, who at other times were wont with cheerful and couragious ſpeeches to relieue the ſouldiers , if they ſaw them any thing diſcouraged. But when they were come into a fair open field neer to a town called Gara,they were aduertiſed, That the Enemy had in the woods before them,wherby they were to paſſe , cut downe great trees croſſe the waies , ſo that neither their great Ordnance nor wagons,nor yet their horſmen could poſſibly paſſe that way,but that they muſt needs breake their order.

This once bruted thorow the army,filled them all with heauineſſe and deſperation ; and ſo much the more,for that Ladiſlaus Moreus,and others which knew the country well , ſaid there was but two waies to eſcape ; the one thorow the Woods about ten miles ſpace to Walpo, which by reaſon of the trees cut down croſſe the waies by the Turks,was not to be paſſed,but they muſt needs leaue behind them their great ordnance and carriages:the other towards the caſtle of Zenthuerzebeth,which was in Ladiſlaus Moreus his Countrey, certaine miles diſtant from Gara ; by taking of which way,the enemy by reaſon of the ſtreitnes of the paſſage, muſt of neceſſitie be inforced to giue ouer his purſuit. Yet for all that , it was in Councell reſolued vpon, to take the way thorow the Woods of Walpo , for that there was there victualls enough, and in the Caſtle of Walpo was kept money ſent from King Ferdinand,ſufficient to pay the ſoldiers for all that Winter. And ſo leauing the great Ordnance behind them, and burning the pouder and whatſoeuer els could not wel be caried on horſebacke, to ſet forward with all ſpeed : as for the trees,they ſaid they would bee wel enough remoued , and the way opened by the pioners and wagoners. Wherfore euery captain was commanded to haue his ſoldiers in readines to ſet forward vpon ſigne giuen,which was by the ſound of a ſhalm or hoboy,which when it ſhould be giuen,was referred to the diſcretion of the General. There were many which wonderfully diſliked of this reſolution,and ſaid openly,that the enemy was fewer in number than their horſmen,and pinched almoſt with like want of victual : beſides,That the Turks durſt neuer in iuſt fight incounter with the Chriſtian men at arms,but like theeves aſſail them vpon a ſudden at ſome aduantage,and by and by be gon again:and that the towne of Gara where the enemy lay incamped,was not ſo ſtrong but that it might be won:wherfore

all

A all things were to be proued, and ſome great matter to be attempted of valiant men, pinched with wants: for that to run away, would be not only a diſhonor vnto the Captains themſelues, who ought alwayes to prefer their honor before their liues, but alſo dangerous to them, which reſpected nothing but life. And if they ſhould ſet forward in the night, many would be loſt in the woods, and valour in the darke could not be knowne from cowardiſe: beſides that, the Turks (as they ſaid) lay ſo nigh, that it was not poſſible to depart without their knowledge, eſpecially if they ſhould burn the powder, or break the great Ordnance. For which cauſes, they thought it better to fight a battell with them, and not to beleeue the falſe reports of new ſupplies comming to them, and that God would vndoubtedly giue them aid, which were ready to lay down their liues for their Religion and glory of the Chriſtian name. After all this, they B began to conſult what was now to be done with the ſick and wounded ſouldiers, which were before carried in waggons or among the other baggage of the army: for it was like, that ſo great a multitude of ſick and wounded men, vnderſtanding what was decreed concerning the departure of the army, would as miſerable forſaken men, fill the camp with lamentation and mourning, which it was thought would be alſo increaſed by the weeping and wailing of them which ſhould neuer afterwards ſee their brethren, kinſmen, fellows, or friends, ſo miſerably and ſhamefully left behind and forſaken: the noiſe whereof, muſt needs come to the ears of the Turks, which lay within a ſmall gun ſhot. Wherefore it was determined, that theſe ſick and wounded ſoldiers ſhould be carried vpon the waggons and cart horſes, and that ſuch as were not able to ſtay themſelues, ſhould be holden vp by others of more ſtrength riding behinde C them vpon the buttocks of the horſe. In fine, to color the matter, they which were ſo deſirous to go, ſaid that this their manner of departure grounded vpon good reaſon, was not to be accounted a ſhamefull flight (as ſome would tearm it) but a right honeſt and neceſſary manner of retiring: foraſmuch as they were ſtronger than their enemies in horſmen, and equall alſo (if not ſtronger) in footmen, although they were ſore weakned with ſicknes. night that famous captain was called vp, and told by his ſeruants, that the Generall was fled and gone: to whom he anſwered again, Without doubt it cannot be ſo, that I ſhould be ſo ſhamefully and perfidiouſly betraid of him: and ſo as a man megred with long watching and painfull labour, laid himſelfe down again to ſleep. Not long after, Mahometes hearing the ſtir that was in the camp, riſe with his Turks to aſſaile his enemies: yet to be better aſſured what the enemy did, he thought it good to ſtay for day light, cauſing his men to ſtand ſtill in order of battell, and with wonderfull ſilence to expect the ſigne of ſetting forward, which was giuen by the ſoft ſound of a horſmans drum paſſing through euery company. For the old captain acquainted with many battels againſt the Chriſtians, doubting of their feigned flight, would not vnaduiſedly be drawn into battell, but in a place commodious for his ſoldiers; as one before fully ſet down (after his wonted maner) to perform that ſeruice, not by the hazard of one ſet battell, but by dallying off the time with often skirmiſhes, when he could take the enemy at aduantage. The day appearing, Lodronius againe waking, heard a certain confuſed noiſe of the Turks, and withall ſaw himſelfe forſaken of the greateſt part of the horſmen: whereupon he complained in vaine, that he was betraid: yet for all that, he was nothing diſcouraged, but cheered vp the footmen, exhorting them to remember their former valor, and to reſolue with themſelues, onely with courage to ouercome the danger, which hard fortune had at that time brought them into; for that valiant men were rather to thinke of an honourable death, than ſhamefull flight, wherby whether they ſhould eſcape with life or not, was vncertaine. As for himſelf, who had bin their happy General in many battels, he ſaid he was reſolutely ſet down by repulſing the enemy to bring them into a place of ſafety, or els valiantly fighting together with them to end his daies. As Lodronius was yet thus incouraging the footmen, the horſmen of Carinthia, Saxony, Auſtria, and Bohemia, who mindful of their duty, had in vain expected the appointed ſignal from the Generall, came vnto Lodronius, as vnto the moſt valiant captain, beſeeching him in ſtead of their trecherous Generall, to take vpon him the place: promiſing to do whatſoeuer he commanded, and to fight as men againſt thoſe Infidels, for their Religion and King, ſo long as they were able to hold vp their weapons. Lodronius would in no caſe accept of that honor ſo franckly offred, modeſtly proteſting himſelfe vnworthy therof: yet as a man of courage, and moued with the hard eſtate of ſuch an army, he with a ſolemn proteſtation promiſed to execute the place in the beſt manner he could, and ſo did as long as his fortune gaue him leaue.

Lodronius encourageth the footmen.

It is reported, that as Lodronius was incouraging the footmen, and earneſtly inueighing againſt ſhamefull flight, an old German ſoldier was ſo bold, as bluntly, yet ſharply to ſay vnto him: Worthy Lodronius, thou canſt neuer be thought to fly ſhamefully, with a horſe of ſuch a price vnder thee. Lodronius perceiuing the old ſoldiers meaning, alighted, and with his ſword boxed his horſe, ſaying aloud, This day, valiant ſoldiers, ſhall you haue me both your Generall and fellow ſouldier, fighting on foot as one of your ſelues: ſee now that you deceiue not my expectation, but let vs either with glorious victory or honourable death end this war together, yet ſo, as that we die not vnreuenged. All his other horſes he gaue away vnto ſuch ſick and wounded ſouldiers as he beſt knew; amongſt whom was one Picenard of Cremona, a Captaine who was then in an extreme fit of an ague, & had hardly eſcaped the hands of the enemy. The firſt troups of horſmen and bands of footmen, were ſcarcely out of the camp with their enſigns, but the Turks comming on with a hideous cry, aſſailed them on euery ſide, and many ſharp skirmiſhes were giuen vnto the horſmen as they marched, with ſuch euent that the Chriſtians ſometime valiantly receiuing the enemies charge, and ſomtime charging them againe, repulſed the proud enemy ſtill buſie with them. In theſe continuall skirmiſhes, Antius Maier Fuchſtat, Generall of the Carinthian horſmen, fighting valiantly was ſlain, being for his braue armor ſuppoſed by the Turks to haue bin the Generall of the field. And by like miſhap foure and twenty horſmen of great name were alſo ſlain, and their guidon taken, amongſt theſe were three noblemen; Andreas Reſchius, Chriſtophorus Hernaus, and Georgius Himelbergus. In another place was made a moſt cruell skirmiſh with the Saxon horſmen, and them of Miſnia, Thuringia and Franconia, who followed the Saxons enſigne: of theſe, fighting moſt valiantly, was ſlain aboue 36 worthy Captains, Lieutenants, or Antients; and Chieurius a principall Captaine of the Saxons taken, who afterwards died in bonds amongſt the Turks. Amongſt them which were ſlain, Sebaſtianus Metheſius, and Iacobus Scallembergh were of greateſt Nobility.

A lity. In like manner the horſemen of Auſtria couragiouſly reſiſting the enemy for a ſpace, were in the end ouerthrowne; where amongſt them was ſlaine two valiant noblemen, Fettaius and Heſſilinchius, with diuers other men of great place and reputation both in their own country and abroad. But the greateſt ſlaughter was made amongſt the Bohemian horſemen, vpon whom (being diſordered by the Ianizaries harquebuſiers) the Turkiſh troups of the old garriſon ſoldiers breaking in with their ſcimiters and heauy yron maces, made a moſt bloudy execution. The battell of footmen being ſore galled, and almoſt diſordered in their march by certain companies of Ianizaries and archers of the Aſapi (who from a woody banke of a mariſh diſcharged their ſhot & arrowes continually vpon them, yet neuer comming to handy blowes) was on the other ſide ſo hardly charged by Amurathes with his troups of horſemen of Boſne, that being not able longer to keep order, it was at laſt by him broken and cut in pieces: where B the Turks with their ſwords and hatchets ſlew the poore Chriſtians without mercy. Lodronius himſelfe, carried away with the breaking in and force of the horſemen, was driuen into a mariſh: where after that he being ſore wounded, and almoſt faſt in the deepe mud, had done the vttermoſt of that his laſt endeauour; he by the faire intreaty of the Turks, perſuading him rather to yeeld, than there to be ſlaine, ſo yeelded himſelfe, that he with three companies which were with him, after they had laid downe their weapons, were all ſaued as valiant ſouldiers; for now the mercileſſe Turks embrued with the Chriſtian bloud, were weary of ſlaughter, and began greedily to ſeeke after the ſpoile, hunting after them (who flying diſperſedly, thought themſelues to haue eſcaped the enemies hands) with ſuch ſucceſſe, that a great number of C them were taken and led away for ſlaues: few of the footmen eſcaped, and almoſt all the reſt which were not fled before the battell, were to be ſeen dead vpon the ground.

The Chriſtian footmen ouerthrowne.

This ſhamefull ouerthrow at Exek was reported to haue exceeded the moſt grieuous ouerthrowes that the Chriſtians had receiued in any former time: for the flower both of horſe and foot there loſt by the raſhneſſe and fault of an vnlucky Generall, rather than by the valor of the enemy, ruthfully periſhed: ſo that many prouinces were filled with heauineſſe and mourning. For it neuer chanced before (as was to be ſeen by the vnfortunat battels of Sigiſmund the Emperor, and king Ladiſlaus) that the Turks got ſuch a victory without ſome loſſe: ſo that they which fell almoſt vnreuenged at Exek, may ſeeme to haue augmented that loſſe by the great infamy thereof. Mahometes hauing thus almoſt without the bloud of his ſoldiers, obtained ſo D great a victory, and taken the ſpoile of the Chriſtian camp, pitched his tents in a little medow being clenſed of the dead bodies, and after he had merrily feaſted with his captains, commanded the chiefe priſoners, the goodly ſpoiles, and faireſt enſignes to be brought vnto him: and openly commending the captaines who had that day done any good ſeruice, commanding diuers bags of mony to be brought vnto him by the receiuers, he with his owne hand rewarded the ſoldiers, ſome with gold, ſome with ſiluer, according to their deſerts: And cauſing all the priſoners which were not common ſouldiers to be brought forth, he diligently viewed them, and preſently cauſed euery one of their names, and the office they bare, to be inrolled by his clerks: and vnto ſuch as brought in the heads, eares, or hands of the Chriſtians with rings vpon them, he forthwith cauſed one reward or other to be giuen. Lodronius, when as by reaſon of E his deadly wounds he was thought vnable to indure trauell, or to be brought aliue with the other priſoners to Conſtantinople, was ſlaine by his keepers, and his head afterward ſent thither. For, as many noble gentlemen (and amongſt others, Laurentius Streiperg and Dietmarus Loſeſtaine) haue reported, (who ranſomed afterwards, returned againe home to their wiues and children) amongſt the priſoners which were together with the faire enſignes, and other gallant warlike furniture (eſpecially gilt armor and headpieces) preſented by Mahometes his meſſengers to Solyman, three of the greateſt captaines heads were in a ſiluer baſon there ſeene and known, which were the heads of Paulus Bachitius the valiant Hungarian captain, Amſius Macer Generall of the Carinthian horſemen, and Lodronius Generall of the footmen: which after the tyrant had looked aſquint vpon, as abhorring that loathſome ſight, he with ſtern countenance F commanded all the priſoners to be ſlaine. But vpon the interceſſion of the Ianizaries (who entreated for them, as valiant men, to whom they had at the time of their taking paſt their faith, and might afterwards do him good ſeruice) he changed his countenance, and ſaued many of them. But Cazzianer flying to his owne caſtle, was of all men accuſed as a wicked forſaker of his owne campe and enſignes, and commonly railed vpon, as the eternall infamy of his country, and authour of that publike calamity: ſo that it was reported, that he durſt neither goe abroad, nor ſhew his face for ſhame. He was ſo generally hated, that infamous libels, made againſt him & the other captains which ſhamefully fled as he did, were commonly ſung in the ſtreets by boyes in all places of Germany. Wherewith he was ſo much grieued, that he requeſted of K. Ferdinand, that he might ſafely come to the court, to anſwer whatſoeuer could be laid againſt him: which his requeſt the king eaſily granted, and when he came to the court, receiued him with doubtfull countenance. But when the hearing of his cauſe was by the king ſomewhat longer protracted than he would haue had it, and he in the meane time kept vnder ſafe cuſtody; impatient of ſuch delay, and halfe doubtfull whether he ſhould be quitted or condemned, thought it better to fly, than to abide the triall. So feigning himſelfe ſicke, and ſcraping vp by little and little with his knife a bricke pauement vnder his bed, and ſo in the night getting out one bricke firſt, and then another, at length brake thorow the vault, and with his ſheets letting himſelfe downe, eſcaped, hauing poſt horſes ready for him without the Caſtle. Not long after, as he was a man of a haſty and vnconſtant nature, deſpairing of his eſtate, he fled to the Turks; Mahometes gladly receiuing him, and beſide his great entertainment, promiſing him the gouernment of all Croatia in manner of a tributary king, if he would faithfully ſerue Solyman, and helpe him in the ſubduing of the cities of Auſtria. After he had agreed vpon all the conditions of his reuolt, that he might returne to Mahometes with ſome more credit, he began boldly to deale with Nicholaus Sirenus a Nobleman of Croatia, and his deere friend, as he ſuppoſed, to reuolt with him; aſſuring him, that Solyman would deale as kindly with them both, as he had before with king Iohn in the kingdome of Hungary. Sirenus promiſed him he would, or at leaſt made as if he promiſed to do what he deſired, and ſo agreed as it were vpon the matter, promiſing to go ouer with him to the Turke with a troupe of his beſt and moſt truſty horſemen. But Sirenus conſidering with himſelfe the hainouſneſſe and impiety of ſo great an offence, changing his purpoſe, choſe rather to deale treacherouſly with his old friend, fearing no ſuch thing in his houſe, than to offend both againſt God and his Prince. Wherefore after he had well feaſted Cazzianer in his houſe, he as a moſt cruell hoſt, cauſed him to be ſlaine, and ſent his head to King Ferdinand: in reward whereof he receiued of the Kings gift Cazzianer his caſtle, with all his ſubſtance.

Cazzianer moſt ſhamefully murdred, and his head ſent vnto K. Ferdinand.

In the mean time the Venetians, prouoked by the Turks with diuers injuries both by ſea and land (when as Solyman but a little before hardly beſieged Corcyra, and with moſt barbarous cruelty waſting the Iſland, had broken the league, & euen then by his lieutenant Caſſimus Baſſa beſieged Epidaurus and Nauplium, two of their cities in Peloponeſus) reſolued without delay to make war likewiſe vpon him, who for a ſmall treſpas would admit no excuſe or recompence. Wherunto they were alſo animated both by Charles the Emperor, and Paulus the great Biſhop: who warned by the late and dangerous attempts of Solyman and Barbaruſſa, thought it more for the ſafety of their eſtates, by giuing aid to the Venetians, to keep the Turks buſied further off, than to ſuffer them to acquaint themſelues too much with the ports of Italy and Sicilia. Wherefore all the Winter following they labored by their Embaſſadors, to ſet down what number and what manner of ſhips, what ſouldiers, what mony was to be prouided, and how to be according to their eſtates apportioned, for the ſetting forth of a ſtrong fleet againſt the next Summer, to be ſent into Grecia againſt the Turks. At laſt it was agreed amongſt theſe confederat Princes, by their Embaſſadors at Rome, That the Emperor ſhould furniſh and ſet forth 82 gallies, the Venetians the like number, and the Biſhop 36, to make vp the number of two hundred gallies; that the Venetians ſhould lend vnto the Biſhop ſo many gallies ready rigged, as he ſhould deſire, to be furniſhed by him with marriners and ſoldiers; and that the Emperor and the State of Genoa ſhould find ſufficient ſhipping for the tranſportation of the land forces and victuall. The Generals alſo of this great fleet to be ſet forth, were at the ſame time appointed: Andreas Auria for the Emperour, Vincentius Capellus for the Venetians, and Marcus Grimmanus Patriarch of Aquilea for the Biſhop; to whom was joyned Paulus Iuſtinianus one of the chiefe Senatours, a man of great experience in ſea matters. It was alſo agreed, that Ferdinand Gonzaga Viceroy of Sicily, ſhould haue the commanding of the land forces; and that whatſoeuer was got from the Turks in that expedition in Grecia, the Iſlands, or Dalmatia, ſhould be all faithfully deliuered to the Venetians, who had receiued ſo many injuries from the Turks. thereof ſo plagued the Turks with great and ſmall ſhot,and the ſallying out of two companies of Italians,that Barbaruſſa hauing loſt many of his men,was faine to retire againe to his fleet in ſuch haſt,that he left behind him 1000 of his Turks,which were gone further into the Iſland after booty,who were afterwards all ſlaine by them of Creet. After that,he attempted to haue taken diuers places in the Iſland, and was euery where notably repulſed. With the city of Candia,wherof the Iſland now taketh name, and was in antient time called Cytheum, he durſt not meddle: but ſailing almoſt round about the Iſland, tooke onely Cecilia, a little towne before forſaken of the inhabitants,which he ſet on fire, and ſo departed from Creet:for he was aduertiſed, That Vincentius Capellius the Venetian Admirall, who was now come to C Corcyra,would in ſhort time come to relieue them of Creet. Auria,Admiral of the Emperors fleet,paſſing the ſtreit of Meſſana,came to Corcyra alſo,and there joined with the Venetians.
The confederat Princes Fleets meet at Corcyra.
The Chriſtian fleet was then ſo great that it was thought the Turks durſt not meet it at ſea, but by all means ſhun to giue battell. For Barbaruſſa then lay with the Turks fleet in the bay of Ambracia,expecting when the Chriſtians ſhould enter the ſtreit entrance therof,where he had on both ſides placed diuers pieces of great ordnance,to haue ſunk them in their comming in: for Grimanus the Patriarch,a little before departing from Corcyra,had with the great Biſhops gallies begun to beſiege Preueſa,a towne vpon the promontory of Actium faſt by that ſtreit, and landing ſome of his ſouldiers, with three great pieces of artillery ſo battered the caſtle of Preueſa, that he was like enough to haue taken it, had not the Turks from Ætolia D come to relieue it with a ſtrong power both of horſe and foot. Wherfore the Patriarch ſhipping againe his men and ordnance, returned to the fleet at Corcyra, not repenting him of his journy, for that he had well viewed the ſtreits of that Bay, and all the enemies fleet riding at anchor within it. Vpon the returne of the Patriarch,and relation made,what he had both done and ſeene,the great commanders of the Chriſtian fleet entred into counſell,what courſe were beſt to take for the better proceeding in that great action. Gonzaga the Viceroy, Generall of Gonzaga his opinion. the land forces,was of opinion,That it were beſt to land the ſouldiers and great ordnance,and with all their force to aſſault the caſtle of Preueſa: which once taken,and their ordnance there planted, the enemies fleet might in the Bay be vtterly defeated, for that all paſſage to ſea might eaſily be taken from them, by ſinking one of the great ſhips in the mouth of the E Streit, and by moaring there of three great Gallions full of Artillery: ſo that if Barbaruſſa would deſperatly aduenture to come out, hee muſt needs be ſunke in the mouth of the Bay.
Whereunto Auria replied, That Gonzaga his counſell was in words and ſhew glorious, but to Auria of another opinion. put in execution moſt dangerous: for that firſt to land the ſouldiers and great artillery, he ſaid was a thing too too full of hazard and perill: for it was to be thought, that the Turks in Ætolia would as they had before done, come with ſpeed with their horſemen to relieue the beſieged in the caſtle; whoſe force the Chriſtian footmen could hardly abide. Beſides that, if the fleet ſhould by force of weather be conſtrained to leaue that coaſt, (as it wel might, Autumne now comming faſt on) after the ſouldiers were landed, From whence ſhould they then get victuall in the enemies country? Or what reliefe ſhould they hope for,if they ſhould hap F to be diſtreſſed; being on euery ſide beſet with their enemies,and their friends by tempeſt driuen from them? Wherefore he thought it beſt, if the enemy could not be drawne out of the Bay to battell,to go directly to the Bay of Naupactum,and to take that towne which was not greatly fortified, and to ranſacke and ſpoile all the Townes, euen to the bottome of the Bay of Corinth. Which the Grecians in the Fleet ſaid might eaſily be done: by taking of which courſe it might fall out, that Barbaruſſa mooued with the danger of his friends, would for ſhame come out and joyne with them in battell. This counſell of Auria was beſt liked both of Capellius and rhe Patriarch, being far more deſirous to fight with their enemies at ſea, than at land.

Auria braueth Barbaruſſa lying in the Bay of Ambracia.

Barbaruſſa reproued of cowardiſe by one of the Turkes Eunuchs.

Auria hauing put in order his fleet, came to Preueſa, and ſo to the ſtreit of the bay of Ambracia, where he ſo placed the whole fleet, which was in number 250 ſaile, that it might eaſily of the enemy be numbred. Which ſight (as it was reported) wonderfully troubled Barbaruſſa; who although he was of a couragious diſpoſition, and ſuch a man as greatly feared not either the valor or martial diſcipline of the Chriſtians, yet was he exceedingly moued with the ſight of ſo great a fleet ſo well appointed; for a greater had not of long time bin ſeene in the Ionian ſea. So that an Eunuch of Solymans court, ſent by him as Barbaruſſa his companion, ſeeing him to delay the time as a man halfe diſcouraged, did with moſt vnciuil and proud words take him vp, becauſe he would not forthwith go out of the bay and fight with the Chriſtians which lay at the mouth thereof daring of them: wherein he was not (as he ſaid) to regard his own ſafety (who as a coward would not endure the ſight of the enemy) but the honour of Solyman his Soueraigne, who would not take it well, to haue the glory of his name ſtained with ſo ſhamefull a delay: for if he were a valiant and martiall man, as he profeſſed himſelfe to be, he ought neuer to deſpaire of victory: and if it ſhould ſo fall out, that fortune ſhould frown vpon them, and not to anſwer their deſires, yet ſhould not Solyman therefore want captains and ſoldiers better than they, if they were ouercome; and the woods of Pontus would afford him timber enough to build twice ſo great and ſtrong a fleet. And for a concluſion, the inſolent Eunuch willed Barbaruſſa to beware, that whileſt he feared a moſt honourable death (which was vncertaine, though the battell were loſt) he drew not vpon himſelfe the certaine danger of a moſt ſhamefull death by the diſpleaſure of Solyman.

Barbaruſſa his anſwer to Salec concerning the Eunuchs ſpeech.

Barbaruſſa putteth out of the bay of Ambracia, and followeth Auria.

At which ſpeech Barbaruſſa turning himſelfe about to Salec, one of the arch pyrats, a famous ſea man, ſaid vnto him, We muſt for ought that I can ſee, moſt valiant and faithfull captaine, aduenture this battell, although it be at too much diſaduantage; leſt haply we periſh by the complaints of this barking demy man. And ſo preſently commanded all his fleet to weigh anchor, at the ſame time that Auria had hoiſed ſaile, and was on his way toward the bay of Naupactus, thinking that the enemy durſt not for feare haue come out of the bay of Ambracia. Auria keeping on his courſe was come to Leucade, when the enemies fleet was diſcried out of the top of Bendelmerius galleon, to be come out of the Bay, and to make towards them, keeping cloſe by the ſhore: which manner of courſe the crafty Turke, miſdoubting his own ſtrength, held of purpoſe, that if he ſhould chance to be ouermatched by the Chriſtians, he might turne the prow of his gallies vpon them, and running the poups aground, ſo to land his men and great ordnance, and from land as he might to defend his Fleet: accounting it a leſſe loſſe (if the worſt ſhould chance) to loſe the gallies, than the men.

The order of the Turks fleet.

Auria ſomewhat troubled with this ſudden comming out of the enemy, as with a thing which he then leaſt expected, yet notably ſtaid himſelfe, and commanded all the fleet to prepare themſelues to battel, and to follow his Admiral gally. Now all the Turks fleet was come into the open ſea into ſuch order, that Barbaruſſa himſelfe was in the middle battell; where his Admirall gally was to be ſeene with many purple flags and ſtreamers flying gallantly in the winde: on his right hand was Tabacches, and Salec on the left, both men of great fame, euery one of them hauing almoſt like number of gallies, which were in all 150. Vnto the middle battell were joyned two wings, in ſuch order, that which way ſoeuer the Admirall turned, they turning alſo, ſtill repreſented the forme of a flying Eagle: ſo that (as Auria himſelfe afterwards confeſſed) a more firme or orderly fleet could not haue bin brought out by any expert captain. Before the fleet came about 20 nimble gallies conducted by Drogut (or Dragut) an arch pyrat, famous afterwards for the great harme he did vnto the Chriſtians. Capellius the Venetian Admirall came in his long boat to Auria, requeſting him, That he with his gallies might giue the firſt charge vpon the enemy: to whom Auria gaue great thanks, and praiſing his forwardnes, requeſted him to follow him, to whom he would in good time giue a ſigne what he would haue done. The formoſt of the Turks light gallies was now come to the great galleon of Bondelmerius, which was the formoſt of the Chriſtian fleet, whereunto were ſent alſo certaine gallies from Salec, to helpe to aſſaile that tall ſhip, which ſhooting a far off, did no harme, neither

Bondel-

A Bondelmerius them; who would not ſuffer one piece to be diſcharged; for he being an expert ſea man, and loth to ſhoot in vain, expected that they ſhould come neerer vnto him, and then vpon the ſudden to diſcharge all his great ordnance vpon them. Neither was he deceiued in that his expectation, for the Turks comming neere vnto him, were ſo ouerwhelmed with the great and ſmall ſhot out of the galleon, that they were glad to ſtay their courſe and retyre. In the meane time Auria called backe again his ſhips which were gon before, and cauſed his galleon to be towed out; and by boats of purpoſe ſent out, charged the captains of the gallies to make themſelues ready to fight, vpon ſignall giuen by the ſound of the trumpet, & diſplaying of the Admirals enſigne: yet was not Auria of mind to fight, with his gallies without his ſhips.
Which thing the crafty enemy well perceiued, and therefore ſought by all meanes to ioyne B battel with the gallies, before the comming in of the tal ſhips, which were as caſtles in reſpect of the gallies: for it was then ſuch a calme, that the ſhips were not able to keepe way with the gallies, and the ſmooth water ſeemed to offer a fit opportunity for battell; which ſo well pleaſed the Patriarch, that many heard him cry aloud to Auria to giue the ſignall; and marueiled much why he deferred to giue battell. For he fetching a great compaſſe, and houering about his ſhips, with his gallies kept ſuch a courſe, that many thought he would vpon a ſudden haue don ſome ſtrange and vnexpected exploit vpon the enemy: but Auria held that ſtrange courſe Auria his politique courſe.
of purpoſe to haue drawne the enemies gallies within the danger of his great ſhips, who thundring amongſt them with their great ordnance, might haue eaſily ſore beaten and diſordered them, and opened a way to his gallies to haue gotten a moſt certaine victory. But the crafty C old Turke doubting by the ſtrangeneſſe of Auria's courſe, to be circumuented with ſome fineneſſe, changed his courſe, and lay ſtill with his owne ſquadron of gallies, warily expecting to what purpoſe that ſtrange courſe of the enemy tended. In the meane time, both the wings of his fleet had a little before Sun-ſet, begun in diuers places to encounter with the Chriſtians: ſome were in vaine ſtill aſſailing Bondelmerius his great galleon; others with their great ordnance had ſo ſore beaten two tall ſhips (wherin Buccanigra and Mongaia, two Spaniſh captains, were embarked with their companies) that they were giuen for loſt, many of the ſoldiers and mariners being ſlain. Two other ſhips loded with victuall, the one of Venice, the other of Dalmatia, were burnt by the Turks, & ſome few of the men ſaued by their ſhipboats, and by ſwimming to the ſhips neereſt vnto them. In the ſhutting in of the euening Salec tooke two gallies D ſtragling behind the reſt of the fleet, whereof Mozenicus a Venetian, and Bebiena a Florentine, were captains. After theſe gallies, was taken alſo the ſhip of Aloyſius Figaroa a Spaniard, although his ſoldiers had for a time fought moſt valiantly. In this ſhip, with Figaroa the father, was taken his ſon a yong gentleman, and beautified with all the good gifts of nature; who afterwards preſented to Solyman, turned Turke: and growing in credit in Solymans chamber, after three yeres miſerable impriſonment, obtained his poore fathers liberty, and ſent him well rewarded home again into Spaine. Whilſt both the fleets were thus expecting how they might to their moſt aduantage ioyne battell, ſuddenly aroſe a great tempeſt of thunder, lightning, and rain, with a freſh gale of Eaſterly wind: wherupon the Chriſtians ſeeing the Turks hoiſing The Chriſtian fleet ſhamefully flyeth.
vp their ſmall ſailes, without delay hoiſed vp both ſmall and great to cleere themſelues of the E enemy, and with that faire wind returned againe to Corcyra; ſo diſordredly and in ſuch haſt, ſparing neither ſaile nor oare, that it ſeemed rather a ſhamefull flight, than an orderly retreat.
So that Auria, a man of ſo great fame at ſea, as that he was called a ſecond Neptune, was that day accounted no captain. It is reported that Barbaruſſa with the ſame wind purſued the Chriſtians a while, and being not able longer to ſee what courſe they held, by reaſon of the darkneſſe of the night, to haue ſtaied his courſe: for the Admirals had cauſed their lights which they vſed to carry in the poups of their gallies, to be put out. Wherat Barbaruſſa heartily laughing, ſaid oftentimes in the Spaniſh tongue: Auria hath therefore put out his light, the better in the darke Barbaruſſa ieaſteth at Auria.
to hide his flight: noting in him ſuch a feare, as that he without regard of honour, ſought onely how by flight to eſcape. When they were come to Corcyra, they were all generally of opinion, F That by the benefit of that ſudden ſtorme they had auoided a great danger. The Imperials, eſpecially the Genowaies, to excuſe Auria, imputed the cauſe of ſo ſhameful a flight vnto the Venetians, who would not from the beginning receiue any Spaniſh ſouldiers into their gallies, the better to haue withſtood the enemy; and that Auria therefore doubting of the Venetians, refrained from ioyning battell; and the rather, becauſe that vpon the comming forth of the Turks fleet,they had hoiſed vp their ſailes tied vp to the yards with ſmall lines, which they might at their pleaſure eaſily cut,and ſet ſaile to fly which way they would. Shortly after came Barbaruſſa with all his fleet to the Iſland of Paxus,about foure leagues from Corcyra Eaſtward,brauing the Chriſtians as if he would haue fought with them,if they durſt come out. Wherat Gonzaga the Viceroy fretting,went to euery one of the three great commanders, requeſting them for the honor of the Chriſtians, to repreſſe that proud Turks inſolency. At laſt the matter was brought to that paſſe, that the Venetians hauing taken in certain companies of Spaniards,the fleet ſhould be diuided into foure ſquadrons,and ſo to giue battell. But this conſultation was ſo long protracting, that Barbaruſſa fearing the tempeſtuous Autumne weather,hoiſed ſaile,and about the ſeuenth of October returned again into the bay of Ambracia. After the departing of Barbaruſſa,the Generals of the Chriſtian fleet directed their courſe into the bay called Sinus Riſonicus, to beſiege Caſtronovum, or New-caſtle,a ſtrong towne of the Turks ſtanding in that bey, and bordering vpon the Venetian Seigniory. The Inhabitants were part Dalmatians, part Epirots, which had renounced the Chriſtian religion, and ſome Turks,liuing moſt part by merchandiſe. Vnto this town the Chriſtians laid ſiege,and in ſhort time won it, where they had a great prey, and a wonderfull number of captiues of all ſorts. Three daies after the taking of the towne, the caſtle was alſo yeelded by the Turks garriſon ; couenanting in vaine to depart with life and liberty.

This towne taken by common force,ought of right by the couenants of the league to haue been deliuered to the Venetians ; yet was it for all that by Auria and Gonzaga reſerued for the Emperor,and Franciſcus Sarmentus with foure thouſand Spaniards all old ſoldiers, left there in garriſon : Capellius the Venetian Admirall vrging in vaine the right of the Venetians. Which thing ſo much grieued the Senat, (who euer had the ambitious Spaniard in ſuſpect, and now aſſured of him as an euill neighbour to their towne of Catarum) that repenting themſelus of the league with the Emperor,they decreed to ſue to Solyman for peace : which they afterwards eaſily obtained, for a ſhort ſpace, by Laurentius Grittus their Dukes ſon, and by the helpe of Antonius Rincus the French Kings Embaſſador ; who then lying at Conſtantinople, in good time told the great Baſſa's, that the league the Venetians had made with the Emperour, was made without the conſent of the greateſt part of the Senat, and that war taken in hand againſt moſt of their wils.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing, Barbaruſſa put to ſea againe to haue relieued Caſtronovum : but being at ſea,many of his gallies were by the violence of a ſudden tempeſt driuen vpon the Acroceraunian rocks,and there caſt away. It is reported that he loſt there 20000 men, which with the broken pieces of his gallies were found almoſt all alongſt the coaſt of Dalmatia. This ſhipwracke being certainly knowne, Capellius would haue perſuaded Auria to haue preſently purſued Barbaruſſa ſo diſtreſſed : which motion Gonzaga wel liked, as a man deſirous by ſome notable exploit to recompence the diſgrace before receiued at Leucade. But Auria for diuers cauſes not liking of the matter,was ſo ſet down vpon his return to Italy, that he preſently hoiſed ſaile,leauing the Venetian Admirall in ſuch a rage,that he deteſted himſelfe,for ſubmitting himſelfe to another mans power ; and wiſhed the captains there preſent, neuer to ſubject themſelues to the command of a ſtranger, foraſmuch as that Genoway, either vpon cowardiſe or malicious mind, as an old enemy to the Venetian State,would not proſecute ſo manifeſt a victory,but put vp ſo ſhamefull a diſgrace as he had before receiued. But of all this Auria made ſmall reckoning,referring all that he both ſaid and did, ſo far vnto the Emperors commodity,that Valerius Vrſinus a noble gentleman then ſeruing in the Venetian pay,merrily ſaid,That Auria had done nothing but wiſely and politickly,in ſetting the Venetians together by the ears with the Turks,and opening a gate for a long war,whether the Venetians would or not : ſo as the emperor himſelf could not haue better wiſhed,and that without the loſſe of one gally. For it was thought by many, that the long wars betwixt the Turks and the Venetians would ſort to the great good of the emperor; when as the Venetians worne out and ſpent with thoſe long and chargeable wars againſt ſo mighty an enemy, ſhould be ſtripped of their lands and territories either by force,or ſome hard compoſition wrung from them by neceſſity.

Auria neglecting to purſue Barbaruſſa, returnes into Italy, to the griefe of the Venetian Admirall.

Caſtronovum thus taken, and Sarmentus with a garriſon of foure thouſand Spaniards there placed, as is aforeſaid, and the Chriſtian fleet diſſolued, Solyman tooke the matter ſo grieuouſly, that he determined to beſiege it againe both by ſea and land : and in his fury, cauſed

Naupli-

A Nauplium and Epidaurus, two of the Venetian cities in the country of Peloponeſus, to bee ſtraitly beſieged. Yet tooke he ſingular pleaſure, that Barbaruſſa his Admirall, in all reſpects worſe furniſhed, had driuen out of the ſea the great fleet of the Chriſtians, which he before that time had made too great account of. Wherefore in the beginning of the Spring, which was in the yeare 1539, Barbaruſſa by his commandement repaired againe his fleet, and notably furniſhed it with all maner of warlike prouiſion; manning his gallies for the moſt part with Ianizaries and other ſuch ſelect ſoldiers. With this fleet Barbaruſſa (Summer now wel come on) departed out of the Helleſpontus, and came to the bay Riſonicus; at which time alſo Vlames the Perſian then Gouernor of Boſna, ſhewed himſelfe with his forces vpon the mountaines, as he had in charge from Solyman. Barbaruſſa before he entred the ſtreits of the bay, ſent before B him Dragut and Corſetus, two notable pirats, with thirty galliots, who landing their men neere vnto Caſtronovum (as they were commanded) were valiantly encountered by Sarmentus with his Spaniards, and forced againe to their galliots, many of the Turks being ſlaine and taken priſoners. After that came Barbaruſſa with 90 gallies, and 3 tal ſhips which carried the artillery for battery and other neceſſary prouiſion for the campe; where he ſpent three daies landing his great ordnance and caſting vp trenches, which could not be done but by night by reaſon of the continuall ſhot out of the Towne: wherewith the Spaniards had in that three daies ſpace ſlaine aboue 1000 Turks: amongſt whom was Agis Hariadenus, who had made himſelfe as it were a king at Taiorea, a city neere Tripolis in Africa; whoſe death much grieued Barbaruſſa, as one of his moſt antient and beſt friends. At length Barbaruſſa hauing caſt vp his C trenches, landed foure and fifty great pieces of artillery for battery; whereof he gaue a fourth part to Vlemas to batter the towne on the North ſide, whileſt he in the meane time, in three diuers places battered the Eaſt ſide, and Salec from ſea with ten gallies, did morning and euening batter another part of the wall. Whileſt Sarmentus was thus in ſo many places aſſailed, and did what was poſſible to haue repaired the breaches; the Turks by force tooke one of the towers, where after they had diſplaied their enſignes, they from thence with their ſhot ſore troubled the Spaniards. At the ſame time alſo, Vlemas had made a breach, and was ready on the other ſide of the city to enter. In which extremities, Sarmentus ſeeing no means longer to defend the city, commanded the hurt ſoldiers to get them into the caſtle below, and the reſt with him to take the market place, there to die together like men: where the Turks D ſtreightway breaking in on euery ſide vpon them, made a moſt cruell and bloudy fight, wherein the Spaniards ouerwhelmed with ſhot, and the multitude of their enemies, were ſlain almoſt euery man. Sarmentus wounded in the face with three arrowes, and wearied with long fight, ſeeing Sancius Fria a captain ready to fly, ſharpely reproued him, and catching him by the hand, made him there to tarry by it, vntill they were both together ſlaine. Many valiant captaines were there loſt, whoſe names for breuity I omit. Aloyſius Arius, and certaine other captaines who together with the wounded ſouldiers were got into the caſtle, ſeeing no means to defend the place, yeelded themſelues: whom Barbaruſſa according to his promiſe, tooke to mercy in ſparing their liues, yet carried them away into captiuity to Conſtantinople. The dead body of Sarmentus could not be knowne amongſt ſo many heaps ef the dead, although Barbaruſſa had E cauſed moſt diligent ſearch to be made for it, and offered great ſums of mony and liberty alſo, to whoſoeuer could recouer it; being deſirous to haue ſent his head for a Preſent to Solyman. Barbaruſſa proud of this victory, began forthwith to gape after Cattarus a City of the Venetians in the bottome of the ſame bay; and thereupon writ threatning letters to Ioannes Bembus one of the Venetian Senators then Gouernour of the city, preſently to deliuer the city; which he would (as he ſaid) otherwiſe aſſault by force. Whereunto Bembus anſwered againe by letters, that in ſo doing he ſhould violate the league lately made with Solyman, and that he ſhould find him ready by force to repell his forces. Wherewith Barbaruſſa diſpleaſed, ſent certaine gallies into the bottome of the bay; who diſcharging certain great pieces at the city, made ſhew as if they had come to beſiege it. At whom Bembus as a man of good courage F cauſed as many moe like pieces to be diſcharged, and ſhewed his men vpon the wals: Which thing Barbaruſſa perceiuing ſtaid his courſe, and calling backe his gallies, returned to Caſtronovum, from whence (better appeaſed with Preſents afterwards ſent from Bembus) he departed out of that bay.

This ſhipwracke being certainly knowne, Capellius would haue perſuaded Auria to haue preſently purſued Barbaruſſa ſo diſtreſſed: which motion Gonzaga wel liked, as a man deſirous by ſome notable exploit to recompence the diſgrace before receiued at Leucade. But Auria for diuers cauſes not liking of the matter, was ſo ſet down vpon his return to Italy, that he preſently hoiſed ſaile, leauing the Venetian Admirall in ſuch a rage, that he deteſted himſelfe, for ſubmitting himſelfe to another mans power; and wiſhed the captains there preſent, neuer to ſubiect themſelues to the command of a ſtranger, foraſmuch as that Genoway, either vpon cowardiſe or malicious mind, as an old enemy to the Venetian State, would not proſecute ſo manifeſt a victory, but put vp ſo ſhamefull a diſgrace as he had before receiued. But of all this Auria made ſmall reckoning, referring all that he both ſaid and did, ſo far vnto the Emperors commodity, that Valerius Vrſinus a noble gentleman then ſeruing in the Venetian pay, merrily ſaid, That Auria had done nothing but wiſely and politickly, in ſetting the Venetians together by the ears with the Turks, and opening a gate for a long war, whether the Venetians would or not: ſo as the emperor himſelf could not haue better wiſhed, and that without the loſſe of one gally. For it was thought by many, that the long wars betwixt the Turks and the Venetians would ſort to the great good of the emperor; when as the Venetians worne out and ſpent with thoſe long and chargeable wars againſt ſo mighty an enemy, ſhould be ſtripped of their lands and territories either by force, or ſome hard compoſition wrung from them by neceſſity.

Caſtronovum thus taken, and Sarmentus with a garriſon of foure thouſand Spaniards there placed, as is aforeſaid, and the Chriſtian fleet diſſolued, Solyman tooke the matter ſo grieuouſly, that he determined to beſiege it againe both by ſea and land: and in his fury, cauſed

A Nauplium and Epidaurus, two of the Venetian cities in the country of Peloponeſus, to bee ſtraitly beſieged. Yet tooke he ſingular pleaſure, that Barbaruſſa his Admirall, in all reſpects worſe furniſhed, had driuen out of the ſea the great fleet of the Chriſtians, which he before that time had made too great account of. Whereſore in the beginning of the Spring, which was in the yeare 1539, Barbaruſſa by his commandement repaired againe his fleet, and notably furniſhed it with all maner of warlike prouiſion; manning his gallies for the moſt part with Ianizaries and other ſuch ſelect ſoldiers. With this fleet Barbaruſſa (Summer now wel come on) departed out of the Helleſpontus, and came to the bay Riſonicus; at which time alſo Vlames the Perſian then Gouernor of Boſna, ſhewed himſelfe with his forces vpon the mountaines, as he had in charge from Solyman. Barbaruſſa before he entred the ſtreits of the bay, ſent before B him Dragus and Corſetus, two notable pirats, with thirty galliots, who landing their men neere vnto Caſtronovum (as they were commanded) were valiantly encountered by Sarmentus with his Spaniards, and forced againe to their galliots, many of the Turks being ſlaine and taken priſoners. After that came Barbaruſſa with 90 gallies, and 3 tal ſhips which carried the artillery for battery and other neceſſary prouiſion for the campe; where he ſpent three daies landing his great ordnance and caſting vp trenches, which could not be done but by night by reaſon of the continuall ſhot out of the Towne: wherewith the Spaniards had in that three daies ſpace ſlaine aboue 1000 Turks: amongſt whom was Agis Hariadenus, who had made himſelfe as it were a king at Taiorea, a city neere Tripolis in Africa; whoſe death much grieued Barbaruſſa, as one of his moſt antient and beſt friends. At length Barbaruſſa hauing caſt vp his trenches, C landed foure and fifty great pieces of artillery for battery; whereof he gaue a fourth part to Vlemas to batter the towne on the North ſide, whileſt he in the meane time, in three diuers places battered the Eaſt ſide, and Salec from ſea with ten gallies, did morning and euening batter another part of the wall. Whileſt Sarmentus was thus in ſo many places aſſailed, and did what was poſſible to haue repaired the breaches; the Turks by force tooke one of the towers, where after they had diſplaied their enſignes, they from thence with their ſhot ſore troubled the Spaniards. At the ſame time alſo, Vlemas had made a breach, and was ready on the other ſide of the city to enter. In which extremities, Sarmentus ſeeing no means longer to defend the city, commanded the hurt ſoldiers to get them into the caſtle below, and the reſt with him to take the market place, there to die together like men: where the Turks ſtreightway D breaking in on euery ſide vpon them, made a moſt cruell and bloudy fight, wherein the Spaniards ouerwhelmed with ſhot, and the multitude of their enemies, were ſlain almoſt euery man. Sarmentus wounded in the face with three arrowes, and wearied with long fight, ſeeing Sancius Fria a captain ready to fly, ſharpely reproued him, and catching him by the hand, made him there to tarry by it, vntill they were both together ſlaine. Many valiant captaines were there loſt, whoſe names for breuity I omit. Aloyſius Arius, and certaine other captaines who together with the wounded ſouldiers were got into the caſtle, ſeeing no means to defend the place, yeelded themſelues: whom Barbaruſſa according to his promiſe, tooke to mercy in ſparing their liues, yet carried them away into captiuity to Conſtantinople. The dead body of Sarmentus could not be knowne amongſt ſo many heaps ef the dead, although Barbaruſſa had E cauſed moſt diligent ſearch to be made for it, and offered great ſums of mony and liberty alſo, to whoſoeuer could recouer it; being deſirous to haue ſent his head for a Preſent to Solyman. Barbaruſſa proud of this victory, began forthwith to gape after Cattarus a City of the Venetians in the bottome of the ſame bay; and thereupon writ threatning letters to Ioannes Bembus one of the Venetian Senators then Gouernour of the city, preſently to deliuer the city; which he would (as he ſaid) otherwiſe aſſault by force. Whereunto Bembus anſwered againe by letters, that in ſo doing he ſhould violate the league lately made with Solyman, and that he ſhould find him ready by force to repell his forces. Wherewith Barbaruſſa diſpleaſed, ſent certaine gallies into the bottome of the bay; who diſcharging certain great pieces at the city, made ſhew as if they had come to beſiege it. At whom Bembus as a man of good courage F cauſed as many moe like pieces to be diſcharged, and ſhewed his men vpon the wals: Which thing Barbaruſſa perceiuing ſtaid his courſe, and calling backe his gallies, returned to Caſtronovum, from whence (better appeaſed with Preſents afterwards ſent from Bembus) he departed out of that bay.

pacified, and ſuch friendſhip (at leaſtwiſe in ſhew) now growne betwixt theſe two great Princes, that moſt men thought that all other quarrels laid aſide, they would now at length with vnited forces goe againſt the great and dangerous enemy of Chriſtendome: which opinion not altogether of the wiſer ſort beleeued, was yet at this time wonderfully confirmed by many extraordinary and rare courteſies then paſſing betweene them, which concerne not this Hiſtory; as alſo, in that two of their moſt famous captains, Alphonſus Vaſtius, and Hanebald, were as it were with one conſent by them both ſent embaſſadors to Venice: to haue drawn the Venetians into the confederation of that war againſt the Turke. Which two renowned captains comming to Venice, moſt gallantly accompanied, were by Landus the Duke, and the whole State, with great magnificence receiued, the people after their wonted manner flocking together in euery place to behold them ſo noble captaines ſent from ſuch mighty Princes; but eſpecially Vaſtins, whoſe fame hauing many times before filled their eares, made them now the more deſirous to ſatisfie their eies alſo with the beholding of his tall and comely perſon. Which two famous captains admitted into the Senate, for that purpoſe fully aſſembled, and audience giuen: Vaſtius ariſing from the Dukes ſide, in theſe or like words deliuered their embaſſage.

Vaſtius his Oration to the Venetian Senat.

It is come to paſſe (as I ſuppoſe) by the great prouidence of Almighty God, and of all the Diuine powers (moſt noble Duke and honourable Senators) that two of the moſt mighty Kings of Europe, who of late had of long time made mortall wars one vpon another, touched with the zeale of religion, are become great friends: vndoubtedly to that purpoſe only, that hauing made a firme peace, they may bring ſuch a generall quietneſſe to the long troubled and afflicted ſtate of Chriſtendome, as beſt beſeemeth their greatneſſe; and taking in hand a ſacred war, to reuenge ſo many calamities receiued from the Infidell. That this might be made knowne vnto you (moſt noble Venetians) theſe mighty Monarchs haue ſent vs hither in good time to kindle in you the like zeale, wherewith it is well knowne you haue alwaies for the honour of your State bin inflamed: for you of all others, which are of ſuch power and valour at ſea, they wiſh for, as their fellowes and confederats in this ſacred war and hoped victory; and thinke you worthy, which ſhould enjoy the eſpeciall fruit of all that labour. Foraſmuch as the Chriſtian forces once renewed, and ſo great and ſtrong a fleet once aſſembled, euery man ſeeth that the Turks muſt needs be too weake: although they brag, That they carried away the victory of late at Acteum. when as they then eſcaped the victorious hands of our men, not by their owne valour, but by the vnexpected hap of a ſudden ſtorme. For all the powers of heauen and earth, and of the ſea alſo, will be propitious vnto vs, vniting ſo great forces, in regard of our ſacred religion; and will ſo take away the hearts of the Infidels, that they ſhall learne to be ouercome. As for our land forces, we are to hope nothing but well, foraſmuch as vnto thoſe which the Emperour of late brought into the field at Vienna, and cauſed the Turkiſh Emperour to fly, ſhall be joyned not onely all the horſemen and infantery of France (a wonderfull ſtrength) but Sigiſmund alſo King of Polonia will without delay bring forth his armies, wherewith he hath beene vſed in the quarrell of the Chriſtian Religion happily to fight againſt the Infidels: ſo that it is not to be doubted of a moſt certaine and aſſured victory. Wherefore the victorious Emperour and moſt Chriſtian King Francis moſt inſtantly requeſt you to enter into the like godly cogitations, conceiued for the generall good of the Chriſtian name, and religiouſly to embrace the hope of a moſt true and glorious victory: and further exhort you, by a wholeſome decree to auert your religious and couragious hearts from the friendſhip of the Infidels: for it may worthily ſeeme vnto your moſt honourable minds, a moſt foule and ſhamefull thing, to haue renewed your league, and to haue preferred an infamous and vncertaine peace, before a moſt religious and juſt war. Neither doth it beſeeme this moſt wealthy State to be terrified from that which is good and right, with any charges of war, be they neuer ſo great: for if we ſhall once ouercome, which is incident to this preſent and long wiſhed occaſion, we ſhall by the profit of one victory, either by ſea or land, to your incomparable praiſe, recompence all the loſſes by vs in former times receiued.

The anſwere of the duke to Vaſtius.

Whereunto the Duke in the name of the whole State anſwered, That there neuer happened any thing at any time vnto the Venetian Senat more honorable, for the manner of the embaſſage, or for the publike ſecurity of their ſtate, more to be deſired than the hope of ſuch a peace: after that two moſt mighty kings by two ſuch famous captains their embaſſadors, did certifie them of their attonement & aſſured peace, moſt glorious to themſelues, to their eternal praiſe, whole-

A wholeſome alſo to the Venetian State, beſet with ſo many dangers, and wonderfully to be wiſhed for of all other Princes of Chriſtendome, if they would ſincerely and religiouſly with their forces by common conſent vnited, reſolue vpon that ſacred war: for then would not the Venetians be wanting to themſelues or the Chriſtian common-weale, but end the league they had with the Turke, not with a diſhonourable peace, but with armes and victory. Wherefore it was to be requeſted of Almighty God by praier, That thoſe puiſſant Kings would with religious and happy euent ſpeedily and ſeriouſly fulfill all that hope of peace, which they had by their mutuall diſcourſes and embracings in ſhew promiſed vnto the World.

In few daies after, certain of the ſelect Senators ſitting in counſell, after the manner of that State, called the embaſſadors vnto them, and asked them, Whether they knew any thing of the B articles and capitulations wherin that league and confederation was to be concluded? and by the way, Whether they thought the Emperour in regard of that peace would giue vnto the French kings ſon the Dukedom of Millan, as was reported? Whereunto Hanebald the French embaſſador anſwering nothing, Vaſtius ſaid, that he knew nothing more, but that the two great Princes had agreed of betwixt themſelues, and that the Emperour had deſired the peace, as one willing to help the afflicted and declining ſtate of the Chriſtian common-weale: which thing any man might ſee could not be effected or brought to paſſe, but the Emperour muſt in many things yeeld to the requeſts of the French King, and redeeme his good will: for the noble mind (ſaid he) worthy Senators, can eaſily make light of the greateſt loſſe of his owne things, when it foreſeeth a large way opened thereby to eternall fame and glory. Theſe words C were very glorious and gratious to the hearers: but they, as men of great experience, could not let it ſinke in their minds, that the Emperor whom they had often deeply ſounded, would euer part with the Dukedome of Millan, which only thing the French King required, and had for the recouering thereof vnfortunately ſtriuen almoſt 20 yeares, to the trouble and diſquiet of a great part of the World. The nobility and authority of this embaſſage more moued the Senat than did the other former Embaſſadors, Didaco Mendoza a Spaniard, and Gulielmus Pellicerius a Frenchman, then both preſent: yet was it much ſuſpected by the Venetians, becauſe it contained no certaine reſolution, but only the bare hope of a future peace; ſo that it was by many men ſuppoſed to be but a matter deuiſed to deceiue others, and to ſerue the Emperours turne to his great profit. Yet all the cunning ſeemed to reſt in this point, That the Venetians D led on with the hope of this league, ſhould neglect the renewing of the league they had the yeare before taken with Solyman, which was now almoſt expired. Vpon which vncertainty of other mens reſolutions, the graue Senators thought too dangerous a matter to depend.

Vaſtius his anſwer to the demand of the Venetian Senators.

Vpon this queſtion of this new league and confederation to be made with theſe Chriſtian Princes againſt the Turke, the Senat was wonderfully diuided: ſome fauouring the Emperors requeſt, enueighed againſt the renewing of that ſhameful league with the Infidels, which they ſaid was nothing els, but as much as in them lay to betray vnto them the other parts of Chriſtendom, and eſpecially Italy, deſtitute of their help, and yet not to be obtained without great charge; and with many reaſons vrged the honorable confederation with theſe Chriſtian Princes: others of a deeper reach, conſidering what infinit harmes they had from time to time E receiued by falling out with the Turks, & ſuſpecting alſo the Emperors drift; and joining therunto the conſideration of the great dearth then reigning in the city, which was not to be relieued but out of Macedonia & Grecia, the Turks countries; the emperor hauing at that time as it were of purpoſe impoſed ſo great a cuſtome vpon all corne to be tranſported out of Sicily, that the very cuſtome came to as much as both the price of the corne and the fraight together: all which miſchiefs they ſaid were to be preuented by renewing the league with Solyman. This matter was with great heat debated in the Senat too & fro, either part hauing great fautours: ſo that the Senators ſpent almoſt whole Winter nights in the court in diſcourſing and conſulting what were beſt to be don: but whatſoeuer was there ſaid or decreed, was forthwith by one of the factions or other made known, not only to the Embaſſadors preſent in the city, F but by letters alſo diſcouered into prouinces far off: a thing neuer before in that ſtate known, which had euer vſed as it were with a religious ſilence to keep ſecret whatſoeuer was there decreed. Which thing Marcus Foſcarus, an old Senator and a man of great wiſedom, perceiuing, ſaid openly, That the ſtate was betraied by the multitude and corruption of voices, and muſt needs ſhortly periſh, if it were not ſpeedily committed to the graue and faithfull judgment of

The Venetian Senators diuerſly affected towards the confederation with the Emperour and the French King, againſt Solyman.

Foſcarus a graue Senatour.

ſome

Foſcarus diſgraced by the multitude.

ſome few : for there were almoſt two hundred of them which gaue voices, reducing the multitude to the number of fifty, who for their experience and loue toward their country, were holden for men of greateſt grauity and ſecrecy : ſo was the madneſſe of many ſtaied by the diſcretion of a few. But Foſcarus ſhortly after fell into ſuch hatred of the multitude, grieuing to be as light headed men without diſcretion, ſo excluded out of the counſell ; that he was by the voices of the multitude firſt thruſt out of the counſell himſelfe, and by them kept a great while after from all the preferments and honours of the city : being indeed one of the graueſt Senatours, and a man of deepeſt judgement. Which diſgrace turned afterward to his great honour and credit, as one that had foreſeene much, after they were once found out and condemned which had traiterouſly reuealed the ſecrets of the State.

The Venetians ſend Aloyſius Badoerius their Embaſſadour to Solyman, to conclude a peace.

But this long conſultation concerning the confederation, came to this end, That the Senators doubting the vnion of thoſe two great princes, and yet willing to expect the euent, decreed forthwith to ſend three Embaſſadors ; whereof two ſhould be ſent to the Emperour and the French king to diſcouer their deſignes ; and the third, which was Aloyſius Badoerius, a wiſe and well ſpoken man, was with all ſpeed diſpatched away to Solyman, to preuent the fame of the diſtruſt to be conceiued of the agreement of theſe great Chriſtian Princes, and if he could by any means, to ſpare for no coſt, to ſaue vnto the Venetians their cities of Nauplium and Epidaurus, which Solyman required of them before he would grant them peace. Which if it could not be obtained of the proud and crafty tyrant, then to yeeld vnto neceſſity, and to conclude a peace with him vpon any conditions : which courſe the Decem-viri thought to be moſt expedient for the State : yet concerning the yeelding vp of the cities, they gaue him ſecret inſtructions and warrant, fearing forſooth the force and tumult of the headſtrong multitude, who if they had knowne any ſuch thing, would vndoubtedly thereupon haue taken occaſion to haue croſſed and ouerthrowne that moſt wholeſome decree : for there was no doubt, that if they had delaied the matter, and ſought for peace too late, but that Solyman would vpon another mans weakneſſe and neceſſity haue increaſed his vnſatiable deſire, and not granted them peace, being brought low and forſaken, except they would deliuer vnto him the Iſlands of Cephalenia, Zacinthus, and Corcyra, a matter no leſſe grieuous than the deſtruction of the very city of Venice it ſelfe. So that the great Embaſſadors Vaſtius and Hanebald, who came of purpoſe to haue hindered the league with the Turke, by their great diligence wrought nothing more effectually, than that the Venetians the better foreſeeing the danger of their ſtate, ſhould as they did, make haſt to conclude the ſame: for it falleth out in mens purpoſes & actions, That a good and happy ſucceſſe otherwiſe well hoped for, is oftentimes marred with too much diligence and care. Neither was it any doubt, but that Hanebald was ſent by the French King but for faſhion ſake, and ſecretly vnderhand by Pellicerius the old Embaſſador, perſuaded the Venetians to haſten the concluſion of a peace with Solyman. Which as Badoerius their embaſſador was carefully ſoliciting the matter at Conſtantinople, & being loth to yeeld the ſtrong cities which Solyman required, offering vnto him in ſtead of them a great ſum of mony : Solyman took him vp with threatning words as a ſhamefull diſſembler, earneſtly proteſting, That he would neuer grant him peace, without the yeelding of thoſe cities, rehearſing vnto him the moſt ſecreteſt points of his embaſſage, and how that he was authoriſed from the Decem-viri to yeeld them vnto him : which thing the Embaſſador did little thinke Solyman had knowne. Wherfore Badoerius ſo ſhamefully reproued and ſtanding in doubt of his life, ſeeing the greateſt ſecrets of his embaſſage reuealed to Solyman and his Baſſaes, was glad to accept of peace, by yeelding vnto him Nauplium and Epidaurus, two cities in Peloponeſus, and with them Nadium and Labrania, two caſtles of Dalmatia, to the great griefe of the whole Senat : for granting whereof the common people ignorant of the ſecret decree of the Decem-viri, and ſuppoſing that Badoerius had giuen away that which he had no authority to giue, were ſo inraged againſt him at his returne, that there was much ado to ſaue the guiltleſſe man from exile, and his goods from confiſcation, although the traitors were then knowne which had diſcouered the ſecrets of the ſtate vnto the Turks. Theſe were Mapheus Leonius a Senatour, and Conſtantinus Cobatius, Secretary to the colledge of the Decem-viri, and Franciſcus Valerius, one of the Senatours baſe ſonnes, the traiterous diſperſer of the Turks mony for the corruption of others : who with other his complices were for the ſame fact hanged in the market place, when as Leonius and Cobatius were a little before fled into France.

The moſt ſecret decree of the Venetian Senat made knowne to Solyman.

1540

A peace concluded betwixt the Venetians and Solyman.

The traitours which reuealed the ſecrets of the Venetian ſtate to Solyman, executed.

Abont

A About the ſame time, which was in the yeare of our Lord 1540, died Ioannes Sepuſius King of Hungary, Solymans tributary; after whoſe death enſued great wars in Hungary, and the lamentable ſubuerſion of that flouriſhing kingdome: for the better conceiuing whereof, it ſhal not be amiſſe with as much breuity as the plaineneſſe of the hiſtory will permit, to open the cauſes and grounds of the endleſſe calamities which afterwards enſued, and neuer tooke end, vntill that warlike kingdome was to the great weakning of Chriſtendome, vtterly ſubuerted.

King Ferdinand and this tributary King Iohn, had with like deſire of peace and quietneſſe, made betweene them a league, profitable to them both as their eſtates then ſtood, rather than honorable, yet moſt welcome to the Hungarians, who diuided into factions, and hauing followed ſome the one king, and ſome the other, enjoyed neuertheleſſe their lands and goods by B the benefit of this peace; the townes and caſtles being ſtill kept by them in whoſe poſſeſſion they then were at the making of the peace. In the capitulations of which peace, it was compriſed, That Ferdinand ſhould from thenceforth call Iohn by the name of a king; whereas before he had both in his common talke and letters called him by the name of a Vayuod only. It was alſo expreſly ſet downe in the ſame articles of peace, and ſubſcribed by the hands of diuers of the nobility of Hungary, That if king Iohn ſhould die, king Ferdinand ſhould ſucceed him in the whole kingdome of Hungary: Which condition was ſuppreſſed and kept very ſecret for feare of Solyman, who accounted of that kingdome as of his owne, gotten by law of armes, and beſtowed vpon king Iohn as vpon his vaſſaile: neither was it to haue been thought, that if he ſhould haue known thereof (being of a hauty mind by nature, and not able to indure C any injury) he would haue ſuffered that kingdome, got and defended with ſo great danger and coſt, to be by the Will of an vnthankfull man, transferred vnto his enemy.

This matter of ſo great importance, was (as it is reported) by Hieronymus Laſcus embaſſador for king Ferdinand to Conſtantinople, reuealed vnto Solyman and the Baſſaes, to bring King Iohn into hatred. So much did this noble gentleman, for his rare vertues otherwiſe greatly to haue beene commended, yeeld vnto his griefe, and deſire of reuenge: when after the death of Aloyſius Grittus, he fell from the friendſhip of king Iohn, being (as is before declared) by him committed to priſon, and hardly afterwards inlarged, at the requeſt of king Sigiſmund. Whereupon Solyman being exceedingly angry with king Iohn, called him vnthankfull churle, and turning himſelfe about to Lutzis Baſſa his brother in law, ſaid, How vnworthily doe theſe two D Chriſtian kings weare their crownes vpon their faithleſſe heads, who as ſhamefull deceiuers are not afraid, either for worldly ſhame or feare of God, for their profit to falſifie their faith? But king Iohn vnderſtanding therof, & wonderfully fearing his owne eſtate, did by good friends and rich Preſents, pacifie Solyman againe, laying all the blame vpon king Ferdinand, as better able to beare it. Not long after, king Iohn hauing ſet his kingdome in good order, and ſtrongly fortified the city of Buda; being now far ſtriken in yeares, at the earneſt requeſt of moſt of the nobility of Hungary, and other his beſt friends, married Iſabella the daughter of Sigiſmund king of Polonia, a gracious lady and of great ſpirit: which King Sigiſmund, had long before married Barbara king Iohns ſiſter, after whoſe death he maried the lady Bona Sfortia, the daughter of Ioannes Galleacius Duke of Millain, by whom he had this lady Iſabella whom king Iohn E now married. Which marriage Solyman liked well of, hauing many times by way of talke before condemned the ſingle life of the king: but King Ferdinand liked thereof nothing at all, plainly foreſeeing, that the Hungarians (if the king ſhould chance to haue a ſon) would forthwith looke vpon him as their naturall king, and reject himſelfe as but a ſtranger.

The ſecret confederation betwixt king Ferdinand & king Iohn reuealed.

King Iohn in his old yeares marieth Iſabella King Sigiſmunds daughter.

This yong queene in ſhort time (as he had feared) conceiued with child, and was now very big: when king Iohn was inforced to make an expedition in perſon himſelfe againſt Maylat (famous for the death of Aloyſius Grittus) and Balas both Gouernours of Tranſyluania: whereof Maylat not contented with the name of Vayuod or Gouernor, ſought to make himſelfe King. But Solyman deteſting the impudent arrogancy of the faithleſſe man, and hating him for the death of Grittus, and the Turks ſlaine with him, aduertiſed king Iohn of all the matter, wiſhing F him to be more circumſpect, whom he truſted with the gouernment of ſo great and rich a country. So Maylat ſhamefully rejected of Solyman, and out of hope of a kingdome, fearing alſo to be thruſt quite out of his gouernment by King Iohn, thought it beſt for his owne ſafety to raiſe vp all the prouince into rebellion, and to take part with king Ferdinand: which thing Ferdinand by his diuers agents ſecretly furthered to the vttermoſt. For theſe two Kings, although they were at peace the one with the other, and in words and ſhew made ſemblance of G friendſhip, yet in heart they enuied and hated each other, as if they ſhould preſently haue waged war. At that ſame time king Iohn exacted of his ſubjects, and eſpecially of them of Tranſiluania, a great ſum of mony, to pay the Turks his tribute, then two yeares behind: Which thing ſerued Maylat and his complices, as a fit occaſion to raiſe the people into rebellion; perſuading them, that there was no reaſon to pay vnto the Turke ſuch a tribute, as would ſerue wel to wage ten yeres honorable war againſt him: ſo that by that, and ſuch like perſuaſions, all the prouince was in an vprore, little differing from manifeſt rebellion. To appeaſe theſe dangerous troubles thus ariſing, king Iohn ſent certaine of his chiefe nobility and beſt captaines with a great power into Tranſyluania, following after himſelfe in his chariot, not yet well recouered of his late ſickeneſſe. Theſe noblemen entering in two places into Tranſyluania, and H ſcouring vp and downe the country, had in ſhort time ſo vſed the matter, that what by force, what by policy, the tumult was well pacified, and diuers of the chiefe offenders worthily executed.

Maylat the ambitious author of this ſedition, not able to hold the field againſt the king, and ſeeing himſelfe beſet on euery ſide with his enemies, retired himſelfe with all his wealth into a towne called Fogaras, a place of great ſtrength, which the kings power ſhortly after hardly beſieged: the king himſelfe then lying at Sibynium, the chiefe city of Tranſyluania, about a mile diſtant from Fogaras, ſicke of an ague, wherinto he was againe fallen through too much care and paines taken in trauelling in that hot time of the yeare, the daies being then at the longeſt. Whileſt he thus lay ſicke at Sibynium, and his army faſt by at the ſiege of Fogaras, newes was brought vnto him from the court, That the Queene his wife was deliuered of a I faire young ſon: which was no ſooner bruted abroad, but the Hungarians as men ouerjoyed, came flocking to the court where the king lay, diſcharging their pieces in triumph, with all other ſignes of joy and mirth they could poſſibly deuiſe: the noblemen came from the camp to rejoyce with the king, and all the army was filled with gladneſſe. And for the greater ſolemnity of this ſo common a joy, a royall feaſt was prepared, which the noblemen would needs haue the king to honour with his preſence, though he were thereto vnwilling, being as yet but a little recouered: howbeit yeelding to their importunity, he ſuffered himſelfe to be ouerruled and brought to the feaſt by them, which was vnto him the merrieſt and the laſt that euer he made: for willing to ſhew his inward joy, and to content his nobility there preſent, he forgot himſelfe, and eat and dranke more liberally than was for the health of his weake body: K whereby the feauer which had but a little before left him, was againe renewed, in ſuch ſort, as that he well perceiued he could not long endure. Wherefore feeling his end to draw faſt on, he made his Will, appointing his yong ſon to be his heire, whom he committed to the tuition of George Biſhop of Veradium, and Peter Vicche a noble gentleman and his neere kinſman, vntill he came to age: requeſting the reſt of the noblemen to prefer his ſon in the ſucceſſion of the kingdom, before a ſtranger; telling them, That Solyman would vndoubtedly take vpon him the protection both of the kingdome and of his ſonne, if they would in time ſend Embaſſadors vnto him with preſents, and promiſe for his ſon, that he ſhould reigne as his tributary, as he had done before: and ſo preſently after died.

Queene Iſabella deliuered of a ſonne.

The death of king Iohn.

This king was of a courteous and gentle nature, bountifull, and in all his doings juſt, of no L fierce and rough diſpoſition, as the Hungarians commonly are, but of a moſt ciuill behauiour, garniſhed with good letters, and thorowly ſchooled in the diuers chances of both fortunes: not meaſuring his actions by the ſtrength of his power, but by the exact rule of diſcretion; for in time of buſineſſe no man was more circumſpect or vigilant than he, nor in time of recreation any man more courteous or pleaſant. He vſed oftentimes to ſay, That the fauor and loue of valiant men gotten by bounty and courteſie, was the beſt treaſures of a Prince; for that courteous and thankfull men, did oftentimes in ſome one worthy piece of ſeruice, plentifully repay whatſoeuer had been beſtowed vpon them: as for ſuch as were vnthankefull, they did to their ſhame beare the teſtimony of another mans vertue.

The honourable ſaying of king Iohn.

The kings death was kept ſecret vntill ſuch time as the noblemen had agreed with Maylat, M that he ſhould take an oath of his faithfull allegiance to the king, and his ſon his lawful heire, and ſo ſtill to injoy his former place & gouernment: which offer Maylat gladly accepted. Then calling together the counſell, it was decreed to ſend the ſame Embaſſage to Solyman, which was appointed the old king yet liuing. So were preſently diſpatched away two moſt honourable

A ble Embaſſador, Ioannes Exechius Biſhop of Quinque Eccleſiæ, and Stephanus Verbetius the Chancelor, a man of great years; carying with them ten boles of pure gold curiouſly wrought, 600 of ſiluer gilt and ingrauen, forty pieces of purple ſilk & cloth of gold for Turks gowns, and 50 ℔ of coined gold to be paid in the name of two years tribute. Which Embaſſadours paſſing directly from Sibynium ouer Danubius into Seruia, and ſo trauelling thorow Thracia, came to Conſtantinople. In the meane time the dead body of the King was with much heauines carried from Sibynium to Alba Regalis, moſt of the army following it, and there with great ſolemnitie buried. After this the yong king was chriſtned and called Stephen, and there preſently crowned with the antient Crown of king Stephen, who firſt erected that Kingdom, and without which the Hungarians neuer accounted their Kings lawfully crowned. Yet B the Royal dignity was by common conſent of the Nobility giuen vnto the Queen; with condition, that in al publique writings the names of the ſon and the mother ſhould be joined, and the Kings mony coined with the ſame inſcription. But the chief authority reſted in George the Biſhop, for he was Treaſurer, and had at his command the caſtles & ſtrong holds: yet were the ſoldiers with their enſignes and furniture at the deuotion of Valentinus Thuracus. In the middle betwixt theſe two was placed Peter Vicche the Kings kinſman, and by the old king appointed for one of the tutors of his yong ſon; ſuſpected of neither part, honored with the title of the high Conſtable. But becauſe the name of this George the Biſhop was moſt famous in this woful war which we are about to write, I thought it worth the labor to ſpeak ſomthing of his nature and diſpoſition; that it may be known to all poſterity, by what policie this war C was managed, & how this flouriſhing kingdom by the madnes of the Hungarians came into the Turks hands.

Embaſſadours ſent to Solymã out of Hungary

A yong childe crowned king of Hungary.

This George was born in Croatia, and brought vp from his youth in the houſe of king Iohn, where vertue and induſtry neuer wanted relief: when as he vnaduiſedly before had entred into the orders of a monaſticall life, and weary too late of the ſtreitnes therof, had forſaken his profeſſion.
Wherfore being of a very pleaſing nature, and ſtil following King Iohn driuen out of his kingdom, and long liuing in exile, he won ſuch credit and commendation for his fidelity, integrity, and ready counſel in the kings moſt doubtful & dangerous affairs, that after Sabacthus that worthy biſhop was by the trechery of Aloyſius Grittus ſlain at Baxovia, he obtained the great Biſhoprick of Veradium. After that, when he had ſtrengthned his credit with great D wealth, he always as a faithful counſellor ſwaied and happily ruled both the court and kingdom, to the profit of the king. But he was of ſuch a diuers and pliant nature, that performing in all actions all the parts of a moſt ready and excellent man, he ſeemed to be made of contrary qualities, and born to do any thing: for in ſaying of his prieſtly ſeruice, and performing the other ceremonies of the Chriſtian Religion, hee ſhewed, or at leaſt counterfeited ſuch a contrition in his deuout countenance and ſpeech, that a man would haue thought it could not poſſibly be the ſame man, who in the moſt weighty affairs both of war and peace, did moſt ſtoutly ſhew the wonderful force of a pregnant and couragious wit: for he vſed to keep whole companies of moſt excellent & ready horſmen, and would oft times come forth into the battel armed: he would with often banquets and rewards win the hearts of the ſoldiers, and after E the maner of great chieftains, maintain the honor and credit of his name, both with puniſhment & reward, as occaſion required. Beſide that, no man looked into the wealth of the kingdom more diligently than he: no man did to more profit let to farm the cuſtoms, old mines, feedings, and ſalt pits: no man could deuiſe finer means to raiſe mony, of all others the readieſt way to credit: inſomuch as King Iohn would confeſſe himſelf to reign by the ſpecial induſtry of that one man. And King Ferdinand would many times ſay, that he envied at King Iohn for nothing he had, but for one hooded fellow which was better for the defence of a kingdom than 1000 with helmets on their heads. Wherefore this Biſhop hauing taken vpon him the tuition of the yong King, was ſtil buſied in all the weighty cauſes of the kingdom both ciuil and martial. He labored with great care, that the Hungarians ſhould agree together in loue F and vnity, and did what he might, prouidently to foreſee, that no tumult or rebellion ſhould any where ariſe, wherby the beginning of the kingdom, yet but weak, might any way be troubled.
But king Ferdinand hearing of the death of king Iohn, thought it now a fit time for him to recouer again the kingdom of Hungary, which he had ſo long deſired. Wherto he was alſo George Biſhop of Veradium a notable man.

The Hungariã fugitiues perſuade K. Ferdinand to inuade Hungary.

the more prickt forward by the perſuaſion of Alexius Torſo, Ferentius Gnarus, Petrus Bachitius, Balthaſar Pamphilus, Francus Capolnates, Ianus Caſtellamphus, and Caſparus Seredus; all Noblemen G or gentlemen of great account in Hungary, who in the former troubles following the part of King Ferdinand againſt King Iohn, liued now in exile. Theſe all with one conſent told King Ferdinand, That now or neuer was the time wherin they might againe be reſtored vnto their country with honor, and that the war might that Autumn be diſpatched, if hee would make haſt, foraſmuch as Winter comming faſt on, would ſtay the comming of the Turks, and ſuch Noblemen of Hungary as took part with the Queen did not very wel agree together, beeing vnwilling to be commanded by George the Apoſtata Monk, who (as they ſaid) with great cunning and diſſimulation ſeducing the Queen, and poſſeſſing the treaſure, enioyed all alone the power of a King: and that they, which for taking part with the right, had long liued as baniſhed men, might now ſafely return into their country, & be honorably preferd by the queen; H the Biſhop (which all commanded) aſſuring them therof, if they would return vnto the yong Kings court, vnto their friends and antient houſes. But they had (as they ſaid) before giuen their faith vnto him, as to a vertuous and faithfull prince, whom they had preferred before one that was a natural Hungarian born: wherfore he ſhould do both vnaduiſedly and vnkindly, if letting ſlip the occaſion preſented, he ſhould defer to make war. For, what could be more diſhonorable to him ſo great a King, and alſo Emperour elect, than by ſhameful delay to forſake them, being noble & valiant gentlemen, which had followed his part, and were then ready with ſtrong troups of horſmen to do him the beſt ſeruice they could.

The German captains in like maner perſuaded him to take the matter in hand; who as martial men, expecting ſome one preferment, ſome another, in the Army, were deſirous of honor, I pay and prey, the chief comforts of their trauell and peril.

Laſchus perſuades K. Ferdinand to requeſt the Kingdom of Hungary of Solyman, rather thã ſeek it by force.

But Laſcus the Polonian (who in matters concerning peace and war ſaw more than all they, as he that knew the diſpoſitions of many Princes, and had ſeen the manners and faſhions of diuers Nations, hauing trauelled thorow a great part of the World, and oftentimes been an Embaſſadour in the Courts of the greateſt Princes) was of a contrary opinion, and told King Ferdinand plainly, That the Kingdome of Hungary was to be obtained rather by policie than by force, by crauing it at Solymans hands, to hold it of him as his his Tributary, as King Iohn had don.

K

For (ſaid he) that may by petition and fair entreatance be eaſily obtained of that heroical Prince (who in his vain humor oftentimes fondly ſeeketh after honour) which will neuer be got from him by force of arms. I know (ſaid he) Solymans haughty mind, and the proud diſpoſition of his Baſſa's: hee contemneth wealth, and is cloyed with ſo many kingdoms. But they vpon their vnſatiable couetouſneſſe and great pride, deſire nothing, nor perſuade him to nothing more than war. Wherefore it is good to beware, that that with the noiſe of this ſudden war you ſtir not vp the Turks, which lie ready as it were expecting ſuch an occaſion, which canot be withſtood but by the united forces of the Chriſtian Princes; which might by their general conſent be done, but that their eies blinded with fatall darknes, canot ſee it, and the vnitie of the Chriſtians now deſperat, ſeemeth by God reſerued for ſome better time: ſeeing that of late the Chriſtian Kings are fallen off, and canot agree vpon the long expected peace. Is not (ſaid he) the French King L deceiued of his hope, and as he would haue it thought, greatly diſhonored with this late vnkindnes? which renuing the old wound, wil reuiue in him an endleſſe hatred. Away with all diſſimulation, enemy to graue counſels, and let plain truth, although vnpleaſant unto princes ears, preuent flattery. Vndoubtedly, he being a Prince of no baſe courage (as it oftentimes falleth out with men thorowly grieued) will in his anger as an enemy pour forth his gold, whereof he hath great ſtore, to croſſe the Emperors deſignes, to trouble the aſſemblies of the States of Germany, to withdraw the minds of the Princes, and with bounty to gain them to himſelf: who enuying mightily at the Imperial dignity, wont to be indifferently giuen to them that beſt deſerued the ſame, to be as it were inueſted in the Houſe of Auſtria, which in this perpetual ſucceſſion of ſo many Emperors, hath as it were got a right by long cuſtom. Wherfore they will ſecretly conſpire together, and as notable lingerers by nature, wil either giue no help at all, or elſe too late, at ſuch time as the Turks M gariſons ſhal come flying to ſuccor the yong king. Neither is there any cauſe for any man to think that the gouernors of the Turks countries neer hand, wil for the approch of Winter be ſlack in this cauſe: for they vndoubtedly making an honeſt and honorable ſhew, will take vpon them to defend the fatherleſſe child and

A widow; of purpoſe to make an entrance to the ſecret deſire they haue to gain the kingdome to themſelues: for if you ſhall once ioyn with them in battell, if the beſt happen, and fortune fauor our firſt attempts, truly you ſhall haue war without end, with ſuch an enemy, who will bring with him wealth neuer to be ſpent, power not to be ouercome, and couragious ſoldiers ſworn to our deſtruction. So will it come to paſſe, and I pray God I be a falſe Prophet, that in ſeeking for the kingdome of Hungary by war, you ſhall at length bee driuen to fight for Auſtria it ſelf, and your own kingdom alſo.

This ſpeech ſo mooued King Ferdinand, that although he purpoſed to go on with the war, yet he thought it good by an honorable embaſſage to proue Solymans mind, & purpoſe alſo: which to do, no man was thought fitter than Laſcus himſelf, author of that counſel, being vnto B him very wel known, and familiarly acquainted with al the great Baſſa's of the court. Which ſeruice Laſcus refuſed not, but being furniſhed with all things needful for ſuch an embaſſage, departed from Vienna toward Conſtantinople.

Laſcus ſent embaſſadour from K. Ferdnand to Solyman.

Yet for all that, King Ferdinand perſiſting in his former purpoſe, made withall preparation for wars, truſting vpon the aid of the emperor his brother, and the comming ouer of the Hungarians, who euer thought it cauſe honeſt enough for them to reuolt, if it ſo ſtood with their preſent profit. But before he would enter into open wars, he ſent Nicolas County of Salma to the Queen, to ſhew her the inſtruments of the laſt league betwixt the king her late husband and him; & to exhort her to yeeld vp the kingdom, which by the late league was another mans right, and not by delaying the matter to hurt both her ſelf & her ſon. For King Ferdinand C offered to giue vnto the child the prouince of Sepuſia, as was before agreed betwixt the two Kings expreſly in the league: and to the queen a greater reuenue, and whatſoeuer els ſhe had in dowry. But if ſhe ſhould forget that lawful league, he threatned, that neither the Emperor Charles his brother, nor he, wanted force wherwith to recouer by ſtrong hand the kingdom, annexed to the houſe of Auſtria both by antient right, and the new conſent of moſt of the Hungarian nobility. The County of Salma being receiued at Buda, hardly obtained to be admitted to the preſence of the queen: for George the Biſhop, and Vicche, miſtruſting her womanly courage, ſaid ſhe was not to be ſpoken withall, for that ſhe was ſo ful of heauines and ſorrow; & that they were of authority as the kings tutors, & ready to giue him both audience & anſwer. Which opinion of her weaknes and want of iudgment, the queen, being a woman of an D heroical and royal ſpirit, took as tending ſo much to her diſgrace, that ſhe ſaid ſhe would kil her ſelf, if the Embaſſadors were not permitted to come into her chamber, which was a dark room hanged with black, as the maner is, and ſhe ſitting vpon a low palat, negligently attyred as one that had no care of her ſelf, wan and pale coloured, but as then ſhedding no teares, but with voice and countenance ſo heauy, as might ſhew her tears to be rather dried vp with long mourning, than that her ſorrow was any thing abated: for the deſire of rule had now ſo poſſeſſed her mind, that ſhe contemned all the dangers of imminent war, and for defence of her ſoueraignty reſolued with her ſelf to call in the Turks. After the County admitted to her preſence, had with due reuerence and great proteſtation deliuered his meſſage, ſhe demurely anſwered, That ſuch was the fortune of her ſex and years, that being bereft of the King her E husband, and perplexed with the daily griefs both of body and mind, ſhe could neither take nor giue counſel; but purpoſed in ſo weighty a cauſe to vſe the aduice of Sigiſmund her father, whoſe integritie and iuſtice was ſuch, that King Ferdinand needed no other iudge or arbitrator to decide that controuerſie. Wherfore ſhe requeſted a conuenient time and ſpace wherin ſhe might ask counſell of her father; to whoſe iuſt iudgment ſhe ſaid ſhe would ſtand, as ſhe thought the Nobility of Hungary would do alſo. Which ſmall time of delay if it ſhould be denied, and that they would needs make war vpon her; ſhe ſaid that the Emperor and King Ferdinand his brother ſhould ſurely win no great honour, if they ſhould come to oppugne her a widow, conſumed with tears, and a yong child yet crying in his cradle. The County being ſo ſent away, when he was returned to King Ferdinand, told him, That the Queen was F altogether in the power of the Biſhop, and could neither ſay nor do any thing but what ſhe had before receiued from him: for he only (as he ſaid) commanded al. As for the reſt of the Nobility, they ſhared amongſt them the honours and preferments of the realme, and as men deſirous of gain, had rather be the gouernors of the yong prince, than the ſeruants & waiters of a great and mighty forrein King. Al which, he ſaid, he had both heard and ſeen. Wherfore all

K. Ferdinand by his embaſſador demandeth the kingdom of Hungary of the Queen.

The queens anſwer to the embaſſador.

G the hope was in war,wherin ſuch ſpeed was to be vſed,as that the Queene with her ſon vnprouided,and expecting the euent of their embaſſage from Conſtantinople,might be driuen out of Buda before they could take vp arms,or wel aduiſe themſelues what to do. And that the Queene ſought delay but to make her ſelfe the ſtronger, and in the meane time to call in the Turk, and ſo to make a more dangerous war. Wherfore if euer he purpoſed to reign in Hungary, he ſhould forthwith caſt off all other cogitations, and make ready his forces with all ſpeed poſſible.

K.Ferdinand inuadeth Hungary.

Herupon King Ferdinand,furniſhed with mony from Charles the Emperour,without delay raiſed a great army,which he ſent down the riuer Danubius to Strigonium, which City had all the reign of king Iohn continued faithful to king Ferdinand.The General of his army was Leonardus Velſius a Nobleman of Rhetia, who for many cauſes thought it expedient, firſt to H open the way to Buda;for almoſt in the middle of the way ſtood Vicegrade,with a goodly caſtle vpon the top of a hil by the riuer; which town, but not the caſtle, Velſius after nine dayes ſiege took,with the loſſe of about 200 of his men,all the gariſon ſoldiers therin being either ſlain or taken priſoners, with Valentinus Litteratus their Captain.

Vicegrade taken.

Peſth & Vacia taken.

From Vicegrade he paſſed ouer the riuer Danubius to Peſth,which he took,being forſaken of the enemy.With like ſucces he took the city of Vacia without loſſe.

Buda beſieged.

And remouing thence, and croſſing again the Riuer with his fleet,came and incamped before Buda,ſo to terrifie the Citiſens, and to diſcouer as far as he could,the purpoſe of the queen. Where Perenus, Stephanus Raſcaius, and Franciſcus Francopanes Biſhop of Agria,all men of great nobility among the Hungarians,reuolted from the Queen to king Ferdinand.The Biſhop was reputed a man of great integrity,& vpon meer I conſcience went ouer to K.Ferdinand: yet was he by letters from Gebrge the kings tutor,challenged to haue reuolted,in hope by means of Charles the Emperor to be made a Cardinal.Velſius lay with his army at the hot baths,about a mile and a half from the city,as if he would rather beſiege it than aſſault it. The Germans lying there did fetch in booty round about the country: which was taken in euil part by the Hungarians on their ſide,who ſeeing their own cattel or their friends driuen away,the villages burnt,and the poore husbandmen bound and taken priſoners,fel together by the ears oftentimes with the Germans.On the other ſide they of Buda ſending out their troups of horſmen,skirmiſht with the Germans,if they did but ſtir out of the camp,and wel defended the villages from the injury of the enemy. For Valentinus Thuraccus General of the Queens power, had taken into the city a wonderful number of light K horſmen. Whilſt the army lay thus incamped, it fortuned that Balthazar Pamphilus a Noble Hungarian,ſtraying out of the camp euen vnto the gates of Buda,deſired the Warders at the gate to giue him leaue to talk with Valentinus their Generall,for that he deſired to ſee his old friend,and to confer with him of certain matters concerning the good of the common ſtate. Which thing being granted by the General,he was immediatly receiued into the City with his troup of horſmen. Shortly after returning again into the camp, he reported how hee had bin entertained by his old acquaintance in the city:where viewing the gariſon, the great Artillery,and fortification of the city, he perceiued it was not to be taken without a greater power,and in a more ſeaſonable time of the year. Which thing ſo mooued Velſius,by nature ſuſpitious,and doubtful of the fidelity of a ſtranger,that he commanded him in anger to auoid L the Camp, becauſe he had without his leaue gon into the city, and vpon his owne inſolencie had conference with the Enemy, and by amplifying their ſtrength, to haue diſcouraged the Army, by putting them out of hope of victorie.

The kings army departeth from Buda.

Wherfore Velſius neuer attempting to aſſault the City, returned again to Vicegrade,to beſiege the higher Caſtle (wherin the antient Crown of King Stephen, wherewith the Hungarian Kings were euer after him crowned, was kept) which Caſtle he alſo took with ſomthing leſſe loſſe than he had don the lower Towne.

Alba Regalis yeelded to king Ferdinand.

Not long after,he marched with his Army vnto Alba-Regalis, the City where the Hungarian Kings were vſually crowned and buried: which town by the means of Perenus was deliuered vnto him,and a Garriſon put into it for King Ferdinand. Theſe things thus done, Velſius M retyred againe to Strigonium: which he did the rather, becauſe the Germanes and Hungarians, two rough Nations, could by no meanes agree together; inſomuch as that Velſius the Generall in parting them was wounded in the thigh, and Perenus was hurt with a ſtone. Beſides that, Winter was now come far on, and the Souldiours cried out for want of pay. For which cauſes Velſius (being alſo ſick of the Stone) billetted his Souldiors for that Winter about

A about the country. Yet before that, he new fortified Peſth, and leſt therein a gariſon, becauſe it was reported, that the Turks vpon their frontiers were making preparation to aid them of Buda.

At ſuch time as King Ferdinand was leuying his forces for the inuaſion of Hungary, the Queen by the counſell of the Biſhop had in good time craued aid of the Turks lieutenants in the countries bordering vpon Hungary; eſpecially of Vſtref gouernor of Boſna (a very aged man, and of great honour, who had maried one of the daughters of BajaZet the old Emperour) as alſo of Mahometes Gouernour of Belgrade, and Amurathes who had the charge of the frontiers of Dalmatia. From whom ſhe receiued one anſwer, That they might in no caſe without expres commandement from Solyman depart from the places committed to their charge. Beſides that,
B Mahometes was by rewards ouercome by Laſcus, as he paſſed by Belgrade to Conſtantinople, not to ſtir or aid the Queen. Wherfore ſhe, rejected by theſe great Captains, certified Solyman by her Embaſſadors, in what danger her ſelf, her ſon, and the kingdom was, crauing his ſpeedy aid. Laſcus was not yet come to Conſtantinople, being faln ſick by the way; but had ſent before Ptolemeus his phyſitian to the great Baſſa's, and eſpecially vnto LutZis his old acquaintance, vpon whom he had beſtowed great gifts, and was in hope by him to haue obtained what he deſired; but all in vain: for Solyman, who thought it much for his honour to defend his own right, and that he had before giuen vnto King Iohn; thought alſo that it would redound both to his great profit and glory, if he ſhould as it were vpon charity take vpon him the protection of the widow and fatherles child, in their ſo great diſtreſſe and danger. Wherfore C calling to him the Embaſſadors, the three great Baſſa's ſtanding by, he ſaid, That he had of his meer bounty before giuen the kingdome of Hungary vnto King Iohn deceaſed, to deſcend to his poſterity, ſo long as they ſhould retain the kind remembrance of ſo great a benefit. Wherfore to declare his conſtancy, inſeparable from his bounty, hee ſaid he would take ſuch a courſe in the matter, as that the Germans his enemies ſhould not long reioyce of the wars they had begun. And in token of friendſhip, and that he had taken vpon him the protection of the yong King, he cauſed to be deliuered vnto the Embaſſadors a royal robe of purple and gold, a buckler with the boſſe moſt curiouſly wrought, a horſmans mace with a handle of gold, and a ſcimiter with the ſcabberd richly ſet with ſtones. And afterwards wrot effectually to Vſtref and Mahometes his lieutenants, That they ſhould without delay giue aid to D the Queen, and not to make excuſe becauſe it was winter: threatning them, That if ſhe took any harm through their defaule and negligence, it ſhould coſt them their heads. The Queens Embaſſadors glad of their good diſpatch, were ſcarce departed from the Turks Court, when Laſcus came to Conſtantinople, and vnderſtanding by his phyſitian the ſucces of the Hungarian Embaſſadors, proceeded for all that in his buſineſſe, and deliuered his meſſage, and vpon reaſonable conditions requeſted the kingdom for king Ferdinand. But when hee in ſpeaking had oftentimes made mention of Charles the Emperor, as if hee would with all the power of Germany aid his brother; Solyman was ſo mooued therwith, that he was preſently taken away and committed to priſon; the great Baſſa's, but eſpecially Ruſtan, Solymans ſon in law, a proud and furious young man, chiding him, and ſhaking him vp as worthy of death, for offending E with his liberty of ſpeech the majeſty of ſo courteous a Prince, and as it were mocking the king of kings, requiring friendſhip, when in the mean time his maſter moſt impudently made wars in Hungary.

The queen craueth aid of Solyman.

Solyman promiſeth to protect the Queen and her ſon, againſt Ferdinand, & ſends preſents to the yong King.

Laſcus K. Ferdinands Embaſſador impriſoned by Solyman.

Vſtref and Mahometes the Baſſa's aforeſaid, hauing receiued ſuch ſtreit commandment from Solyman, aſſembled their diſperſed ſouldiers, and by ſhipping brought them down the riuers Savus and Dranus, into Danubius. For it is a hard matter to perform any great thing by wars in Hungary, without the helpe of a great fleet, for conueying of the great Ordnance, victuall, and other ſuch neceſſaries of the army, from one ſide of the great riuers to the other, as occaſion requireth. But as then being the midſt of winter, and the North wind blowing hard, Danubius was ſo froſen on both ſides, that the middle of the riuer was ſcarſe open; ſo that the Turks F not able to paſſe for the extremity of the weather, nor daring to return for the ſtreit command of Solyman, were inforced in their Tents there to abide the hardnes of Winter, to ſhew their readines. It is almoſt incredible to be ſpoken, with what patience and reſolution the ſoldiers endured all the extremity of the time in ſo bare a place, their horſes, which of all other things they hold moſt dear, ſtaruing for cold and want of meat.

The queen joineth her forces with the Turks and burns Vacia.

Peſth in vaine beſieged by the Turks.

The Spring at length comming on (right welcome both to the Turks and the queen) Mahometes with his Turks and wild Illyrians, and Vſtref with his ſouldiers of Boſna, entred into Hungary; with whom Valentinus General of the Queenes forces joined alſo, with an Army of Hungarians brought from Buda. And the Queen to further the matter, ſent preſents to the Turks Generals, victualled the camp, and furniſhed them with great Ordnance for the beſieging of ſuch Cities as were holden by King Ferdinand her enemy. They paſſing ouer Danubius, took the city of Vacia (being but badly defended for King Ferdinand) and putting many to the ſword, after the manner of their barbarous cruelty, burnt the City. From thence they remoued to Peſth, which was ſo valiantly defended by Barcocius and Fatiſcus, the one of them an Hungarian captain, the other a German; that the Turks diſpairing of the winning of the city, and not wel relieued with victual from the Queen then, fearing future want, paſſed again ouer Danubius, & faithfully reſtoring the great ordnance without any more doing, returned again into their own countrie. But in their retyring, the Hungarians by the leading of Ferentius Gnarus ſlew many of them; among whom was one Achomates, one of their beſt and valianteſt captains.

K. Ferdinand ſends the Lord Wil. Rogendorff with an Army into Hungary.

Buda beſieged.

Rogendorff threatneth the Queen.

The Biſhop his ſcornfull anſwer to Rogendorff.

King Ferdinand aduertiſed of the Turks departure, returned again to his old hope of recouering the kingdom: perſuading the Emperor his brother, not to giue ouer the war ſo fortunatly begun, eſpecially now that the Turks hauing forſaken the Queen, were departed & gon. Wherfore the new forces lately before raiſed in Auſtria, Bohemia, Sileſia, and Morauia, for a new ſupply of Velſius his army, were preſently ſent into Hungary, vnder the leading of the lord William Rogendorff ſteward of the Kings houſe, who was then gon as far as Poſſonium, to haue relieued them of Peſth; vnto whom, as a more antient and honourable Generall, Velſius gaue place. He, furniſhed with theſe new ſupplies, three months victuals, and great Artillery from Vienna, joining with the old Army, marched directly to Buda and beſieged it. Ouer againſt the ſtately caſtle of Buda, wherin the Queen lay, was a great hil called S. Gerrards mount, ſo high, that the middle therof was equall with the higheſt place of the caſtle; and from the top therof they might look into the ſtreets of the City: betwixt which hil and the Caſtle was a great valley and deep ditch. Vpon this hil, Rogendorff to beat the Caſtle, and to terrifie the Queen, planted his battery, and ſo ſhook a new built tower therof, that it was thought that it would haue ſuddenly fallen: which if it had, yet was it ſuppoſed a dangerous matter to haue aſſaulted it, becauſe it was walled about with a treble wal. But the ſumptuous turrets and the princely galleries of the Kings palace in the Caſtle, which euery man ſaw Rogendorff might haue beaten down with his great ordnance, he ſpared: but whither of himſelf, or els commanded by the King (as loth to deſtroy ſuch goodly buildings as could not without great charge be in long time again repaired) was vncertain. Wherfore by diuers heralds ſent to the queen, he wiſhed her to breake in ſunder thoſe gyves and fetters wherin the Biſhop vnder colour of protection had faſt bound her ſon and her, and to accept of K. Ferdinands offer, who was readie to beſtow vpon her a goodly ſeigniory, wherin ſhe might moſt honourably liue in quiet, and bring vp her ſon in ſafety. Which thing if ſhe as a ſimple woman ignorant of her owne danger, ſhould refuſe, and obſtinatly contemn the peril wherein ſhe ſtood, he would forthwith in moſt terible maner beat down the palace about her ears. Wherunto the Biſhop in the queens behalf anſwered, That ſhe was not ſuch a fool to exchange the kingdom of Hungary for the principality of Sepuſia: and that ſhe thought Rogendorff a very doting and mad old man, who being once before wel beaten in thoſe ditches, came now again like a fool to receiue his vtter deſtruction in full guerdon of his raſh folly. Wherefore hee ſhould ceaſe to terrifie valiant men, fighting with diſcretion for their natural King and country, againſt his drunken company; for that they were nothing troubled with the noiſe of his great ſhot. But yet he ſaid, that he would aboue all the reſt, by way of priuat curteſie, gently requeſt Rogendorff to diſcharge his pieces with a little leſſe noiſe, becauſe he had a ſow at home great with pigs, which terrified with the thundring of his guns, would farrow he doubted before her time, to the grief of his gueſts. For the Biſhop was of a ſharpe and taunting ſpirit, and ſuch a contemner of the Germans, that when two of them were taken in the Kings orchards, burning certain orchards, he in deriſion cauſed two hogs to be hanged vpon the ſame gallows with them. Not long after, Rogendorff remoued his camp from S. Gerrards mount, to a more conuenient place for the battering of the City, called the Iewes Graues, neere vnto the Gate called the Iewes Gate.

Which

A Which thing the Biſhop ſeeing,after his quipping manner requeſted of Rogendorff to pardon him,in that he had of late wrongfully called him a doting old man;for that in remoouing his camp into a more commodious place,he ſeemed to be a proper wiſe man,and of good diſcretion, now that he had pitched his tents in a moſt fit place amongſt the dead, both for himſelf being an old man,and almoſt worn with vain labor; and for his army condemned to dy there with him. Rogendorff thus incamped,began in two places to batter the wals: Perenus with the Hungarians and the Bohemians neer vnto the gate called Sabatina in one place,and hee himſelf with the Germans betwixt the Iews gate and the Caſtle in another:which was done with ſuch violence,that a great part of the wal was beaten down;and another part therof ouercharged with earth,which the defendants had caſt vp on the inner ſide for the ſtrengthning thereof, B was at the ſame time born quite out and ſo fel downe, to the wonderfull diſmaying of all that were in the city. Which fair opportunitie to haue taken the city Rogendorff let ſlip, either not wel aware therof,by reaſon of the great ſmoke of the artillery on both ſides, and the duſt ariſing with the fall of the wall,which couered all;or els according to his natural diſpoſition, doing all things leiſurely and ſuſpitiouſly; ſo that a little delay bereft him of the preſent apprehenſion of ſo ſudden a reſolution: and the Germans,vſed more to ſtanding battells than to aſſaults,were not to be ſo eaſily brought on to aſſault the breach vpon the ſudden, as were the Spaniards,Italians, or French. The wall was opened in that place almoſt two hundred paces in length,yet ſtanding almoſt the hight of a man,which might eaſily haue bin ſcaled with ſhort ladders: but night was comming now faſt on, wherin the Germans would not C attempt any dangerous matter;ſo that the aſſault was deferred til the next morning. Wheras they of Buda in the mean time taking aduantage of the enemies delay, with incredible diligence and labor in that night raiſed vp a new rampier in ſtead of the wal that was fallen, euery man without exception putting his hand to the work. In the morning the Germans comming to the breach,gaue ſuch a fierce aſſault vnto the new made rampier, that Otho Fatiſcus deſperatly entred into a ſhattered houſe which ioyned vnto the wall; and certain other companies, one ſoldier helping vp another,had almoſt recouered the top of the rampier,and were there ready to ſet vp their enſignes. When they of Buda with wonderful conſtancie and reſolution withſtood the aſſailants, George the Biſhop incouraging them, and fighting amongſt them: who hauing laid aſide his hood, was now to be ſeen with his helmet on his head, running D to and fro as need required all alongſt the rampier. At length the Germans ſeeing themſelues to ſtriue in vain againſt reſolute men,were inforced to retyre. In this aſſault Rogendorff loſt aboue 800 men. Perenus was alſo in like maner,but with leſſe loſſe, repulſed at the other breach he had made at the gate Sabatina. After that, Rogendorff attempted by vndermining to haue taken the city,but was by countermines diſappointed of his purpoſe. Yet for al this, they in the city began to feel the want of many things,ſo that it ſeemed they were not able to endure any longer ſiege: the common people pinched with hunger,crying openly out in mutinous ſort,that it was time to yeeld and make an end of thoſe common miſeries. But ſuch was the authority of the Biſhop, with his prouident foreſight of all vrgent euents, that once ſhewing himſelf in the market place as if he would haue preached, he could turn the peeuiſh E minded people which way he pleaſed.

A great breach in the walls of Buda.

The Germanes aſſaulting the breach are repulſed with loſſe.

After all this it miſſed but a little,but that this City which could not by enemies force be won,had by ſhameful treaſon bin loſt. There was at that time in Buda one Bornemiſſa a lawyer, who had in former time bin Maior of the city: this Bornemiſſa exceedingly hated the Biſhop, for taking part with a bankerout Iew againſt him,and being full of malice,and deſirous of reuenge,promiſed to Reualius (Marſhal in the enemies camp) to deliuer to him the blinde poſtern in S. Maries churchyard,wherby he might enter the city:which gate ſerued the Citiſens in time of peace to go thorow to the riuer. Rogendorff the General made acquainted with the matter,ſo liked therof, that he himſelf thought it not good in a matter of ſo great importance to vſe at all the ſeruice of the Hungarians. Quite contrary to that Bornemiſſa had requeſted F of Reualius,who deſirous to haue the matter brought to paſſe without the ſlaughter of ſo many guiltleſſe people as was by him to be betrayd,would haue had it altogether performed by the Hungarians,who he was in good hope would ſhew mercy vnto their Countrymen and kinſmen,and vſe their victory with more moderation than the Grmanes, who prouoked with many deſpights,and comming in by night,were like enough to make great effuſion of bloud.

Bornemiſſa practiſeth to betray Buda.

But Rogendorff after the maner of his Nation, to be counted politique, vſed to keepe promiſe G with no man; and hoping by excluding the Hungarians, to haue all the glory of the conceiued victory to himſelf, made as if he would haue vſed only the Hungarians, and glozed with Revalius, whoſe ſon for the more aſſurance he took as pledge. For againſt the appointed hour, which was about midnight, hauing before giuen ſtreit charge that no man ſhould ſtir in the camp, he ſent four ſelect companies of Germans with great ſilence vnto the poſtern; at which time his ſon Condi ſtood with a ſtrong troup of horſmen ready to haue entred, as ſuch time as the Germans, receiued into the city, ſhould breake open the great gate, as was before agreed.
Neither did Bornemiſſa fail to perform what he had as a traitor promiſed; but opening the po-ſtern we ſpake of, had with great ſilence receiued in moſt part of thoſe Germane Companies.
But when he ſtil asked ſoftly of them as they came in, for Revalius, and heard them anſwer no- H thing but in the German language; although he was otherwiſe a man of a bold ſpirit, yet then ſurpriſed with a ſudden fear (as it oftentimes chanceth in ſuch actions, to men deceiued of their expectation) he ſtood as a man amaſed, that knew not what to do, and forgot to conduct the Germans: who altogether vnacquainted in the city, knew not which way firſt to goe; and ſtealing on ſoftly in the dark, went on with no great courage, for fear of treaſon; ſtil asking of them that followed, for him that ſhould direct them. The Germans could not go ſo cloſely, but that by the clattering of their Armor and the light of their matches they were deſcried by the Watch: who asking for the word, and they not giuing it, preſently raiſed an Alarm; but now all too late, the City being as good as half taken, had the Germanes well conducted, reſolutely gon on with the matter ſo wel begun: but they ignorant of the way, and now de- I ſcried and chaſed with their own fear, ran backe againe to the poſtern in ſuch haſt, that one of them miſerably wrung another, in ſtriuing who ſhould get out firſt: and their paſſage was much letted by the pikes and weapons which they which fled firſt had caſt croſſe the way, to run the lighter into the camp. The firſt that ſet vpon the Germans was Bacianus, who had that night the charge of the Watch; and after him Vicche, who kept the Court of gard in the market place, and hearing the alarme came thither with a ſtrong company both of horſemen and footmen. Many of the moſt valiant Germans, who comming in firſt, were in flight becom laſt, were ſlain or taken, and amongſt them many of Bornemiſſa his familiars and friends (as for himſelf he was got out among the formoſt) from whom the Biſhop by exquiſit torture wrung out the whole plot of the treaſon, and afterwards cauſed them to be ſeuerally executed to the K terror of others. Revalius in the mean time complaining in the Camp, That he was deceiued by the General: and Bornemiſſa wofully lamenting, That hauing worthily got the name of an infamous Traitor, he had therby loſt all his ſubſtance, and vndon his friends & kindred. The Generall Rogendorff (condemned euen of the common ſoldiers for his fooliſh arrogancie and pride) was hardly ſpoken of thorow all the camp, as he that by too much inſolencie had ouerthrown the faireſt occaſion of a moſt goodly victory. Wherfore from that time hee attempted no great matter, but ſet himſelfe downe by long ſiege to tame his enemies, and ſo to win the city.

Bornemiſſa receiueth in the Germans by a poſtern, ſuppoſing them to haue bin Hungarians.

The Germanes not conducted, are diſcouered & diſcomfited.

Solyman vnderſtanding of the Queens diſtreſſe in Hungary, and with what deſire Ferdinand (ſupported by the Emperor his brother) thirſted after that kingdom; conſulted with his Baſ- L ſa's, of the purpoſes and power of his enemies both there and elſwhere: and politickly reſolued at one time, with his diuided forces, to withſtand their attempts in diuers places, & thoſe far diſtant one from another; whereby the greatneſſe of his power is well to bee perceiued.
Firſt, he ſent Solyman Baſſa an Eunuch to Babylon, to defend the Countrey of Meſopotamia, and the frontiers of his Empire alongſt the riuer Tygris, againſt Tamas the King of Perſia.
Mahometes another of his great Baſſa's he ſent into Hungary to relieue the beſieged Queen.
And after him Vſtref Baſſa (which was the fourth of his chiefe Baſſa's) with another Army to ſtay at Belgrade, in readineſſe to aid the other great Baſſa ſent before him, as occaſion ſhould require, if he ſhould find his enemies too ſtrong. Vnto Barbaruſſa hee committed his Navy, for the defence of Grecia and Epirus againſt Auria; who but a little before (aided by M the Gallies of Sicilia and Naples) had driuen the Turks and Moors (which took part with the Turkes) out of Clupea, Neapolis, Adrumentum, Ruſpina, Tapſus, and all alongſt that coaſt of Africke which the Moores call Mahomedia, except the City of Leptis; and cau-ſed thoſe Cities to ſubmit themſelues vnto the gouernment of Muleaſſes King of Tunes.

Solyman maintains wars in diuers far diſtant places of the world at once.

Theſe cities are at this day called Calabia, Suſa, Mahometa, Monaſterim, Sfaxia, and Africa. And becauſe Solyman vnderſtood, that Maylat the Vayuod of Tranſyluania tooke part with King Ferdinand, he ſent againſt him Achomates gouernor of Nicopolis, and commanded Peter of Moldavia, Prince of Valachia, to aid him; who afterwards accordingly came vnto him with 30000 horſmen. He himſelf alſo doubting the purpoſes of the Chriſtian princes, and eſpecially of Charles the emperor, more than he had need, came to Hadrianople, and in the countries therabouts raiſed a third army, to aid the two Baſſa's ſent before him into Hungary; keeping with him his ſon in law Ruſtan, whom he had made one of the four great Baſſa's of his Counſel, hauing thruſt out Luſttbeius, whom the Turks cal Lutzis, his brother in law, and exiled him into Macedonia for euil intreating and ſtriking his wife, which was Solymans ſiſter, as is before ſaid, but was at this time don.

Mahometes the Baſſa deſirous to do his great maſter the beſt ſeruice he could, entred into Hungary with his Army about the middle of Iune, in the year 1541, taking with him in his way the other Mahometes gouernor of Belgrade, who gaue the Chriſtians that ſhameful ouerthrow not farre from Exek; ioyning alſo with him the power of Boſna, now commanded by Vlemus the Perſian, for that Vſtref the old Baſſa was lately dead. The captains of the Chriſtian army hearing of the comming of the Turks, entered into counſell, whether they ſhould continue the ſiege, or els go and meet them by the way and giue them battel. But the period of the Hungarian kingdom drawing faſt on, and the inevitable deſtiny therof ſo requiring, the opinion of Rogendorff preuailed againſt the reſt for continuing of the ſiege; he ſeeming more willing to die, than to croſſe ouer the riuer to Peſth, or to retyre to Vicegrade or Strigonium, as diuers would haue perſuaded him. Wherfore he remoued from the place where he lay before, and incamped his army on the further ſide of the city, at the foot of S. Gerrards Mount; where the hil lying between Buda & the camp, & departing from the riuer, leaues a fair plain toward the Eaſt; of purpoſe that the Turks (whom he knew would not go far from the Riuer and their fleet) ſhould be inforced dangerouſly to paſſe by the mouth of his great Ordnance, which he had aptly placed vpon the front of his trenches: for ſuch was the nature of the place that the camp lay defended on the right hand with the ſteep hil, on the left hand with the riuer, and behind toward the city with a ſtrong bulwark. Vpon the right hand, vpon a little riſing ground he placed the leſſer camp, wherin were the Hungarians which fauored king Ferdinand, and then followed his enſignes. He made alſo a bridge from his camp into a little Iſle which lay in the riuer, and with a fort wel planted with ordnance commanded both the Riuer and the plain, ſo to beat the enemies fleet comming vp the riuer, and themſelues alſo as they ſhould march alongſt the plain. Hee was about alſo to haue made a bridge of lighters and boats quite ouer the riuer from his Camp to Peſth; and in this order to expect the comming of new ſupplies from king Ferdinand, and to repel the enemy who was comming, and with long ſiege to weary them in Buda: for there was ſuch ſtore both of victual and all other warlike prouiſion in Peſth, as would wel haue ſufficed his army vntil winter had bin ſpent. As ſoone as the Turks were come nigh the city, Valentinus as an Embaſſador from the Queen, met them with two thouſand horſe, and fully inſtructed both the Mahomets, what the Chriſtians did, what ſtrength they were of, and how they might moſt conueniently incamp their army: wherfore the Baſſa marching on boldly forward, came within half a mile of the Chriſtian Camp, where he quickly intrenched himſelfe round with a ſtrong trench, filling a great part of the plain with his Tents. But the other Mahometes Gouernor of Belgrade, a moſt politick captain, took the higher ground towards the riſing of the hill, neerer vnto the tents of the Hungarians than of the Germanes. Vnto theſe two Armies thus incamped, belonged alſo two fleets; the Chriſtian fleet conſiſted of four and twenty Galliots, about fourſcore ſmal pinnaces, and little leſſe than 100 ſhips of burthen, and other great boats. Wheras the Turks fleet was not thought to be paſt half ſo great. Neer vnto the little Iſland, joined as we haue before ſaid by a bridge to the Chriſtian Campe, beneath in the riuer had the Turkes taken another Iſland called Cepellia, ouer againſt their own Camp; where caſting vp a great bulwark in the vppermoſt end therof, and planting it with great ordnance, they from thence ſhot at the fort which the Chriſtians held in the little Iſland, and at their Veſſells paſſing to and fro in the Riuer, as the Chriſtians did at them likewiſe. This Iſland of Cepellia lieth ſomwhat more than forty miles in length in the riuer of Danubius, ful of country villages, ſo commodiouſly, that if Rogendorff had at the firſt taken it,and fortified it before the comming of the Turks, as G the Hungarians perſuaded him to haue don,the Turks could by no means haue incamped in the plain,but muſt needs haue forſaken their fleet,fetching a great compaſſe about more toward the Weſt,farther off from the riuer,which would haue turned to the Turks great diſaduantage.

But no man is ſo wiſe as to foreſee all things, when as the euill ſucces, be the plot neuer ſo well layd, ſhal of it ſelf,beſides the loſſe,leaue vnto the vnfortunate man the note of the want of prouident foreſight and diſcretion. But Rogendorff was not willing to diuide his forces vntil he had ſome new ſupply from King Ferdinand. Whilſt the armies lay thus neer one to another, there were ſome light ſkirmiſhes made euery day,either by the horſmen or footmen, and ſomtime one braue man challenging forth another hand to hand,whom he thought by his armour,or ſome other ſigne of his worth, to be like to himſelf: which was ſo pleaſant a ſight to behold, that both H the armies vpon a military curteſie,as if it had bin ſo agreed, would many times for certaine hours forbear to ſhoot any ſhot,of purpoſe to ſee thoſe gallants,with true proweſſe to proue their valor and manhood one vpon another with their ſpears and ſwords only. In which light ſkirmiſhes the German horſmen were oftentimes put to the worſt;who mounted vpon heauy horſes,fitter for a ſet battell,could neither ſo readily charge the enemy,nor purſue him in his flight;as could the Turks with their nimble ready light horſmen,ſo wel acquainted with that maner of flying fight,that they would with wheeling about eaſily fruſtrat the firſt charge of the heauy horſmen,and by and by come vpon them again with a freſh charge, and ſo often retyre and come on again,vntil they had either wearied or ouerthrown them. But the Hungarians acquainted with that manner of fight as well as they, and alſo better armed, did eaſily encounter I the Turks and foil them,although they were in number moe.

Rayſchachius for ſorow of his ſon ſlain by the Turks, ſuddenly dieth.

There was amongſt the German captains a nobleman called Eckius Rayſchachius, whoſe ſon (a valiant yong gentleman) being got out of the Army without his fathers knowledge, bare himſelf ſo gallantly in fight againſt the enemy,in the ſight of his father and of the army,that he was highly commended of all men, but eſpecially of his father, who knew him not at all: yet before he could cleer himſelfe he was compaſſed in of the enemy, and valiantly fighting ſlain. Rayſchachius exceedingly mooued with the death of ſo braue a man, ignorant how neer it touched himſelf,turning about to the other captains, ſaid, This worthy gentleman,whatſoeuer he be,is worthy of eternal commendation,and to be moſt honorably buried by the whole army. As the reſt of the captains were with like compaſſion approuing his ſpeech, the dead K body of the vnfortunat ſon reſcued,was preſented to the moſt miſerable father;which cauſed all that were there preſent to ſhed tears: but ſuch a ſudden and inward griefe ſurpriſed the aged father,and ſtrook ſo to his heart, that after he had ſtood a while ſpeechles, with his eyes ſet in his head,he ſuddenly fell down dead. From that time the General commanded, That no man ſhould vpon pain of death go out of the army to ſkirmiſh with the enemy without leaue: wherin he was ſo ſeuere,that he hanged vp one or two that preſumed to tranſgreſſe his commandment.
Which thing much diſcouraged his own men,and ſo incouraged the enemy,that they would ſomtime braue the Chriſtians vpon the top of their own trenches.

Many daies had now paſſed ſince the comming of the Baſſa, the Turkes and they of Buda daily increaſing both in ſtrength and courage;when as on the other ſide,faint courage, weake L ſtrength,troubled counſel, vncertaine reſolution,the ominous ſignes of an vndoubted ouerthrow, were eaſie to be ſeen:and hope it ſelf,the ſtay of all human actions,eſpecially of martial affairs,almoſt loſt:the only things which vpheld their fainting hearts,were, the often Letters of king Ferdinand;and the firm opinion they had conceiued, That Charles the Emperour would not in ſo great a danger fail to aid his brother both with men and mony:and laſt of all, the firm reſolution of a General,which far paſſed al reaſon,the ſooner to draw him to his end.
The armies lying in this order,the Turkes from the higher ground and out of Ceppellia,perceiuing the Germans in the little Iſland as careleſſe men to keep but ſlight watch, agreed amongſt themſelues,at one inſtant out of both their Camps to aſſail diuers of their forts: and

The Turks ſuddenly aſſail the Chriſtians in the Iſland.

ſo by break of the day landed with their fleet ſo cloſely and ſuddenly to the Iſland,that they M had ſlain almoſt 600 of the Germans before they were throwly awake or could wel arm themſelues.
Wherwith the reſt were put in ſuch a fear,that they fled to the Campe in ſuch haſte, that many of them fel beſide the bridge,and were drowned in the Riuer. All the Camp was wonderfully troubled with the ſuddennes of the matter, the Turkes with their hideous cries raiſing the alarm in diuers places at once: yet for all that, certain German Companies in one of the forts neereſt vnto the riuer, and the ſoldiers in the fleet, wel declared their preſent reſolution and valiant courage, in recouering again of the Iſland. For Herbeſtulſus the Camp maſter perſuading them not to ſuffer the Chriſtian enſignes and great ordnance to be ſo ſhamefully caried away by the Turks; & Marius the Admiral at the ſame time landing diuers companies in the Iſland with his pinnaces and great boats; they ſo courageouſly charged the Turks, then buſied in ſpoiling the dead bodies, and drawing away of the great ordnance, that they draue them again to their boats, leauing vnto them as victors both the Iſland and Ordnance; hauing before their departure receiued no leſſe loſſe themſelues, than had the Germans before.

It was reported, that the Turks fleet might that day haue bin quite ouerthrown, if the Chriſtians vſing the victory, and holpen with the courſe of that ſwift riuer, had courageouſly purſued them and landed with them. But many things after a matter is don are eaſily ſeen, which in the very heat and hurle of the danger canot be foreſeen; foraſmuch as ſudden accidents attended with great peril, do oftentimes daſle the minds of right wiſe and valiant captains: yet four of the Turks pinnaces were ſunke, and three taken, and many of the Turks ſlain or drowned in the riuer. Shortly after, the Turks more and more incouraged with the multitude of themſelues, and the fearfulnes they perceiued in their enemies, did at ſundry times ſo inſolently trouble and aſſail the camp of the Chriſtians on euery ſide, that they left them almoſt no time of reſt, one company ſtil ſucceeding another; ſo that they were almoſt in diſpair to be able long to defend their camp, the enemy ſtil growing both in ſtrength and courage. For the Baſſa that lay at Belgrade ſtil taking vnto him the ſick and wounded ſoldiers, ſent continually freſh men in their ſtead: and Valentinus taking to him a company of the Turks harquebuſiers, had driuen Perenus with the Hungarian horſmen out of the vpper camp. So that they in the nether camp were now hardly beſet by their enemies on euery ſide: yet were they well holpen by the great Artillery from Peſth, which much troubled Valentinus and his horſemen in aſſailing the camp on that ſide.

Valentinus the queens general certifieth Perenus of Solymans comming.

Some report, that Valentinus, not greatly angry with the Hungarian baniſhed men, but with the Germans, did by the way of priuat curteſie or friendſhip, by a faithful ſouldier wiſh Perenus, ſpeedily to prouide for the ſafety of himſelfe and of the Hungarians with him; for that there was a great beaſt comming which would at one morcel deuour them al. For Solyman aduertiſed of the doings of the Emperour and King Ferdinand, thinking that they would haue come down to Buda with a puiſſant army, was reſolued to be preſent himſelf at ſo notable a battel, and was therfore comming thither with his Army in all haſt. Wherfore Perenus thus forewarned, ſaid plainly to Rogendorff and the other captains, that except they would preſently riſe with the army and depart, he would now whilſt he had yet time make ſhift for himſelf and his countrymen. Their opinions diuerſly deliuered, at laſt they all agreed, that it was beſt the next night to paſſe ouer the riuer to Peſth. Only the General by fatal obſtinacy ſaid, He would not without King Ferdinands commandement depart from Buda: and therefore ſent County Salma with a ſwift pinnace vp the riuer to Vienna, to know his pleaſure therin. In the mean time vrged with fear, Perenus fretting at their long ſtay, it was reſolued vpon, that they ſhould the next night, after the Moon was downe, paſſe ouer the riuer with four conuoyes to Peſth. In the firſt were to paſſe ouer the Hungarians with their great ordnance. In the ſecond the German and Bohemian horſmen; and in the other two, the footmen and baggage of the army: for it was not ſo eaſie a matter to make a bridge ouer Danubius, as they had at firſt ſuppoſed: for after they had begun it & almoſt planked it, there riſe ſuch a wind and tempeſt, and the violent riuer became ſo rough, that the timber wherwith the bridge was faſtned together was broken, the joints vnloſed, and many of the boats wherof the bridge was framed, their cables being broken, were carried away by the force of the ſtream. The firſt and ſecond conuoy fortune ſo fauored that they wel paſſed ouer; for although they of Buda and the Turkes, ſeeing in the day time from their high places their fleet drawing together into one place, might haue ſome ſuſpition of the matter, ſome gheſſing one thing, and ſome another; yet could they foreſee nothing of that ſudden departure of the enemy. But that multitude of ſhips and boats now paſſing to and fro, could not long be hid from the attentiue and vigilant Enemy; and ſo much the leſſe, for that two fugitiue Hungarians euen then diſcouered to the Biſhop, which without further delay came almoſt with all their power to aſſault the Chriſtians in their camp:the great ordnance was brought forth,and after the Ianizaries and other footmen, followed the horſmen,diſmounted from their horſes to do the better ſeruice ; who all with a horribly cry aſſailed the trenches. Then began the Germans to quaile, their flight being now diſcouered;yet did they with the the Bohemians for a while notably reſiſt the enemy. Al the campe was filled with tumult and confuſion,and eſpecially at the riuer ſide,euery man in that great feare ſtriuing to get aboord,without regard of order or ſhame : for the dead time of the night then couered with darke and thicke clouds, made all things more terrible, euen vnto them which were of beſt courage:the authority of Rogendorff the General(in the darkneſſe of the night, and ſo great clamour both of his owne people and of the enemy,and the thundring H of the ordnance)was as nothing:he(beſides that he was then ſick in mind)lay in his bed wounded, by a wonderfull and fatall chance:for as he was writing letters to the king,a faulcon ſhot out of the enemies camp falling in his tent, and ſtriking in ſunder a cheſt which ſtood there, wounded him grieuouſly in the left ſhoulder with a ſplinter of the ſame. The other captaines of the footmen enuying that the horſmen were ſo wel eſcaped, ſtood as men more carefull of themſelues,than of the common danger,faintly reſiſting the enemy. The vpper tents wherin Perenus lay,were firſt taken by Mahometes of Belgrade,and Valentinus, & the German footmen chaſed all ouer S.Gerrards mount. They of Buda alſo ſallied out,and entred the camp on that ſide which was next vnto the City,and with wild fire burnt the Tents,a little before forſaken by the Germans. And the Biſhop at the ſame time cauſed a great ſtacke of ſtraw ſtanding by I the kings ſtables,neer vnto the riuers ſide,to be ſet on fire,which gaue ſuch a light that a man might haue ſeen all ouer Danubius vnto the wals of Peſth,as if it had bin light day:whereby the great confuſion of the Chriſtian army by land,as well as the ſhameful flight by water,was of the Turks plainly diſcouered. Then was the great artillery on euery ſide diſcharged vpon the flying fleet,as wel from Buda,as the Turkes Campe. And to increaſe the feare, Caſon the Turks Admiral rowing with his light boats againſt the ſtream,ſet vpon the ſhips croſſing the riuer to Peſth,where he took certain boats loded with ſouldiers,and his great ordnance ſunke diuers others : ſo the riuer was filled with dead bodies, and the miſerable company of mariners and ſoldiers,laboring to ſaue their liues by ſwimming ; for at ſuch time as the Ianizaries hauing ſlain the firſt companies,were broken into the lower Campe ; and the reſt of the Germans K flying ouer the bridge into the Iſland,were there ſlain without mercy,by the Turks purſuing them,many of them leapt into the riuer and there periſhed. Three hundred ſail of one ſort of ſhips and other were ſo mingled together, that Danubius ſeemed that night to be couered ouer as if it had bin with a great bridge. But the Chriſtian fleet ſeeing all loſt, cleered themſelues ſo ſoon as they could of the Turkes ; and ſo beating them backe with their great ordnance out of the poups of their ſhips,got vp the riuer to Comora. The reſt of the Forces endured the ſame fortune by land in the Campe, of whom the Bohemians died moſt honourably, ſlain by the enemy in fight. Many falling into the hands of them of Buda,were ſaued or ſlain, as it was their fortune to fall into the power of a mercifull or mercileſſe man. But the Sunne riſing, plainely diſcouered the ſlaughter of the Chriſtians, and the victory of the L Turks,not ſo well before known. There was about 3000 men of one ſort and other, who in warlike maner had taken a little hil by S.Gerrards Church, and there ſtood vpon their gard ; vntill ſuch time as more than two thouſand of them were ſlaine : the reſt caſting away their weapons, yeelded, in hope of life,and were reſerued for a ſpectacle more grieuous than death it ſelfe.

At the ſame time Caſon with his victorious fleet comming to the ſhore of Peſth, brought ſuch a fear vpon them that were eſcaped thither, and might eaſily haue defended the Walls, (only with the cry of his ſoldiers, and thundring of his artillery) that the horſmen for haſt to get out,were like to ouer-run one another. The Germanes had at that time ſo much forgot their wonted valor,and ſo trembled at the name of the Turkes, that as ſoone as they ſaw their M white caps in their ſhips they ran away as men diſmaied,vnarmed, leauing behind them their plate,their cariages,and whatſoeuer good thing they had els. Yet ſome Hungarian horſmen, more deſirous of the ſpoile, than afraid of death, ſtaid behinde rifling the merchants ſhops ; for Peſth was become a very rich mart town for all kind of merchandiſe, merchants reſorting thither

A thither from all other places of the troubled country, as to a ſtrong and commodious city, and of more ſafety than the reſt. But Caſon now entring without reſiſtance, ſlew ſome of thoſe greedy Hungarians, and ran thorow the towne with ſuch barbarous cruelty and thirſt of the Chriſtian bloud, that he ſpared neither man, woman, nor child, except ſome few, which either for their beauty or ſtrength of body were reſerued for the Turks beaſtly luſt, or ſlauiſh labor: ſo that in this war it is reported, more than 20000 Chriſtians were one way and other by di-uers chances ſlaine. There were taken at Peſth, in the campe and in the Iſland, 36 great pieces for battery, of wonderfull beauty; and of leſſer field pieces 150. As for ſhot, powder, armor, weapons, and victuall prouided for Winter, ſuch ſtore was found, that the Turks accounted it for the greateſt part of their victory. Rogendorff the vnfortunat Generall, at ſuch time as the B Turks hauing won the trenches, were fighting in the midſt of his camp, deſiring rather to be ſlaine in his tent, than to liue after ſo great an ouerthrow, was againſt his will by ſtrong hand carried aboord a little pinnace by his phyſitian and chamberlaine, which would not leaue him as he lay, and was ſo conueighed vp the riuer to the Iſland of Comora; where he ſhortly after, partly for the painefulneſſe of his wound, but more for griefe of minde, died in a little country village called Samarium, leauing vnto the Germans a wofull remembrance of his accurſed obſtinacy and pride. Solyman ſtill doubting the comming of Charles the Emperour and King Ferdinand to Buda, was comming with his army from Hadrianople in ſuch haſt, that he cau-ſed the Ianizaries, his beſt footmen, contrary to their manner, to march as faſt as his horſemen: but vnderſtanding by the way, of the late victory obtained by his captaines, he tooke more C leiſure, and came with a great power to Buda in Auguſt, and there incamped on the other ſide of the city, to auoid the noiſome ſauour of the dead bodies, which lay yet vnburied. Where calling vnto him the other army, and making one huge campe of both, he highly commended all his captaines, but eſpecially the two Mahometes. And vnderſtanding that the victory was eſpecially gotten by the meanes of Mahometes Gouernour of Belgrade, he made him Generall of all his Europeian horſemen, one of the moſt honourable preferments of the Turkiſh Empire: the other captaines he rewarded according as they had deſerued, and withall augmented their pay.

Peſth taken by Caſon, Admirall of the Turkes fleet.

Rogendorffe against his will caried away by his phyſitian & chamberlain, to Comara, there dieth.

Solyman commeth to Buda.

After that, he cauſed the priſoners, in number about eight hundred, to be brought out, who bound in long ropes, were in deriſion led all alongſt the army, ranged in order of battell, and D afterward by his commandement ſlain by his yong ſoldiers: ſaying with ſeuere countenance, that they were worthy of ſuch death, which by Embaſſadours diſſemblingly entreating of peace, had in the meane time craftily waged war. Amongſt theſe priſoners was one ſouldier of Bauaria of an exceeding high ſtature; him in deſpight of the German nation, he deliuered to a little dwarfe (whom his ſonnes made great account of) to be ſlaine, whoſe head was ſcarce ſo high as the knees of the tall captiue; with that cruell ſpight to aggrauate the indignity of his death, when as that goodly tall man, mangled about the legs a long time by that apiſh dwarfe with his little ſcimeter, as if it had bin in diſport, fell downe, and was with many feeble blowes hardly at laſt ſlaine by that wretch, ſtill heartened on by others, to ſatisfie the eies of the Princes, beholding it as their ſport.

Turkiſh cruelty.

E This barbarous and cruell execution done, Solyman ſent his Embaſſadors with preſents to the yong king, which were three beautifull horſes, with their bridles of gold, and their trappings richly ſet with pretious ſtones, and three royall robes of cloth of gold, & vnto the chiefe of the nobility he ſent rich gownes and chains of gold. The embaſſadors which brought theſe preſents, in curteous manner requeſted of the Queene, to ſend the yong king her ſon, attended with his nobility, into the campe, and without all feare, to hope that all ſhould go well both with her and her ſon: for that Solyman, who exceeded all other kings, not in power and fortune only, but in vertue and vpright dealing alſo, was of ſuch an heroicall diſpoſition, that he would not onely defend the childe, whom in the right of his father he had once thought worthy his protection and fauor, victory confirming the ſame, but would alſo augment his eſtate, with the F largeſt bounds of his antient kingdome. Wherefore he was deſirous to ſee the yong king, and to behold him in the repreſentation of his father, and with his own hand to deliuer him to be imbraced of his ſons; that of his protection renewed, ſo happily begun, might be grounded a firme and perpetuall friendſhip with the Othoman kings: and that he would alwaies account of her as of his daughter. But the cauſe why he came not to ſee her, which he did in curteſie de-Solyman ſends for the young King into the campe.

ſire,was for that by antient cuſtome the Othoman Kings were forbidden that point of curteſie, to viſit other mens wiues in their houſes. Beſides that, Solyman (they ſaid) was not ſo forgetfull of his modeſty and honour,as to receiue into his pauillion the daughter of a King his friend and allie,and ſhe the late wife of a King his friend and tributary, and the faire young mother of a ſonne, growing in the hope of like regall dignity, for feare he ſhould draw into any ſuſpition the inuiolate name of her chaſtity, which in Queenes was to be guarded with an eſpeciall and wonderfull care. Whereunto the Queene (a manifeſt feare confounding the tender ſences in her motherly affection) anſwered very doubtfully; but the Biſhop perſuading her, and inſtantly requeſting her, not to giue the Turks occaſion to ſuſpect, that ſhe had them in diſtruſt,by her little and vnprofitable delay; ſent her young ſon in Princely ſwathing clothes, in a rich chariot,with his nurſe and certaine great ladies vnto the campe, attended vpon with almoſt all the nobility to whom Solyman had ſent Preſents. In his comming to the campe, he was for honours ſake met vpon the way by certaine gallant troups of the Turks braue horſemen: and all the way as he paſſed in the camp,orderly ſtood the Ianizaries of Solymans guard. As ſoone as he was brought into the campe,Solyman courteouſly looked vpon him,and familiarly talked with the nurſe, and commanded his ſons there preſent to take him in their armes, and to kiſſe him,in certaine tokens of the loue they would beare him, whom they were in time to haue their friend and tributary, when he was growne to mans eſtate: theſe were Selymus and BajaZet,begotten of his faire concubine Roxolana, bearing the names, the one of his grandfather, the other of his great grandfather. As for Muſtapha his eldeſt ſonne by his Circaſſian wife,he then liued in Magneſia a great way off; who though he was a Prince of ſo great hope, as neuer any of the Turkiſh kings had a ſonne of greater, and was therefore exceedingly beloued of the men of war; yet was he not ſo well liked of his father, brought out of fauour with him by Roxolana,as if he had traiterouſly gone about to take the Empire from him,yet liuing, as did Selymus his grandfather from Bajazet: for which cauſe Solyman ſecretly purpoſed to take him away, as afterwards he did, and to appoint Selymus for his ſucceſſour, as hereafter ſhall appeare.

The Queen ſendeth the young King her ſon to Solyman in the camp, attended with the Nobility.

Solyman curteouſly receiueth the young king.

Solyman craftily taketh the city of Buda.

But Solyman at ſuch time as the Noblemen of Hungary were dining merrily with the Baſſa's, had commanded certain companies (to whom he had before giuen inſtructions what he would haue done) vnder the colour of ſeeing the city, to take one of the gates called Sabatina, and the chiefe ſtreets: which was done ſo quietly and cunningly, that a wary watchman ſtanding there, and beholding the manner of the Turks comming and going too and fro, could hardly haue perceiued how the gate was taken, vntill it was too late. For many of the Turkes walking faire and ſoftly by great companies into the city, as if it had bin but for pleaſure, to haue ſeen it; and otherſome to colour the matter, walking likewiſe backe againe, as if they had ſufficiently viewed the city; by that meanes they without any tumult or ſtirre quickely tooke the appointed gate,with the market place and chiefe ſtreets of the city. Which ſo finely done,the captaine of the Ianizaries cauſed proclamation to be made in all parts of the city, That the citiſens ſhould without feare keepe themſelues within their houſes, and forthwith, as they would haue their liues, liberty, and goods ſaued, to deliuer all their weapons: which they ſeeing no remedy, did: and hauing deliuered their armes, and taken the Turks faith for their ſecurity,they receiued them into their houſes as their vnwelcome gheſts. But ſuch was the quietnes and modeſty of the Turks, by reaſon of the ſeuerity of their martiall diſcipline, that no citiſen which tooke them into their houſes, was by them wronged by word or deed. Solyman vnderſtanding that the city was thus quietly and without reſiſtance taken, ſent the childe backe againe vnto the Queene,although it was now almoſt night; but the chiefe noblemen he retained ſtill with him: theſe were George the Biſhop and Treaſurer, Petrus Vicche the young Kings nigh kinſman and one of his Tutors, Valentinus Turaccus Generall of the Queens forces, Stephanus Verbetius Chancellor, and Bacianus Vrbanus Gouernour of the city of Buda. This ſudden and vnexpected change exceedingly troubled all their mindes, and ſo much the more; for that the great Baſſa's with changed countenance began to picke quarrels with them, and as it were ſtreightly and impudently to examine them, and to call them to account for all that they had done. The Queene ſeeing the city ſo craftily ſurpriſed, and the nobility iniuriouſly detained in the campe, troubled with feare and griefe, by humble letters requeſted Solyman not to forget the faith he had long before giuen vnto her, and euen of late confirmed Solyman deteineth the Noblemen of Hungary in his campe.

A by his Embaſſadors; but mindfull both thereof, and of his wonted clemency, to ſend backe vnto her the Noblemen, who for their fidelity and valiant ſeruice had well deſerued both of him and her: this ſhe did by Ruſtemes Baſſa, whom ſhe had loded with gifts, and amongſt other things of great price, had ſent him a faire coronet of her owne, and a goodly jewell ſet with rich ſtone, to ſend vnto his wife (Solymans daughter) for a Preſent.

After that, Solyman conſulted with his Baſſaes foure daies, what order to take concerning the kingdome of Hungary: in diſcourſe whereof his great Baſſaes were of diuers opinions. Mahometes aduiſed him to carry away with him to Conſtantinople, both the young childe and all the Nobility, and to leaue ſuch a gouernour in Buda, as by his wiſe and moderate gouernment, rather than by rigour, might put the people out of feare of ſeruitude and bondage; B by defending them from wrong, and yet by little and little lay vpon them the yoke of the Turkiſh gouernement. But Ruſtemes Baſſa (before corrupted, and a man in greater fauour than the reſt, becauſe he was Solymans Son in law, and therefore further from all ſuſpition of flattery;) ſtood altogether vpon tearmes of honour: ſaying, That nothing could be more diſhonourable vnto ſo great and mighty a Monarch, who neuer had at any time with any ſpot or ſtaine blemiſhed the glory of his name, than after victory, againſt all right and reaſon to breake his faith at once with a weake woman and ſilly infant, whom he had before taken vpon him to protect and defend. On the other ſide, Mahometes Gouernour of Belgrade (an old mortall enemy of the Chriſtians, of all the reſt beſt acquainted with the ſtate of Hungary, and for his great experience and approued valour, then extraordinarily admitted by Solyman C into counſell among the great Baſſaes) diſliked of both the former opinions, as too full of lenity: and beeing asked his owne, deliuered it in this miſchieuous manner as followeth:

The great Baſſaes of diuers opinions for the diſpoſing of the Kingdome of Hungary.

I know (ſaid he) moſt mighty Solyman, that he which in conſultation of matters of ſo great conſequence is to deliuer his opinion laſt, ſhall if he diſſent from the reſt, be ſubiect to enuy and reprehenſion. And therefore it cannot be, but that I being of a quite contrary opinion to them that haue before ſpoken, my ſpeech muſt alſo be vnto your eares both vnpleaſant and tedious. But I refuſe not be counted by my ſelfe, yea, and preſumptuous, if you will ſo haue it, rather than a ſmoother vp of other mens ſayings, as one of no iudgement, whileſt I recount thoſe things, which as the preſent caſe ſtandeth, may wonderfully profit D your deſignes and the Imperiall ſtate: for of right I may deſire you to yeeld a little to my yeares, and (if I may by your good fauour ſo ſay) to that I haue already done: when as I, now growne an old man in wars againſt theſe Hungarians, haue by experience learned thoſe things of the ſtate and ſtrength of this kingdome, and the diſpoſition of the people, which being here laid downe, may much auaile for your better determination of this ſo weighty a cauſe as admitteth no repentance if you ſhall now be ouerſeene therein. You haue now within the ſpace of theſe twenty yeares come in wars your ſelfe in perſon fiue times into this country, when as I no obſcure captaine or ſouldier, was in all thoſe warres and battels euer preſent, of purpoſe, as I ſuppoſe, to reuenge your iniuries, to inlarge your empire, and in briefe to aſſure you of a good peace, which could neuer be but by force of armes and victory. And therefore you valiantly won Belgrade, the infamous dwelling place and receptacle of moſt outragious theeues and robbers, and in former time famous E for the vnfortunat attempts of your anceſtors: when as from thence the Hungarians in time of peace had at their pleaſure, whileſt your father was then occupied in the Perſian war, ſpoiled the borders of Seruia, and Illyria. The ſame Hungarians about fiue yeares after, for that they had in cruell manner ſlaine your Embaſſadors, you ouerthrew in battell, and ſlew their King: and poſſeſſed of Buda, to manifeſt and make knowne by a notable demonſtration, the magnificence of your heroicall minde, euen vnto the remoteſt enemies of our name, did chuſe out of the reliques of that vanquiſhed Nation, one whom you might grace with the honour of the regall Crowne, although not borne of Royall bloud, or vnto you knowne for any other deſert, than that he was a little before both your publike and priuat enemy; and comming againſt you with a ſtrong power out of Tranſyluania, he had in the meane time loſt his brother, a better man than himſelfe, ſlaine with our ſword. After that, roſe vp the Auſtrian King, a new enemy, to expulſe this Hungarian, F reigning by your courteſie, and ſo you tooke in hand the third warre againſt the Germanes, which you ſo effectually proſecuted, that hauing forthwith reſtored the King, you carried the terrour of your ſelfe not onely to the wals of Vienna, but into the very heart of Germany. But two yeares ſcarcely paſt, the ſame King (neuer long contented with peace or warres) ſupported by the power of his brother Charles, and in vaine beſieging Buda, defended by your garriſons, ſtirred you vp againe to reuenge the injury, ſlaughter, and ſpoile by his ſouldiers done: for that you thought it to ſtand with your honour, to protect him with your power, whom you had of your rare bountty made a King; and then deſired aboue all things, to fight a noble battell with the two brethren for the Empire of the Weſt. But they at ſuch time as you with fire and ſword ran thorow their antient kingdomes, endured not the noiſe of your comming. After that, enſued a peace betweene the Hungarians and the Germans, your Majeſty permitting and approuing it, at ſuch time as you made haſte to goe againſt the Perſians: but the Germane King ſo broke that peace, that had not I in good time reuenged his treachery, by the ouerthrow of a great army of his at Exek, you muſt of neceſſity haue beene ſent for from Babylon your ſelfe, as but now you were glad to come in haſt, by long and painefull journies from Conſtantinople, to aid vs in time, and as I verily hope to make an end for all; that all things ſet in firme order in Hungary, the inconueniences of ſo many labours and ſo great charge, fiue times vndertaken for another mans profit, might now at length take end: except (as I ſee ſome wiſh) you be in minde neuer to giue ouer the protection of the childe and widow, a matter full of infinite labour and perill, not to be counteruailed with that glorious ſhew of honour, which by theſe (in my opinion) too too wiſe men is pretended to your haughty minde, euer deſirous of honour and fame. But I as a blunt man vnderſtand not this high point of wiſedome, abounding with glory, which in the very courſe thereof cutteth in ſunder the ſinewes of victory, and is neuer by politique Generals admitted into their camps. In which doing, as I wiſh you more fortunate than your anceſtors, who haue vnited eighteene kingdomes to this your Empire, ſo would I not haue you more wiſe than they: for what can be a more vnwiſe part, than alwaies to play the vnwiſe man? that is to ſay, alwaies to be carefull of other mens affaires, and in the meane time oftentimes to indanger his owne eſtate, his health, his wealth, his honour. You haue ſatiſfied, and that (in my opinion) plentifully the duties both of charity, fidelity, and if it muſt needs be ſo, of honor and glory alſo; if it be to be gotten rather by courteſie, clemency, and lenity, than by the inuincible ſtrength of wiſe policy, and the conſtant reſolution of a martiall mind: for by thoſe inſtruments, and none other, hath worthy vertues alwaies promoted and ſupported the Othoman kings. Wherefore let thoſe vaine ſhews (as ſeemeth vnto me) of counterfeit honour delight the minds of idle and ſlothfull kings: aſſuredly they neuer pleaſed your armed anceſtors; but after the enemy was quite ouerthrowne, the triumph made, and the trophies of victory erected. But let this be as beſt pleaſeth your high wiſdome and judgement, whereunto the greateſt wits giue place. Truly I (if I well foreſee the chances of war, and the aſſured euents of things) will not follow that manner of counſell which the pleaſure of my mind perſuadeth me vnto; when as neceſſity, which ruleth all things, preſently forceth me & ſheweth me a far better courſe. The Hungarians aboue all other things notably warne vs not to truſt them, who infamous for their inconſtancy, after reuolt and trechery, are ſtill at variance amongſt themſelues; and their baniſhed men are continually ſetting on the Germans to inuade the country, and the weake power of the Queene and the child is not ſuch as may withſtand ſo neere and ſo mighty an enemy: ſo that another mans kingdome muſt of neceſſity be defended by our helpe, which may not be leſſe than a ſtrong army, without our great perill. To be briefe, euery yeare to take in hand ſo long an expedition of ſo great labour and trauell, with an army furniſhed with horſemen, footmen, artillery, and a fleet of ſhips for the defence of another man, as commonly we do, ſeemeth vnto me meere madneſſe: neither do I thinke it to ſtand with the Majeſty of the Othoman Emperors, thus to be moued euery yeare at the requeſt of a puling woman, crying for helpe: except you thinke it more profitable and honourable to maintaine a defenſiue than an inuaſiue war: Wherefore (in my opinion) it is beſt to turn this kingdome (ſo often conquered and defended by law of Armes) after the manner of your anceſtors, into the forme of a prouince: the Queene I would haue ſent to her father, and the boy her ſonne brought vp in your court at Conſtantinople, and there inſtructed in our religion: the nobility of the country I wiſh to be ſlaine, and their caſtles raſed, and the notable families which bare the braueſt minds, to be carried away out of all parts of the country into Aſia: as for the baſe multitude, I would haue kept vnder with good garriſons, to till the ground, and inhabit the cities. By this only means (mighty Solyman) ſhall both the Hungarians perceiue themſelues conquered, and the Germans glad to forbeare comming into Hungary, vnleſſe they will raſhly and vnfortunatly hazard both Styria and Auſtria.

Miſchieuous counſell.

Solyman entreth Buda the 30 of Auguſt 1541, & there firſt ſacrificeth after the Mahometan manner.

But Solyman thinking it good to doe ſacrifice before he would reſolutely determine of ſo great a matter, entred into Buda with his two ſonnes, Selymus and Bajazet, the thirtieth of Auguſt in the yeare 1541: and there in the Cathedrall Church dedicated to the Virgin Mary (being before by his prieſts purified after the manner of their ſuperſtition) ſacrificed the firſt Maho-

A Mahometan ſacrifice in Buda. Shortly after, he as it were moderating the opinions of his great counſellors,prouided out of them all both for his owne ſecurity and honour, and publiſhed a decree,the fatall doome of that flouriſhing kingdome, where vnder it yet groaneth at this day;That Buda ſhould from that day be kept with a garriſon of Turks,and the kingdome conuerted into a Prouince of the Turkiſh Empire ; and the queene with her yong ſon ſhould preſently depart the City, and liue in Lippa, in a fertile and quiet Country beyond the riuer of Tibiſcus,which ſomething to comfort her, was neere vnto the borders of her father Sigiſmund his kingdome,to be ſafely conducted thither with all her wealth and jewels by his Ianidaries.
Wherefore the Queene and her Son,according to this Decree,with teares and mourning, deteſting in her heart the Tyrants perfidious dealing (which neceſſity inforced her then to diſſemble) departed from Buda, conſtrained by the Turks to leaue behind her all the ordnance B in the caſtle and city,with all other the warlike prouiſion and ſtore of victuall.The Nobleman went with her alſo,who although they went ſorrowfull for this wofull and vnexpected change of things, yet were they very glad of their liberty and ſafety,whereof they had for the ſpace of three daies diſpaired. Only Valentinus was kept in ſafe cuſtody in the campe,becauſe he was a martiall man of greateſt power amongſt the Hungarians ; and beſides that, much hated of the Turks for the hard purſuit of Caſon and his horſemen, ſlaine at Storamberg in Auſtria.
Thus the royall city of Buda fell into the hands of the Turks, whereupon not long after enſued the finall ruine of that kingdome,ſometime the ſtrong Bulwarke of Chriſtendome, but loſt to the great weakning of the Chriſtian Common-weale ; which may juſtly be imputed to the pride,ambition,and diſſention of the Hungarians amongſt themſelues,and the calling C in of the common enemy : the due conſideration of whoſe onely comming, might well haue ſufficed to haue ſet them agreed.

The doome of Hungary.

The Queene departeth out of Buda with her Sonne.

Whileſt theſe things were doing at Buda, King Ferdinand expecting the euent of this war at Vienna,& hearing of the ſhamefull loſſe of his army,and that the Generall deadly wounded was fled to Comara,and that Solyman(fame increaſing the euill newes)was comming towards Vienna ; ſent Leonardus Velſius (who neuer liked of the ſiege of Buda) to Comara, to ſtay the further flight of the ſoldiers, and to gather together ſo well as he could the diſperſed reliques of the ſcattered army, and to comfort againe the diſcouraged men with the hope of new ſupplies and of pay. And ſomewhat to ſtay Solyman, who as it was thought would ſuddenly come D to Vienna, he ſent County Salma, and Sigiſmund Letheſtaine, a noble and graue counſellor, his Embaſſadors,with Preſents and new conditions of peace to Solyman. The preſents were a high ſtanding cup of gold after the German faſhion, curiouſly ſet with ſtones : and a wonderfull globe of ſiluer of a moſt rare & curious deuice,daily expreſſing the hourely paſſing of the time, the motion of the planets, the change and full of the Moone, the motion of the ſuperiour orbes,euer mouing by certaine wheeles or weights curiouſly conueied within the ſame, and exactly keeping due time and motion ; liuely expreſſing the wonderfull motions and conuerſions of the celeſtiall frame. A moſt curious and ſtrange piece of worke, deuiſed and perfected by the moſt cunning Aſtronomers for Maximilian the Emperour,whoſe noble minde neuer ſpared for any coſt to obtaine things of rare and ſtrange deuiſe. The Embaſſadors paſſing E downe the riuer of Danubius,were at their landing firſt receiued by Caſon the Admirall of Solymans fleet,and by him brought into a rich tent,the ground vnder their feet being all couered with rich carpets : to whom Ruſtan Baſſa ſent ſuch good cheere as the campe afforded, but eſpecially moſt excellent wine, no leſſe forbidden the Turks by their law,than deſired of the Germans. The next day after,the great Baſſaes feaſted the Embaſſadors, Solyman himſelfe dyning not far off in his pauillion : at which feaſt the Baſſaes for the more courteſie dined with the embaſſadors,not ſitting with their legs gathered vnder them flat vpon the ground, as their maner was,but ſitting in chaires at a high table,after the manner of the Chriſtians:only Mahometes Gouernour of Belgrade, for his age and valour an extraordinary gheſt, ſat downe vpon a cuſhion beneath the Baſſaes. Their cheere was only Rice and Mutton,and that ſo plainly and F ſparingly dreſſed, as if they had thereby noted our gourmandiſe and exceſſe ; who meaſure not our cheere by that which nature requireth, but that which greedy appetite deſireth, as if therein conſiſted the greateſt nobility : and the drinke for the great Baſſaes themſelues,right eaſie to be had,was faire water out of the riuer Danubius. After dinner the embaſſadors were brought in vnto Solyman, each of them led betwixt two Baſſaes holding them faſt by the armes as it had been for honours ſake,and ſo brought to kiſſe his hand. For the Turks ſuffer G no ſtranger otherwiſe to come vnto the preſence of their ſuſpitious Emperour, but firſt they ſearch him that he haue no weapon about him, and ſo claſping him by the armes vnder the colour of doing him honour,diſſemblingly bereaue him of the vſe of his hands, leſt he ſhould offer him any violence : yet hath he alwaies as he ſitteth in his Throne, lying at hand ready by him,a targuet, a ſcimiter, an yron maſe, with bow and arrowes. The great Globe was alſo brought in by twelue of the Embaſſadors ſeruants,which with the ſtrangeneſſe thereof filled the minde of Solyman, and the eies of his Baſſaes with admiration : for Solyman was of ſo ſharpe a wit, that he was not learned onely in ſuch bookes as contained the lawes and rites of the Mahometane ſuperſtition, but had alſo curiouſly ſtudied Aſtronomy, and eſpecially Coſmography, in which profitable and pleaſant ſtudy he much recreated himſelfe as his leiſure H ſerued. The Embaſſadors deſired that he would giue the kingdome of Hungary to King Ferdinand, almoſt vpon the ſame conditions that Laſcus had before required it for him at Conſtantinople,paying him ſuch yearely tribute as King Iohn had vſually paid,and promiſing farther to draw Charles the Emperor his brother into the ſame league : ſo that Solyman deliuered of all feare that way, might at his pleaſure turne his forces vpon the Perſian, which it was thought he moſt deſired. Beſides that, they ſaid he ſhould deale neither honourably nor indifferently, if he ſhould prefer the young child before King Ferdinand,who beſide his antient right vnto that kingdome,(which they were not now to vrge, as oppreſſed by his happy victories,but might in time be reuiued) had alſo a late intereſt by a league betwixt him and King Iohn, wherein he had expreſly couenanted by the ſolemne conſent of the greateſt part of his I Nobility,that King Ferdinand ſhould ſucceed him in the kingdome. Whereby they excuſed him of the late war, as iuſtly taken in hand againſt the Queene and her Son vſurping vpon his right; which King Iohn knowing to be good, and moued with conſcience, had by his ſolemne act acknowledged, though to the great offence and preiudice of Solyman his ſetter vp and defender, as alſo to the touching of himſelfe in honour, to haue ſo vnthankefully and fraudulently dealt with his Patron, to whom he was by the oath of obedience bound. Wherefore they requeſted, that ſith he being a Prince of all others moſt mighty and magnificent, ſtanding vp-on his vpright dealing both in peace and war, had ſo lightly regarded the ſly dealing of ſo vngratefull a man: he would rather accept of King Ferdinand ſo many waies iniured, as his friend and tributary, than to haue him his perpetuall enemy. Concluding, That nothing K could be vnto him, for the good report of his iuſtice more commendable, or for the aſſurance of a perpetuall peace more profitable, or to the immortall praiſe of his bounty more honourable, than to call a King of a moſt antient diſcent, famous for his vertue and fidelity, choſen for a king by the Bohemians, deſired for a King by the Hungarians, Emperor elect of the Ro-mane Empire by the Germans, and the naturall brother of the great Emperour, his tributary King of Hungary. Solyman with cheerefull countenance accepting and commending of the Preſents,anſwered them two daies after by Ruſtan the Baſſa his ſon in law, that this was his reſolute condition of peace and friendſhip ; If King Ferdinand would forthwith reſtore all the cities, townes, and caſtles, which were before belonging to King Lewis, and for euer after ab-ſtaine from Hungary : and whereas he had beene ſo often prouoked by him to warre, and had L therein beſtowed ſo great charges,and taken ſo much trauell,he could for that be content with an eaſie paine(which ſhould be for his great honour) to impoſe an eaſie tribute vpon Auſtria : vpon which conditions he was content to enter into league with them ; but if ſo be that thoſe conditions ſeemed vnto them too heauy,and that they would rather make choice of war than peace,he would bring to paſſe by continuall war, that ſuch things as they had taken from the kingdome of Hungary,ſhould be requited with the deſtruction of Auſtria. But the Embaſſa-dours, although they were much moued at the proud demand of tribute for Auſtria, as that wherein the two brethren of mighty power, Charles the Emperor and King Ferdinand were diſdainefully abuſed ; to keepe the beſt courſe of their negotiation, and to win ſome time in ſo hard eſtate of things ; required a truce vntill ſuch time as King Ferdinand and the Emperour M his brother might be made acquainted with the matter,. Which their repueſt, the Turke (perceiuing their drift & purpoſe)would in no caſe grant,for Winter was now faſt comming on. It was lawfull for the Embaſſadours all the time they were in the Turks campe, to view euery part thereof, Ruſtan Baſſa conducting them from place to place : where aboue all things, they moſt wondred at the perpetuall and dumbe ſilence of ſo great a multitude, the ſouldiers being ſo ready and attentiue, that they were no otherwiſe commanded but by the becking of the hand, or a nod of their commanders: they marueiled alſo at the exquiſit order and ſweetneſſe of the Turks campe, finding therein nothing diſordered or noyſome; ſo that it ſeemed not the campe of ſuch a rude and barbarous nation, but rather of them which were the authors of martiall diſcipline. The Embaſſadors being rewarded and ſo ſent away, Solyman commanded the old Gouernor of Belgrade to ſpoile the borders of Auſtria all alongſt Danubius: Caſon alſo Generall of the voluntary horſemen, he ſent into Morauia for like purpoſe; who neither of them did any great harme, by reaſon of the ſudden riſing of the great riuers, with the abundance of raine then falling in Autumne. After that, Solyman appointed one Solyman an Hungarian (who taken priſoner in his youth by the Turks, had from that time followed the Mahometan ſuperſtition) Gouernor of Buda: who by the vpright adminiſtration of iuſtice, and the courteous vſing of the people, with Verbetius the old Chancellor, ſhould do what was poſſible to put the people in hope of long peace and tranquility. Which things done, after he had ſtaid about 20 daies at Buda, he determined to returne againe into Thracia, becauſe the rain of Autumna & the cold of Winter was now come in: and was alſo in doubt to be ſhut in with the riſing of the great riuers, wherewith the country of Hungary is in euery place ſo watered, and on euery ſide ſo compaſſed, that it is a hard mutter to paſſe. By the way he ſet Laſcus, King Ferdinands embaſſador, again at liberty, whom he had left in priſon at Belgrade: but he long injoyed not that benefit: for ſhortly after returning into Polonia, he died of the flix; which cauſed many to ſuppoſe, that he was poiſoned by the Turks. A man for his vertue and learning, famous, worthy of a longer life, whoſe death the King himſelfe much lamented.

Solyman returneth towards Conſtantinople.

Laſcus ſet at liberty by Solyman, ſhortly after dieth.

As Solyman was returning into Thracia, and was come to the riuer Drauus, it was told him, That Stephen Maylat, Vayuod of Tranſyluania, who tooke King Ferdinand his part, a profeſſed enemy of the Turks, was taken, by the cunning of Peter of Moldauia, and Prince of Valachia; and that all the country of Tranſyluania was well pacified, and yeelded to his obedience. Of which newes Solyman was paſſing glad; for he exceedingly hated Maylat, a martiall man of a froward nature, deſirous of rule, and ready vpon any occaſion to reuolt; foraſmuch as he remembred Grittus his Legat, and the Turks by him ſlaine, and knew alſo, that the Tranſyluanians, an inuincible people, borne to trouble, and more delighting in vncertain war than aſſured peace, was by him ſtirred vp, whom he wiſhed rather by gentleneſſe to appeaſe, than by force of armes and ſtrong hand to ſubdue. But becauſe we haue oftentimes before made mention of this Maylat, of whoſe taking Solyman ſo much reioyced, it ſhall not be amiſſe in few words to declare in what fineneſſe he fell into the hands of this treacherous and bloudy man, Peter of Moldauia.

This Moldauian by the commandement of Solyman (as is aforeſaid) had ioyned his forces with Achomates, Gouernor of Nicopolis, againſt Maylat; which being vnited, were in number 50000 horſemen beſide footmen; which after the manner of thoſe countries, were not many, euery man almoſt in the country, be he neuer ſo poore, keeping a horſe to ſerue vpon. Maylat beſet with the multitude of his enemies, and finding himſelfe too weake to encounter them, deſpairing alſo of aid from King Ferdinand, whom he knew to be buſied in a greater war, forſooke the field, and fled again into the ſtrong town of Fogaras, as he had done the yere before, when he was ouercharged by king Iohns power: for there as in a moſt ſtrong place both by nature and fortification, he had laid vp his greateſt ſubſtance & prouiſion for the wars, but eſpecially the rich ſpoile he had long before taken from Grittus. Achomates comming thither with his power, and perceiuing the place was not to be battered or taken by force, but with much labour and long time, thought it beſt, to aſſey if he could ouercome him by craft and deceit. Wherefore he ſent a meſſenger vnto Maylat, to perſuade him to yeeld himſelfe vnto Solyman, and to make choice rather to be called of him his friend, than to be iudged his enemy; of whom he might well hope of all goodneſſe, which had giuen whole kingdomes vnto his enemies: promiſing that he would vſe the vttermoſt of his credit, which was not ſmall, and labour for him as his friend, that he might feele the fruit of his clemency and bounty, and ſtill enjoy the gouernment of Tranſyluania, paying him ſome ſmall yearely tribute, as hee had before requeſted: foraſmuch as hee could take no courſe better, being beſet with ſo many enemies, than to make his peace vpon reaſonable conditions, and that with as much ſpeed as G were poſſible: in which doing, beſides that he ſhould well prouide for his owne ſafety, he ſhould alſo ſaue both his wealth and honour; for Solyman was comming (as he ſaid) with his victorious army; who would with aſſured death reuenge his vaine hope of holding out the ſiege, if he ſhould vpon a ſtubborne and obſtinate mind then refuſe to obey his command.

Whereunto Maylat, who foreſaw that it was better for him to make a certaine peace, than to endure an vncertaine warre, anſwered, That he could be content to conclude a peace, ſo that it were not vpon any bad conditions; and would not greatly refuſe Solymans command, which was wont to be both reaſonable and iuſt: wherefore vpon ſufficient pledges he would come into the campe, in preſence to agree vpon the conditions of the peace, and demanded to haue Achomates his ſon, a valiant yong gentleman, deliuered in hoſtage. Which thing Achomates denied, H for that he had (as he ſaid) before giuen him to Solyman, as the manner was; and therefore had ouer him no more power: but he promiſed for him, that was but one, to giue foure of his beſt captains. Which offer Maylat (miſdoubting no deceit) accepted, and with a great and galland retinue attended vpon, came into the enemies campe, where he was courteouſly and honourably receiued. But the parly, as it could not be conueniently begun immediatly after the firſt ſalutation, ſo could it by no meanes be then ended, but was deferred vntill the next day; to the intent, that the trecherous Moldauian might take his well acquainted and well knowne gueſt, whom he had againſt that time inuited to a ſolemn banquet. By that means, the next day about the midſt of dinner, fortune ſo fauoured the intended trechery, Maylat (who was of ſo proud and cholericke a nature, that he could not well brooke the leaſt indignity) was by occaſion I of ſome inſolent ſpeech, of purpoſe miniſtred by the Moldauian gheſts, put into ſuch a fret, that laying his hand vpon his ſword, he in a rage flung from the table: at which time al the other gheſts ſtarting vp alſo, laid hands vpon him and tooke him, fuming, and in vaine crying out, that he was ſhamefully betraid. His followers were all fothwith ſtript of all their brauery by the needy Moldauians, and their horſes and armor taken from them. Whileſt Maylat was yet furiouſly exclaiming of this treaſon, in came Achomates, who to ſeeme guiltleſſe of the matter, with deep diſſimulation ſharpely reproued the falſe Moldauian, that he had in doing ſo foule a fact ſhamefully violated the lawes of hoſpitality, reuerenced of all nations, falſified the faith which he had giuen him for his ſafety, and betraid the liues of ſuch notable captains as lay in hoſtage for him. Wherunto the Moldauian (as if it had bin in contempt) ſcornfully anſwered, K that he had vpon good cauſe taken Maylat priſoner, and ſo would in ſafety keep him for Solyman, vnto whom it only belonged to judge, whether he had juſtly or vnjuſtly kept him.

Maylat commeth into the Turke campe.

Maylat trecherouſly taken priſoner by the Moldauian.

Not long after, the ſtrong towne of Fogaras was deliuered, with the hoſtages; but whether by feare or by corruption of Maylats lieutenant, is vncertaine. So Valentinus Turaccus, and Maylat, two of the greateſt noblemen of Hungary, ſufficient of themſelues to haue reſtored the Hungarian kingdome (firſt rent in ſunder with ciuill diſcord, and afterward with the inuaſion of the Turks) fell into the hands of the enemy, not vanquiſhed in battel, but deceiued by treaſon.
The towne being thus ſurrendred, almoſt all the country of Tranſyluania, was by Solymans conſent deliuered to the yong king, vnto whom al the people moſt willingly ſubmitted themſelues, L and tooke the oath of obedience, remembring that his father had almoſt for thirty yeares ſpace with great iuſtice and quietneſſe gouerned that prouince; and with many preſents honoured the young King lying in Lippa, with the Queene his mother, and his two tutors, the Biſhop, and Vicche.

Tranſyluania giuen by Solyman to the young King.

At the ſame time, Charles the Emperor at the importunat ſuit of his ſubiects of Spaine, had prepared a great force both by ſea and land for the conquering of Algiers: from whence the Turkiſh pyrats did ſo infeſt all that coaſt of the country, from Gades to the mountains Pyrenei, that the Spaniards (all trade of merchandiſe being ſet apart) were glad to keep a continual watch and ward all alongſt that coaſt for defence of the country. Wherefore although hee well knew of the comming of the Turks to Buda, and how hardly he was by the Langraue and others ſpoken of, for leauing his brother ſo hardly beſtead, to go againſt a ſort of pirats in M where by the way he met Octauius Farneſius his ſon in law, Alphonſus Vaſtius his lieutenant, by great

A Millain, where he was with great ſolemnity joyfully receiued of the citiſens, and vnder a canopy of gold brought vnto the palace: he himſelfe going in a plain blacke cloke, and a homely cap in mourning wiſe, when as the women and vulgar people, vpon a curious ſimplicity, expected to haue ſeene ſo great an Emperor in his royall robes, gliſtering with gold and precious ſtone, and the imperiall crowne vpon his head. His heauy countenance anſwerable alſo to his attire, was much noted, as preſaging the wofull ouerthrow which was the day before receiued at Buda, but not yet knowne in Italy. From Millaine he departed to Genoa, where he was aduertiſed by letters from his brother king Ferdinand, of the ouerthrow of the Germans, of the victory of the Turks, and the comming of Solyman. Vpon which newes, Vaſtius and Auria, his two chiefe commanders, the one at land, the other at ſea, would haue perſuaded him B to haue deferred his intended expedition for Africa vntill the next Spring: and with ſuch power as he had already raiſed in Italy, and brought with him out of Germany, to ſtay ſtill in Italy, ſo to make ſhew vnto the Turks as if he would haue returned and holpen his brother: and in the meane time to aſſure himſelfe of his ſtate in Italy againſt the French, who (as it was thought) would be ready to take all occaſion of aduantage, if any miſhap ſhould befall him, either by the force of the enemy, or violence of tempeſt. But he conſtant in his former reſolution, anſwered them as they ſat in counſell, that they had perſuaded him for great reaſons to ſtay in Italy; but that he was for far greater to paſſe into Africke: for if he ſhould then ſtay in Italy, it would be thought, that he was for feare of the Turks fled out of Germany: which diſgrace could no otherwiſe be preuented, but by the preſent proſecution of the former determination C for Algiers, and ſatisfying the expectation of his ſubjects of Spaine; and ſo by ſea valiantly to proue their better fortune, which had of late not ſo well fauoured them at land; in hope that Algiers might be woon before the ſeas ſhould grow rough and dangerous with Winter tempeſts: which if it ſhould fall out according to his mind, he would not, as he ſaid, greatly care what the French could do. Yet was it thought, That the diſſembling friendſhip betwixt the French king and him, would not long indure: and the rather, for that there was a new grudge riſen betwixt them about the death of Antonius Rinco, who for certaine yeares had lien embaſſador for the French king at Conſtantinople, to Solyman, and was a few months before ſent backe again by him into France to the king: but returning backe againe with new inſtructions from his Maſter, for the confirmation of a further league betwixt the Turkiſh D Sultan and him, he was by certaine Spaniards of the Emperors old ſouldiers, who had knowledge of his comming, belaied vpon the riuer Padus as he was going downe to Venice, ſo to haue paſſed into Epirus, and ſlaine, together with Cæſar Fregoſius: or as the common report went, firſt taken and tortured, to get from him the ſecrets of his negotiation, and afterwards ſlaine. Which report ſo much troubled Vaſtius in credit, that in purgation of himſelfe, he offered the combat to any man of like quality to himſelfe, that durſt charge him with the truth thereof. But many were of opinion that he was well and worthily taken away, for vndertaking ſo odious a charge, as to ſtir vp the Turks againſt the Chriſtians, and to ſhew vnto them ſuch opportunities as might beſt ſerue their purpoſe, by diſcouering vnto them the Emperors deſignes, to the great hurt of the Chriſtian common-weale. But were it well, or were it euill, E as Paulus the third of that name then Biſhop of Rome, meeting the Emperour at Luca as he came from Genoa, could not, or would determine, ſure it ſerued as no ſmall occaſion to ſet thoſe two great Princes againe at ods, whereby the wiſhed vnity of the Chriſtian ſtate was ſore ſhaken, and a way opened for the Turke. The Emperor at his comming to Luca, was honorably receiued by the Cardinals and Biſhops, and lodged in the court; the great Biſhop was before placed in the Biſhops palace, whither the Emperor came thrice to talke with him, and the Biſhop to him once. But the Biſhop hauing nothing at all preuailed with the Emperor and the French embaſſador, for the appeaſing of the troubles euen then like to ariſe betwixt him and the French King; did what he might to perſuade him to employ ſuch forces as he was about to paſſe ouer with into Africke, againſt the Turks in defence of his brother Ferdinand, F and of the country of Auſtria, if Solyman ſhould happily purſue his late obtained victory at Buda. But he ſtill reſolute in that fatall determination of inuading of Africke, rejected that the Biſhops requeſt alſo. So the great Biſhop hauing moued much, and preuailed little, in the greateſt matters which moſt concerned the common good, taking his leaue of the Emperour, returned by eaſie journies to Rome.

Delay in great actions hurtful

The Emperor in the mean time with certain bands of Italians, vnder the leading of Camillus Columna and Auguſtinus Spinula, and ſix thouſand Germans, came from Luca to the port Lune, and there imbarking his ſoldiers in certain merchants ſhips prouided for the purpoſe, and fiue & thirty gallies, departed thence, commanding the maſters of the ſhips to direct their courſe to the Iſlands of Baleares: but after they had put to ſea, they were by force of tempeſt ſuddenly ariſing, brought within ſight of Corſica: where after they had beene toſſed to and fro two daies in the rough ſeas, and put out of their courſe, the wind ſomething failing, they put into the hauen of Syracuſa, now called Bonifacium. The diſperced fleet once come together into the port of Syracuſa, and the rage of the ſea well appeaſed, he put to ſea againe for the Iſlands Beleares, now called Majorca, and Minorca: where in his courſe he met with a tempeſt from the Weſt, more terrible and dreadfull than the firſt: wherin diuers of the gallies hauing loſt their maſts and ſailes, were glad with extreame labour and perill in ſtriuing againſt the wrought ſea to get into a harbor of the leſſer Iſland, taking name of Barchinus Mago the famous Carthagenenſian, whoſe name it retaineth vntil this day. From hence the Emperor with all his fleet paſſed ouer to the greater Iſland, being wonderfull glad that Ferdinand Gonzaga his Viceroy in Sicilia was in good time come with the Sicilian gallies and ſhips of Italy, in number a hundred and fifty ſaile, wherein he had brought ſuch ſtore of bisket and victual, as might haue ſufficed for a long war. Mendoza was alſo expected to haue come thither with his fleet from Spaine; but he by reaſon of contrary winds being not able to hold that courſe, altered his purpoſe according to the tempeſt, and ſo happily cut ouer directly to Algiers. So the Emperour nothing miſdoubting the carefull diligence of Mendoza, and thinking that which was indeed already chanced, and the wind now ſeruing faire, by the perſuaſion of Auria his Admirall hoiſed ſaile, aud in two daies came before Algiers, and there in a goodly order came to anker before the city in the ſight of the enemy. Whileſt the fleet thus lay, two of the pyrats which had beene abroad at ſea ſeeking for prize, returning to Algiers, not knowing any thing of the fleet, fell into the bay amongſt them before they were aware: the bigger whereof Viſcontus Cicada ſtemmed with his gally and ſunke him, the other with wonderfull celerity got into the hauen. In the meane time Mendoza with his gallies had paſſed the promontory of Apollo now called the cape of Gaſſineus, and in token of honour ſaluting the Emperour after the manner at ſea, with all his great ordnance, gaue him knowledge that the Spaniſh fleet was not far behind. In this fleet was aboue a hundred tall ſhips of Biſcay & the low countries, and of other ſmaller veſſels a far greater number. In theſe ſhips beſides the footmen, was embarked a great number of braue horſemen out of all parts of Spaine: for many noble Gentlemen had voluntarily of their owne charge gallantly furniſhed themſelues with braue armour and couragious horſes, to ſerue their Prince and country againſt the Infidels. Ouer theſe choice men commanded Ferdinand of Toledo, Duke of Alba, for his approued valour then accounted a famous captain. Theſe ſhips going altogether with ſails, were not yet able to double the cape as did Mendoza with his gallies, for now it was a dead calme: howbeit the billow of the ſea went yet high, by reaſon of the rage of the late tempeſt, and did ſo beat againſt the plain ſhoare, that it was not poſſible to land the ſouldiers, but that they muſt needs be waſhed vp to the middle: which thing the Emperour thought it not good to put them vnto, and ſo to oppoſe them ſea-ſicke and thorow wet againſt the ſudden and deſperat aſſaults of their fierce enemies. He alſo ſtaied for the comming of the Spaniſh ſhips, for two cauſes: firſt, That he might with his vnited power more ſtrongly aſſault the city, and terrifie the enemy; then, To communicat the whole glory of the action with the Spaniards, at whoſe requeſt and forwardneſſe & greateſt charge he had vndertaken that war. Which fatal delay of two daies, although it was grounded vpon good reaſon, did not only diſturbe an aſſured victory, but to the notable hurt of the whole army, opened a way to all the calamities which afterward inſued.

The Emperour ſendeth a meſſenger to Aſſan-Aga Gouernor of Algiers for Barbaruſſa.

In the meane while the Emperor ſent a conuenient meſſenger to Aſanagus, otherwiſe and more truly called Aſſan-Aga, or Aſſan the eunuch; who with a little flag of truce in his hand making ſigne of a parley, and anſwered by the Moores with like, as their manner is, went on ſhore, and was of them courteouſly receiued and brought to Aſſan. This Aſſan was an eunuch, borne in Sardinia, brought vp from his youth in the Mahometan ſuperſtition by Barbaruſſa, a man both politicke and valiant, and by him left for the keeping of his kingdome of Algiers in his abſence with Solyman. This meſſenger brought into his preſence, required him

A forthwith to deliuer vp the city (firſt ſurpriſed by force and trechery by Horruccius, and afterwards to the deſtruction of mankind, fortified by Hariadenus Barbaruſſa his brother) to Charles the mighty Emperor, come in perſon himſelfe to be reuenged on thoſe horrible pyrats: which if he would do, it ſhould be lawfull for the Turks to depart whither they would, and for the naturall Moores to abide ſtill, with their goods and religion wholly reſerued vnto them vn-touched, as in former time: and for himſelfe, he ſhould receiue of the Emperor great rewards both in time of peace and warres, ſo that he would remember himſelfe, that he was borne in Sardinia, and was once a Chriſtian, and accept of the faireſt occaſion which could poſſibly be offered for him to returne againe to the worſhipping of the true God, and to injoy the fauour and bounty of the moſt mighty Emperour, and withall to reuenge himſelfe of the cruell ty-B rant Barbaruſſa, for the vnnaturall villany done vnto his perſon. But if he would needs dally on the time, and make proofe of the ſtrength of ſo great preparation, he ſhould vndoubtedly, with the reſt of his followers, receiue the ſame reward of his obſtinacy, which they had to the example of others, receiued at Tunes. Whereunto the vngracious eunuch anſwered, That hee thought him altogether mad, that would follow his enemies counſell, and with a grinning countenance askt him, Vpon what hope the Emperor truſted to be able to win the city? The meſſenger pointing with his finger directly toward the fleet, told him, That which you ſee, with his great artillery, and valour of his ſouldiers, both horſe and foot: whereat the eunuch ſcornefully laughing, replied, And we with like force and valor will defend this city, and make of Didacus Vera, and Hugo Montada to them of Algiers, and alſo prefixed a time when as the Chriſtian Emperor aduenturing to beſiege that city, ſhould there receiue great loſſe both by ſea and land. The fame of which blind propheſie ſeruing fitly to confirme the hope of good ſucces in the minds of the vulgar multitude, Aſſan ſo fed and augmented (although he himſelf being a crafty wiſe fellow, beleeued no ſuch vanity) that he did therwith not onely encourage his own ſoldiers, but alſo ſtrucke a terror into the minds of the weaker ſort of his enemies, ſee-ing themſelues caſt vpon ſo dangerous a coaſt vpon the approch of Winter. There was in gar-riſon in the city about 800 Turks, and moſt of them horſemen, but ſuch, as whoſe valour and D reſolution far exceeded their number. For Aſſan had loſt many of his beſt men, ſome in fight againſt Mendoſa, and otherſome at ſea, ſlaine or taken by Auria in Corſica; and in other places by the Rhodian, Neapolitan, and Sicilian gallies; but many moe were by his leaue gone to aid the Moores againſt the Portingals: the other multitude did ſcarce make vp the number of 5000; which were partly naturall Moores borne in that country, and partly ſuch as were born in Granado; to whom were joined many fugitiues out of the Iſlands of Majorca and Minorca, who in former time hauing entred into rebellion, and fearing condigne puniſhment, were fled to Algiers, and there reuolted to the Mahometan ſuperſtition. But the captaines of the wild Numidians made vp a great number both of horſe and foot, which lying ſtragling without the city in the open fields, ſhould night and day vex and moleſt the Chriſtians. This bru-E tiſh people, naturally enemies vnto the Chriſtians, had Aſſan with rewards and hope of a rich ſpoile, allured out of the countries thereabout to aid him: neither was it lawfull for any man to carry his wife or children out of the city, into places of more ſafety farther off, or to ſhew any ſmall token of feare, pain of death being by the imperious eunuch propoſed to whoſoeuer ſhould but looke heauily for feare of danger, or ſpeake a word ſauouring of cowardiſe. The Emperour by Auria making choice of a moſt conuenient place for landing his men, laid his gallies ſo cloſe to his tall ſhips, that his armed ſoldiers might with eaſe come out of the high built ſhips into them, and ſo out of them into the long boats, to be forthwith ſet on ſhore. And ſuch was the ſpeedy diligence of them that had the charge of that matter, and the plenty of boats ſtill ready to receiue the ſouldiers as faſt as they could come out of the gallies, that the F footmen were in a very ſhort time all landed. The Emperour hauing a little reſted and refre-ſhed his ſoldiers, diuided his army into three equal battels, which was in number about twenty thouſand footmen, beſides horſemen, and others, who of their owne voluntary will then followed the Emperors fortune. Vnto euery battaile he appointed three field pieces, to terrifie the Numidian horſemen, which were ſtill pricking vp and downe about them, ready to charge if they could take them at any aduantage. And ſo ſetting forward a few furlongs, encamped G in a ſtrong and conuenient place, neere vnto the city, betweene two deepe ditches, which the water falling from the mountaines had naturally worne ſo deepe, that neither horſeman nor footman could well paſſe ouer, but by bridge: and faſt by vpon the left hand was a hill, from the top whereof it ſeemed the city might with great ordnance well be battered.

A maruellous tempeſt.

The city of Algiers, ſometime the royall ſeat of the great King Iuba, called of the Romans Iulia Cæſarea, is in forme of a triangle, ſcituat faſt by the ſea towards the North, hauing a hauen, but neither great, neither ſafe for the North wind. The houſes farther off from the ſea, ſtand in ſeemly order vpon the riſing of a ſteep hill, as it were vpon degrees; in ſuch ſort, that the windows of one row ſtill ouerlooks the tops of the next beneath it, into the ſea, moſt beautifull to behold. The Emperor hauing diuided his campe into three parts, euery nation by H themſelues, lying on the Eaſt ſide of the towne, was in great hope to win it; and the rather, for that whilſt he aſſaulted it on that ſide, his ſhips & gallies from the North ſide, might in time of the aſſault with their great ordnance beat the enemy all alongſt the wall: which ſtill riſing higher and higher according to the riſing of the ſteep hill, could not conueniently be defended with one bulwarke, as we ſee it may in plaine ground. Neereſt vnto the riſing of the hils, lay the Spaniards: in the midſt, the Germans with the Emperor; and in the plaine neereſt to the ſea, the Italians. In the mean time whilſt the great ordnance was landing, & the horſes vnſhipping, the Numidians with a hidious outcry ſhew'd themſelues vpon the tops of the mountains aboue the Spaniards, and from thence eaſily gauled them with their darts and ſhot: for they nimbly running to and fro in the known paths of the rough mountains, would ſuddenly I and fiercely aſſaile them, but after the manner of their nation skirmiſhing a far off, rather than neere at hand. In which maner of light skirmiſhes, all the day was ſpent vntill night, with ſmal danger, but much trouble to the Spaniards. And when night was come, theſe wild people, one company ſtill ſucceeding another in the place they had before taken, neuer left ſhooting, for whereſoeuer they ſaw any fire in the Spaniſh camp, thither came arrows, darts, and ſtones flying as thicke as haile: for remedy whereof, the Spaniards were glad to put out their fires, and with ſilence to expect the day, that they might come neerer vnto them. Wherefore as ſoone as the ſun was vp, the Spaniards by the perſuaſion of Aluares Sandes, maſter of the camp, valiantly climing vp the high mountaines, repulſed and put to flight the Numidians, and tooke the top of the hils, and there lay as it were incamped in the poore ſheepheards cottages. But K the ſame day ſuch a multitude of the wild people was flockt about them, that they were compaſſed in round, and glad to fight on euery ſide in a ring. Yet this fiercenes of this barbarous people, was by the valour of the Sicilian companies quickly repreſſed, whoſe pikemen gliſte-ring in their bright armour, made ſmall account of the Numidians arrowes and darts, but orderly ſtepping forwards with their pikes, & the harquebuſiers cloſe by their ſides, eaſily repulſed their naked enemies. The Numidian footmen are for moſt part youths halfe naked, with long haire not vnlike the Iriſh, vſing no other weapons but darts: they fight mingled with their horſemen, truſting the one to the other, and are of a wonderfull ſwiftneſſe and agility of body. Their horſemen vſe long ſpeares, armed at both ends, which they with a maruellous dexterity vſe, to the endangering of their enemy purſuing them: they vſe alſo long and light tar- L guets made of leather, wherwith they ſo cunningly defend themſelues & their horſes, both in their charge & retreat, that for a ſmal trifle, in reſpect of the danger, they will giue a man leaue to caſt ſeuen darts at one of them, which they will all moſt ſurely auoid, either with the ſpeare, or receiue them without harme in their targuet. In the meane time, whilſt this wild people thus skirmiſhed all the day, at night a ſudden miſchance ouerthrew all the emperors hope: for as he ſtood beholding the vnſhipping of his great ordnance, his horſes, victual, & other neceſ-ſaries of the army, a ſtorm of wind & rain began about ſix a clock in the afternoon, holding on all the night without intermiſſion, with ſuch rage, as if heauen & earth ſhould haue gon together: wherewith the whole army at land was wonderfully troubled, and a great part of the fleet at ſea by force of tempeſt driuen aground periſhed. That night 3 companies of the Italians, by M the appintment of their generall, lay without the trenches againſt the ſudden aſſault of ſo vncertain an enemy, who when they had all the night endured the vehement raine and extreme cold, were ſo ouercome with the extremity of the weather, that neither was their minds able to relieue their weake bodies, neither their feeble bodies their daunted minds: for they could neither

A neither conueniently ſtand nor lie down, al the ground being ſo myrie, that at euery ſtep they ſunk vp to the calf of the leg. Vpon theſe ſtarued companies, the Turkiſh horſmen & Moors footmen, who diligently obſerued the watch of the Chriſtians, perceiuing their diſtres, ſuddenly ſallied out in the dawning of the day, and ſo fiercely charged them, their match and powder being now ſo wet that they could not vſe their pieces, that they all fled except a few pikemen, who made a ſtand, & were all quickly ſlain by the Turks who ſo deſperatly purſued the reſt in chaſe, that they followed them ouer the trench into the camp. This alarm beeing heard, Camillus Columna the Italian General came preſently thither, being ſent by the Emperor, who with certaine Companies iſſued out ouer the bridge: who now in ſhew diſcouraged with the comming out of this new ſupply, did indeed, or at leaſtwiſe made as if they did, B diſorderly retyre for fear. At which time Ferdinand Gonzaga, Viceroy of Sicilia, being a man of greateſt account in the army next to the Emperor, comming in alſo, and angry with them which had before fled; perſuaded them as valiant men to recompence their ſhameful flight with a freſh charge, by driuing the enemy home to his own doors. Which thing Columna ſaid could not be don without great peril: but Gonzaga being a man of a notable courage, deſired to haue the diſgrace which the Italians had receiued, ſalued ſome way, although it were with neuer ſo great danger; thinking alſo that it might haply fall out, that the enemy being put to flight and haſtily purſued, they might together with them enter the city, without any danger of the artillery. So without further delay, the reſt of the Italian companies were led forth of their trenches with great cheerfulnes by Auguſtine Spinula, who ſo valiantly charged C the enemies that they put them to flight, & purſued them ſo hard, that they came with them to the very gates of the City; where many ſhut out for feare of letting in the Italians with them, ſcaped by known waies, ſome to another gate, and ſome into the mountains: but then thoſe barbarous people with darts and ſhot from the wals, began to ouerwhelme the Italians which were vnaduiſedly come within their danger, and with terible outcries to terrifie them; and they which before were fled without the wals, returned again to fight. They alſo which had ſhut the gate ſallied out again, and hardly charged the Italians, who already galled with ſhot from the wals, and rent in ſunder with the great ordnance, fled moſt diſorderly; for why, they were but raw ſouldiers taken vp in haſt, little or nothing acquainted with the wars. At which time Aſſan alſo ſallying out (who was eaſily known by his countenance & rich attire) D purſued the chaſe with his troups of Turks and Moors footmen. Only certain Knights of the Rhodes fought valiantly, and retired orderly: and Spinula with ſome other gentlemen making a ſtand at a little wooden bridge, ſomwhat ſtaid the enemy, and ſaued the liues of many. So the Italians which firſt charged moſt valiantly, being in the flight become hindermoſt, the Enemy ſtriking them down as they fled, couered the fields with their dead bodies by the ſpace of half a mile, eſpecially they which fled toward the ſea, for they were circumuented & ſlain by the merciles Numidians, who beholding the ſhipwrack, were come downe to the ſea ſide for prey. But the foremoſt companies of the Italians which fled into the camp, fled in ſuch haſt, and ſo great fear, that none of the leaders in ſo great and ſudden a perplexity remembred either the Common ſafety, or performed the duty of an aduiſed Captaine: ſo that all ſeemed E at once loſt both by ſea and land. Only the Emperour, armed with an inuincible courage againſt all the chances of Fortune, and not to be diſmayed with any miſhap, was both to himſelf and others that day the beſt Captaine. For when all was almoſt loſt, hee in good time ſtayed the matter, by comming on with the ſquadron of Germans, wherof he ſent before him three enſignes to ſtay the flight, and with them as a ſure and freſh ſupply to gard his Campe beyond the bridge, which was ouer the ditch, ſeruing his Army for a trench, as we haue before ſaid. But ſuch a fear had poſſeſſed the minds of the flying Italians, and ſuch was the fierce purſuit of the enemy, that thoſe Germans (not before wont to turn their backs) as if they had bin afraid of the Turks white caps, or not able to abide their ſight, or to hold vp weapon againſt them, by and by turned their backs, and ſhamefully fled for company with the Italians. Then F the Emperor galloping forth with his horſe, and his ſword in his hand drawn, reprouing them of cowardiſe that fled, ſet forward with the German ſquadron, and with a ſtout and manlike courage ſpake to them theſe few words in their owne language: When will you (fellow ſouldiers) ſhew your faces to your proud enemies, if now when you ſhould fight for the honor of the Chriſtian name, for the glory of the German nation, for the ſafety of your own liues, in the preſence of your Emperor, you fear a few diſordred and naked Barbarians? Immediatly when hee had thus ſaid, the Germanes touched with ſhame, and diſdaining that it ſhould be thought they needed any exhortation to perform the parts of valiant ſoldiers, iſſued out againſt the enemy, who mooued with their comming, and ſeeing the Italian battel again reſtored by the valor and trauel of certaine valiant and expert captains, ſtood ſtill a while and began to retyre; whether it were becauſe they feared the great artillery and aſſault of the Germanes, or that they thought they had done enough for that ſally; when as for the ful accompliſhment of that victory they ſaw the Chriſtian fleet ouercome with a moſt horrible tempeſt, miſerably to periſh before their faces, and many of their men, eſpecially the Moors, haſted to the ſea ſide in hope of a more certain prey whereas no enemy was to be feared. For the bluſtring winds blowing from diuers quarters, as if they had conſpired to raiſe a moſt horrible tempeſt, had made ſuch a wrought ſea, & the huge billows went ſo high, that the ſhips by the violence of the weather, and rage of the ſea, put from their anchors, fel foul one of another, and were ſo loſt, or els driuen vpon the main, were there beaten in pieces in ſight of the army. So that all the ſea coaſt Weſtward, from Algiers to Cercello, lay ful of dead men and horſes, and the ribs of broken ſhips. The Numidians beholding this miſerable wrecke, came down in great companies from the mountains, & without mercy ſlew all that came aliue to land. In the ſpace of a few houres were loſt aboue 140 ſhips, and all the ſmall boats and caruels, which were in number many. Some of the Gallies, when they had from midnight to the next day at noon, by the painful labor of the mariners, and skilfulnes of the maſters, rid it out, beeing no longer able to endure the rage of the tempeſt, & fearing to be eaten vp of the ſea, with ſails and oars ran aground: but the ſouldiers and mariners ſwimming to land in hope to ſaue their liues, and thinking that the greateſt danger was then paſt, were by the Numidian horſmen which ran vp & down the ſea ſide ſlain. There might a man haue ſeen free-men of all ſorts, with tears commending their liues and liberty to their own gally-ſlaues, that by the ſpeech & intreaty of them (which by the ſudden chance of fortune had but euen now ſhaken off their irons, and with merry hearts ſwam out to their liberty) they might be ſaued from the cruelty of the fierce Numidians. It was a moſt grieuous and woful ſight for diuers hard extremities, when as euery man according to the diſpoſition of his mind, and skil in ſwimming, ſtanding doubtful in moſt aſſured death, which to receiue or to refuſe, was by fatal deſtiny drawn to his end; and either drowned in the ſea, or thruſt thorow with the enemies lance; yet moſt made choice to abide the danger of the ſea, and to expect the end of the tempeſt, rather than to haſten their end by the enemies merciles hand. By that means it came to paſſe, that that barbarous cruelty of the enemy (as a thing feared moſt of the mariners and ſoldiers) ſaued many gallies, which by the appointment of the fearful mariners & paſſengers ſhould otherwiſe haue bin run on ground. But after that, a notable gally, wherein Iannettin Auria went, was ſeen to come neer the ſhore, and to be driuen vpon the ſands by force of weather, and the beating of other gallies. The Emperor not enduring to ſee ſo valiant a yong gentleman, captain of many gallies, ſlain without help by the Moors, in the ſight of Auria his vncle, ſent by and by one of his captains called Antonius of Aragon, with three bands of Italians to the ſea ſide: by whoſe comming the Moors were put to flight, and he with the reſt in the galley ſaued; but ſo, that the ſauing of him was the loſſe of diuers other gallies. For many deliuered of the fear of the Numidians, and truſting to the reſcue of the ſouldiers come down to the ſea ſide, deſiring to ſaue themſelues from the rage of the ſea, ran their gallies on ground; and had not ſome bold Captains, grieued to ſee ſo great a loſſe, ran vp and down the banks with their drawne ſwords in their hands, and by threatening death to the gally-ſlaues and their mariners, ſtaid their rowing, moſt part of the Gallies had by the example of others periſhed. Auria, not ſo angry at himſelf as at the Emperor (who contrary to the obſeruation of skilfull ſea-men, could not be perſuaded from taking in hand that great expedition in ſo vnſeaſonable a time of the yeare) with an inuincible courage ſtroue againſt the violence of the tempeſt, & rage of the ſea: inſomuch, that being requeſted by ſome of his friends, to ſaue himſelf, whatſoeuer became of the gally; he was ſo angry therat, that he commanded them to be beſtowed vnder hatches. Four Gallies alſo of Virginius Vrſinus earle of Anguillaria, and as many of the Rhodians, after his example rid it out, the reputation of their honor exceeding the fear of death. Certain gallies alſo of Sicilia, Naples, & Spain, happily endured all the rage of the tempeſt. Yet was there fifteen great Gallies caſt away, with

the

A the loſſe wherof, beſides the loſſe of ſo many ſhips, the tempeſt ſtill enduring, ſo great ſorrow and deſperation in the woſull expectation of the wreck of all, poſſeſſed the whole army, that not only the yong ſoldiers, regarding only their own liues, but euen the moſt valiant captains, careful of the common eſtate, were vtterly diſcouraged. For neuer was army in any memory ouerwhelmed with a greater concourſe of calamities, when as all their victuals being loſt in three daies, nothing was left to relieue them withall; and they wanted tents wherin to ſhroud and reſt the ſoldiers, ſpent with hunger, labor, cold, and wounds, in ſuch perpetual raine and ſo dirty a country. In which ſo great miſeries, a wonderfull care, heauier than the former feare, exceedingly troubled the minds of all men, to think vpon that horrid wreck, when as hauing loſt ſo many ſhips, and they poor men landed in Africk, were in doubt how euer to returne again B into their natiue countries. Yet the notable courage of the emperor ſtil kept the diſtreſſed men in hope, which neuer altogether forſaketh wretched men in the midſt of their calamities: for he with a couragious heart and cheerful countenance performed all the parts of a prouident and curteous General. For when he had again made ſure his camp againſt the aſſaults of the Barbarians, he commanded the wearied captains (eſpecially the Duke of Alva, wonderfully wearied in the late skirmiſh, and dung wet) to ſpare themſelues and take their reſt: hee comforted the wounded men, cauſing them to be cheriſhed in the Tents which by chance yet ſtood (for the tempeſtuous wind had almoſt ouerthrown them all) and not ſparing himſelf for any pains, being in his armor and thorow wet, won the hearts of all his ſouldiers the more. In this conflict he loſt about 3000 men, among whom was fiue of his forward captains, C and three Knights of the Rhodes: but many more were hurt. The greateſt loſſe was thought to be in the ſhips and mariners, which was alſo increaſed by the loſſe of a wonderfull deal of great ordnance, reckoned ſo much the greater, for that it would come into the Moors hands, to the common harm of the Chriſtians, ſo ſoon as the ſea would giue them leaue to diue for it. Shortly after, Auria (as he was to foreſee a tempeſt, a wonderfull obſeruer of the heauens and of the clouds) miſtruſting that place, departed with the remainder of the fleet to the cape called Metafuſium, becauſe it was a place of ſafer riding for his Gallies, and better for the taking in of the ſoldiers, aduiſing the Emperor to march thither with his army: which his counſel the Emperor liking wel of, to relieue the hunger of his ſoldiers, commanded firſt all the draught horſes which were firſt vnſhipped for the drawing of the great Ordnance, and D after them the horſes for ſeruice, to be killed and diuided for meat among the ſouldiers. As for fire-wood, they had plenty of planks and ribs of the broken ſhips; fortune as it were with one poor benefit recompenſing ſo many calamities. The next day the Emperour departed from Algiers, with his army diuided into three battels, the ſick and wounded men beeing received into the middle: and when he had marched ſeuen miles (the enemies horſmen ſtil houering about him) he came to a heady brook, which the Moors cal Alcaraz: which was grown ſo high with the abundant rain and the check of the wind and the ſea, that being but a ſhallow thing before, it was not now to be paſſed ouer by a good horſman. Wherefore the Emperour of neceſſity there incamped, in ſuch ſort, than lying with his Army in forme of a triangle, two ſides therof were defended with the ſea and the brook, and the other with a ſtrong gard of armed E men; for he thought it not good to depart from the ſea, a ſure defence for his Army on the left hand, to ſeeke a foord farther off. Many aduenturing to ſwim ouer, were by the violence of the ſtream caried away and drowned. Wherfore the Emperor cauſed a bridge to be made ouer it, of the maſts & ſail-yards of the broken ſhips which were by chance there taken vp, and ſo paſſed ouer the Italians & Germans. The Spaniards marching higher vp the brook, found a foord wherby they paſſed ouer. At which time the Turks purſued them no farther, being called back again by Aſſan their gouernor. As for the Moores and Numidians which ſtill followed at hand alwaies ready to skirmiſh, they were eaſily repulſed by the harquebuſiers and field-pieces appointed for euery Nation: but vpon ſuch ſicke and wounded men as were not able to keep way with the Army, they exerciſed all manner of cruelty. For there was F none which in that ſmall hope, poſſeſſed with the fear of their owne ſafety, was greatly mooued with the compaſſion of their fellows miſery. The next day paſſing ouer another little riuer, which the ſouldiers waded ouer vp to the breſts, they came in three daies march vnto the rode where the fleet lay, and incamped in the ruins of the old city Tipaſa, neere vnto the ſea ſide, which ſerued them in ſtead of a fortreſſe againſt the Barbarians. The ſea was now calm, the wind laid,and the weather ſo fair,that all men thought the ſoldiers might now be imbarked G and tranſported into Europ. Wherſore the Emperor,to the great ioy of the whole army, commanded euery man to make himſelf ready to go abord:in ſuch ſort,that firſt the Italians, then the Germans,and laſt of all the Spaniards ſhould be imbarked: but ſo many ſhips and gallies as is beforeſaid beeing loſt by ſhipwracke, it was thought that thoſe which were left were not able to receiue the whole army,although it were crowded together as cloſe as was poſſible.

Horſes of great price drowned, to make roome for the common ſoldiers.

Wherſore the Emperor commanded the maſters and owners of the ſhips to caſt all the horſes ouer-boord into the ſea; reputing it an vnmercifull part, to prefer the ſafegard of thoſe horſes (although they were of great worth) before the life of the baſeſt common ſoldier or horſ-boy in his camp. Which thing much grieued the minds of the noblemen and owners of thoſe goodly beaſts,not only for that they were,not without extream neceſſity,for the preſent H depriued of ſuch an ineſtimable treaſure,but ſhould for euer (as they ſaid) loſe the moſt noble race of horſes in Spain. There with griefe and vain compaſſion was to be ſeen goodly horſes of ſeruice bearing vp their proud heads, ſwimming all about the ſea, to the ſhips neereſt vnto them for ſafegard,as if it had bin to the ſhore; & in the end wearied with long ſwimming,to be there drowned. But ſcarſe half the ſoldiers were yet imbarked,when the Eaſt and North-eaſt wind,and ſoon after diuers contrary winds almoſt as great as the firſt,roſe:whereupon the ſhips which had already taken in the ſoldiers,not expecting any command,for fear of being driuen vpon the rocks,directed their courſe according as the wind caried them, with ful ſails alongſt the coaſt. They were quickely out of ſight and diſperſed with the tempeſt, ſome into one country,ſome into another,carying the fame of that ſhipwrack, and the report I that all was loſt, into the Iſlands of the Mediterranian and ports of Italy.

Two Spaniſh ſhips ful of ſoldiers driuen by tempeſt to Algiers,are taken to mercy by Aſſan.

The force of this tempeſt was ſo great,and the billow went ſo high, that ſome of the ſhips were in the ſight of their fellows ſwallowed vp of the ſea. But amongſt the reſt,two Spaniſh ſhips ful of ſoldiers were by wonderful miſhap by contrary winds driuen againe to Algiers,and there ſet faſt vpon that fatal ſhore;where the Numidian horſmen with a multitude of Moors following them, came running down to the ſea ſide to kill them as they ſhould come to ſhore: for the barbarous people thirſting after Chriſtian bloud,would not receiue them to mercy, although they were ready to yeeld themſelues,and couenanted nothing but the ſafegard of their liues. At which their cruelty the Spaniards diſdaining,with their weapons in their hands got to ſhore, and ſtanding cloſe together as deſperat men, withſtood them, who had with their multitude K quickly compaſſed them in round: yet in deſpight of what that barbarous multitude(without regard of humanity or law of arms) could do, they made way thorow the midſt of them, from the place where they were caſt on ſhore,vnto the very gates of the city. But ſeeing the Turks ſally out,they called vnto them,offring to yeeld themſelues priſoners to Aſſan without further reſiſtance,if they would aſſure them their liues;which they were in good hope of, for that he was born of Chriſtian parents in Sardinia, and was attended vpon by many renegat Spaniards. So Aſſan comming forth of the city,gaue them his faith for their ſafety, and beating away the Moors & Numidians, curteouſly ſaued them all:wiſely making great account of ſo great a gain as would redound vnto him by ſo many priſoners,joined with no ſmal commendation of his clemencie in ſauing them. Of the Germanes the third part neuer returned L home,but were either loſt by ſhipwrack,or els dead of the ſickneſſe inſuing ſo great miſeries.

The Emperour comes to Buzia

The emperor perſuaded,or rather ouerruled by Auria, to auoid the violence of the tempeſt, ſailed alongſt the coaſt of Africk Eaſtward to Buzia, the caſtle wherof was kept with a ſmall gariſon of Spaniards:where the Emperor landed,found ſome freſh victual,though not much, yet ſuch as did both him and his noblemen no ſmal pleaſure. Whilſt the Emperor lay at Buzia expecting fairer weather,a great Genoa ſhip laded with victual chanced to come into the bay,to the great rejoicing of the hungry ſouldiers: but ſuch was the violence of the tempeſt, that her anchors came home,and ſhe driuen vpon the flats was caſt away;yet ſo,as that part of the victual driuen to ſhore,and half ſpoiled with the ſalt water,well relieued the increaſing want. In the mean time the Emperor,when he had long looked for the aſſuaging of the tempeſt, M and was now out of hope of any new ſupply of victual, ſent away Gonzaga with the Sicilian and Rhodian gallies:for the wind before at North, was now come to Northweſt, and put them in hope to aduenture again to ſea,rather than to ſtay there longer. So although with a troubleſome, yet proſperous courſe, they came in ſhort time to the port of Vtica, now called

A led Farinas: where Muleaſſes King of Tunes bountifully relieued Gonzaga and his fleet with all kind of victuall and other neceſſaries. From whence they afterward departed, and landed all in ſafety in Drepanum at Sicilia. The bluſtring winds were now at length weary of blowing, and the raging ſea became calme, ſo that the skilful ſea-men for feare of new dangers, and weary of thoſe that were paſt, thought it beſt to aduenture againe to ſea. Almoſt euery houre they were reaſoning in councell, What courſe they were for moſt ſafetie beſt to take: when ſome were of opinion, that it was beſt to beare for Sardinia or Corſica: and otherſome would haue had them to haue kept alongſt the coaſt of Africa, and ſo directly for Sicilia. But the wind comming faire at Eaſt, the Emperor directed his courſe to the Iſlands Baleares, & from thence at length arriued at the port of new Carthage in Spaine, greatly commended euen of B his enemies, for his wonderfull courage and conſtancy in paſſing through ſo many extremities, in ſuch ſort as if he had triumphed ouer the malice of fortune.

The Emperor arriueth in Spaine.

The French King the more to trouble the Emperor, ſolliciteth Solyman to inuade his countries.

About this time the diſſembled friendſhip betwixt Charles the Emperour and Francis the French king brake out into open hatred, The king firſt thinking himſelfe deluded by the emperor, who had long time fed him with the vain hope of the reſtitution of the Duchy of Millan, when as he meant nothing leſſe; and of late abuſed by the death of Rinco his Embaſſador, ſlain by the Spaniards in paſſing down the riuer Padus, as is before declared. In reuenge whereof he raiſed a great power in France, and at ſuch time as moſt men thought he would haue inuaded Italy, ſent Charles his ſon with the one part of his forces into the Low-countries, which were then gouerned by Mary Queen of Hungary the Emperors ſiſter; and Henry his other ſon C with the other part of his forces to inuade Spaine, both young Princes of great hope. And not ſo contented, but deſirous by all means to trouble and moleſt the Emperour, as he did in the Low-countries by ſetting on the duke of Cleue: ſo by Antonius Polinus his Embaſſador, a man of great diſcretion, he earneſtly ſolicited Solyman the Great Turke, with whom he was then in league, to ſpoile the borders of Spain with his gallies, at the ſame time that Henry his ſon was beſieging Perpenna in Spain. For which practiſe he was of moſt men diſcommended, as too much fauouring his owne griefe; and eſpecially by ſuch as affected the Emperor. But how this matter (which drew vpon the French King no ſmall enuy) was carried in the Turks court, ſhall not (as I hope) be vnto this Hiſtory impertinent to declare.

Pralinus the French Embaſſadour meeteth Solyman comming from Beda, and offreth vnto him Preſents from the French King.

After the death of Rinco ſlain by the Spaniards, Francis the French king ſent Antonius Polinus D a man of great dexterity, his Embaſſadour to Solyman: who paſſing by many by-waies to Venice, and ſo ouer the gulf to Sibinicum, croſſing ouer Illyria, met with Solyman in Myſia, as he was comming from Buda; and there firſt offered vnto him the preſent ſent from the King his maſter (for with empty hands no man might preſume to come to thoſe barbarous kings of the Eaſt) which Preſent was a cupboord of plate curiouſly wrought, in weight 600 pounds; and 5000 rich garments of al ſorts of ſilk & skarlet to be beſtowed vpon the Baſſa's & other great courtiers. Solyman after he had read the French Kings letters, and heard what he had further to ſay, ſeemed to be greatly moued with the death of Rinco, & promiſed Polinus not to be wanting to the French king, by ſea or land to giue him aid in his iuſt wars againſt Charles his enemie, for breaking of the league: but foraſmuch as nothing could be well determined of ſuch E matters in his journy of ſo great haſt, he told him, that as ſoon as he was come to Conſtantinople, he ſhould then haue anſwer by his Baſſa's of all his demands. The embaſſador aboue all things deſired that he would ſend Hariadenus Barbaruſſa with his fleet againſt the next ſummer into Prouince, there to be receiued into the French harbors, & to be imploied againſt the emperor as occaſion ſhould require: & further, That he would requeſt the Venetians, with whom he was able to do much, to join in league with the king his maſter againſt Charls the emperor, whoſe power began now to be dreadful to their eſtate. Polinus was not ſlack in his buſines, but all the way as he went ſought to win the fauor of the Baſſa's, ſtill giuing them one Preſent or other, & filling their minds with the hope of greater. But when they were come to Conſtantinople, in the later end of December, Solyman promiſing what he had before ſaid, aduiſed F Polinus to returne to France with his letters, and to bring him certain word back againe from the king, of the determinat time & full reſolution of taking thoſe wars in hand: & that he would in the mean time ſend Ianusbeius his embaſſador to Venice, who had bin there diuers times before, & would prouide to haue ſuch a fleet in readines as he deſired. Polinus exceeding glad of that anſwer, with great ſpeed returned back againe to the king, bringing with him as preſents from Solyman two goodly Turkiſh horſes and a ſword richly ſet with ſtones of great price. G The French King hauing by his Embaſſador receiued Solymans letters and preſents, and three days together diſcourſed with him at large of the maner of his proceeding in the Turks court, in ſhort time after ſent him backe again to Solyman with full inſtructions both of the time and places, & other circumſtances of the intended war.

Polinus ſent backe againe to Solyman, commeth to Venice and notably ſoliciteth the Venetians to take vp armes with the French king againſt the Emperor.

Polinus comming to Venice, found not Iunusbeius there, as he had well hoped: yet to loſe no time in expecting his comming, he with Pellicerius Embaſſador lieger for the French king, and other of the French faction, labored the Senators in the behalfe of the king. For it was thought like enough, that the Venetians ſtill meaſuring all their conſuls by their profit, would eaſily conſent to that league, eſpecially being requeſted thereunto by Solyman, and put in hope to haue the port towne Maranus deliuered vnto them in reward thereof, which otherwiſe the French, in whoſe poſſeſſion it was, threatened H to deliuer to the Turks, and to make them their euill neighbours, rather than to haue it taken from them by the Germans. Wherefore Polinus hauing audience giuen him in the Senat, notably pleaded the French kings cauſe, grieuouſly lamented the death of the embaſſador ſlain by the Spaniards, and bitterly enuied againſt the ambition of the Emperor, who as he ſaid aſpired to the whole monarchy of Italy, not by true vertue and valour, but by meere craft and deceit, incroching ſtill vpon the liberties of the free States, and by little & little impoſing vpon them the yoke of bondage. In confirmation whereof he produced many examples, to them well known, requeſting them as antient friends and confederats of the French, to ioine their Forces with the King; in which doing they ſhould aſſure themſelues of ſuch reward of the vndoubted victory, as they could not deſire greater. Whereas if they ſhould refuſe ſo to do, and would I rather ſit ſtil & look on as neuters, they ſhould vndoubtedly, fortune hauing decided the quarrell, grieuouſly offend both, and might worthily expect of the vanquiſhed, hatred; and of the conqueror, iniury. Beſides that, in taking vp of armes they ſhould highly gratifie Solyman, who prouoked with late iniuries, had determined with a puiſſant army to inuade Hungary, and at the ſame time to ſend Barbaruſſa with a great fleet againſt the Spaniards their common enemies: for the imparting of which his deſignes he would ſhortly ſend vnto them Iunusbeius his Embaſſadour. As for the euent of the war they needed not to doubt, when as they of themſelues were ſtrong enough quickly to thruſt the Emperor out of the dutchy of Millan, being generally hated of the people, feeding his ſoldiers with the ſpoile of the country, and on euery ſide beſet both by ſea and land by two of the greateſt Monarchs of the world. K

The craftie anſwer of the Venetians to the French Kings Embaſſador.

Whereunto the Senat delaying the time for certain daies, that Iunusbeius might in the mean time come thither, grauely anſwered, That the amity they held with king Francis, ought to be vnto them an ornament, but no burthen: the like alſo they held with the Emperor, whom they would in no caſe ſeeme to caſt off, although they had bin by him ouertaught: Wherefore the Senators and all the citiſens in generall were of opinion, to preſerue their peace, as they which in the hard times of warres had endured great extremities, which would hardly be recouered with long peace: but if they did once ſee the enſignes diſplaied, and the wars begun, they would then take further aduice, Whether it were good for them to thruſt themſelues into thoſe warres or not, when as they were in league and friendſhip with three of the greateſt princes in the world.

Solymans Embaſſadour commeth to Venice.

In the meane time Iunusbeius arriued at Venice, and was there honorably receiued. He reque- L ſted, That the league before made at Conſtantinople by Badoerius their Embaſſador, might by the authority of the Senat be confirmed: and ſo commended the French kings cauſe to the Senat, that he requeſted no more, but that vnto that amity which they had already held with the French, they would ioine further curteſies, the rather for that Solyman had accounted him for his brother, and had vndertaken to aid him againſt Charles king of Spain: but as to join in league with him, or in his quarrell to take vp armes, he requeſted nothing. Which was quite beſide the expectation of Polinus and Pellicerius, who by vrging of the matter, and by telling of al, had thought eaſily to haue perſuaded the Senat to haue granted what they requeſted, and therfore thought the Turk (who had ſo coldly ſpoken in the cauſe) to be ſome way corrupted. But as it afterward appeared, there was ſuch equity and modeſty in Solymans letters (who was otherwiſe M of a proud and inſolent nature) that he would not as then exact any thing of them, which ſhould not ſtand with the good of their eſtate. Wherefore Polinus hauing in vaine ſtaied certaine daies at Venice, was in one of their publique gallies tranſported to Raguſium, and from thence trauelled by land to Conſtantinople, where he found all things more difficult than Polinus commeth to Conſtantinople, findeth not the Turk ſo readie to ſend his fleet to aid the French king, as he had hoped.

A thaneuer he dreamed of. For the great Baſſaes ſaid, There could no fleet be ſet out that yeare, by reaſon that he was come too late to ſue for ſuch a matter, the ſpring of the yere being now paſt, of all other times moſt fit for to take in hand ſo long a voyage. So that Polinus was aboue meaſure vexed with care and griefe, that he had ſo euilly ſped, and was come ſo out of ſeaſon both to Venice & Conſtantinople. Dixim alſo, one of the maſters of the Rhodian gallies, was come to Conſtantinople, to carrie newes into France of the comming of the Turks fleet: who told Polinus, That the Kings ſons were with ſtrong power far entred into the Low-countries, and had already inuaded Spaine, expecting nothing more than the comming of the Turks gallies. Wherfore Polinus (as it eaſily chanceth to men deceiued by truſt repoſed in any other mens promiſes, and bewailing the euill ſucceſſe of their vain trauell) wonderfully tormented B himſelfe, curſed the froward and vnconſtant manners of the Baſſaes, called vpon the faith of Solyman; and beſought the great Baſſaes one by one, that they would not contrary to their promiſe forſake the King, who vpon the hope of the comming of the Turks fleet, had now inuaded both the Low-countries & the kingdome of Spaine: foraſmuch as by that delay, which was vnto them neither honourable nor profitable, was (as he ſaid) betraid the maieſtie of his King, and a moſt aſſured victory, now as good as gotten, quite marred. In which his obteſtations, he was ſo importunat and tedious, that he became vnto thoſe proud Baſſaes rather loathſome than gracious; inſomuch that to end his ſuit, they thought it beſt ſharply to take him vp, & for that time to ſhake him off. And therefore ſending for him and the other French gentlemen which followed him, to the court, the great Baſſaes then ſitting in counſell, and C Barbaruſſa with them for the honour of his place; as ſoon as they were come into the councel chamber, Solyman Baſſa the Eunuch, turning himſelfe about, ſpake vnto them in this ſort.

Frenchmen (ſaid he) this place for diſpatch of moſt weighty affaires, appointed by the graue iudgement of our moſt mighty Emperor to vs his faithfull ſeruants, doth (as it beſt beſeemeth, receiue vs, daily comming vnto it, void of loue and hatred: and withall doth notably put vs in remembrance to ſpeake our minds freely. Neither would I, that this franknes of ſpeech (the meſſenger of truth, and therfore the faithfull keeper of friendſhip, ſhould be vnto your eares vnpleaſing or troubleſome: for ſithence your King hath been called the friend and fellow of the Othoman name, we may not now either forget the duties of loue, or loth your friendſhip: ſeeing that our Emperor doth maruellouſly affect you, and is not a little deſirous to D ſtrengthen you with his power, and by ouercomming your enemies to increaſe your power and honour. But in your demands is no equitie, no modeſtie, ſo that we tearme you vnmodeſt and importunat: and others which fauour you not ſo well, call you plainly by your right names, vnreaſonable and ſhameleſſe men; who as too too forgetfull of your duties, do moſt fondly trouble the lawes of amitie and friendſhip. For leagues are confirmed by like profit, by making euen the charge and mutuall dangers: but if neglecting your friends kindneſſe and courteſie, you will make no requitall, they will quickly grow wearie of you. So happeneth it vnto you Frenchmen, who euer forgetful and negligent in our dangers, but in your own alwaies mindfull and diligent, haue ſhewed your ſelues friends vnto vs when need was, not in deeds and certaine aid, but onely in bare letters, and embaſſages. Tell me I pray you where euer you ſhewed me any ſigne or token of your good will or ayd? whereby the minds of our enemies might at the leaſt wiſe haue but been E kept in ſuſpence of ſome doubtfull feare, when as Charles with all the power of the Weſt came into Hungarie: And Corone and Patras were in the meane time ſhaken in Grace with the enemies fleet; and laſt of all Tunes taken with ſo great a fleet? But all this we pardon you: yet this it is which is hardly to be endured, that you did not ſo much as once grieue at our ſo great iniuries as you ought to haue done; but ſent your gratulotorie Embaſſadours vnto the bloudie common enemie; who had but euen then ſlaine ſo many of our people. At length our Emperor came to Aulona to your great profit, about to paſſe ouer into Italie: but neither then in the arriuall of our fleet appeared the good wills of the Apulians towards you, which were of you ſo vainely promiſed, neither did you ſo much as once moue to inuade the vpper part of Italie; ſo neither ſeruing our turne, nor well fitting your owne, you haue alwaies loſt the occaſion of the good ſucceſſe of your affaires. But neither then, neither at any time afterwards, needed we your counſell F or vnited forces: for the Venetians to their paine felt both our forces and our faith: as for the reſt, war, the notable reuenger of our wrongs, moſt happily brought to paſſe, at ſuch time as you of your owne voluntary made peace with the common enemy to inuade vs; and did as vnkindly as impudently as it were blow wind in his ſailes. But we, without your helpe, haue notably repreſſed ſo great aſſaults of our ene- mies: when as this ſame Hariaden Barbaruſſa put to flight their fleet at Ambracia, and happily ſlew the Spaniſh pyrats of Caſtrum, and hauing again recouered our owne cities, tooke alſo from them ſome of theirs. wherefore we are bound vnto you for no deſert, but we had rather forget theſe vnkindneſſes, than to faile you whom we haue once receiued into our friendſhip. For we performe our fidelitie in deeds: but it is his part to regard the time, to way the danger, to wait occaſion; which will not raſhly commit his actions to the hazard of Fortune. You are come later than you ſhould haue done for the ſetting forth of our fleet: for Summer now wel ſpent, followeth the peſtilent time of Autumne, ſo that mariners cannot in conuenient time be taken vp, or ſafely thruſt into the gallies: for in long ſayling, who would not thinke, but that ſuch a company of ſaylers vſually ſick at the change of an vnacquainted ayre, would be in danger of their liues? Who would not feare ſhipwracke in their returne, when as this ſame Hariaden ſo great a maſter at ſea, driuen vpon the Acroceraunian rocks in the month of Auguſt loſt ſo many gallies? A fleet would be rigged in Winter, furniſhed and ſet forward in the Spring; in Summer is ſafe ſailing and making war. Which that it may be ſo done, we will for the common wealths ſake perſuade the Emperor: for the nauy once loſt, cannot vpon the ſudden be againe reſtored for much gold, whereof the Othoman Emperour wanteth no ſtore, heaped vp by many ages. If thou be wiſe, take theſe things in good part as friendly ſpoken: but whether the Emperor will pardon thy boldneſſe or not, let himſelfe conſider; truly we haue ſatisfied both him and our ſelues in ſpeaking to thee ſo plainely.

Polinus by the meanes of the Capiaga, is brought to the ſpeech of Solyman himſelfe.

Theſe things ſeuerely ſpoken by the Eunuch Baſſa, did ſo much the more trouble Polinus, for that they ſeemed to haue bin ſent from the mouth of Solyman himſelfe, who was thought to haue heard all that was ſaid. For behind the Baſſaes as they ſate in Councel, was a window with a braſen gate, and a curtain drawne before it, that the Emperour when he pleaſed, might vnperceiued heare the complaints and ſuits of all nations, and note the manners of his great councellors; whoſe care for the adminiſtration of juſtice was ſo much the greater, for feare of his preſence. Yet did not Polinus for his repulſe, deteſting the double dealing of the Baſſaes, ſo giue ouer his ſute; but winning by gifts the fauour of the Copiaga or chiefe Porter, a man euer of great authority in the Turks court, laboured by him to be brought to the ſpeech of Solyman himſelfe: who faithfully performed what he had vndertaken. So the French Embaſſadour brought by him into the ſecreteſt place of the court, which few Chriſtians had euer bin, and ſo vnto the preſence of Solyman, recounted vnto him how all matters had before paſſed, and moſt earneſtly beſought him not to faile the kings expectation of the fleet he had before promiſed, who at that preſent was inuading his enemies in three places.

Solymans anſwer to Polinus

Whereunto Solyman courteouſly and expreſſely anſwered, That the opportunitie of ſending out his fleet was paſt; not by his will, which was alwaies immutable and firme, but by his late comming, & the time of the yeare halfe ſpent: but promiſed the next Spring without doubt to ſend vnto the king his friend & brother, twice ſo great a fleet as he had deſired againſt Charles their enemy. With which anſwer, the embaſſador diſpatched away Dixius into France, vpon whoſe arriual, king Francis called back again Henry his eldeſt ſon with his army, from the ſiege of Perpenna in Spaine.

The Princes of Germany ioyne their forces with king Ferdinand againſt the Turke in Hungary.

The Princes and States of Germany, at the requeſt of King Ferdinand and the nobilitie of Hungary, about this time decreed with one conſent, to take vp arms againſt the Turks, for the recouering againe of Buda, and other the loſt parts of Hungary. For beſides the diſhonor don to their nation at Exek, vnder the leading of Cazzianer, and again at Buda vnder the leading of the Lord Rogendorff; they wel ſaw, that if they did not ſpeedily relieue the Hungarians ouerwhelmed with the calamities of the Turks forces, they ſhould in ſhort time be inforced to fight for their religion, children, wiues, and liues, againſt the ſame mighty enemy, at their own doores. For preuenting whereof, the Princes and free cities of Germany, ſet out 30000 footmen, and 7000 horſemen: amongſt whom was Mauritius, afterwards Duke of Saxonie, then a young gentleman about twenty yeares old. But the Generall of theſe German forces was Ioachimus Marqueſſe of Brandenburg, a man more for the honour of his houſe than the valour of himſelfe preferred to that place: yet ſo, that vnto him was ioyned eight others, men of great yeares and experience, by whoſe counſell he was to be directed. When they were come to Vienna, king Ferdinands power met them: where, beſide ſuch as were taken vp in Auſtria, Huganot Gouernour of Stiria came in with ten thouſand horſemen. Vnto theſe the noble men of Hun-

A Hungary, Iaſper Seredius, Andreas Bathor, and Petrus Perenus a man of greateſt authority, power, and experience among the Hungarians, joined themſelues, with fifteen thouſand horſemen; whither alſo Paulus the third of that name, then Biſhop of Rome, ſent three thouſand choſen footmen out of Italy, conducted to Vienna by Alexander Vitellius a moſt famous Captaine.
The Marquiſſe with his great Army marched from Vienna alongſt the River of Danubius; but ſo ſoftly, that the Hungarian and Italian Captaines ſaid plainely, That the beſt part of the Summer, being the fitteſt time for Wars, was paſſed ouer in loytering and dallying out the time to no purpoſe. Eſpecially Iacobus Medices, who had long before perſuaded the king to be ready to ſet forward with his forces with the firſt of the Spring, before the Turkes could either augment their Garriſons, or put in any new forces; for that by ſuch reſolute and ſpeedy B inuaſion it was like enough hee might recouer both Peſth and Buda. Which politique and wholſome counſell ſo well giuen, King Ferdinand too much crediting the great men of his Court (liking nothing but what proceeded from themſelues) rejected, expecting the full aſſembly of all his forces, before the ſetting forth of his Army. At length the Marquis was by ſoft marches come to Strigonium (King Ferdinand himſelf ſtaying behind at Vienna) where it was commonly reported, That Solyman fearing to loſe Buda, was either in perſon himſelfe comming into Hungary, or els ſending down the Generall of his Europeian horſemen, who might neuer ſet foot forward to war without ſixty thouſand horſmen. Which news ſo troubled the Germans, that they made no great haſt forward, doubting how they ſhould returne again, if they chanced not to get the victory. Beſides that, it was thought that the Marquiſſe C neuer purpoſed to fight a battell, or to indanger himſelfe and his Army for the kingdome of Hungary, but only to defend the bounds of Auſtria, and by ſhewing the ſtrength of Germany, to terrifie if he could the Turks, if they not contented with Hungary, ſhould alſo prouoke the Germans. But after it was by certain eſpials from Samandria, known that all that report of the comming of the Turks great Army was but vaine, and that there was ſcarſe a thouſand Ianizaries and twice ſo many horſmen come to Buda, and that the Turkes fleet was both in number and ſtrength far inferior to the Kings, they ſet forward again with more cheerfulnes, much incouraged by the forwardnes of the Hungarians, eſpecially of Perenus, who aſſured them, that if they would without delay march on, and ſpend no more time in vain, they ſhould not find at Buda any ſuch number of Turks as was worthy the name of an Army; for that Solyman D vſing but euery ſecond year to make war, did that year take his reſt, and was not like to vndertake any great expedition. For theſe reaſons all men being ready cheerfully to ſet forward, the Marquis appointed to paſſe ouer Danubius: which this Perenus, Hugonot, and Medices, all expert Captains, liked not of, wiſhing him rather to hold on his way directly ſtill on that ſide the riuer to Buda, the chief City of the kingdom. But it was the mind of the Generall and all his Counſellors, firſt to beſiege Peſth, which might be done with leſſe labour and danger, and there hauing made proofe of the enemies ſtrength and purpoſe, to come to beſiege Buda: for then would the ſouldiers with much more courage and cheerfulneſſe endure the ſiege of Buda, if they had by good fortune firſt beaten them out of Peſth. Which counſel was both beſt liked and followed, and the Army by two bridges with great and painful labor E made ouer Danubius, (which was in that place diuided into two parts) tranſported. At the ſame time Medices an Italian, Admirall of the Kings fleet, came down the riuer, and in deſpight of the Turks fleet took the Iſland of S. Margaret, lying in the Riuer a little aboue Buda, and by force repulſed the Turks fleet vnto the ſuburbs of the City. The Marquiſſe to auoid the danger of the great ſhot from Buda, after he was paſt the riuer, fetcht a great compas about, and ſo came to the North ſide of Peſth; for on the South it was defended with the riuer Danubius, running betwixt it and Buda; and on the Eaſt and Weſt, the great ordnance on the one ſide from the caſtle of Buda, and on the other from Mount S. Gerrard, did ſo ſcoure all alongſt the wals, that no man could without moſt manifeſt danger there abide. For Buda ſtanding vpon the hil, and diuided from Peſth only by the riuer, ſo ouerlooketh and commandeth F all the plain country about Peſth, that without perill no man can ſtir on any ſide of the City, but Northward towards Agria, couered by the City from the ſhot out of Buda. As the Marquis was comming thither, he was told by certain Fugitiues, That Balis Gouernor of Buda (who in that place ſucceeded Solyman the Hungarian Renegat, lately before dead of the plague) had in garriſon in Buda two thouſand horſemen: and that Vlemas the Perſian, Gouernor uernor of Boſna was come vnto him with 2000 more: wherunto Amurathes had alſo joyned G another thouſand which hee brought out of Dalmatia; and that Segemenes was come thither alſo with 1000 Ianizaries brought from Conſtantinople. As for the reſt of the footmen, that they were but wild country people, fitter for labor than ſeruice in wars. They told him alſo, that the enemies fleet conſiſted of 60 ſmall pinnaces, ten gallies, and a few other great boats: and that Solyman had commanded his Captains, in any caſe to defend Buda and Peſth, to the laſt man, without regard of any other place; and had propoſed vnto the valiant great rewards, & to the cowardly extream puniſhment: charging them further, that if need were, they ſhould ſend in time to Achomates the Generall of his Europeian horſemen, to Sophia, to aid them. The Turks vpon the approch of the Chriſtians iſſued out at one of the gates of the City, and skirmiſhed with the Hungarians: but after they had ſufficiently prooued one anothers ſtrength, and ſome few were on both ſides ſlain, they retyred into the city, and the Hungarians H to the camp.

The Turks ſally out of Peſth, & put the Chriſtians to the orſe..

The next day after, Vitellius going out of the camp neer the City with fiue companies, to chuſe a place for planting the battery; the Turkes at one inſtant ſallying out at two gates of the city, gaue him an hot skirmiſh: where at the firſt, the fight was begun with like courage and force; but the Turks ſtil ſending out new ſupplies both of horſe and foot, firſt the Chriſtian footmen, and after that the horſmen, not able longer to endure the force of the Turks Ianizaries, were conſtrained diſorderly to retyre, hauing loſt in that retreit four of their captains and two enſignes: and had not Vitellius with one company of horſmen ſerred together, valiantly repulſed the inſolent Ianizaries, the loſſe had bin much greater. Vitellius exceedingly grieued with this loſſe, and perceiuing the maner of the enemies fight, incouraged his I ſoldiers, purpoſing if he could to be fully reuenged: and aboue all others, requeſted Perenus to be ready to join with him, as occaſion ſhould require. Vitellius lay incamped in the Kings orchards, walled about as it were a mile, equally diſtant both from the great Camp, and from the city: out of theſe orchards he went with twelue companies vnder their enſignes, commanding the reſt to ſtand ſtil within the walls, in readineſſe at all aſſaies; and ſo fetching a great compaſſe about, marched alongſt the riuers ſide toward the city. Neither did the proud enemy (brag of the former daies victory) make any delay, but brauely ſallied out at the Eaſt ſide of the city, and couragiouſly charged them. But Vitellius warned by his former harm, and ſeeing his enemies come on as he deſired, couered his ſhot with his pikes, and ſtanding cloſe, receiued the enemies charge; his ſhot ſtil playing vnder the pikes oftentimes vpon their knees. K

The Turks ſallying out again are defeated.

Many of the Turks were there laid on ground, whilſt they deſperatly ſought to haue broken the order of the Chriſtians. In the mean time, when many of the Turks horſmen and Ianizaries comming out of the gates, and diuers others beholding the fight were come ouer the Riuer from Buda, to be partakers of the victory, had filled the hithermoſt bank; Vitellius in good time, of purpoſe by little and little retyred, as if he had bin ouercharged. Then began the enemy to giue a great ſhout, and more fiercely to aſſail the Chriſtians; their horſmen alſo clapt behind them, to haue there charged them. Which thing Perenus diligently noting, and that the Turks in following Vitellius were drawn a great way from the gates; he ſuddenly with his light horſmen clapt in betwixt the city and the Turks, at their backs: after whom followed alſo Mauritius (afterwards duke of Saxony) with a ſtrong troup of German horſmen, of purpoſe L to ſhut them in from retyring back again into the city. But then the Turkes perceiuing the danger, & finding themſelues ſhut in, ſtood as men more than half amaſed, bethinking themſelues which way to take, and ſo began to retyre. When Vitellius comming on couragiouſly with his pikemen and harquebuſiers diuided into two wings, charged them fiercely: and the Hungarian & German horſemen breaking in among them on the other ſide, made great ſlauter of them, & ſtruck ſuch a fear among the flying Turks, that many of them in running to the gate, thruſt one another thorow with their pikes: diuers others were alſo by the horſmen driuen into the ſea and drowned. That day Segemenes loſt aboue an hundred of his Ianizaries, and four hundred other ſouldiours. The chiefe commendation of this piece of ſeruice was giuen to Vitellins, who had ſo wel and ſo quickly reuenged himſelf of the Turks: and next vnto M him, to Perenus, who as a skilfull Captaine had ſo wel awaited the time to intrap the enemy.

Mauritius in danger to bee ſlain.

ſuch

A ſuch time as that he was reſcued by others, Ribiſcht himſelfe preſently dying of his wounds:
This little victory ſo incouraged the Germans, that the Marquis commanded the great ordnance to be preſently brought forth, and the battery planted; which was at the firſt placed ſo far off, that it did little harm, although the wall were both old and thinne, not aboue fiue foot thick: and the ordnance laid either a little too low, or mounted too high, either ſhot ſhort, or quite ouer the city into Buda: which fault once perceiued, the battery was remoued neerer, and a fair breach ſoon made in the wall, with the continual beating of 40 great pieces of artillery.
Vitellius was the firſt that offered to aſſault the breach, ſo that the Germans would preſently ſecond him, which thing they al by holding vp of their hands promiſed couragiouſly, but ſoon after cowardly brake their promiſe. For oftentimes it chanceth, that they which before B the danger are readieſt to promiſe their helpe, are in the very danger it ſelfe of all others moſt ſlack. The Hungarians alſo for their parts promiſed not to be behind. The ſilence of the enemy at the breach and in the city was wonderful, ſo that many thought he had beene fled back ouer the riuer to Buda: for Segimenes captain of the Ianizaries, an old beaten ſoldier, ordered all things with as little ſtir as was poſſible: he had receiued new ſupplies from Vlemas, and had caſt vp a deep countermure within the wal againſt the breach, and on the inner ſide of the ſame had made a ſtrong barricado, with gabions and wine veſſels filled with ſand & earth; behind which ſtood the Ianizaries, and next vnto them the Turkiſh archers, and laſt of al the horſmen, who had left their horſes to ſerue on foot. The ſignal for the aſſault once giuen, four Italian captains ran deſperatly with their Companies by the ruins of the wal to the breach: C but whilſt they there ſet vp their enſignes, and wondring at the enemies fortification, were ready betwixt hope and fear to leap down, they were ſuddenly ouerwhelmed with a ſhoure of arrows and bullets. Yet Vitellius ſtil incouraging them, brought them ſtil on, who did what they might to haue entred. But the German footmen with their General ſtood ſtil vnder the wals, looking on, as men nothing mooued either with the hope of victory, or danger of their friends: and the Hungarians not ſo much as once looking vpon the enemy, retyred. Two of the Italian captains, Rufus and Fiolla, were there ſlain, and Carolus, Vitellius his nephew, ſhot in the ſholder. The Turks with ſhot and ſtones ſtil repulſed and beat down the Italians, wherof the Germans alſo ſtanding ſtil felt part, & were more galled than a man would haue thought men could haue bin that did nothing: for there they ſtil ſtood for ſhame, leſt if they ſhould D haue alſo firſt retyred, they ſhould haue incurred a ſecond infamy as bad as the firſt. Which thing Vitellius perceiuing, would in no caſe depart from the breach, but wiſhed rather to loſe his men by whole companies, than to leaue the leaſt colour of excuſe to the Germans, or that they ſhould ſay they ſtaied longeſt, of whom hee with greater anger than griefe complained, that he was forſaken and cowardly betraid. In time of this aſſault one of the Turks was heard to ſpeak aloud in the Italian tongue, Why do not you, valiant Italians, ſpare your ſelues, & giue place to thoſe lazy Germans. We all wiſh to ſpare you, and to beat the drunkenneſſe out of their moſt cowardly heads, that they ſhould no more herafter prouoke vs. At length the Germanes, weary of their hot ſtanding, and nought doing, got them further off; after whom the Italians forthwith retyred:
but ſo diſorderly, to be quickly out of the danger of the enemies ſhot, that if the Turkes had E at the ſame time ſallied out at al the gates, it was thought that the whole camp had bin much indangered. In this attempt, rather than aſſault, 700 Chriſtians were ſlain outright, and many more hurt, who died afterwards of their wounds.

The Germanes & Italians retire with loſſe.

All this while the Marquis and Hugonot, the great Commanders of the army, kept themſelues ſo far from gun-ſhot, that they were no where to be ſeen; vntil that Torniellus & Fotiſcu two valiant Captaines finding them out, wiſhed them for ſhame to ſhew themſelues for the comforting of the army. A little before night they conſulted with the other captains, whither they ſhould forſake the ſiege, or continue it ſtil. Wherof moſt of the Germanes beſt liked to be gon, as the ſafeſt way: though Vitellius and ſome others ſpake erneſtly to the contrary. At which time a ſpy comming in, brought news, that Achomates, Solymans lieutenant of the Europeian F horſmen, had paſt ouer the riuer Savus at Belgrade, and was comming to Peſth: whoſe comming either cunningly feined, or vainly beleeued, cauſed the Germanes to make a ſhort concluſion, & to reſolue flatly to return to Vienna; fearing that if they ſhould longer continu the ſiege, they ſhould be ſtayd againſt their wils by Achomates. Which thing made many of Germans and the hard fortune of their nation; vainly wiſhing for a General in courage anſwerable to the ſtrength of that great Army. Segemenes perceiuing how much the Chriſtian Army was diſcouraged by the laſt days euil ſucces, early in the morning ſent out al the horſmen, and after them certaine Companies of footmen, to relieue them in their retyre, who in many places ſkirmiſhed with them, being nothing inferiour vnto them either in courage or ſkil: and the matter was brought to that paſſe as if it had bin ſo agreed vpon, that many of the moſt notable and expert ſouldiers on either ſide incountred hand to hand in the ſight of the Italians and Germans, the Hungarians mixt with the Turks, and the Turks with the Hungarians, with ſuch fidelity, that they regarded no other enemy but him whom euery man had ſingled out for himſelf, as if it had bin in a triumph, for exerciſe hand to hand. It happed that a notable captain of the Turks deſired to ſee Vitellius; who being ſhewed vnto him (for hee was eaſie to be known by his armor) the Turk ran vnto him to embrace him for his honor, and ſo departed. About 500 horſemen ſo incountered with one another hand to hand that day, of whom many were ſlain or hurt. The night following, the battery was remoued, and the Army marched toward the riuer to the fleet. The Turks perceiuing the Chriſtians to be departed, ſallied out of the City on all hands, and with a great cry vpbraiding them of cowardiſe, hardly purſued the rereward of the army. Vlemas was come ouer himſelf from Buda, and ſo eagerly followed the Army, that it could hardly haue eſcaped without great danger, had not Vitellius with his Italians made a ſtand, and requeſted the Hungarian and German horſemen to turn back vpon the enemy: which they at his requeſt did, and not only repulſed the Enemy, but alſo put him to flight, and in the chaſe ſlew many. After which time the army paſſed on quietly; yet 700 Germanes which were ſick and ſtragled behind the Army, were by the Turks horſmen miſerably ſlain in the ſight of their fellows. The Germans thrice foiled by the Turks, firſt at Exek, then at Buda, and now at Peſth, returned full of heauines and grief, as they which were now to forget the ſubduing of Hungary, and to become careful of Germany it ſelf. The army comming to Vienna, was there broken vp, and the Italians ſent home into their country; who for moſt part died by the way, of infection taken in the camp in ſtrange air, and a moſt queſie time of the year.

The Chriſtian army broken vp at Vienna.

Perenus vncurteouſly apprehended vpon ſuſpition of treſon.

But to couer the ſhame of this vnfortunat expedition, and to turn mens talke another way by ſome notable accident; Petrus Perenus the noble Hungarian was the man pickt out for the purpoſe to fil mens mouths. He, belayd with the enuy of the Court, was for ſuſpition of aſpiring to the kingdom of Hungary, by the commandment of King Ferdinand apprehended by Liſcanus a Spaniſh captain, in the caſtle of Strigonium, as a traitor, and preſently deliuered to Medices the Admiral, to be conueyed vp the riuer to Vienna. Liſcanus at the time of his apprehenſion, couetouſly and vncurteouſly took from him his Chaine, and a rich cloake lined with ſables. Which indignity don to ſo noble a gentleman, ſo much offended the mindes of the reſt of the Hungarians, that aboue 12000 of them thereupon preſently returned home to their own dwellings, curſing the Germans to the diuel. This Perenus was one of the greateſt Peers of Hungary, but of a moſt hauty and magnificent mind, ſo that he would ſomtime haue almoſt 100 goodly ſpare horſes fit for ſeruice led before him without their riders; and would ſomtimes ſpeak too liberally againſt the barenes of king Ferdinands court, who polled by the courtiers, hardly maintained his ſtate. Which his ſurpaſſing magnificence and princely port was cauſe enough for the other great courtiers to enuy at his eſtate, & to ſeek his ouerthrow: who as men ouercharged with the burthen of another mans vertue, whereof they neuer bore the leaſt part, and alwaies gaining by the deprauing of other mens perfection, conſpired together his ouerthrow; and oftentimes pointing at him with their fingers, would ſay, That he ſauored of a crown. This notable man as he had many worthy vertues, ſo was hee not without cauſe noted of ambition and inconſtancy. For after that King Lewis was loſt, he diſdaining the preferment of Iohn the Vayuod to the kingdom of Hungary, took part with King Ferdinand againſt him, in hope as it was thought to be next in honour vnto himſelf. But after hee ſaw King Iohn again reſtored, and his ſtate ſtrongly ſupported by Solyman, and that all things ſtood doubtful and tickle with Ferdinand, he with like leuity ſought means by Abraham the great Baſſa, to be reconciled vnto King Iohn: which was hardly obtained of him by the interceſſion of Solyman himſelf (as is before declared) to whom he gaue his ſon as a pledge of his fidelitie. After which time he liued in great honour and royalty all the reign of King Iohn:

but

Matters ſurmiſed againſt Perenus.

A but after he was dead,and ſaw George the Biſhop the Kings tutor doing what he liſt, to reigne like a King,he diſdained his gouernment,and ſolicited by King Ferdinand,reuolted again vnto him,and furthered him in what he could for the obtaining of the kingdome. But now falling into the enuy of the court, malice found out matter enough to worke his confuſion. Firſt it was giuen out, That his ſon who had many yeres been detained in Solymans Court,as a pledge of his fathers faith, was euen then vnder the colour of a feigned eſcape come into Tranſyluania; when as he had ſecretly agreed with Solyman, that his father being a man much fauoured of the people, ſhould by promiſing them all poſſible freedome, allure them to the Turkiſh ſubjection:in reward of which good ſeruice he ſhould be made Gouernour of the Kingdome of Hungary, and put in hope alſo to be made the tributary King thereof, if it ſhould fortune B the young King to die. Beſides that,it was accounted a thing very ſuſpitious, that he had the Winter before vſed great kindeneſſe and friendſhip toward the Turkiſh Captains,by ſending them great Preſents,and receiuing the like againe. And laſt of all,his letters directed to certaine Hungarian Captains were produced, wherein he ſeemed to promiſe them as his friends and followers, greater entertainment than agreed with his preſent eſtate. All which things King Ferdinand (of his owne diſpoſition not eaſily to be perſuaded to conceiue euill of the Germanes his countrey men, were it neuer ſo apparant or true, but of ſtrangers any thing) quickely beeleued,and therefore cauſed him (as is before ſaid) to be apprehended. But Perenus as he was brought by Medices the Admirall to Vienna, when he was come neere vnto the gate of the city,and heard that Philippus Torniellus with certaine other braue Captaines of his C acquaintance,were come to meet the Admirall; he requeſted that the cloſe Coach wherein he rid might be opened, and that he might haue leaue to ſpeake to thoſe noble and valiant Gentlemen. Which thing was eaſily granted, for that the nobility and approued valour of the man ſeemed vnto them which had the charge of him,vnworthy of ſuch reſtraint of liberty or impriſonment,yea,or of the leaſt ſuſpition thereof. So he turning himſelfe towards them, ſpake vnto them in this ſort:

The lamentable ſpeech of Perenus, to Torniellus and the other Captaines, concerning his apprehenſion.

Wretched I,noble Gentlemen (ſaid he) whom deſpightfull enuy hath circumuented guiltleſſe:but much more miſerable King Ferdinand, whom domeſticall theeues bereaues of ſubſtance,of friends, and honour all at once. For ſo it commeth to paſſe, that by this inconſiderat wrong done vnto me, he ſhall vtterly loſe D the loue and fidelity of the Hungarian Nation, and may therefore for euer not without cauſe diſpaire for the obtaining of the Kingdome of Hungary,ſithence that it is not lawfull for me (inferiour to none of my Nation in birth,and hauing for my good and faithful ſeruice well deſerued reward of a iuſt King) ſo much as to rejoyce for the deliuerance of my ſon from the captiuity of the Turks,but that by my ſiniſter fortune, dreadfull death in ſtead of incomparable joy muſt be preſented to mine eies. For will theſe malicious Pickethanks, guilty of their owne cowardiſe, the wicked contriuers and witneſſes of my wrongfull accuſation, ſpare me being laid faſt and in durance,which neuer ſpared the Kings honour? For euery man of what nobility ſoeuer, be he neuer ſo guiltleſſe, when he is once in hold, muſt be content to endure, not what he hath deſerued,but what his hard fortune aſſigneth. Yet my vpright mind and cleare conſcience,which thing only God the moſt iuſt Iudge leaueth as a comfort to men in miſery wrongfully accuſed, deliuereth me of this E care:and ſo will the Marquiſſe our Generall,to whom I before vpon a miſtruſt foretold,that ſuch a danger would ſhortly befall me, and that I had rather be ſlaine guiltleſſe, than to withdraw my ſelfe from triall; which thing I told him at ſuch time as I was ſo guarded with mine owne ſtrength, that I feared no mans force. I beſeech you do me this honourable fauour, as to requeſt King Ferdinand in my behalfe,quickely and honourably to proceed to the triall of my cauſe, and according to his owne Princely diſpoſition, and the will of others, to diſcerne betwixt his faithfull friends and feigned flatterers. Truly we are too too vnfortunate Captains,if for a little euill ſucceſſe we ſhall be ſo adjudged as men that had ouerthrowne their fortune. Cazzianer peraduenture receiued the iuſt puniſhment he had deſerued, for the ſhamefull forſaking and loſing the army at Exek, when as he poſſeſſed with an vncouth feare, forgot the duty of a Generall,more affraid of death than diſhonour: for when he had voluntarily committed himſelfe to ſafe cuſtody, F he was ſo generally condemned of cowardiſe, that diſpairing to defend his cauſe, he brake priſon, and as wickedly as vnfortunatly reuolted to the Turks: But neither was I of late the Generall, neither were we vanquiſhed,although we preuailed not, but honourably retiring, valiantly repreſſed the inſolency of the purſuing enemy. As for the kingdome of Hungary, I might then well haue affected the ſame, and eaſily haue deſerued it at Solymans hands, when as King Ferdinand after the death of King Iohn, was ma- king his preparation for that war: at which time my friends and followers at my deuotion, with the loue of the Hungarians towards me, ſeeming of no ſmall importance for the obtaining of the victory, might haue miniſtred no vnreaſonable or vſeaſonable hope to haue drawne a man into courſes not altogether beſeeming a Chriſtian. Wherefore I haue, and will ſo long as I liue, fight againſt the Turks, if King Ferdinand ſhall ſhew himſelfe an indifferent Iudge in this accuſation, falſly ſurmiſed againſt me by the malice of mine enemies.

Perenus, Valentinus, & Maylat, three of the greateſt nobility in Hungary, kept in perpetuall priſon.

When he had made an end of ſpeaking, the Admirall courteouſly perſuaded him to haue good hope in the clemency of the moſt juſt King; and ſhortly after performed his requeſt: for he and Torniellus taking the King as he was hunting, entreated him to deale fauorably with Perenus. For all that, Perenus could not obtaine that his cauſe might be openly heard, but was committed to ſafe keeping, there to remaine in perpetuall priſon: but whether it was for the miſpriſion of new treaſon, or for reuenge of his old vnconſtancy, is vucertaine. Thus three the only great Princes left of the Hungarian bloud, equally worthy of the Kingdome, Valentine, Maylat, and Perenus, ſnarled almoſt in like ſnares of enuy, cut off all hope of raiſing a King to their ſeditious and therefore miſerable countrymen: when as Perenus lay too late bewailing his vnconſtancy in perpetuall priſon; and the other two faſt in chaines neere vnto the Euxine ſea, expected death the end of their miſeries. This end had the wars taken in hand againſt the Turks by the generall conſent of the Germans in the yeare 1542; which many thought might worthily be compared with the greateſt loſſes of thoſe times: when as King Ferdinand hauing in vaine ſpent a great maſſe of treaſure (the fitteſt ſtay for the imminent war) and loſt the opinion before conceiued of the ſtrength of Germany; had now as a weake Prince, and ſubject to injury, prouoked the Turks him againſt, bold enough otherwiſe, but as then inſolent for their late victories.

1543 Polinus the French Kings Embaſſadour ſtill following the Turks Court, ceaſed not by all meanes to ſolicite Solyman, with his gallies to aid the King his Maſter in the inuaſion of the Dominions of Charles the Emperour, in Italy, Sicily, and Spaine. In which ſute he was ſo croſſed by Solyman the eunuch Baſſa, then Viſier, that he was almoſt in diſpaire of ſpeed: for the malicious Eunuch being himſelfe a great ſea-man, and enuying the honour of Barbaruſſa (who was to be imploied in that ſeruice) ſought by keeping him out of all honourable actions, to diminiſh his former glory; and concerning the preſent, proteſted openly as he ſate in Councell, That he ſaw no other cauſe why the Turkiſh Emperour ſhould to his great charge and the common danger, ſend out ſuch a fleet, but to ſerue Barbaruſſa his owne turne. But Solyman hauing diligently heard, and deepely conſidered of that the Baſſa's had ſaid, rejected their opinions who would not he ſhould haue giuen the French King any aid; and honourably decreed according to his promiſe, whatſoeuer ſhould enſue thereof, to ſend his fleet vnto the King by Barbaruſſa. Two daies after, the French Embaſſadour, before in diſpaire, but now reuiued with that Decree, was ſolemnly feaſted by Ruſtan Baſſa (Solymans ſonne in law) and by Solyman the Eunuch Baſſa: for ſo it was their great Maſters pleaſure, both of them joying of him for the friendſhip confirmed betwixt the two Princes by ſending this fleet. After which, diuers gifts were beſtowed vpon the Embaſſadour and his chiefe followers; and at ſuch time as he was to take his leaue, Solyman gaue him great charge of his Nauy, that it might be ſafely kept, and ſo after the ſeruice done, againe returned: and withall deliuered him letters vnto King Francis, wherein after the glorious rehearſall of his proud titles, he writ vnto him as followeth.

Solyman granteth to ſend his fleet by Barbaruſſa to aid the French king againſt the Emperour.

Solymans letters to the French king.

We haue vpon a brotherly bounty granted vnto Polinus your Embaſſadour, ſuch and ſo great a fleet as you haue deſired, throughly furniſhed for all aſſaies: whoſe direction we haue commanded Hairaden our Admirall to follow, and by your appointment proceed againſt the Enemy. But you ſhall doe well and friendly, the wars once happily ended, to ſend backe againe my fleet to Conſtantinople. All things ſhall vndoubtedly fall out according to your owne deſire and mine, if you ſhall carefully take heed that Charles the Spaniſh King your perpetuall enemy, doe not againe deceiue you with the motion of a deceitfull peace. For then ſhall you bring him to a moſt indifferent peace, when you haue brought vpon his countries all the calamities of War.

A Polinus taking his leaue of Solyman then lying at Hadrianople, returned to Conſtantinople, where he found Barbaruſſa with an hundred and ten gallies and forty gallions, ready to put to ſea, which he had with incredible celerity rigged vp and furniſhed. And ſo ſetting forward the eight and twentieth of Aprill in the yeare 1543, and paſſing the ſtreight of Helleſpontus, he arriued firſt at Cariſtius in Euboea; and from thence to Malea, where he was by contrary winds caſt into the bay of Lacedemon, and there ſtaied nine daies before he could double the cape of Metapanium, called in antient time Tenarus. After that he came to Methon, and from thence croſſing the Ionian ſea came to the ſtrait of Meſſina: where the Turkiſh pyrats being come with their gallies within the ſight of Rhegium, began to land their men. They of Rhegium ſeeing ſo great a fleet, and the Turks already landed, fled out of the city for feare; but the ca- B ſtle was ſtill kept by Didacus Caietanus a Spaniard, who refuſed to haue any parly with Polinus the French Embaſſador, and with ſhot out of the caſtle ſlew certaine of the Turks; wherewith the reſt being inraged, brake into the city, and finding it deſolate ſet it on fire, ſore againſt the will of Polinus and Barbaruſſa, who ſought to haue found out the authors thereof, and to haue puniſhed them accordingly.

After that, certaine pieces of great Ordnance were landed and planted againſt the Caſtle, which with a few ſhot ſo terrified the Captaine, already troubled with the crying out of his wife, that he without any more ado yeelded himſelfe and the Caſtle withall therein, into the hands of the Enemy: vnto whom with his wife and children, Barbaruſſa at the requeſt of the French Embaſſador granted both life and liberty: the reſt he ſhut vp in a church, and gaue the C ſpoile of the Caſtle to his ſouldiers. There was in the garriſon of the Caſtle about ſeuenty Spaniards, but many mo citiſens, which were all carried away priſoners. One of the Captains daughters, a young gentlewoman of exceeding beauty, had with her good grace ſo warmed the withered affection of the old Pyrat Barbaruſſa, that he (now fitter for the graue than for marriage) became amorous of her perſon: ſo that taking her from her father, and entring her into the Mahometan Superſtition, he made of her as of his wife: inſomuch that certaine moneths after he welcommed and bountifully entertained the Captaine as his father in law, comming to ſee his daughter at the Port called Portus Herculis in Tuſcany, where the Turks fleet then lay. Barbaruſſa ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Italy, came to Oſtia, in the mouth of the riuer Tiber, and brought ſuch a feare vpon the city of Rome, that the Citiſens were ready ge- D nerally to haue forſaken the city; had not Polinus by his letters to Rodolphus the Cardinall, then the great Biſhop Paulus his Legat in the City, in part ſtaied the ſudden tumult. The Biſhop himſelfe was then at Buxetum, a towne betwixt Cremona and Placentia, trauelling (in ſhew) with the Emperor, to haue made a peace betwixt him and the French King; but labouring in ſecret to haue bought of him the Dukedome of Millan, for Octauius his kinſeman the Emperors ſonne in law. Polinus his letters written to the Cardinall at Rome, and ſent by the Gouernor to Tarracina, were to this effect:

Barbaruſſa amorous of the Captaine of Rhegium his daughter.

This fleet which is by Solyman ſent for the defence of France by Barbaruſſa his Admirall, is by his appointment at my command: ſo that it is not to hurt any but our enemies. Wherefore make it knowne to E the Romans and others dwelling alongſt the coaſt of the Popes territory, That they feare of vs no hoſtility; for the Turks will neuer violate the faith of their Emperor, ſolemnly giuen vnto me: and you know moſt aſſuredly, that the French King deſireth nothing more, than that the eſtate of Rome might not only be kept in ſafety, but alſo flouriſh moſt glorioufly, and be therefore preſerued from all injury. Farewell.

The French embaſſadours letters to comfort Rodolph the Cardinall the Popes Legat in Rome.

In like manner he alſo comforted vp them of Neptunianum and Oſtia, ſo that they brought vnto the Turks all manner of victuall; and ſometime for foure ſheepe or a couple of oxen redeemed a good priſoner taken in ſome place of the kingdome of Naples. Yet for all this, the Romans did not ſo much credit the Embaſſadors promiſe in the behalfe of the Turks good dealing, but that many of the weaker ſort fled out of the city into the country by night, al- F though the chiefe Magiſtrats did what they might to haue ſtaied them. When Barbaruſſa had thus lien three daies in the mouth of the riuer Tibur, and there watered, he paſſed alongſt the coaſt of Etruria and Liguria, without doing any harme; and ſo failed directly to Marſeilles. Where leauing him with his fleet for a while, expecting the French kings further pleaſure, we will againe returne vnto Solyman, who at the ſame time that Barbaruſſa was ſpoiling the frontiers of the Emperors Dominions in Italy, came with a great army into Hungary, for the more aſſured poſſeſſion of that Kingdome, where after he ſaw King Ferdinand ſo much longed. And G becauſe he would make all ſure before him, he ſent Amurathes Gouernour of Dalmatia, and Vlemas the Perſian Gouernour of Boſna, to beſiege Walpo, a ſtrong towne ſcituate vpon the riuer Drauus, not far from Eſſek, famous for the ouerthrow of the Chriſtian army vnder Cazzianer: after whom followed alſo Achomates the great commander of his Europeian horſemen. This towne (part of Perenus his poſſeſſions) was againſt all theſe forces kept and worthily defended by Perenus his wife (her husband then lying in priſon at Vienna) and her friends by the ſpace of three moneths, but was at laſt by the trecherous ſoldiers deliuered to the enemy, together with their Generall, whom when they could by no meanes perſwade to conſent to the yeelding vp thereof, but that he would needs hold it out to the laſt, they tooke him perforce, H and ſo deliuered him with the towne to the Turks: who receiued him with all courteſie, and vſed him honourably: but thoſe traiterous ſouldiers, whether it were in deteſtation of their treachery, or for the ſpoile of them, were all put to the ſword, the juſt reward of their treaſon. The reſt of the Citiſens were taken by the Turks to mercy, and well vſed. The Biſhop and chiefe men of Quinque Eccleſiæ (a famous city not far off on the other ſide of Drauus) hearing of the loſſe of Walpo, and terrified with the greatneſſe of the Turks army, fled for feare, leauing none but the meaner ſort of the people in the City, who willingly yeelded the ſame vnto the Turks. The next towne of any ſtrength was Socloſia, belonging alſo to Perenus; which for a while held out againſt the Turks, for that diuers Gentlemen of the country which were fled into the City, encouraged the Citiſens to ſtand vpon their defence. But after much I harme done on both ſides, when they were no longer able to hold out, they retired into the Caſtle, in hope to haue ſo ſaued their liues and liberty by their yeelding: but Amurathes was ſo offended with them, that he would come to no reaſonable compoſition, or promiſe them any thing more, than that they ſhould at their pleaſure come forth: and ſo as they came out of the gate ſlew them euery mothers ſonne, thereby to terrifie others from making like reſiſtance.

Solyman commeth with his army to Strigonium.

Solyman vnderſtanding of all theſe things, gaue thoſe towns which were taken, to Amurathes the Generall: and hauing put all things in readineſſe, departed from Buda with all his army to beſiege Strigonium, which was then kept by Liſcanus and Salamanca, two proud couetous Spaniards, with a garriſon of 1300 ſoldiers, whereof ſome few were Spaniards and Italians, and the K reſt Germanes. Paulus Biſhop of Strigonium got himſelfe out of the city betimes, diſpairing of all mercy if he ſhould haue fallen into the power of Solyman, by whoſe intermiſſion he had bin once before reconciled to King Iohn, and had again reuolted from him to King Ferdinand. The caſtle of Strigonium was ſcituat vpon a high hill ouerlooking Danubius running vnderneath it, the walls were built euen without any flankers, after the old manner of building before the inuention of guns: for which cauſe Vitellius and Torniellus two expert captaines (the yeare before ſent from the King to view the place, and the manner of the fortification) were of opinion, that the city could hardly be defended, if it were beſieged by any ſtrong Enemy, being ſubject alſo vnto a hill not far from the gates of the city. Againſt which inconueniences the old garriſon ſoldiers which wintred in Strigonium, caſt vp new bulwarks and fortifications, L and after the manner of windy headed men, making great boaſt before the danger, what they would do, ſeemed to wiſh for the comming of Solyman. But after that the barbarous enemy had with his tents couered the fields and mountaines round about the City, and withall brought a gallant fleet vp the riuer, all thoſe brags were laid in the duſt, & euery man began to grow doubtfull of his own ſafety: for that they being but few (although men of good worth) were to withſtand the infinite number of ſuch enemies, as oftentimes vſed moſt deſperatly to expoſe their liues to all maner of dangers. This their feare was alſo increaſed by the comming of certain meſſengers from Solyman, who vnderſtanding of what nation the garriſon conſiſted, ſent vnto the city three of his owne gard, one a Spaniard, another an Italian, and the third a German, all renegat Chriſtians; that euery one of them might without an interpreter ſpeake M vnto their countrymen in their own language: Theſe men admitted into the city, offered great rewards and large entertainment in the name of Solyman, to ſuch as would in time yeeld: denouncing all torture and extremities vnto them which ſhould endure the ſummons of the cannon. Whereunto it was anſwered by the Captaines, That thoſe faithfull and valiant ſouldiers

A diers,who had repoſed their laſt hopes in their armes,were neither to be won by giſts,nor terrified with threats. With which anſwer the meſſenger returned, and the ſame day the Turks great ordnance was planted vpon the hill before the gate of the city, and the weakeſt part of the walls round about the city, ſo well pickt out by the Turks to be aſſaulted, as that they could not more ſkilfully or commodiouſly haue been choſen out of them which had within moſt diligently viewed euery thing:ſo that it is to be thought that the Chriſtians wanted not only fortune againſt the Turks, but alſo faith amongſt themſelues. Salamanca diſtruſting the fortification of the ſuburbs, retired into the city, contrary to that he had before vainely boa-ſted. Achomates Generall of the Europeian horſemen, laied ſiege to that part of the wall which was next to the Biſhops gardens: Vlemas the Perſian beſieged the tower neere vnto the gate B towards Buda: the Aſapi or common ſoldiers were by their captains brought on to dig trenches and caſt vp mounts,as was thought moſt conuenient. It is incredible to be ſpoken, with what fury the great ordnance was diſcharged without ceaſing; inſomuch that the tower with a great part of the wall neere vnto it,ſhaken with continuall battery, fell downe with ſuch violence, as if all had been ſhaken with a moſt terrible earthquake: neither was any man able to ſtand vpon the wals,but that the Ianizaries with their harquebuſiers out of their trenches,and from their mounts,would moſt certainly fetch him off: and many which ſtood within farther off,were with the Turks arrowes falling from high as if it had been out of the aire, grieuouſly wounded. But that which moſt troubled the defendants,and did them greateſt harme,was the ſtones,which beaten in ſunder with the great ſhot,and not to be auoided,did with their pieces C kill or maime the ſouldiers neere hand. With which dangers they were enforced to forſake the vttermoſt wall,and to caſt vp new fortifications within, that they might with leſſe danger defend the place. Neither in the enemy wanted courage to aſſaile the breach: thrice they deſperately attempted to haue entred,and were alwaies with loſſe repulſed. In which aſſaults, amongſt others,Bultaces Sanzacke of Selymbria,a man of great account among the Turks,was loſt. Whileſt the defendants were thus buſied, many of the ſouldiers and marriners which came vp the riuer with all things neceſſary for the army, from Buda,went on ſhore,and lay in the ſuburbs of the city in ſuch ſecurity,as if there had been no enemy nigh: which thing they in the city perceiuing, ſuddenly ſallied out vpon them fearing no ſuch matter, and ſlew many of them before they could arme themſelues, and draue the reſt to their fleet: ſo that betwixt D fighting and flying there was about two hundred of them ſlaine. Zimar a Perſian, Admirall of the Fleet, in reſcuing of them which to ſaue their liues fled vnto the riuer, was ſhot through with a ſmall ſhot and ſlaine. Whileſt theſe things were in doing, and the Turks hauing in many places ſore ſhaken the wall,did with greater force daily aſſaile the City,and the defendants with their continuall loſſe, and out of all hope of reliefe, were more and more diſcouraged,an old Calabrian enginer which had long time ſerued king Ferdinand,fled out of the city to the Turks,who being courteouſly entertained by Solyman, and examined by the Baſſaes of many things concerning the ſtrength and ſtate of the city, ſatisfied them in all that they deſired; and further, directed them in planting their batteries in places moſt conuenient for the ſpeedy taking of the towne. In the meane time whileſt the Turks were with reſtleſſe labour E battering the walls, and working in their mines, it fortuned that a gilt braſen Croſſe which ſtood vpon the top of the ſteeple of the Cathedrall Church,was by the continuall ſhooting of the Turks thereat,at length beaten downe: at the ſight whereof, it is reported that Solyman after the ſuperſtitious manner of that nation taking the chance as a token of good lucke, cried out preſently,Strigonium is won.

The ſtout anſwere of the Captains.

The terrible battery of the Turks at Strigonium.

The Turkes repulſed thrice at the aſſault of the breach.

A Chriſtian fugitiue diſcouereth the ſtrẽgth and ſtate of the City vnto the Turks.

Liſcanus and Salamanca fearfully conſulting of the euent of the ſiege,and ſecretly conferring together,reſolued to ſaue themſelues,and to giue vp the towne. Liſcanus was no great ſoldier, and yet by continuall ſpoile growne exceeding rich,and therefore thought it but folly to buy the name of a reſolute captain at too deare a price, with the loſſe of his life and wealth. The like feeling was alſo in Salamanca,who preferred the ſafety of himſelfe & of that which he had F got in long ſeruice,before all credit & honor were it neuer ſo great. This their purpoſe was not kept ſo ſecret, but that it was noiſed abroad among the common ſouldiers, of whom almoſt the third part were now either ſlain,or with wounds or ſicknes grown weake: yet were they all of opinion generally, that they were ſtill ſtrong enough to defend the towne. But the vnder Captains and Antients vſing to flatter their Generals,liked well of the motion, to yeeld vnto Salamanca goeth out of Strigonium, to parly with the Turks about the yeelding vp of the ſame.

Strigonium yeelded to the Turks by Liſcanus the Spaniard.

Liſcanus the couetous Spaniard merrily ſtript of all his wealth by Halu Captaine of the Ianizaries.

Solyman vpon reaſonable conditions; rather than to expoſe themſelues to moſt certaine death, which ſhould nothing better King Ferdinands cauſe. G Not long after, an Antient was by night let downe ouer the wall; and hauing by an interpreter receiued the Turks faith, called forth Salamanca, that he might vpon better conditions go thorow with them for the yeelding vp of the towne. Who without further delay comming out, went to Achomates; before he went, commanding them which defended the water tower next to the riuer ſide, a place of great danger, for ſafegard of their liues to get them into the city: who terrified with that news, and haſtily retiring, were by the vigilant Turks which lay at the ſiege therof, perceiued; who ſuddenly breaking in, ſlew ſuch as were not yet gone, and poſſeſſed the caſtle. But Salamanca being brought before the great Baſſa's, when he had ſtood vpon many nice termes, & required many things to haue bin granted him, obtained no more, but that they ſhould without delay yeeld H vp the city, and put themſelues wholly to the mercy of Solyman. So the Spaniards being there ſtaid, himſelfe writ to Liſcanus, how he had ſped; willing him forthwith, if he loued his owne ſafety, to yeeld the city, without ſtanding vpon further termes. Liſcanus vpon receit of theſe letters comming forth to the ſoldiers, declared vnto them the neceſſity of yeelding vp of the town, and what hope there was to eſcape with life and liberty. But whileſt the ſouldiers filled with indignation, ſtood as men in doubt what to do, Halis commander of the Ianizaries came vnto the gate, and with cheerfull rather than ſterne countenance required to haue it opened vnto him, according to the agreement made by Salamanca in the campe: which was forthwith opened by Liſcanus, and the keies deliuered vnto him. The Ianizaries entring in peaceably into the city, poſſeſſed themſelues of the wals and fortreſſes round about, commanding the Chriſti- I an ſoldiers to giue place, out of whom they choſe all the beardles youths, and commanded the reſt to caſt down their harquebuſies & other weapons in a place appointed, which they all for feare did, expecting nothing but ſome cruel execution to be done vpon them by the barbarous enemy. Which their feare was the more increaſep by a ſtrange accident then vnluckily chancing: for whileſt the ſoldiers did as they were commanded, with their harquebuſies caſt their flaskes full of pouder alſo, one of them ſuddenly tooke fire of a match which was by chance caſt in amongſt them with fire in it, which firing the reſt, blew about all the heape of weapons among the Turks, which ſo filled them with anger and feare of ſome ſudden trechery, that they fell vpon the Chriſtians and ſlew diuers of them: vntill ſuch time as Halis (perſuaded that it was a thing hapned rather by chance than malice) commanded his Ianizaries to ſtay their fury. K This tumult appeaſed, Halis cauſed proclamation to be made, That all ſuch Chriſtian ſoldiers as would ſerue Solyman in his wars, ſhould haue ſuch place in his army as their quality required, with bountifull entertainment: yet of all the Chriſtian ſoldiers were found only ſeuenty, which carefull of their liues accepted the offer, fearing that the Turks would vpon ſuch as refuſed exerciſe their wonted cruelty. Halus entertaining them courteouſly, ſent them away with the other youths whom he had before culled out, downe the riuer to Buda: the other ſoldiers he tooke into his protection, and vſed their labor to help the Turks to make cleane the caſtle. But Liſcanus, who to ſaue his gold had made ſhipwrack of his honor & reputation, was glad to giue vnto Halis the faire chaine of gold which he had moſt couetouſly & inſolently before taken from Peremus; when as Halis (who would otherwaies haue taken it from him by force) by L way of military curteſie now craued it of him, as a ſtrange kind of ornament among the Turks: with which gift he was in hope to haue ſaued the reſt of his coine. But fortune fauoured not ſo much the couetous coward: for when he was about to depart away with his horſes of ſeruice which he kept very good, & had cunningly ſtuffed the ſaddles ful of gold, thinking ſo ſlily to haue conueied it: the Turks laughing at him, tooke from him his horſes furniſhed as they were, ſaying, that he which was to go by water needed no horſes. So was the couetous wretch at once quit of the great wealth which he had in long time euil got. The captains with the reſt of the ſoldiers diſpoiled of their armes, were conueied ouer the riuer of Danubius, and ſo trauelled on foot to Poſſonium, where the County Salme by the commandement of the king apprehended Liſcanus, Salamanca, and ſome other of the captains for ſuſpition of treaſon, & com- M mitted them to ſafe cuſtody, there to anſwer for their cowardly yeelding vp of the city.

Solyman entreth into Strigonium, and there ſetteth vp the Mahometan ſuperſtition.

Solyman entred into Strigonium the tenth of Auguſt in the yere 1543, and there conuerting Chriſtian Churches into Temples for the Mahometan ſuperſtition, firſt ſacrificed for his victory (as he had before done in Buda) and after with all ſpeed ſo ſtrongly fortified the city,

A as if he would thereby for euer haue taken from the Chriſtians all hope of recouering the ſame againe, deriding the ſloathfull negligence of the Germans, who poſſeſſed of it foureteen yeares, had neglected all that time to fortifie it. Not long after, Solyman leauing Oſſainus a valiant captaine Gouernor of Strigonium, and ſending his Tartarian horſmen to ſpoile the country on the left hand, as far as Alba-Regalis, went himſelfe to beſiege the caſtle of Tatta, called in antient time Theodota. The garriſon ſoldiers terrified with the loſſe of Strigonium, and the ſight of the Turks army, vpon the firſt ſummons yeelded the caſtle without reſiſtance, and were ſo ſuffered quietly to depart. That caſtle after the maner of the Turkiſh diſcipline, (who with few and thoſe very ſtrong holds keep their prouinces in ſubjection) was by Solymans commandement preſently raſed downe to the ground. Torniellus Generall of the Italians cauſed B Hanniball, captaine of the caſtle, to haue his head ſtrucke off, for his cowardly yeelding vp of the place he had taken charge of: thereby to admoniſh others, which had the charge of ſtrong places, not to refuſe an honourable death in defence of their country, for feare of an ignominious death attending their cowardiſe.

A cowardly captaine worthily rewarded.

Solyman goeth to Alba Regalis.

Tatta thus laid in the duſt, Solyman marched with his army towards Alba, ſyrnamed Regalis, for that the kings of Hungary by an antient cuſtome vſed there to be crowned, and alſo buried.
Buda, Strigonium, and Alba-Regalis, three principall cities of the kingdome of Hungary, ſtand in maner of a triangle, almoſt equally diſtant one from another, about a hundred miles in compaſſe. Buda and Strigonium are ſcituate vpon the riuer of Danubius: but Alba ſtandeth more into the land, ſtrongly ſeated in the middeſt of a great lake, but not ſo wholeſomly, eſpecially C in the Summer time, the Winter waters then decreaſing, and groſſe vapours ariſing with the heat of the Sunne. From the city thorow the mariſh or lake, vnto the firme land, lie three broad and high cauſeys (in manner of the ſtrakes of a cart wheele) well built with faire houſes and gardens on either ſide, and a broad way in the middle, wherby men paſſe in and out of the city. At the end of euery cauſey toward the land were caſt vp ſtrong bulwarkes, which the citiſens vſed not to watch but in dangerous times of war: ſo that by theſe bulwarkes, the houſes of the ſuburbs ſtanding vpon theſe cauſeys, were ſafe from the danger of the enemy, the lake filling vp all the ſpaces betwixt the cauſeys: which, what for the depth, what for mud, flags, and bulruſhes, growing in it, was not by horſe or man to be paſſed thorow. And the city it ſelfe ſtanding in the midſt of the lake, compaſſed round about with a ſtrong wall, and a deep D ditch alwaies full of water, was hardly to be beſieged: for which cauſes a great number of the country people vpon the comming of Solyman, fled into it with their cattell, as vnto a moſt ſure hold. In the city lay in garriſon two companies of Germans, and 200 horſemen, vnto whom were joyned 500 Hungarian horſemen, ſuch as in time of peace liued by robbing, and are by an infamous name called Vſarous: vnto theſe, the Italian County Torniellus, who with his Italians was come as far as Iauarinum, or Rab, ſent foure captaines with their companies, ſuch as were moſt forward in that ſeruice: after whom followed Barcotius, captain of the Kings guard, with a company of horſemen, appointed by the King for Generall. Who was no ſooner come into the city, but newes was brought of Solymans approch. Whereupon he in haſt called together the other captaines, with Birrous then Major of the city, and other the chiefe citiſens to E conſult with them, What was beſt to be done for the defence of the city, but eſpecially, Whether the ſuburbs of the city, ſtanding vpon thoſe three broad cauſeys, were to be deſtroied or not? that ſo the city ſtanding in the middeſt of the great marriſh, might both with leſſe labor and danger be defended. This queſtion was ſeriouſly debated, and great reaſons alledged: at laſt the citiſens cried out with one voice, againſt the matter and ſaid, That they would neuer ſuffer thoſe goodly ſuburbs, wherein were ſo many churches and faire buildings as might compare with the city it ſelfe, to be ſo ſhamefully deſtroied, to the vtter vndoing of ſo many rich citiſens: for what could be (ſaid they) more diſhonourable or lamentable, than to the encouraging of the barbarous enemy, to ſhew ſuch a token of extreame feare; and with their owne hands to burne and deſtroy thoſe ſtately buildings, which might by ſtrong hand be well F enough defended againſt the enemy, if they did not play the ſhamefull cowards. Of which opinion with the citiſens was alſo Octauianus Sorboſactius an Italian Captaine; alledging that both the City and the ſuburbs might both with like danger be defended; foraſmuch as they were equally fortified with the benefit of the marriſh, and if the worſt ſhould happen, the defendants might yet ſafely enough retire into the City. At laſt ſtanding vp as one thruſt forward, both with the publicke hard fortune and his owne, ſaid, Valiant gentlemen, what ſhew will G you giue of your valor, or what honor ſhall you haue of your ſeruice? If you ſhall defend ſo famous a city, by deforming of it your ſelues, and cutting off the ſuburbs, as it were the armes thereof, before the danger, vpon too haſty deſperation? Verily you ſhall do nothing, either in the ſeruice of the King, or the honour of your ſelues, except this city (if God ſo pleaſe) be of you whole and ſound valiantly defended. Vpon this ſpeech they all aroſe, the wiſer ſort and of greateſt experience giuing place to the importunity of the ignorant and ſimple. Barcotius himſelfe full of care, and ouercome with the vain opinion of the greater part, yeelded alſo vnto that fatall reſolution of ſauing the ſuburbs. For it often falleth out, that they, who wiſely weighing dangers in the ballance of reaſon, and do therefore fearefully reſolue of the euent of things, and doe thereupon oftentimes giue more hard and reſolute iudgement of things than men of greater courage; yeeld neuertheleſſe to be partakers of other mens follies, yea euen to moſt aſſured death, rather than by maintaining their fearefull opinion, to be deemed cowards. So fell it H out with Barcotius the Generall, who ſetting a good countenance on the matter which nothing liked him, went out to the ſouldiers, declaring vnto them the reaſons why the ſuburbs were to be defended: exhorting them with like valour on their parts to anſwer that honourable reſolution, promiſing to prouide whatſoeuer ſhould be neceſſary for the obtaining of the victory; aſſuring them of great rewards and preferment, which ſhould by their good ſeruice deſerue the ſame. Hereupon the ſuburbs were by the common labour of the ſoldiers and the citiſens quickly ſortified, the great ordnance in places conuenient orderly planted, and watch and ward kept by their captains and their companies by their turns day & night. But the Turks drawing neere to the city, bent their forces only againſt the ſuburbs of the gate leading towards Buda: I for that they perceiued the mariſh was in that place drier than the other, and the ſandy ground more vnfit for the making of bulwarks, & other fortifications for the ſafety of the defendants, than in the other places where the ground yeelded better turfe. Barcotius perceiuing the enemies purpoſe, drew all the Italians and Germans from the other gates into the ſuburbs of the gate of Buda, leauing the country people which were fled into the city, & the citiſens, in their places. At the firſt comming of the Turks, the Hungarian and German horſmen, with the Italian footmen, ſallied out of the ſuburbs, and after certain light skirmiſhes retired. Which maner of fight was continued by the ſpace of three daies without any great harme don on either ſide; for the captains had warily commanded, That the ſouldiers ſhould not aduenture out too far. But after that Solyman himſelf was come, and had with the multitude of his tents beſet the K city far and neere, to the terror of the beholders; the Chriſtians ſhut vp all the gates, and ſallied out no more. Which thing cauſed the wild Hungarian Vſarous (vſed to open skirmiſhes) to prouide for themſelues in time, and not to ſuffer themſelues to be coupt vp (as they termed) within the wals of the city: ſo for faſhion ſake, asking leaue to be gone (who were not againſt their wils to be ſtaied) they by night departed, being not to be intreated by the Generall or citiſens to ſtay, and by knowne waies eſcaped thorow the woods from the enemy. In the mean time the Turks were come with their winding trenches within ſhot, and with their arrowes and ſmall ſhot ſo ſcoured the top of the bulwarke, that no man could there poſſibly appeare but he was ſtreight wounded: and ſuch was the fury of the great artillery, that it had in ſhort time battered in ſunder the planks and timber which kept in the ſandy mould, whereof the for- L treſſe was made, more for ſhew than for ſtrength; in ſuch ſort that the great ſhot flying quite through all, ſlew and wounded many that were a far off: in which diſtreſſe of the defendants, the Turks Aſapi with ſmall danger filled vp the ditches of the bulwarke, and diuers places of the marriſh with earth and wood, which they brought continually from a wood thereby with ſix hundred waggons, ſo that in the ſpace of twelue daies they had made a firme way for them to paſſe ouer vpon, both to the bulwarke and the ſuburbs; a worke before thought impoſſible to haue been performed. The ditches thus filled vp, the Turks valiantly came on, ſeeking by plaine force to enter the bulwarke. Firſt came on the Aſapi, whom as men of leaſt worth the Turks captains vſe to thruſt to the firſt danger: after whom followed the horſmen, now on foot, with ſwords and targuets, or elſe their horſemens ſtaues, couering the Ianizaries, who M vpon their knees with their harquebuſies ſore gauled the defendants. This hot fight endured aboue three houres with equall hope and courage: but the Turks ſtill relieued with freſh ſouldiers, repulſed the Chriſtians, and gained the vttermoſt bulwarke: neuertheleſſe the Italian fort was that day valiantly defended, the very women and religious helping to defend it:

The Turks with incredible labor fill vp the ditches and lake, and by plaine force aſſault the bulwark of the ſuburbs toward Buda.

A it: in which aſſault a tall Hungarian woman, whoſe courage far exceeded the weakneſſe of her ſex, thruſting in amongſt the ſouldiers vpon the top of the fort, with a great ſythe in her hand at one blow ſtrucke off two of the Turks heads, as they were climing vp the rampier. This aſſault was giuen the nine and twentieth of Auguſt, on which day the Turks had before taken Belgrade, and alſo ſlaine king Lewis at the battell of Mohatchz, and were therefore after their ſuperſtitious manner in obſeruation of their fortunate and vnfortunate daies, in good hope to haue then taken the city: wherein they were much deceiued, being not able at that time further to enter, but enforced againe to retire. Wherewith Solyman offended, ſent for Abraham, Achomates, and Halis (the chiefe captains in that aſſault) into his tent, and reproued them ſharply, for that the bulwarke being ſo valiantly and fortunatly won, they had not with more courage B prosecuted the victory, but cowardly (as he thought) giuen it ouer, being in a manner already won: and therewithall with ſterne countenance commanded them to prepare all things ready within three daies for a freſh aſſault, and neuer to returne vnto him, except they did win the city. Whereunto the captains anſwered no more (for were they neuer ſo guiltleſſe, they might not before him ſtand to excuſe themſelues) but that they would in ſhort time accompliſh his deſire. Wherefore hauing made all ready, and encouraged the ſouldiers to this laſt aſſault, they terribly aſſailed the rampiers, and brought a great feare vpon the defendants: for taking the benefit of a thick miſt (as it oftentimes chanceth in marriſh grounds) they were with great ſilence (contrary to their manner) got vp to the top of the rampiers, and come to handy blowes, before they were well diſcouered. The fight was for the time fierce and terrible: but C the Ianizaries preuailing, at length put the Germans to flight, and after them the Italians alſo, ſo that now well was he that could run faſteſt towards the city. But that their haſty flight little auailed, when as they were to paſſe out by a little narrow gate in maner of a wicket: & they in the city, without regard of them that fled, had plucked vp the draw bridge ouer the ditch.
For naturally it commeth oftentimes to paſſe, that the feare of the preſent danger, without bluſhing excuſeth our foule dealing. So the barbarous and fierce enemy purſuing the flying Chriſtians at the heeles all the length of thoſe ſuburbs with moſt cruel execution, many notable men, ſome fighting, ſome flying, were there ſlain: amongſt whom was Octauianus Seroſactius, author of the euil counſell whereof enſued that calamity. Barcetius the Generall flying on horſbacke to the little gate, which was not to be paſſed thorow, and crying in vaine to them that D fled, to haue the great gate opened, was by the comming of the Ianizaries ſlaine: whoſe head and right hand full of rich rings, was by the barbarous enemy carried about in deriſion vpon a launce. The reſt of the flying multitude finding the little gate ſhut vp with the bodies of the dead, and the bridge malitiouſly drawn vp, deſperatly threw themſelues into the deep ditch; where ſome of them labouring to ſwim out, were caught by the legs and arms by others that could not ſwim, & both together drowned. Some hardly crawling ouer, were ſhot in the head or backe with the Turks arrowes: otherſome ſticking faſt in the mud, were as if it had been in ſport ſhot to death by the Turkes: ſome few there were which got ouer and were ſaued.

A notable act of an Hungarian woman.

The ſuburbs of Alba Regalis won by the Turks.

The miſerable ſlaughter of the flying Chriſtians

There was yet left in the city the Generall of the German horſemen, and Vſcaſadus of Cremona, an Italian captain; theſe two gathering the remainder of the ſouldiers which were left, E placed them vpon the wals: but the citiſens were ſtrucke with ſuch a feare, that they could not tell which way to turn themſelues. For now Birrous the major, with the Aldermen and other chiefe citiſens, ſeeing the ſlaughter of the Italians and Germanes, were ſo ouercome with deſpaire, that they thought no hope of their well doing was to be repoſed in making of any further reſiſtance, but only in the mercy of Solyman. Wherfore Birrous ſpake vnto the Turks from the wall, That he might ſafely ſend Embaſſadors to Solyman, to intreat with him vpon reaſonable conditions, for the yeelding vp of the city: which thing Achomates eaſily granted. With theſe Embaſſadors for the citiſens, went alſo the Generall of the German horſemen, and Carolus Rufus an Italian captaine (who of all others had borne himſelfe moſt valiantly in all the aſſaults, to the great admiration of the Turks) to intreat for the ſafety & liberty of the ſouldiers.
F The Embaſſadors being brought before the great Baſſaes, requeſted, That yeelding the city, the citiſens might enjoy their liues & liberty: whereunto they were ſo anſwered, as that it ſeemed they ſhould not all be pardoned, yet was the general feare wel diminiſhed, for that the puniſhment reſpected but ſome few. Rufus was curteouſly entertained, and eaſily obtained, that the Italians might in ſafety depart with bag & baggage to Vienna: the like grace alſo had the Gene-

Embaſſadors ſent to Solyman to entreat vpon conditions for the yeelding of the city.

Generall of the Germans for his ſoldiers. Solyman the Eunuch Baſſa, offered vnto Rufus honourable entertainment, if he would haue ſerued Solyman: which when he refuſed as bound to G king Ferdinand by oath, in honour of his valour he gaue him a rich cloake wrought with flowers of gold. The Embaſſadors returning into the city, and telling how they had ſped, deliuered the citiſens of a great feare. Shortly after the city being yeelded, Achmates by open proclamation in the market place, commanded the Italians and Germans to make themſelues ready againſt the next day to depart, and to take good heed that no Hungarians went with them; he alſo ſtreightly charged the citiſens to keep their houſes, vntill the ſtrange ſoldiers were departed. At the time appointed the Italians and Germans ſet forward, conducted by Homares with a company of the Turks horſemen, who faithfully defended them againſt the Tartars, running vp and downe the country after ſpoile: neither was any thing taken from them but H their dags, which the German horſmen after a new faſhion carried at their ſaddle bowes; theſe the Turks greatly deſired, delighted with the nouelty of the inuention, to ſee them ſhot off with a firelocke without a match. But after the departure of Homares, they were in their trauell ſet vpon by the Hungarians with whom they had many hot skirmiſhes, and had hardly eſcaped vnſpoiled, had they not bin reſcued by the Kings ſoldiers lying in garriſon in the Caſtles as they paſſed alongſt the country. The few which remained, after many troubles came at laſt to Vienna, more like ghoſts than men.

Solyman entreth into Alba Regalis.

Solyman entering quietly into the city, firſt viſited the Sepulchres of the Hungarian Kings, and gaue out proclamation, That the Hungarians ſhould feare of him no harme; for that he was not come to conquer them, but to deliuer them from the bondage of the Germans, and ſo I to reſtore againe that entire kingdome vnto Stephen the right heire of King Iohn. But within three or foure daies after, he called out the chiefe citiſens into a field not far off, wherein the bodies of condemned men were wont to be buried, as if he would there haue taken an oath of them for their fidelity: whether, after they were all aſſembled in the beſt manner they could, as to ſome ſolemne feaſt, the cruel tyrant (without regard of his faith or promiſe) cauſed them all to be ſlaine. Howbeit ſome report, that he cauſed them only to be put to death which bare office in the city, at ſuch time as they reuolted from the obedience of the Queene and the infant king, vnto Ferdinand, and had then brought in German ſoldiers; and that he ſent the reſt into exile to Buda and Belgrade. So Solyman leauing Balibeius Gouernour of Alba-Regalis; and Mahometes ſometime Gouernour of Belgrade, his Lieutenant Generall for the whole go- K uernment of that kingdome, returned againe toward Conſtantinople (Winter now beginning to approch) after he had that Summer won Strigonium and Alba-Regalis, two of the chiefeſt cities of Hungary. All this while king Ferdinand had raiſed no power worth the ſpeaking of, to withſtand ſo mighty an enemy; only at Vienna lay ſeuen thouſand Germans and foure thouſand Italians, at ſuch time as Solyman departed from Alba-Regalis, which were ſhortly after diſcharged.

Solymā causeth the chiefe Citiſens of Alba Regalis to be ſlain.

Solyman returneth to Conſtantinople.

Whiles Solyman thus lay at the ſiege of Alba-Regalis, he ſent his Tartarian horſmen which ſerued him to ſmall purpoſe in the ſiege, to ſpoile the country round about: theſe ſauage people doing much harme, were in diuers places circumuented by the Hungarians, & about three thouſand of them ſlaine: one of them being taken priſoner, had found in his knapſacke halfe L a child, of about two yeares old, the loathſome remainder of his barbarous feeding.

Barbaruſſa all this while lying with his fleet (as we haue before ſaid) at Marſeilles, fretted exceedingly, that he had to his diſhonour vndertaken ſo long a voiage by ſea, to pleaſure him which was not able (as he ſaid) to direct his own deſignes to any certain reſolution, but ſhamefully ſuffered the beſt time of the yeare for ſeruice, negligently to paſſe away without any thing doing, the blame whereof would (as he ſaid) be imputed to him at Conſtantinople: and that Solyman who deſired to aid the King his friend and confederat, and by all means to annoy his enemies, would take in euill part to haue it reported, that he had with ſo great charge ſet out ſo great a fleet, and ſo far off, to helpe his friend hardly beſet with his enemies, and to haue done nothing: beſides that, he tooke on like a Turke, that he who in time of ſeruice neuer vſed M negligently to let ſlip the leaſt opportunity, ſhould now blemiſh his former credit and eſtimation, by lying ſtill all that Summer in the harbour of Marſeilles, where his ſoldiers grew lazy with nothing doing. Wherefore Polinus going to the King, told him of the proud Turks great diſcontentment for lacke of imploiment: and returning to Barbaruſſa, brought order from the

A the king, that he ſhould lay ſiege to Nice a city of Prouince, then holden by the Duke of Sauoy.
This city ſtanding vpon the ſea, was by one of the French kings for a great ſum of mony pawned vnto the Duke: which mony, King Francis had many times offered to haue repaied; but could neuer get the city out of the Dukes hands. Vnto which ſeruice, the French King ſent alſo his fleet of two and twenty gallies and eighteen ſhips, wherein were imbarked eight thouſand footmen, and victuall for many daies. This fleet departing from Marceilles, keeping cloſe by the ſhore, came to the port called Monoc; whither two daies after came Barbaruſſa alſo with an hundred and fifty gallies. From thence Polinus by commandement from the king writ vnto the State of Genoa, That they ſhould not feare of that great fleet any hoſtility, which was not to hurt any but them of Nice, and not them neither if they would yeeld themſelues.
B For more aſſurance whereof, he obtained of the Turks diuers Genoa captiues, which had long time bin chained in their gallies, and courteouſly ſet them at liberty, and ſent them home without ranſome. After that, he friendly exhorted the citiſens of Nice, to yeeld themſelues againe vnto their antient and lawfull Prince, renowned for his bounty and power; rather than to aduenture their State to all extremities for that poore and diſtreſſed Duke, who betweene the Emperor and the French king, diſpoiled of the greateſt part of his dominions, ſaw no other end of his miſeries, but to leaue that little which yet remained, as a prey to the one or to the other, that ſhould firſt lay hand thereon. Wherunto the magiſtrats of the towne anſwered, That they knew no other Prince or ſouereigne, but Charles their Duke: wherefore he ſhould deſiſt farther to ſolicite them by letters or meſſengers, whom they would make no C other account of but as of their enemies. Wherefore the Frenchmen and Turks landing their forces, laid ſiege to the towne in three places. The citiſens had but a little before newly fortified their wals, by the direction of Paulus Simeon, captaine of the caſtle, and one of the Knights of the Rhodes, a man of great experience; who long before taken at ſea by pyrats, had ſometime ſerued Barbaruſſa, and therefore perſuaded the citiſens as reſolute men to withſtand the Turks. Which, that they ſhould more conſtantly performe, he tooke their wiues and children and weaker ſort of the people into the caſtle; and from thence furniſhed the citiſens with all things neceſſary for their defence. The City was at once in diuers places battered by the Turks and French, both by ſea and land: ſo that at laſt the Turks had beaten downe one of the new built bulwarks, and made ſo faire a breach, that with their enſignes diſplaid, they attempted D to haue entred: whoſe forwardnes Leo Strozza (then ſeruing the French King with a band of Italians) imitating, ſought to haue entred alſo: but the citiſens ſtanding valiantly vpon their defence, manfully repulſed both the Turks and Italians, and cauſed them with loſſe to retire.
In this aſſault were ſlaine about 200 Turks, and of Strozza his ſouldiers 22. Preſently after, Barbaruſſa with all his force began a freſh battery, in ſuch terrible maner, that the citiſens ſeeing their wals in diuers places opened, and the few ſouldiers they had, ſore wounded, and no hope to be in conuenient time relieued, began to parley with the French Generall from the wall, concerning the yeelding vp of the city; vpon condition, that they might in all reſpects liue vnder the French King as they had done vnder the Duke: for performance wherof, the Generall gaue them his faith. But Polinus fearing leſt the Turks ſhould violate this compoſition, E and for griefe of the loſſe of their fellowes, or for hope of the ſpoile, breake into the city, entreated Barbaruſſa to recall his ſouldiers, and to cauſe them to go aboord his gallies. For which cauſe not long after, the Ianizaries, as men deceiued of their hoped prey, were about to haue ſlaine both Polinus and Strozza, as they came from talking with Barbaruſſa.

Nice in Prouince beſieged by the French and the Turks.

The Citiſens craue parley, & after yeeld the city.

The city thus yeelded, they began to conſult for the taking of the caſtle: the performance wherof conſiſted firſt in the aſſailing of the caſtle it ſelfe, & then in defending of the city from the ſudden ſallies of them in the caſtle, and likewiſe in defending of them which beſieged the caſtle, ſo that no enemy ſhould come to raiſe the ſiege: of which two things, Barbaruſſa put the French to choice which they would take, ſhewing himſelfe ready either to beſiege the caſtle, or to keepe the field. The French ſtanding in doubt of which to make choice, the proud old F Turk ſcorning their ſlow reſolution, & them alſo, as men vnfit for the ready accompliſhment of any martiall exploit, cauſed 7 pieces of battery, wherof 2 were of wonderfull greatnes, to be placed in a trice in a place moſt conuenient, & the ſame quickly intrenched & fortified, to the great admiration of the French: with which pieces he had quickly beaten downe the battlements of the wals, and centinel houſes, ſo that no man was able to ſhew himſelf vpon the wals.

The caſtle beſieged.

The Frenchmen likewiſe on the other ſide did with their great ordnance continually batter G the caſtle:but with long ſhooting they came to ſuch want of ſhot and pouder, that Polinus was glad to requeſt, that he might either borrow or buy ſome of Barbaruſſa: whereat the Turke fretted and fumed exceedingly, That they ſhould in their owne country ſtand in need of his prouiſion, who at Marceilles had better fraughted their ſhips with wine, than with neceſſaries for the wars. For the rough and ſeuere old Turke could not forbeare to taunt them, and oftentimes complained, that he was deluded with the hope of great matters which Polinus had promiſed at Conſtantinople; and that in ſuch rage, that he would threaten to lay hands vpon Polinus, who had brought him from Conſtantinople thither, whereas he muſt either loſe his honour, or hauing ſpent his ſhot and pouder, expoſe himſelfe and his fleet to all dangers. Wherefore being exceeding angry with the French, he ſuddenly called a counſell of his Captaines, H and other chiefe afficers; giuing it out, That he would preſently returne toward Conſtantinople, ſeeing that among theſe cowardly and vnskilful men (as it pleaſed him to terme them) he found nothing ready or according to promiſe. Yet for all that, when he had chaſed his fill, by the faire intreatance & large promiſes of the French General & Polinus together, the wayward old man was perſuaded to change his minde, and to continue the ſiege. But he was yet ſcarcely well pacified, and his mind ſet againe vpon the ſiege, but letters were intercepted from the great captaine Alphonſus Vaſtius, to Paulus captaine of the caſtle, wherein he requeſted him to hold out a while againſt the enemy, till that he, who had already ſent before his light horſemen, might come alſo himſelfe with his men at armes, who were vpon the way alongſt the Alps by the ſea ſide, and would in two daies with the ſlaughter of the Turks put him and his I caſtle out of all feare and danger. Which thing once bruted in the camp, ſuch a great and ſudden feare come vpon the Turks and Frenchmen (the night following the more to terrifie them prouing by chance very rainy and tempeſtuous) that they all forſooke their trenches and great ordnance, and laying downe their weapons, by narrow paths climing ouer the top of the high mountaine, came downe headlong to the ſea ſide to the fleet. But the day appearing, and no enemy to be ſeene, they were aſhamed of that they had done, and came againe to the ſiege. Not long after, when as the caſtle in all mens judgement was hardly to be battered, and ſtanding vpon a firme rocke, was not but in long time with hard labour and doubtfull ſucceſſe to be vndermined, it was generally thought good to raiſe the ſiege. The Turks vpon their departure brake into the city, and when they had taken the ſpoile thereof, ſet it on fire. K Barbaruſſa in his rage threatneth to lay hands on Polinus. and to returnforthwith to Conſtantinople.

The Turks and French giue ouer the caſtle of Nice, and ſet fire on the city.

Barbaruſſa retiring with his fleet to Antipolis, came to anker at the Iſland Lerina, called of the mariners Margarita; at which time Vaſtius and the Duke of Sauoy, with Auria his fleet arriued at Villa Franca: in the entrance of which hauen, the gally wherein Vaſtius went, was like to haue bin loſt. Foure other gallies by force of ſudden tempeſt were driuen vpon the rockes, and ſo ſuddenly beaten in pieces by the ſurges of the ſea, that the gally ſlaues had no leiſure to ſtrike off their yrons, but were there all drowned, and all the ordnance loſt. Polinus vnderſtanding this diſtreſſe of the enemy, ſent one Petrus Angelus to Barbaruſſa, to ſhew him the occaſion offered, & to perſuade him with all ſpeed to haſt thither with his fleet, as to a moſt aſſured victory. Barbaruſſa ſeemed to like well of the motion, and promiſed to go; yet he moued not, letted as was thought with the contrary wind, which then blew hard at Eaſt, and with the L roughneſſe of the ſea. But the wind being fallen, and the ſea become calme, and he contrary to his wonted maner making no haſt, ſet ſlowly forward, and being a little on his way, came again to anker, and went no further; the Sanzackes and other captaines firſt maruelling, and afterward laughing thereat, ſcoffingly ſaid, That Barbaruſſa did but reaſon to deale kindely with Auria, as his brother and friend of his owne profeſſion, for that he had ſome yeares before receiued the like friendſhip at his hands, in letting him eſcape at Hippona, which he now honeſtly repaied him again. Whereunto Barbaruſſa both then and afterwards at Conſtantinople anſwered no otherwiſe, but, That he being an old commander, and halfe blind, ſaw more in the matter than all thoſe greene Captaines with their ſharpe ſight. Not long after, he returned againe to Marceilles, and put into the hauen of Tolon, called in antient time Taurenta. Vaſtius M and the Duke comming to Nice, commended the Captaine of the Caſtle, and wondering at the cunning manner of the Turks fortifications, preferred them in that point before the Chriſtians. Barbaruſſa lying with his fleet at Tolon, and by the Kings officers entertained with all poſſible courteſie, deliuered fiue and twenty gallies to Salec the famous pyrat, and Barbaruſſa derided by the Turks captains.

His anſwer to their taunts.

A Aſſanes his nigh kinſman, who paſſing the bay of Narbona, rifled certain towns in Spain ſtanding vpon the ſea coaſt, and about the promontory of Venus (called of the mariners Creum) took great prize, and in the hauen of Palamos took one merchant ſhip and a gally with which prey they paſſed ouer to Algiers as they were commanded, there to winter, and with the firſt of the Spring to return againe to Barbaruſſa in Prouince. That Winter Barbaruſſa repairing his fleet, was furniſhed with many neceſſaries by the Genowaies, and ſpecially by Auria himſelf, who vnder the colour of redeeming of priſoners, willingly furniſhed the Turk with ſuch things as he wanted: for although he profeſſed himſelſe one of the Emperours Captaines, yet would he not ſhew an enemies mind, by the vnſeaſonable deniall of a little ſea furniture, leſt in ſo doing he ſhould haue hurt his natiue country Genoa, which he ſaw then ſubiect to the B iniury of ſo great a fleet ſo nigh at hand. But leaue we now Barbaruſſa to winter in Prouince, and with the courſe of time turn a little out of the way, to ſee in Muleaſſes king of Tunes, the ſmall aſſurance the greateſt haue in higheſt place of worldly honour.

Muleaſſes fearing the comming of Barbaruſſa, departeth from Tunes into Italy, to craue aid of Charles the Emperor.

This Mahometan king, once before thruſt out of his kingdome by Barbaruſſa, and reſtored again by Charles the Emperour (as is before declared) hearing of his comming with this great fleet, and imagining nothing leſſe than that he ſhould come to the aid of the moſt Chriſtian King, doubted (not without cauſe) leſt it was prepared againſt himſelfe. Beſides that, diuers great cities of his kingdome, namely Conſtantina, Mahemedia, and Mahometa (called in antient time Cyrtha) Leptis & Adrumentum, were then holden by the Turks Barbaruſſa's fauorites.
Wherfore fearing the worſt, about the ſame time that Barbaruſſa was ſailing alongſt the C coaſt of Italy, he paſſed ouer into Sicily to haue met the Emperour at Genoa, and to haue obtained of him greater aid againſt the Turks. At his departure out of Africke, he committed the tuition of his kingdom to ſuch valiant men as he ſuppoſed would haue bim to him moſt faithfull: Firſt, he appointed Mahometes (then Maniphæt) to gouern the city, and Corſus (otherwiſe called Fares) his old ſeruant to keep the caſtle; leauing Mahometes his brother, and Fares his ſon, with Touarres a Spaniard (captain of the caſtle of Guletta) as pledges, the one of his brothers, the other of his fathers faith: but vnto Amida his ſonne he committed the leading of his men of war for the defence of his kingdome againſt the Turks and Numidians. As he was paſſing out of Sicilia to haue met the Emperour at Genoa, he was by contrary winds driuen firſt to Caieta, and afterward to Naples, where he was by the Viceroy honorably entertained, D and a houſe appointed for him richly furniſhed: the Neapolitans wondring at the ſtrange attire of the people, with the maner of their feeding, and curious plenty of all manner of ſweet perfumes; for into euery diſh they put in odors of exceeding price, ſo that it was well known, that a Peacock and two Pheaſants dreſſed after the manner of the kings kitchin, coſt aboue an hundred duckats: ſo that not only the dining chamber, when they were carued vp, but all the houſe was ſo filled with the ſtrange & fragrant ſmell, that all they that dwelt neer therabouts were partakers of that vnuſuall and delicate perfume. From Naples he was about to haue trauelled by land vnto the Emperour, being then in conference with the Pope at Buxetum (fearing to aduenture the ſea, poſſeſſed by the enemies fleet) had not the Emperor by his letters willed him to ſtay ſtill where he was. But whilſt he made his abode at Naples, and carefully E attended what courſe Barbaruſſa would take (who furniſhed with ſo great a fleet, was departed from Nice diſappointed of his purpoſe) he was by certain meſſengers aduertiſed out of Africa, That Amida his ſon was riſen vp againſt him, and poſſeſſing himſelſe of the kingdome, had ſlain his captnins, polluted his wiues, and taken the caſtle of Tunes. With which news he being exceedingly troubled, determined without delay to paſſe ouer into Africke, and though late, yet as he might to remedy his domeſticall troubles, in hope to oppreſſe that rebellion in the beginning, and his ſonne alſo, before he could gather any ſtrength to reſt vpon. Wherfore he with all the haſt he could opened his coffers and entertained ſoldiers, the Viceroy giuing leaue to all ſuch baniſhed men as would, to come and giue their names to paſſe ouer as ſouldiers into Africke: vpon report whereof, ſuch a number of maleſactors and condemned perſons F came flocking to Naples, that it was thought a ſufficient army might haue been made of ſuch kind of men; euery one of them chuſing rather to enter into pay, and blot out the infamy of baniſhment, and proue the fortune of wars, than to liue wandring vp and downe the woods and in danger euery houre to be hanged. Of theſe infamous men, one Ioannes Baptiſta Loffredius (a man well borne, but of a fierce and couetous diſpoſition) vndertooke the leading: he co-Coſtly diſhes.

Amida riſeth againſt Muleaſſes his father, and vſurps the kingdome of Tunes.

Muleaſſes returneth into Africke to Guletta.

uenanting with Muleaſſes to haue three months pay before hand, leuied 1800 men; which he G preſently ſhipped, and keeping the greateſt part of their pay to himſelfe, paſſed ouer with the King into Africke, and landed at Guletta. But how Amida roſe vp againſt his father, and what was the end of that bloudy rebellion, ſhould not be amiſſe briefly to rehearſe. There were certain Noblemen of great authority about Amida when Muleaſſes departed, which at their pleaſure ruled the yong Prince, who eaſily hearkened vnto their counſell, and followed the ſame: the chiefe of theſe was one Mahometes the ſonne of Bahamer, who in the reigne of Mahometes, Muleaſſes his father, was Maniphæt, whom Muleaſſes (poſſeſſed of the kingdome) put ſhamefully to death by cutting off his priuities, becauſe he had by haſty marriage deceiued him of Rhahamana a maiden of incomparable beauty, the daughter of Abderomon captain of the Caſtle, whom he moſt paſſionatly loued: for which cruell fact, Mahometes his ſonne had H long time conceiued a deadly hatred againſt Muleaſſes, which he had many yeres diſſembled, that he might as occaſion ſerued be the more cruelly reuenged. Next vnto him was another Mahometes ſyrnamed Adulzes, whom Muleaſſes was wont commonly to call his worſt ſeruant. Theſe two with a few others conſpiring together, gaue it out, that Muleaſſes was dead at Naples, and before his death had moſt irreligiouſly (as they accounted it) reuolted to the Chriſtian religion. With which report they perceiuing Amida moued, came vnto him, and perſuaded him quickly to enter into his fathers ſeat, leſt Mahometes his yonger brother (then lying in hoſtage with the Chriſtians at Guletta) ſhould by the fauour and help of Touarres, whoſe garriſon was euer ready, be preferred before him. For Mahometes was eighteene yeares old, reſembling his Grandfather in name, fauor, and diſpoſition, and therefore of the Citiſens of I Tunes beſt beloued. Wherfore Amida came in poſt haſt out of the camp to Tunes, to lay firſt hand vpon his fathers Kingdome. The people which as yet had heard nothing of the Kings death, receiued him with doubtfull countenance: and as many ſtood maruelling that he was ſo raſhly come into the City without his fathers commandment, Mahometes (appointed by Muleaſſes to gouerne the City) came out and ſharply reproued him as guilty of high treaſon, perſuading him to returne againe into the camp, and ſeeing him ſtay, by force of multitude thruſt him out of the City. Amida deceiued of his expectation, got him out of the way into the pleaſant country of Martia between Vtica and the ruines of old Carthage. But Mahometes Gouernour of the City, after he had repulſed Amida, got him with all ſpeed by water to Touarres at Guletta, to know of him more aſſuredly, if any ſuch euill news were brought from K Sicily of the death of the King; and to complain of the raſhneſſe and intollerable preſumption of Amida. Where ſtaying ſomewhat long in diſcourſing with the Captaine, and afterwards returning to the City, he was ſuſpected to haue practiſed with the Captaine, to make Mahometes (the pledge in Guletta) King in his fathers ſtead; for ſo the common voice went. The Moores are by nature a faithleſſe people, haſty, ſuſpitious, deſirous of news, which true or falſe, they for the time interpret as ſerueth beſt their factions, whereunto they are exceedingly giuen. So at the firſt there roſe in the City a doubtfull rumor of the making of a new King; the ſuſpition whereof more and more increaſing, ſet all the City on an vprore. By occaſion whereof, certain of the citiſens to whom the very name of Muleaſſes was odious, ſpeedily certified Amida (then in the gardens of Martia, ſighing and grieuing at his hard fortune) how L all ſtood, and that now was the time to do himſelfe good. He reuiued with that vnexpected news, and encouraged by the perſuaſion of Bohamar and Adulzes, and other his followers; reſolued to take hold vpon that good offer of fortune, which would not alwaies frown, & to follow his good hap. So in haſt returning to Tunes, and entring in at the gate, which he then found open, ran preſently to the Gouernours houſe, and finding him not at home, cruelly ſlew all his houſhold, and with his bloudy company went preſently to the Caſtle: where Fares the Captain ſeeking to haue kept him out, and boldly laid hands vpon his horſes bridle to haue thruſt him back, was by a deſperat Æthyopian, one of Amida his followers, thruſt through with a ſword and ſlain: ouer whoſe body yet ſprawling, Amida forcing his horſe, brake into the caſtle with his friends, & finding Mahometes gouernor of the city, preſently ſlew him alſo: and M ſo by this means Amida in the ſpace of an houre (a little before, a man in deſpair) obtained the city, the caſtle, and kingdom together. After that, he murthred his yonger brethren, & embrued with bloud, without ſhame polluted his fathers concubines. Muleaſſes landed (as we haue before ſaid) at Guletta, with ſuch forces as he had brought with him out of Italy; was aduiſed

A by Tovarres the Spaniard, not to aduenture with ſuch a handful of men to go to Tunes, before he were wel aſſured of the good diſpoſition of the citiſens toward him: and was the more ear-neſt with Loſredius not to go, becauſe the Viceroy had expreſly written, that he ſhould in no caſe go farther than Guletta, except the King according to his promiſe had a good ſtrength of the Numidians to ioyn with him. But certain of the Noblemen amongſt the Moors, who vnder the colour of friendſhip were fled out of the city, and had after the ſolemne manner of their nation, put their ſwords vnto their throats, and ſworn to be faithfull vnto him, wonderfully pricke forward both the King and Loſredius (too haſty of themſelues to their own deſti-ny) bearing them in hand, that Amida vpon the firſt ſight of his father would forſake the City and betake himſelf to flight. So without any more ſtaying, Muleaſſes with enſigne diſplai-B ed ſet forward toward Tunes, Loſredius cheerfully following him; Tovarres requeſting them in vain to beware of the Turks trechery. Muleaſſes marching ſtill forward, was come ſo nigh that they might from the wals deſcry him, when ſuddenly a ſtrong troupe of Moores ſallied out at the gate with a terrible cry, and fiercely aſſailed him: whom the Kings horſmen valiantly receiued, many falling on both ſides. Muleaſſes in this hot skirmiſh fighting couragiouſly againſt his enemies, was wounded in the face, and bled exceedingly; which ſo diſcouraged them about him, that they doubting of his life, turned their backes and fled: when pre-ſently a wonderfull number of horſe and foot ſuddenly iſſuing out of the oliue gardens, had beſet Loſredius and his ſouldiers round; vpon whom the Italians diſcharged certaine field pieces: but after they had once diſcharged them, they had no leiſure to charge them againe; for C the barbarous enemy came on ſo thicke and ſo faſt, that the Italians ſeeing themſelues too weake, and compaſſed in round, let fall their weapons as men diſcouraged, and caſt themſelues into the lake, ſo by ſwimming and taking hold of the little boats, to ſaue themſelues from the enemies ſword: which boats ſtood theſe diſtreſſed men in great ſtead; for being furniſhed with ſmall pieces, they did beat backe the Moores, who eagerly purſued them euen into the lake with their horſes. Loſredius as a man amaſed with the ſudden comming of the enemy, tooke the lake with his horſe, and was there vnhorſed by the enemy and ſlaine, as were diuers with him. Some few there were that fought couragiouſly, chuſing rather honourably to die in the midſt of their enemies, than ſhamefully to be ſtrangled in the ſtinking lake. Muleaſſes ſoiled with his owne bloud and with the duſt, flying amongſt the reſt, was knowne and taken: D nothing more bewraying him than his odoriferous perfumes. In this conflict 1300 Italians were loſt; the reſt which eſcaped Touarres relieued, and ſhortly after ſhipped them ouer into Sicily, from whence they trauelled home to Naples, but ſo poore, as well ſhewed the miſery of their fortune. Amida hauing thus obtained the victory, was more carefull of nothing than to make his father vnfit for gouernment, which he did by cutting the ſight of both his eies with a hot penknife: the like cruelty he vſed vpon Nahazar and Abdalla his brethren, then taken with his father. After that, he certified Touarres Captaine of Guletta, That he had taken a few youths priſoners, which he would deliuer vnto him; and that he had bereft his father of his ſight, who had deſerued a worſe puniſhment, as he that had long before done the like to his brethren, but had yet left him his life, as an example to other tyrants, and to ſhew that he dealt E not altogether vnmercifully with ſo perfidious a father. Laſt of all, he confirmed (vpon certaine conditions) the ſame league which his father had with him: which he well ſaw was to great purpoſe, eſpecially in the newneſſe of his kingdome. Neither did Touarres refuſe the ſame, as ſtanding with his preſent profit: for vpon this agreement, Amida was to giue him certaine mony to pay his ſouldiers, and to deliuer him the priſoners he had taken, with the en-ſignes and body of Loſredius. For more aſſurance whereof he gaue Sebites his ſon then nine yeares old, in hoſtage, yet vpon condition, that if any aſſured peace could not be agreed vpon, but that they muſt needs enter into war, then Touarres ſhould forthwith reſtore him his ſonne Sebites in ſafety. Theſe capitulations, although they ſeemed not vnreaſonable, and were of them well liked; yet Touarres thought it not altogether agreeing with the honor of the Em-F peror, that he ſhould enjoy the kingdome, who by moſt horrible treaſon and deteſtable villany had thruſt himſelfe thereinto without the Emperors leaue. Wherefore he entred into a new deuice to cal in the rightful heir, who might at the Emperors pleaſure (offended with the injury done by Amida) reigne in Tunes.

cetes fled to Barbaruſſa. Him, becauſe he was Muleaſſes naturall brother, Touarres ſent for, putting him in hope of the kingdome, ſupported by Anemſeah a great Prince amongſt the Numidians, who had all that long time curteouſly entertained him. Neither was Abdamalech ſlow to accept the occaſion preſented, eſpecially incouraged thereunto by the Numidian prince his good friend, and the predictions of the Aſtrologers, who had foretold him, That he ſhould die king of Tunes. Which vain kind of diuination hauing in it no maner of aſſurance, yet cauſeth great mindes oftentimes to vndertake great attempts beyond reaſon, which falling out with more hap than they were with reaſon foretold, giueth ſome credit to that vanity, and cauſeth thoſe cold prophets to be of ſome accounted as great wiſards. And to worke this feate, ſuch a time was offered, as a better could not be wiſhed: for Amida hauing ſet all things in order as he pleaſed in the city, and caſting no perill, was gon to Biſerta, to take order for his Cuſtoms. which was there great vpon fiſhing. Wherefore Touarres to keepe his promiſe, ſent backe Sehites, Amida's ſon, in a boat to Tunes, and receiued Abdamalech: who trauelling moſt part by night, was ſecretly come to Guletta, and there reſting himſelfe and his horſes a few houres, to preuent the fame of his comming, poſted in haſt with a troupe of his Numidian followers to Tunes, and paſſing through the city, went directly to the caſtle, which he entred without reſiſtance of the warders; ſuppoſing him to haue bin Amida come from Biſerta: for Abdamalech had after the manner of the Moors couered his face with a ſkarſe, as if it had bin to haue kept him from the ſun & the duſt, and by that happy ſlight got into the caſtle before it was known who he was. The warders perceiuing their error, began as men amaſed now too late to betake themſelues to their weapons, for in making reſiſtance they were quickly ſlain by the Numidians which came in with Abdamalech: who thus poſſeſſed of the caſtle (the chiefe ſtrength of that kingdom) let in his friends, which were many in the city, by whom preſently he was ſaluted king: the reſt of the citiſens either well liking of the matter, or at leſt not daring for feare to ſtir. But as in theſe worldly things, for which men ſo vainly toil, is no aſſurance, ſo this new king ſhortly after fel ſick and died, when he had reigned but 26 daies, and was afterwards roially interred. After whoſe death, his mighty friends, with the chief of the citiſens (perſuaded and incouraged by Touarres the Spaniard) choſe Mahometes his ſon (a childe ſcarce 12 yeares old) to reign in his fathers place; appointing Abdalages Maniphæt (brother to him who Amida ſlew) Abdelchirinus Meſuar, Schyriſſus (a great man in their Mahometan ſuperſtition) and Perellus a Chriſtian knight, to be his directors & gouernors: which foure ſwaied all at their pleaſure. But Abdelchirinus tendring the welfare of his country, and diuiſing out of ſeaſon how to ſet vp one of the roiall bloud that were of himſelfe able to gouern the kingdom (ſaying, That it was not for the common good to be ruled by a childe) was for his labour by his other three fellowes ſuddenly ſlain, with all his kindred and knowne friends. After whoſe death the other three erected a manner of Triumvirat gouernment, euery one of them laying hand vpon one part of the ſtate or other, as liked him beſt. Amida thus ſhut out of Tunes, and hauing loſt his kingdom, wandred vp and down to Leptis, Cyrapolis, and many other places, crauing aid of euery man to recouer his kingdom, miſerably rent in ſunder (as he ſaid) by moſt wicked men who inſolently triumphed ouer the boy king. Which they of Tunes knew well to be true, and daily complained of the death of Abdelchirinus, whom they called the faithfull Counſellor and father of his countrey. Whilſt Amida is thus trudging vp and down, crauing help of this and that prince, prouing his friends, and ſounding his ſubiects affection towards him, Muleaſſes grown miſerable with his long impriſonment and the calamity of his diſaſter fortune, obtained of the yong king his nephew ſo much fauour, as that he might ſomtime go out of the caſtle to the church: vnder colour whereof he took ſanctuary, a place in Tunes holden in ſuch reuerence amongſt the Moors, as that it was a moſt inuiolable refuge to all ſuch as fled thereunto. Not long after, at ſuch time as Bernardinus Mendoza the Admiral of Spain, came to Guletta with the Spaniſh fleet, Muleaſſes at the requeſt of Touarres was conueyed out of the ſanctuary to the Lake, and ſo by water to Guletta, there to be preſent at the conſultation there holden for the vtter ſubuerſion of Amida and the driuing out of the Turks out of ſuch Cities as they yet held alongſt the ſea coaſt in Africa. Muleaſſes had hardly before eſcaped the hands of certaine of his enemies in Tunes, who ſought after his life, preſerued by an old woman, who mooued with pitty, hid him from their fury vnder a great heap of garlicke: and had he not now in good time eſcaped to Guletta, he had againe fallen into the hands of his merciles ſon Amida, who ſhortly after recouered again his kingdom, and would not, as he ſaid himſelf, haue ſpared him for the reuerence of any ſanctuary. For the citiſens of Tunes weary of the euil gouernment of ſuch as were in authority about the yong king, and not a little offended with the King himſelf, for eſpouſing Melucca his couſin, one of Muleaſſes his daughters; ſecretly incouraged Amida by letters to repair to the city, promiſing to aid him in recouering of his kingdom. Wherupon he came in ſuch haſt, that the yong king had ſcarce time to get out of the city; and Amida entring without reſiſtance, and holpen by his friends, eaſily obtained again the kingdom, and exerciſed moſt exquiſit cruelty vpon his enemies: of whom he cauſed ſome to be torn in pieces and deuoured of fierce maſtiues kept hungry for that purpoſe. Perellus he cauſed to be tortured, his ſecrets to be cut off, and himſelf afterward burnt to aſhes in the market place.

Amida recouereth the kingdom of Tunes.

But Muleaſſes ſtaid not long at Guletta, offended with the couetouſnes of Tovarres, who, as he ſaid, had not faithfully reſtored ſuch things as he had before put him in truſt withall, but had auaritiouſly to his miſery deceiued him of part of his rich houſhold ſtuffe, with certaine notable pretious ſtones, and ſome of his treaſure: whereof the blind King ſo grieuouſly complained to Charles the Emperor, that for deciding the matter they were both commanded to repair vnto him into Germany: where in concluſion to end the ſtrife, Tovarres was diſcharged of his gouernment, and Muleaſſes ſent into Sicily, there to bee kept of the common charge of that rich Iſland. Muleaſſes by the way comming to Rome, was honorably feaſted by Cardinal Farneſius: at which time he ſhewed himſelf both in his apparel and behauiour not forgetfull of his better fortune: and being brought into the preſence of Paulus the great Biſhop, would do him no greater honor than to kiſſe his knee, accounting it too great an indignity to haue kiſſed his foot. He was of ſtature tall, and of a princely diſpoſition, vnworthy of ſo hard a fortune, had he not in the like maner before vnmercifully dealt with his own brethren.

Barbaruſſa weary of his long lying to ſo ſmall purpoſe in Prouince, requeſted the French King either thorowly to imploy him, or els to giue him leaue to depart: offering if he ſo pleaſed, to ſpoil all alongſt the coaſt of Spain, from the mountain Pyrenæi to Cadiz. But he not ignorant what hard ſpeeches ran of him already in all parts of Chriſtendom, for bringing in the Turks, was loth to leaue to the memory of all poſterity, the foule remembrance of ſo woful a ſlaughter: beſides that, he was aduiſed to diſburthen his Countrey of ſuch troubleſome gueſts, who rouing about, did much harm in the prouince where they lay, and as it was reported, now & then ſnatcht vp one country peaſant or other, and chained them for ſlaues in their gallies. Wherfore in ſupply of the Turks that were dead, the king gaue vnto Barbaruſſa all the Mahometan ſlaues in his gallies, to the number of about 400, and furniſhing him with all kind of prouiſion, and beſtowing great gifts vpon him and his captains, ſent him away, and with him Strozza with certain gallies, his Embaſſadour to Solyman. So the Turkes departing out of Prouince, kept along the coaſt vntil they came neer to Savona, whither the Germanes ſent diuers preſents and freſh victuals to Barbaruſſa; which he took ſo thankfully, that he proteſted not to hurt any of their territory. From thence he took a right courſe to the Iſland of Elba belonging to the duke of Florence, ouer againſt Populona; where vnderſtanding that one of the ſons of Sinan his old friend was kept priſoner, he writ vnto Appianus Gouernour of the Iſland, for his deliuerance, to this effect:

I know that a yong man a Turk ſerueth thee, the ſon of Sinan ſyrnamed the Iew (a famous Captaine) taken of late at Tunes; him I would haue thee freely to reſtore: which gift I wil make thee to vnderſtand to be vnto me moſt acceptable, for this our great fleet in paſſing by you ſhall faithfully forbear to vſe any hoſtility. But if thou ſhalt in this ſo ſmall a matter refuſe to gratifie me, expect vpon the coaſt of thy country all the harms that an angry enemy can do.

Barbaruſſa his letters to Appianus.

Wherunto Appianus (ſhewing his men vpon the walls in token that he was not afraid) anſwered, That the yong man was become a Chriſtian, & therfore might not in any caſe be deliuered to the Turks: but that he would in any other thing gratifie him what he could, and for his ſake vſe the yong man as his ſon. And to mollifie the vnkindneſſe of his anſwer, he ſent him freſh victual with other preſents. But Barbaruſſa offended with the anſwer, landed his men round about the Iſland, and commanded them to make what ſpoile they could. Which they performed accordingly, hunting the Iſland people vp and down the rocks & mountains like hares; vntil that Appianus, not without cauſe doubting the vtter ſpoil of the Iſland, redeemed his peace by deliuering the yong man to Salec the pyrat, who brought him to Barbaruſſa gallantly attyred after the Italian maner; of whom he was ioyfully receiued, as the ſon of a moſt valiant captain his old friend. And therupon Barbaruſſa ſtaid his ſoldiers from doing any further harm vpon the Iſland, and gaue Appianus great thanks for him. This yong man Barbaruſſa honored with the command of ſeuen gallies, and afterwards ſent him to his father, then lying at Suetia a port of the red ſea, Admiral againſt the Portugals, who greatly troubled thoſe ſeas. But the old Iew ouerjoyed with the ſudden and vnexpected return of his ſon, whom hee had for many years before giuen ouer as loſt, in embracing of him fainted, and ſo preſently for joy died.

Sinan the Iew dieth for ioy.

Barbaruſſa doth great harm vpon the coaſt of Italy.

This man for valor was accounted little inferior to Barbaruſſa, but for diſcretion & iuſt dealing far beyond him, nothing of ſo furious and waiward a diſpoſition as was he. Barbaruſſa departing from Elba, came into the bay of Telamon in Tuſcany, and in ſhort time tooke the city, which he ſpoiled and burnt, eſpecially the houſe of Bartholomeus Telamonius; whoſe dead body but a little before buried, he cauſed to be pluckt out of the graue, and his bones to bee ſcattered abroad, becauſe he being admiral of the Biſhop of Romes gallies, had in the Iſland of Lesbos waſted Barbaruſſa's fathers poor poſſeſſions: and marching by night eight miles farther into the land, ſurpriſed Montenum, and carried almoſt all the inhabitants away with him into captiuity. The like miſchief he did at the port called Portus Herculis; but purpoſing to haue taken Orhatello, and there to haue fortified, he was by Luna and Vitellius (two valiant Captains before ſent thither, the one by the State of Siena, and the other by the Duke of Florence) repulſed. So though diſappointed of his purpoſe, yet hauing done great harme, and put the whole country of Tuſcany in exceeding fear, he departed from thence & landed again at Igilium, now called Gigio, an Iſland about twelue miles diſtant from Portus Herculis, where he quickly battered the town, and caried a wonderful number of all ſorts into miſerable captiuitie. Keeping his courſe, he paſſing the cape of Linar, and comming ouer againſt Cantumcelle, had burnt that city for the ſame reaſon he did Telamon, had he not bin otherwiſe perſuaded by Strozza the French Embaſſador, fearing to draw the French King into further obloquy. From thence he came with a direct courſe to the Iſland of Iſchia; where landing in the night, he intercepted moſt part of the inhabitants of the Iſland, as they were flying into the mountains; and in reuenge of the hatred he had conceiued againſt Vaſtius at the ſiege of Nice, he burnt Forino, Panſa, and Varranium, three chief townes of that Iſland: but Pithacuſa the dwelling place of Vaſtius, ſtanding vpon a broken rocke ſomewhat diſtant from the ſea, he durſt not aduenture vpon. Then ſcraping along the Iſland Prochita with leſſe hurt, becauſe moſt part of the inhabitants were before fled to Pithacuſa, he put into the bay of Puteoli, and ſent Salec the pyrat with part of his fleet, to make proof if the city of Puteoli might from ſea be battered. Salec drawing neer the city, ſhot into it with his great ordnance, and by chance ſlew one Saiauedra a valiant Spaniard, vpon the wals, and put the citiſens in great fear leſt the whole fleet ſhould haue landed, they themſelues as then vnprouided. But the Viceroy came preſently with a power both of horſe and foot from Naples: which Barbaruſſa diſcouering from ſea as they came down the mountains, called back Salec, and leauing the Iſland of Capri, and paſſing by the promontory of Atheneum, was about to haue ſeiſed vpon Salernum; when a tempeſt ſuddenly ariſing diſperſed his fleet, and draue him beyond the promontory of Palinurus, vpon the coaſt of Calabria, where he did exceeding much harm, eſpecially at Carreato. From thence he departed to the Iſland of Lipari, betwixt Italy and Sicily, which Iſland he miſerably ſpoiled, and with forty great pieces ſo battered the City, that the Citiſens were conſtrained for fear to yeeld; whom he carried away all priſoners, about the number of ſeuen thouſand of one ſort of people and other, and afterwards burnt the City. So loded with the rich ſpoil of Italy and the Iſlands vpon the coaſt, hee returned againe towards Conſtantinople, with ſuch a multitude of poore Chriſtian Captiues ſhut vp ſo cloſe vnder hatches among the excrements of Nature, that all the way as they went almoſt euery hour ſome of them were caſt dead ouer boord. Euery man deteſting the endleſſe hatred betwixt the Emperor and the French King, the very ground of all this and many thouſand other moſt woful and vndeſerued calamities of the poor ſubiects. With this rich prey, and an infinite

Solyman triumphing at Conſtantinople for the good ſucces he had in Hungary, in the middeſt of all his glory was aduertiſed of the death of Mahomet his eldeſt ſon, whom of all his children he held deareſt: whoſe dead body was ſhortly after brought from Magneſia, & with wonderful ſolemnity and no leſſe mourning buried at Conſtantinople. How intirely Solyman loued this his ſon, wel appeared by the great ſorrow he conceiued at his death; and not contented to haue built him a ſtately Tomb, he erected alſo in memorial of him a Mahometane church, called the Church of Mohomet the leſſer, for the difference of Mahomet the great who B won Conſtantinople. Wherto alſo he anexed a monaſtery and a colledge, with many things more after the groſſe maner of their ſuperſtition, for the health of his ſoul, as he vainly ſuppoſed.
After that, Solyman according to his wonted maner, which was but euery ſecond or third year to take in hand ſome notable expedition, for two years ſpace ceaſed from wars; in which time many of the great princes and worthy men of that age died, amongſt whom was Francis the French King. Hariadenus Barbaruſſa that famous Turk of whom we haue ſo often ſpoken, (being a man of great years, and of no leſſe fame) left this life in the year of our Lord 1547, and was buried at a houſe of his own called Beſictas, neer to Boſphorus Thracius on Europe ſide, not far from the mouth of Euxinum, about four miles from Pera, where he had but a few years before at one time ſould about ſixteen thouſand Chriſtian captiues taken out of Corcyra.
C And to make famous that place appointed for his buriall, he of his owne coſt built a Mahometan temple there, which with his ſepulchre is yet to be ſeen. That place was in antient time called Iaſonium. About which time alſo died of conceit the famous captain Alphonſus Davalus Vaſtius, taken away by vntimely death when he had liued but forty fiue years. At which time Charles the Emperour by his Embaſſadour Gerardus Veltunich concluded a Peace with Solyman for fiue years, wherin King Ferdinand was alſo included. Which peace was afterwards before the expiration thereof, by Solyman (at the requeſt of Henry the French King) 1548.

Mahomet Solymans eldeſt ſon dieth.

Barbaruſſa and Vaſtius die.

Solyman had now almoſt three years taken his reſt, when it fortuned that Ercaſes ImirZa king 1549.
of Sirvan, mooued with the often injuries of Tamas his brother the great Perſian King, fled D to Solyman at Conſtantinople to craue aid againſt his brother. Solyman glad of ſuch an occaſion to work vpon, entertained him with all curteſie, and promiſed to vndertake his quarrel, and to protect him againſt his vnnatural brother: and when hee had made all things ready for ſo great an expedition, paſſed ouer into Aſia, and after a long and painſull trauell entred at laſt with a puiſſant army into Armenia, and there in the borders of the Perſian kingdom firſt beſieged the city of Van, which after ten daies ſiege was yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, that the Perſian ſoldiers there in gariſon might with life and liberty depart with their arms as ſoldiers: which was at the firſt by Solyman granted, and ſo the city ſurrendred. From thence Solyman ſent his chief Commanders with a great part of his Army to burn and ſpoil the Enemies country: which they for a time cheerfully performed, and running far into the country, E ſtroue as it were among themſelues who ſhould do moſt harm; where ImirZa among the reſt (for whom Solyman had vndertaken this war) was as forward as the beſt to waſt and ſpoile his brothers kingdom, ſparing nothing that came to hand: the beſt and richeſt things he got he preſented to Solyman, to draw him on ſtill in that War. But that ſerued not his turn to recouer again his kingdome of Sirvan: for Tamas, without ſhewing any power to withſtand the Turks, had after his wonted manner cauſed his people to withdraw themſelues far into the mountain Country, leauing nothing behind them in that waſt country to relieue them, but the bare ground: ſo that the farther the Turks went, the more they wanted, without hope of better ſucceſſe than ſuch as they had before to their loſſe made proof of, in their former expeditions into that great Kingdome. The conceit wherof did not ſo much pierce the common F ſouldiers only, but euen the Captaines themſelues, that to make an end of that long and vnprofitable war taken in hand for another mans good, they conſulted amongſt themſelues either to kil ImirZa, or elſe to diſgrace him with Solyman. Which thing they ſo cunningly wrought; ſome ſuggeſting falſe ſuſpitions of his trecherous dealing in the proceeding of that war; and others with like craft, vnder colour of friendſhip giuing him warning in ſecret of the danger

danger he was in; the one filling Solymans head with diſtruſt, and the other Imirza's with fear; briefly to ſhut the matter vp in their own terms, They perſuaded the Hare to fly, and the hounds to follow. Imirza doubting ſome ſudden miſchief, fled to an old acquaintance of his, one of the princes of Chaldæa, who moſt trecherouſly ſent him in bonds to Tamas his brother his moſt cruel enemy; who glad to haue the author of all his troubles with the Turks, deliuered into his hands, caſt him in priſon: and that Solyman nor any other ſhould in his behalf further proſecute the war, or by his means hope for victory, cauſed him to be murthered in priſon. In this expedition againſt the Perſian king Solyman was occupied a yeare and nine moneths: all which time the Turks endured great troubles, and were often hardly diſtreſſed by the Perſians: vntill at laſt Solyman himſelf weary of that tedious war, wherin he had got neither honor nor profit, thought it beſt ſo to make an end; and therupon returned again to Conſtantinople in the year 1549.

1550.

Dragut the pyrat taketh certaine cities in Africk.

1551.

Malta attempted by the Turks.

In the mean time it fortuned that one Dragut Rayſes a notable pyrat of the Turks, had craftily ſurpriſed the city of Africa in the kingdom of Tunes (called in antient time Aphrodiſeum, and alſo Leptis Parua, and now of the Moors Mahomedia) and there ſetling himſelf as in a place both commodious and of good aſſurance; exceedingly troubled the Chriſtians both by ſea and land, eſpecially ſuch as traded in the Mediterranian. So that the Emperor, mooued as wel with the manifold injuries don by that arch pyrat vpon the frontiers of his dominions, as by the daily complaints of his poore ſubjects, commaunded the Viceroy of Sicilia, and Auria his admiral, to levy a ſufficient power, in time to repreſſe that pyrat before he grew to further ſtrength. Whereupon they with a ſtrong fleet wel manned, and thorowly appointed for that purpoſe, and aided by the Knights of Malta, paſſed ouer into Africk, and landing their forces, by the ſpace of three moneths beſieged the City, before poſſeſſed by the pyrat; which with continual battery they had at length made ſaultable. And hearing that Dragut was comming with a new ſupply to relieue it, they with al celerity aſſailed it both by ſea and land, and in the ſpace of a few hours took it by force the 10 of September, An. 1550. in which aſſault many of the enemies were ſlain, and the reſt taken. Auria hauing thus diſpoſſeſſed the pyrat, and aduiſedly conſidering that the city was not without infinit charge to be holden by the Chriſtians, among ſo many of the infidels, raſed it down to the ground, carying away with him 7000 captiues, and all the ſpoil of the city; and not ſo contented, did all the harme hee could with fire and ſword all alongſt the coaſt of Africa, to the intent that the Turks ſhould there find no relief; and took 12 priſoners out of Monaſterium, a town not far from the City of Africa: and ſo hauing don what he came for, returned againe into Sicily. Dragut thus at once thruſt out of all he had, with a few of his friends fled to Solyman to Conſtantinople, and ſo inſenced him with the grieuous complaint of the wrong don vnto him by the Chriſtians, that in reuenge therof he reſolued to make war both vpon the Emperor and King Ferdinand, notwithſtanding that the fiue yeares league hee had before taken with him at his going into Perſia, was not yet expired. So with cheerful words and curteous entertainment comforting vp the deſperat Pyrat, the Spring following (which was in the year 1551) he furniſhed him with a great fleet in moſt warlike manner appointed, to reuenge the injuries done vnto him by Auria in Africk. With this fleet, in number 140 ſaile, Sinan one of the Turks great Baſſa's, accompanied with Dragut the pyrat, by the appointment of Solyman departed from Conſtantinople, and cutting thorow the ſeas, arriued at length in Sicily, where they ſuddenly ſurpriſed the town and caſtle of Auguſta, which they preſently ſacked. Departing thence, they came to the Iſland of Malta, and there landed their men in the port of Marza, otherwiſe called Moxet, neer vnto the caſtle, which they battered with certain great pieces of Ordnance, but ſo as that it was not to any great purpoſe. At which time diuers companies of the Turks running farther into the Iſland, made hauock of whatſoeuer came in their way. After they had thus a few dayes in vaine battered the Caſtle, and ſaw themſelues both there valiantly repulſed, and in other places by ambuſhes and ſuch like meanes cut off by the ſouldiers and inhabitants of the Iſland, they remoued thence to the road of Saint Paul, where they landed their ordnance with purpoſe to haue beſieged the city: but perceiuing by a little, what ſmall hope there was to preuail, and ſeeing diuers of their men dying through the extremity of the heat, they forſook the Iſland and went to Gaules, now called Goza, a little Iſle about thirty miles in compas, fiue miles diſtant from Malta Weſtward, ſubject to the Knights of the Religion:

A and there landing their men, miſerably ſpoiled the Iſland, and whatſoeuer they light vpon, and carried away with them of one ſort of people and other ſix thouſand and three hundred captiues into moſt woful bondage. With which booty they put againe to ſea, and ſayled directly to Tripolis in Barbary, called of old Leptis Magna: which city Charles the Emperour had before giuen to the knights of Malta, & was at that time by them kept. This city was the marke whereat the Baſſa and the pyrat ſhot; for taking whereof they landed their forces and by long and winding trenches approached as neere the ſame as they could: Which they did not without great loſſe of their people, for they of the caſtle hauing good ſtore of great ordnance, and moſt expert canoniers, did with continuall ſhot ſo annoy the Turks, that they were oftentimes inforced to retire; yet with much troubleſome labour and no leſſe perill, they B came at laſt within eight hundred paces of the wals: where the Baſſa cauſed his gabions made of thicke planks, to be placed in the night, and his battery planted. And the next day (which was the eighth of Auguſt) the cannon began to play, which was again anſwered from the ca-ſtle with like, and euery houre ſome of the Turks ſlaine, the great ſhot ſtill flying into their trenches, ſo as that day foure of the beſt canoniers in the army were ſlaine, with certain other men of good account alſo: and the clerk-generall of the army, a man of great eſtimation and well beloued of the Baſſa, had his hand ſhot off, and many other of the Ianizaries & common ſouldiers either ſlaine or hurt: moreouer they brake one of their beſt peeces, and diſmounted foure others, which for that day made them to leaue the batterie. The next night the Turks approched yet neerer vnto the caſtle, vpon whom the Chriſtians in the break of the day ſal-C lied out euen vnto their very trenches, and afterwards retired. With the riſing of the Sunne (which the Turks haue in great reuerence) they renued their battery with greater force than before, yet with ſuch euil ſucceſſe, that the Baſſa was almoſt mad for anger: for about the euening the fire by miſchance got into their pouder, wherewith thirty of the Turks were burnt, many hurt, and one piece broken. At length the Turks were come ſo neer, that they had planted their battery within 150 paces of the wal: which they continued with ſuch fury, that they had made a faire breach euen with the ditch: but what was beaten down in the day time, the defendants repaired again by night, in ſuch ſort, as that it was not to be aſſaulted. Yet in con-cluſion, a traiterous ſouldier of Prouince, before corrupted by the Turks, found meanes to fly out of the caſtle into the camp, where he declared vnto the Baſſa the weakeſt places of the ca-D ſtle, by which it might be moſt conueniently battered and ſooneſt taken, and eſpecially one place aboue the reſt which was againſt the gouernours lodgings; which ſtanding towards the ditch, and hauing vnderneath it cellars to retire the munition into, could not if it were once battered, well be repaired again or fortified. Which the Baſſa vnderſtanding, cauſed the batterie there to be planted, laying the peeces ſo low, that they did eaſily beat the cellars & vaults in ſuch ſort, that in ſhort time the walls were ſo ſhaken, that the rampiers aboue through the continuall battery, began greatly to ſink: which ſo amazed the ſoldiers, ſeeing no conuenient means to repaire the ſame, that ſetting all honour aſide, they requeſted the Gouernour, That ſithence the matter began now to grow deſperat, and that the place was not longer to be holden, he would in time take ſome good order with the enemy for their ſafety, before the walls E were further endamaged. With which motion, Villier the Gouernour (an antient knight of Dauphiny, and one of the Order) was exceedingly troubled: which Poiſieu another of the knights, perceiuing, he as a man of great courage, and of all others there preſent moſt antient, in the name of the other knights declared vnto them, that the breach was neither ſo great, nor ſo profitable for the enemy, but that it was defenſible enough, if they would as men of courage repaire the ſame, ſaying, That it was more honourable for worthy knights and luſty ſol-diers, to die valiantly with their weapons in their hands, fighting againſt the Infidels for the maintenance of their law & Chriſtian religion, than ſo cowardly to yeeld themſelues to the mercy of thoſe, at whoſe hands nothing was to be looked for but moſt miſerable ſeruitude, with all kind of crueltie: and therefore perſwaded the gouernor to hold it out to the laſt. For all F that, he ouercome with the importunity of ſuch as would needs yeeld, who with al vehemen-cy vrged the imminent danger wherewith they were all like to be ouerwhelmed, and finding deration, conſented that a white enſigne ſhould be diſplayed vpon the Walls, in token that

danger he was in; the one filling Solymans head with diſtruſt, and the other Imirza's with fear; briefly to ſhut the matter vp in their own terms, They perſuaded the Hare to fly, and the hounds to follow. Imirza doubting ſome ſudden miſchief, fled to an old acquaintance of his, one of the princes of Chaldæa, who moſt trecherouſly ſent him in bonds to Tamas his brother his moſt cruel enemy ; who glad to haue the author of all his troubles with the Turks, deliuered into his hands, caſt him in priſon: and that Solyman nor any other ſhould in his behalf further proſecute the war, or by his means hope for victory, cauſed him to be murthered in priſon. In this expedition againſt the Perſian king Solyman was occupied a yeare and nine moneths : all which time the Turks endured great troubles, and were often hardly diſtreſſed by the Perſians : vntill at laſt Solyman himſelf weary of that tedious war, wherin he had got neither honor nor profit, thought it beſt ſo to make an end; and therupon returned again to Conſtantinople in the year 1549.

Dragut the pyrat taketh certaine cities in Africk.

In the mean time it fortuned that one Dragut Rayſes a notable pyrat of the Turks, had craftily ſurpriſed the city of Africa in the kingdom of Tunes (called in antient time Aphrodiſeum, and alſo Leptis Parua, and now of the Moors Mahomedia) and there ſetling himſelf as in a place both commodious and of good aſſurance; exceedingly troubled the Chriſtians both by ſea and land, eſpecially ſuch as traded in the Mediterranian. So that the Emperor, mooued as wel with the manifold injuries don by that arch pyrat vpon the frontiers of his dominions, as by the daily complaints of his poore ſubjects, commaunded the Viceroy of Sicilia, and Auria his admiral, to levy a ſufficient power, in time to repreſſe that pyrat before he grew to further ſtrength. Whereupon they with a ſtrong fleet wel manned, and thorowly appointed for that purpoſe, and aided by the Knights nf Malta, paſſed ouer into Africk, and landing their forces, by the ſpace of three moneths beſieged the City, before poſſeſſed by the pyrat; which with continual battery they had at length made ſaultable. And hearing that Dragut was comming with a new ſupply to relieue it, they with al celerity aſſailed it both by ſea and land, and in the ſpace of a few hours took it by force the 10 of September, An. 1550. in which aſſault many of the enemies were ſlain, and the reſt taken. Auria hauing thus diſpoſſeſſed the pyrat, and aduiſedly conſidering that the city was not without infinit charge to be holden by the Chriſtians, among ſo many of the infidels, raſed it down to the ground, carying away with him 7000 captiues, and all the ſpoil of the city ; and not ſo contented, did all the harme hee could with fire and ſword all alongſt the coaſt of Africa, to the intent that the Turks ſhould there find no relief ; and took 12 priſoners out of Monaſterium, a town not far from the City of Africa: and ſo hauing don what he came for, returned againe into Sicily. Dragut thus at once thruſt out of all he had, with a few of his friends fled to Solyman to Conſtantinople, and ſo inſenced him with the grieuous complaint of the wrong don vnto him by the Chriſtians, that in reuenge therof he reſolued to make war both vpon the Emperor and King Ferdinand, notwithſtanding that the fiue yeares league hee had before taken with him at his going into Perſia, was not yet expired. So with cheerfull words and curteous entertainment comforting vp the deſperat Pyrat, the Spring following (which was in the year 1551) he furniſhed him with a great fleet in moſt warlike manner appointed, to reuenge the injuries done vnto him by Auria in Africk. With this fleet, in number 140 saile, Sinan one of the Turks great Baſſa's, accompanied with Dragut the pyrat, by the appointment of Solyman departed from Conſtantinople, and cutting thorow the ſeas, arriued at length in Sicily, where they ſuddenly ſurpriſed the town and caſtle of Auguſta, which they preſently ſacked. Departing thence, they came to the Iſland of Malta, and there landed their men in the port of Marza, otherwiſe called Moxet, neer vnto the caſtle, which they battered with certain great pieces of Ordnance, but ſo as that it was not to any great purpoſe. At which time diuers companies of the Turks running farther into the Iſland, made hauock of whatſoeuer came in their way. After they had thus a few dayes in vaine battered the Caſtle, and ſaw themſelues both there valiantly repulſed, and in other places by ambuſhes and ſuch like meanes cut off by the ſouldiers and inhabitants of the Iſland, they remoued thence to the road of Saint Paul, where they landed their ordnance with purpoſe to haue beſieged the city : but perceiuing by a little, what ſmall hope there was to preuail, and ſeeing diuers of their men dying through the extremity of the heat, they forſook the Iſland and went to Gaulos, now called Goza, a little Iſle about thirty miles in compas, fiue miles diſtant from Malta Weſtward, ſubject to the Knights of the Religion:

A and there landing their men, miſerably ſpoiled the Iſland, and whatſoeuer they light vpon, and carried away with them of one ſort of people and other ſix thouſand and three hundred captiues into moſt wofull bondage. With which booty they put againe to ſea, and ſayled directly to Tripolis in Barbary, called of old Leptis Magna: which city Charles the Emperour had before giuen to the knights of Malta, & was at that time by them kept. This city was the
not without great loſſe of their people, for they of the caſtle hauing good ſtore of great ordnance, and moſt expert canoniers, did with continuall ſhot ſo annoy the Turks, that they were oftentimes inforced to retire; yet with much troubleſome labour and no leſſe perill, they B came at laſt within eight hundred paces of the wals: where the Baſſa cauſed his gabions made of thicke planks, to be placed in the night, and his battery planted. And the next day (which was the eighth of Auguſt) the cannon began to play, which was again anſwered from the ca-ſtle with like, and euery houre ſome of the Turks ſlaine, the great ſhot ſtill flying into their trenches, ſo as that day foure of the beſt canoniers in the army were ſlaine, with certain other men of good account alſo: and the clerk-generall of the army, a man of great eſtimation and well beloued of the Baſſa, had his hand ſhot off, and many other of the Ianizaries & common ſouldiers either ſlaine or hurt: moreouer they brake one of their beſt pieces, and diſmounted foure others, which for that day made them to leaue the batterie. The next night the Turks approched yet neerer vnto the caſtle, vpon whom the Chriſtians in the break of the day ſal-
C lied out euen vnto their very trenches, and afterwards retired. With the riſing of the Sunne (which the Turks haue in great reuerence) they renued their battery with greater force than before, yet with ſuch euil ſucceſſe, that the Baſſa was almoſt mad for anger: for about the eue-

the Baſſa, if he could be contented that ſome of them might come to intreat with him of ſome good order to be taken for the yeelding vp of the caſtle. Whereunto the Baſſa willingly conſenting, two of the knights were forthwith ſent out, to offer to him the caſtle with the artillery and munition, ſo as he would furniſh them with ſhips to bring them with bag & baggage ſafely to Malta.

Hard conditions offered by the Baſſa to the beſieged.

Whereunto the Baſſa briefly anſwered, That (foraſmuch as they had as yet deſerued no grace, preſuming to keep ſo ſmall a place againſt the army of the greateſt Prince on earth) if they would pay the whole charges of the army, he would condiſcend to their requeſt; or if they would not thereunto conſent, that for recompence, all they within the caſtle ſhould continue his ſlaues & priſoners: notwithſtanding if they incontinently & without delay did ſurrender the place, he would exempt out of them 200. Wherupon the meſſengers returning in deſpaire, were ſtaid by Dragut and Salla Rais, with flattering words and faire promiſes that they would ſo much as lay in them, perſuade the Baſſa to condiſcend to a more gratious compoſition; fearing indeed that the beſieged through deſpaire would reſolue (as their extreme refuge) to defend the place euen to the laſt man. Wherfore they went preſently to the Baſſa, to declare vnto him his ouerſight in refuſing them who voluntarily would haue put themſelues into his hand, whom reaſon would he ſhould with all curteſie haue receiued: for that after he had the caſtle & the men in his power, he might diſpoſe of them as he ſhould think good.

More eaſie conditions offered by the Baſſa, which he confirmeth by his oath.

The Baſſa liking wel of his counſell, cauſed the meſſengers to be called again, & with fained & diſſembling words told them, That at the inſtance of Dragut & Salla Rais there preſent, he did diſcharge them of all the coſts & charges of the army, ſwearing vnto them (the better to deceiue them) by the head of his lord & his own, inuiolably to obſerue al that he had promiſed vnto them: which they too eaſily beleeued, and forthwith went to declare the ſame to the Gouernor, & others within the caſtle. The Baſſa, the better to come to the effect of his deſire, after theſe meſſengers ſent a crafty Turke, whom he charged expreſly to perſuade the Gouernor to come with him into the camp, for the full concluſion of the giuing vp of the caſtle, & for the appointing of ſuch veſſels as ſhould be needful for their ſafe conduct to Malta; and that if he made any doubt to come, he ſhould make ſhew as if he would there remaine in hoſtage for him, but aboue all things, to conſider of the ſtrength & aſſurance of the beſieged, and of the diſpoſition of all things there. Which the ſubtile Turke ſo finely handled, that the gouernor by the counſell of thoſe who had perſuaded him to yeeld (notwithſtanding the reaſons of wars & duty of his office forbad him in ſuch maner to abandon the place of his charg) reſolued vpon ſo ſmall an aſſurance of the Baſſa, & gaue eare to the miſerable end of his fortune. So taking with him a knight of his houſhold (to ſend back vnto thoſe of the caſtle, to declare vnto them how he ſped in the camp) vnder the conduct of the Turke that was come to fetch him, he went ſtreight to the tent of the Baſſa: who by the Turke that went firſt in, was aduertiſed of the ſmall courage of the defendants, which he aſſured him to be no better, but that if he thought it good, he might bring them to ſuch order & agreement as he would himſelfe. Vpon whoſe perſuaſion calling in the gouernor Vallier, after he had rigorouſly reproued his raſhnes, ſaid vnto him, That foraſmuch as he had once giuen his word, if he would pay the charges of the army, he was content to let them go with bag & baggage, otherwiſe he would diſcharge but two hundred. Whereat the Gouernor greatly moued, anſwered, That that was not according to his laſt promiſe to the knights before ſent. But when he ſaw it would be no better, he requeſted him that he might again returne to the caſtle to know the minds of the reſt: which the falſe Baſſa would by no means grant, but only permitted him to ſend back the knight that he had brought with him, to make report of theſe hard news to the beſieged: as for the Gouernor, he was ſent to the gallies with yrons on his heeles. When they of the caſtle vnderſtood what had paſſed betwixt the Baſſa & the gouernor, they began exceedingly to feare the miſchief then at hand: yet took no other reſolution, but to returne the ſaid Knight to the Baſſa, to know whether they ſhould expect from him no better anſwer. Who as ſoon as he was come before him, the captain of the caſtle was brought in, of whom the Baſſa asked, Which of the two he would chuſe, either to pay the expences of the army, or els both he & al the reſt to remain his priſoners?

The warie anſwer of the gouernour to the Baſſa.

Whereunto the Gouernor anſwered, That a ſlaue had no other authority than that which by his maſter was giuen him; & that hauing loſt (beſides his liberty) the power to command, if any thing were yet reſerued in him, could not counſel him to command others to agree vnto any thing, but that which was concluded with them which were before ſent.

A ſent. Which thing the Baſſa hearing, for feare that ſuch a reſolute anſwer ſhould come to the knowledge of the beſieged, and cauſe them to become deſperat; hauing taken counſell with his other Captains, he tooke the Gouernour by the hand, and with a ſmiling and diſſembling countenance told him; That he would without any doubt let them depart as he had promiſed; and that therfore without fearing any thing, he ſhould cauſe them all to come out of the Caſtle. But the Gouernour becauſe he had bin before deceiued, would not truſt to his word, but ſaid vnto him; That he might command him that was come from the Caſtle; for that he knew they would now do neuer a whit the more for him. So the Baſſa turning towards the other Knight, commanded him forthwith to go vnto them in the Caſtle, and to cauſe them to come forth, ſwearing again as before, by the head of his great Lord, and his owne, That they B ſhould al be deliuered & ſet at liberty, according to the conuentions firſt agreed vpon: which the Knight beleeuing, went to report to them this good news: which they receiued with ſuch ioy, that without further care or conſideration of their miſhap ſo neer, they ran in preaſe with their wiues, children, and beſt moueables, ſtriuing who ſhould firſt get out. But they were no ſooner iſſued, but they were by the enemies ſpoiled of all that they had, and taken priſoners; part of the Knights were ſent to the gallies, and the reſt to the Baſſa. Who being by the gouernour put in remembrance of his faith twice giuen, anſwered, That there was no faith to be kept with dogs, and that they had firſt violated their oath with his great Lord, vnto whom at the giuing ouer of the Rhodes, they had (as he ſaid) ſworn neuer more to beare armes againſt the Turks. The Caſtle was forthwith taken and ſpoiled, and about two hundred Moores of C that country that had ſerued the Knights, cut in pieces, & therupon, a great peale of ordnance diſcharged, with great cries and ſhouts in ſign of their victory. Thus the ſtrong caſtle and antient City of Tripolis in Barbary was deliuered vnto the Turks the fifteenth day of Auguſt, in the yeare 1551. Whilſt the Baſſa lay at this ſiege, the Lord of Arramont, who had many yeres lien Embaſſador from Francis the French King at Conſtantinople, and was now ſent again by Henry the ſecond, came to the Turks camp, being requeſted ſo to do by the Great maſter of the Rhodes, to haue diſſuaded the Baſſa from that ſiege: wherein he nothing preuailed.
Yet now grieued to ſee how the faithles Turk, contrary to his oth, moſt villanouſly intreated the Gouernour and the other Knights, lying at his feet as men halfe deſperat; was ſo bold as to put him in mind of his promiſe, confirmed by his oth; which if he would not keep, that yet D at the leaſt according to his own voluntary offer, he would releaſe two hundred of them: but he excuſed himſelfe as before, ſaying, That no faith was to be kept with dogs, which had firſt broken their own faith. Yet afterwards he condiſcended, that two hundred of the eldeſt and ſuch as were moſt vnfit for ſeruice (amongſt whom was comprehended the Gouernor and certain other old Knights) ſhould be ſet at liberty; who were forthwith ſent aboord the French Embaſſadors gallies, and by him tranſported to Malta: where they were but hardly welcom, for that they had ſo cowardly ſurrendred a place, which they might much longer haue defended.
The next day after the caſtle was deliuered, which was the 16 of Auguſt, the proud Baſſa for ioy of his victory made a ſolemne dinner, whereunto he inuited the French Embaſſador, and Vallier the late Gouernour: which they refuſed not to come vnto, in hope to recouer E ſome mo priſoners. This great feaſt for the more magnificence was kept in the Caſtle ditch againſt the breach, where were ſet vp two ſtately pauilions, the one for the Baſſa, and the other for the Embaſſadour and his company, where he was honourably feaſted with wonderfull plenty both of fleſh and fiſh and good wines, which they had found in the Caſtle; which ſeruice was done with muſicke of diuers ſorts, and officers in number aboue a hundred, apparelled for moſt part in long gownes of fine cloth of gold, tuffed or fringed; and the other of veluet or damaske. The Baſſa was no ſooner ſet down, but all the Ordnance of the fleet was diſcharged with ſuch a noiſe and thundring, that it ſeemed the heauens and skies did ſhake.
The table being taken vp, the Embaſſador, and the late Gouernour Vallier, entred into the pauilion of the Baſſa, and beſide the two hundred men which he had promiſed, obtained twenty F mo, vpon the Embaſſadours promiſe, That he ſhould for them cauſe to be releaſed 30 Turks taken at Malta, at the landing of the army there. The Turks hauing in their hands an antient gunner of the Caſtle, called John de Chabas born in Dolphin (to the end that this triumphant feaſt ſhould not be vnfurniſhed of ſome cruell ſacrifice of Chriſtian bloud) for that he had in time of the ſiege ſhot off the hand of the clerke generall of the army, brought him into the and there for their pleaſure ſhot at him with their arrows,& afterward to make an end of him cut his throat. The Baſſa ſhortly after departing out of Barbary, left Dragut the pirat Gouernor of Tripolis,honoring him with the title of Sanzack of that place; from whence he many years after grieuouſly moleſted the Moors neer vnto him by land, and the Chriſtians by ſea.

Haly Baſſa of Buda proud of the good ſucces he had the year before,vnderſtanding that diuers of the chief Hungarians had withdrawn themſelues into the caſtle of Agria, purpoſed in himſelf with all his power to beſiege it,and there to take them. So aided by Achomates,Chaſan, and other of the Turks Sanzacks and captains,by Solymans appointment ready at his call, he came with an army of 35000 Turks,and the 10 of September, An. 1552, incamped round K

Agria beſieged by the Turks.

doubting to preuail that way,he attempted alſo to vndermine the Caſtle, omitting nothing that could be deuiſed for the taking therof. But all in vain; for the Hungarians by the good direction of Stephanus Dobus their Captain,couragiouſly indured the ſiege,and very manfully repulſed the enemy. At length the 29 of September,the enemy with 28 enſignes of ſelect ſoldiers gaue a freſh aſſault to the caſtle,and were by the defendants inforced ſhamefully to retyre: at this time 24 barrels of gunpouder by miſchance got fire, and beſides that it blew vp diuers captains and ſouldiers,did much harm in the Caſtle,to the great diſmaying of the defendants.
After that,the Turks with incredible pertinacy the 12 of October fiercely aſſaulted the caſtle from morning vntil night,and for deſire of reuenge and hope of ſpoile left nothing L vnattempted for the gaining of the place,but were by the greater valor of the Hungarians beaten back,and with great loſſe inforced at laſt to giue ouer the aſſault. Thus the Baſſa nothing preuailing by force, attempted by great promiſes and large offers to haue brought them form. Which he vnderſtanding to be nothing regarded,and his letters ſcornfully burnt, brought on his ſoldiers again, & gaue vnto them in the caſtle a moſt furious aſſault, but with no better ſucces than before; for hauing loſt many of his beſt ſouldiers, he was inforced to retyre.

So after he had in vain ſix weeks beſieged the caſtle, he was glad to raiſe his ſiege and retyre to Peſth. After whoſe departure there was found 12000 great ſhot wherewith hee had battered the wall. In this ſiege 6000 Turks were ſlain,and of the Hungarians but three hundred.
King Ferdinand glad of this victory, made Stephanus the worthy Captaine Vayuod of M following, did great harme vpon the coaſts of Calabria, Sicilia, Sardinia, as alſo in the Iſlands of Elba, Corſica, Cerbe, and Majorca, and ſuch like places on the frontiers of the Emperours dominions: yet were the Turks in moſt places notably againe repulſed by the people of thoſe Countries. The ſame yeare Solyman, ſeduced by Roxolana (ſometime his faire Concubine, but then his imperious wife) and Ruſtan Baſſa his ſon in law, moſt vnnaturally murthered his eldeſt ſon Muſtapha, the mirrour of the Othoman Family: Which tragicall fact (the like wherof both for the trecherous contriuing and inhumane execution hath ſeldome times beene heard of) I haue thought good here in due time to ſet downe, in ſuch ſort as it is by moſt credible Writers B of that time reported.

Solyman after the manner of the Othoman Kings (who to auoid the participation of their ſoueraignty, vſe not oftentimes to marry, but otherwiſe to ſatisfie their pleaſure with ſuch beautiful Concubines as it pleaſeth them to make choice of out of the faireſt captiues of all Nations, moſt daintily brought vp for that purpoſe in the Court) had by a Circaſſian bondwoman a ſon called Muſtapha, who for his wonderfull towardlineſſe and rare perfection, was amongſt the Turks had in ſuch expectation and admiration, as that they in nothing accounted themſelues more happy, than in the hope laid vp in him: whoſe noble carriage was ſuch, as thereby he ſo poſſeſſed the minds of all men in generall, (but eſpecially of the men of warre) that he was reputed the glory of the Court, the floure of Chiualry, the hope of the ſouldiers, and joy C of the people. Whileſt he thus grew, increaſing both in yeares and fauour, it fortuned with Solyman as it doth with men delighted in change, that he became amorous of Roxolana, of ſome called Roſa (but more truly Hazothya) by condition a captiue, but ſo graced with beauty and courtly behauiour, that in ſhort time ſhe became miſtreſſe of his thoughts, and commandreſſe of him that all commanded: and that which more eſtabliſhed her in poſſeſſion of his loue, ſhe had in time made him father of foure faire ſons, Mahomet, Selymus, Bajazet, and Tzihanger; and one daughter called Chameria married to Ruſtan or Ruſtemes the great Baſſa. In this height of worldly bliſſe nothing troubled her more than the exceeding credit of Muſtapha, Solymans eldeſt ſonne by the Circaſſian woman; who honoured of the greateſt, and beloued of the reſt, ſtood only in her light, imbarring her and hers (as ſhe thought) of the hope of the Empire, D which ſhe now aboue all things ſought to bring to one of her owne ſons: which the better to compaſſe, ſhe vnder the colour of great good will and loue, procured that Muſtapha the young Prince and his mother ſhould as it were for their greater honor and ſtate, with a Princely allowance be ſent into Caramania to gouerne that great country, far from the Court. Which was no great matter for her to bring to paſſe: for that the Turkiſh Emperours vſually ſend their ſons after they come to any yeares of diſcretion, vnto ſuch prouinces as are far from the Court, attended vpon with one great Baſſa and ſome graue Doctor of their Law, ſo to acquaint them with the manner of gouernment; the Baſſa inſtructing them in matters of ciuile policy, and the Doctor in matters concerning their ſuperſtition: and yet by ſending them a far off, to keepe them from aſpiring to the Empire by the fauour of the Court: (a thing of the Turkiſh E Emperors not vnworthily feared euen in their owne and beloued children. Roxolana hauing at once thus cunningly rid the Court of the great competitors both of her loue and of the Empire (things of all others enduring no partners) reſted not ſo, but began ſtreightway to plot in her malitious head the vtter deſtruction of him, to whom all others wiſhed all happineſſe.
This ſhe ſaw was not to be brought to paſſe without ſome complices: wherefore after ſhe had in her ſecret conceit diſcarded many, of whom at firſt ſhe had reaſonable good liking; at laſt ſhe made choice of Ruſtan Baſſa her ſonne in law, vpon whom ſhe would ſet vp her reſt. This Ruſtan was a man baſely borne in Epirus, altogether compoſed of diſſimulation and flattery, euer ſeruing his owne turne, were it neuer ſo much to the hurt or grieuance of others: by which meanes he, although none of the beſt ſouldiers, was yet by many degrees growne vp F to be the greateſt man in the Court, and Solymans ſonne in law: him ſhe probably thought to wiſh the ſucceſſion of the Empire to one of her owne ſons, his wiues full brethren, rather than to Muſtapha her halfe brother. Beſide that, ſhe was not ignorant how that Ruſtan as one carefull of the Emperours profit (the readieſt way to preferment) had abridged the penſions and fees of the officers and ſeruitors in Court: which he perceiuing to pleaſe the Emperour, proceeded ſo far therein, that he attempted to haue cut off, if it had beene poſſible, ſome part of Muſtapha his princely allowance: for which doing, ſhe knew how odious he was to all the courtiers (whereof he made ſmall reckoning) but eſpecially to Muſtapha, inſomuch that it was thought he would not forget ſo notorious an injury, if euer he ſhould obtaine the Empire. Hereupon ſhe brake with Ruſtan vpon the matter, whom ſhe found ready ynough of himſelfe to do what in him lay to further her miſchieuous deſire.

Roxolana conſpireth with Roſtan Baſſa her ſon in law, againſt Muſtapha.

Roxolana faineth her ſelfe religious.

To begin this intended tragidy, ſhe vpon the ſudden became very deuout, and being by the fauour of Solyman growne exceeding rich, pretended as if it had been vpon a deuout zeale for the health of her ſoule, after the maner of their Turkiſh ſuperſtition, to build an Abbey, with an Hoſpitall and a Church: which ſo godly a purpoſe ſhe imparted to the Muphti or chiefe Mahometan Prieſt, demanding of him, if ſuch works of charity were not acceptable vnto God, and auaileable for her ſoules health. Wherunto the Muphti anſwered, That thoſe workes were no doubt gratious in the ſight of God, but nothing at all meritorious for her ſoules health, being a bondwoman; yet very profitable for the ſoule of the great Emperor Solyman, vnto whom as vnto her Lord, both ſhe and all ſhe had appertained. With which anſwer of the great Prieſt ſhe ſeemed to be exceedingly troubled, and thereupon became wonderfull penſiue and melancholy, her cheerefull countenance was repleat with ſadneſſe, and her faire eies flowed with teares, her mirth was mourning, and her joy heauineſſe. Which thing Solyman perceiuing, and ſorry to ſee his loue vpon conceit ſo to languiſh, ſent her word to be of good cheere, and to comfort her ſelfe; promiſing in ſhort time to take ſuch a courſe as ſhould eaſe her of all her griefes: which he forthwith did, ſolemnly manumiſing her from her bond eſtate. So great a fauour obtained, Roxolana with great cheerefulneſſe began thoſe meritorious works by her before intended, as if ſhe had thought of nothing but heauen, whereas indeed her thought were in the depth of hell. When ſhe had thus a good while buſied her ſelfe in pauing the way to heauen, as was ſuppoſed; Solyman not able longer to forbeare the company of her, in whom his ſoule liued, after his wonted manner ſent for her by one of his Eunuchs, who ſhould haue brought her to his bed-chamber. To whom ſhe with her eies caſt vp to heauen, demurely anſwered, that her life and whatſoeuer elſe ſhe had was at her dread Soueraignes command, but againe to yeeld her body vnto his appetite ſhe might not in any caſe do, without the great offence of the high God, and manifeſt breach of his ſacred Lawes, which permitted her now voluntarily to yeeld him that, being free, which he before without offence might command of his bond-woman: and becauſe ſhe would not ſeeme to vſe this as an excuſe, ſhe referred her ſelfe in all things to the graue judgment of the learned and reuerend Muphti, with whom ſhe had before at full conferred. This ſhe did, preſuming of the ſoueraignty ſhe had ouer that great Monarch, whom ſhe right well knew ſhe had ſo faſt bound in the pleaſing fetters of his affection towards her, as that ſhe was ſure enough of him without a keeper. Solyman rauiſhed with her loue, and well the more for her deniall, ſent for the Muphti, requiring his judgement in the matter: who before inſtructed in all points, agreed with that Roxolana had ſaid, aggrauating the hainouſneſſe of the fact, if he ſhould proceed to enforce her as his ſlaue, who being now free, he might not without great offence touch vnmarried. Whereupon Solyman more and more burning in his deſires, became a freſh ſuter to her for marriage, whom he had ſo often before commanded: which his ſute eaſily obtained, (as the marke ſhe had all this while aimed at) he with all ſpeed to the great admiration of all men, and contrary to the manners of the Mahometan Emperours, ſolemnly married her, appointing for her yearely dowry fiue thouſand Sultanyns. But here before we proceed any further, ſtay a while, and take the view of that faire face whereon this great Monarch ſo much doted, as it is by the skilfull workemans hand moſt liuely expreſſed.

For hatefull thoughts ſo finely maskt, their deadly poyſon haue.

This woman of late a ſlaue, but now become the greateſt Empreſſe of the Eaſt, flowing in all worldly felicity, attended vpon with all the pleaſures her heart could deſire, wanted nothing ſhe could wiſh, but how to find means that the Turkiſh empire might after the death of F Solyman be brought to ſome one of her own ſons. This was it that had (as is before ſaid) long troubled her aſpiring mind, and in the midſt of all her bliſſe, ſuffered her yet to take no reſt. Noble Muſtapha, Solymans eldeſt ſonne, and heire apparant of the Empire, although far abſent, was yet ſtill before her eies preſent; his credit, his valour, his vertues, his perfections were all bars to her deſires: he was the only cloud that kept the ſunne from ſhining vpon her; if he by any means might be taken away, then wanted nothing that ſhe deſired. Which to bring to G paſſe, the wicked woman laboured cunningly by little and little to breed in Solymans head no ſmall ſuſpition of Muſtapha, That he being a yong man of a hauty ſpirit, deſirous of Soueraignty, generally beloued, and ſwelling with the immoderat fauour of the men of war, which were all at his deuotion, left nothing elſe to be expected from him, but when he ſhould (as did his grandſier Selymus) lay hand vpon the Empire, and worke his aged fathers deſtruction. This miſchieuous plot by her deuiſed, was not a little furthred by Ruſtan the great Baſſa, by whom paſſed all great matters: who nothing omitted that could be ſlily deuiſed for the diſgrace or confuſion of the yong Prince. For he as a great ſecret, craftily told all them that were ſent gouernors into Syria, that Muſtapha was ſecretly ſuſpected by his father, of aſpiring to the Empire, and therefore charged them particularly, carefully to obſerue all his actions, with the H manner of his life and gouernment, and by their letters diligently to aduertiſe him of whatſoeuer they ſhould ſee or heare; bearing them in hand, that the more ſuſpitiouſly or odiouſly they ſhould write of him, the more gratious & acceptable it would be vnto the great Sultan.

Wherfore he by theſe men oftentimes certified of the princely diſpoſition, courage, wiſdom, valour and bounty of Muſtapha, whereby he had won all mens hearts, doubted that he would at length be preferred to the Empire: yet durſt he not for all that aduenture to temper with Solyman about that deteſtible conſpiracy againſt the innocent Prince, but ſtill deliuering the letters to the malitious woman, left the reſt by her vngratious head to be wrought. And ſhe ſtill as occaſion beſt ſerued her purpoſe, ceaſed not with pleaſing allurements and flattery (wherin ſhe was moſt excellent) to infect Solymans mind, that whenſoeuer he ſhould chance to haue any I ſpeech of Muſtapha, ſhe might take the fitter occaſion to bring forth thoſe Letters. Neither was ſhe in her drift deceiued, but hauing found a fit opportunity, with tears trickling downe her cheeks (which to ſerue their turnes ſubtill women ſeldome want) ſhe told the Emperor in what danger he ſtood: recounting amongſt other things, how Selymus his father had by ſuch means depriued Bajazet his grandfather, both of his life and Empire together: and therefore moſt inſtantly beſought him, as if it had altogether proceeded of a carefull loue, by that example warned, to looke to himſelfe. But theſe light arguments of ſuſpition ſeemed as they were indeed, vnto Solyman ſcarce probable; ſo that ſhe little preuailed thereby. Which thing ſhe well perceiuing, and inwardly grieuing thereat, conuerted her cruell mind to other miſchieuous deuices, and ſought by all means how to poiſon the young Prince: neither wanted there K wicked men, as it were vowed to all kinde of miſchiefe and villany, ready to haue performed what ſhe deſired, had not Gods prouidence withſtood ſo horrible a practiſe. For whereas certaine rich apparell was by her ſent vnto him in his fathers name, he fearing the worſt, would not touch it before he had cauſed it to be worne by one of his ſeruants: by which curious warineſſe (as it was thought) he for that time preuented the treaſon of his wicked ſtepdame, and made her malitious practiſe manifeſt to the world. Yet reſted ſhe not ſo, but was ſtill plotting new deuices, tending all to one purpoſe: for being growne to that height of honour and power as neuer was woman in the Othoman court, and by the means of Trongilla a Iew (as it was thought) hauing bewitched the mind of the Turkiſh Emperor, ſhe ſtill grew more and more in fauor, and obtained that her ſons might by turnes be ſtill preſent in Court: of purpoſe, that L by their daily preſence and continuall flattery, they ſhould more and more procure their fathers loue; and if by chance Muſtapha ſhould come thither, ſhe might haue the better means to diſpatch him: if not, to expect ſome other fit time, when ſhe might by ſome one or other meane take him away. But Muſtapha neuer comming (for why, the Emperours ſons vſe not without their fathers leaue to go out of the prouinces aſſigned vnto them, or to come to Conſtantinople, but after the death of their father to receiue the Empire, attended vpon with a number of ſouldiers) ſhe eaſily deuiſed another practiſe, that her ſons ſhould wait vpon their father, not in the city only, but in the Prouinces alſo; ſo that Tzihanger ſurnamed Crouchbacke, alwaies followed his father in the campe. Certaine yeres thus ſpent, and ſhe ſtill hammering her miſchieuous deuices; at length fortune fauouring her wicked deſire, got from the Baſſa which had the gouernment of Muſtapha and the prouince of Amaſia (for as we haue ſaid, euery one of the Kings ſons hath with him one Baſſa, which is as it were his lieutenant in adminiſtration of iuſtice and martiall affaires) certain ſuſpitious letters, wherin was contained, that there was a ſpeech of a marriage to be made betweene Muſtapha and the Perſian Kings daughter:

Muſtapha in danger to haue beene poyſoned by Roxolana.

ter; which thing he thought good to giue knowledge of to the Counſell, that if any harme ſhould enſue therof, he might be out of all ſuſpition. Theſe letters being brought to Ruſtan, he thought he had now as good as halfe brought to paſſe the long deſired ruin of Muſtapha: ſo making no ſtay, he opened the matter to Roxolana, & afterwards both together went to the court, and declared all the matter to the Emperor: in doing wherof, they forced both their vngratious wits to fill his head, yet doubtfull, with ſuſpition, and to poſſeſſe his mind with the feare of his own moſt dutifull ſon: ſaying, That he as a proud and ambitious young man, rauiſhed with the deſire of ſo glorious an empire, ſought againſt the laws both of God & nature, to take his father out of the way, that ſo he might with more ſpeed ſatisfie his aſpiring mind. And to giue the more credit to this their moſt falſe ſuggeſtion, they warned him of the alliance by him purpoſed with the Perſian king the antient enemy of the Othoman Emperors: wiſhing him to beware leſt Muſtapha ſupported by the ſtrength of Perſia, and the fauor of the Sanzacks and Ianizaries, whoſe loue he had by bounty purchaſed, ſhould in ſhort time when he feared leaſt, together depriue him both of his life and Empire. With theſe and ſuch like accuſations they ſo preuailed with the aged man, whom they neuer ſuffered to reſt in quiet, that he at length reſolued to worke his ſafety (as he ſuppoſed) by the death of his owne ſonne; in this ſort:

Roxolana and Ruſtan together put Solyman in feare of his ſon Muſtapha

In the yeare 1552 he cauſed proclamation to be made almoſt in all the prouinces of his Empire, That foraſmuch as the Perſians without reſiſtance with a great army inuaded Syria, burning and deſtroying the country before them, he to repreſſe that their outragious inſolence, was inforced to ſend thither Ruſtan Baſſa with an army: which according to his appointment was in ſhort time raiſed. Now when all things were in readineſſe, as if it had beene for ſuch a war as was pretended, he commanded Ruſtan, with as much ſecrecy and as little tumult as was poſſible, to lay hands vpon Muſtapha, and to bring him bound to Conſtantinople: which if he could not conueniently effect, then by any other means to take him out of the way.

Solymans ſends Ruſtan Baſſa with an army to take Muſtapha.

With this wicked and cruell charge Ruſtan with a ſtrong army marched towards Syria; Muſtapha vnderſtanding of his comming, without delay with 7000 of the beſt horſemen in all Turky made towards Syria alſo: whereof Ruſtan hearing, and perceiuing that he could not (as he deſired) conueniently execute the cruell command of the vnnaturall father, forthwith turned his backe, and treading the ſame ſteps he came, returned with his army to Conſtantinople with ſuch ſpeed, that he endured not to behold the very duſt raiſed by Muſtapha's horſemen, much leſſe his preſence: giuing it out, That he certainly vnderſtood that the prouince was in quiet, (as indeed it was) and that he thereupon returned. But vnto Solyman he told another tale in ſecret, which he malitiouſly had deuiſed, That he by moſt apparant ſignes and manifeſt preſumptions had perceiued the whole army ſo inclined towards Muſtapha, that if he ſhould haue attempted any thing againſt him by plaine force, he ſhould haue bin vtterly forſaken, and had therefore in ſo dangerous a caſe left the matter as it was to his graue further direction. This tale ſuſpiciouſly told, raiſed in the wicked and vnnaturall father (nothing degenerating from the naturall cruelty of his anceſtors) new and great ſuſpitions, whereof to diſburden his diſquieted mind, he conceiued with himſelfe a moſt horrible deuice. Wherfore the yere following, which was the yeare 1553, he raiſed a great army; giuing it out, That the Perſians had with greater power than before inuaded Syria, and that therefore he for the loue of his Country, and defence of his Empire, was determined to go thither with his army, and in perſon himſelfe to repreſſe the attempt of his enemies. Wherfore the army being aſſembled, & all things neceſſary orderly prouided, he commanded to ſet forward, and in few daies after followed himſelfe: who comming at length into Syria, preſently by truſty meſſengers commanded Muſtapha to come vnto him at Aleppo, for there he lay incamped. And yet for all theſe ſhadowes, the matter was not ſo cloſely by Solyman conueied (although he was exceedingly carefull therof) but that his mortall and deadly hatred againſt his ſon was perceiued by the Baſſa's, & other great men about him: inſomuch that Achmat Baſſa by a ſecret and truſty meſſenger gaue him warning thereof, that ſo he might in time the better prouide for the ſafegard of his life. Neither could Muſtapha himſelfe but maruell, that his aged father without any apparant reaſon ſhould come ſo far with ſo great an army; yet truſting to his owne innocency, though wonderfully troubled and perplexed in mind, he reſolued (although it were with the extreme danger of his life) to obey and yeeld to his fathers command: for he thought it more commendable and honorable to incurre the danger of death, than liuing to fall into the foule ſuſpition of

The malitious deuice of Ruſtan.

Muſtapha perplexed in mind.

diſloyalty. In ſo great a perplexity of mind, after he had with himſelfe much diſcourſed too and fro, what courſe he were beſt to take, at length he boldly and reſolutely asked the Doctor whom (as we haue before ſaid) he had alwaies with him in his court, Whether the Empire of the World, or a bleſſed life were of man more to be deſired? To whom the doctor frankly anſwered, That the Empire of the World, to him that would enter into the due conſideration thereof, brought with it no felicity, more than a vaine ſhew and outer appearance of good, nothing being more fraile or vncertaine than worldly honor, bringing with it feare, vexation of mind, tribulation, ſuſpition, murder, wrong, wickedneſſe, ſpoile, ruin, and captiuity, with infinit miſchiefes of like nature, not to be deſired of him that would attaine to true felicity, by which meanes the bleſſed life was to be loſt and not gained: But they vnto whom God had giuen the grace rightly to conſider and weigh the fragility and ſhortneſſe of this our eſtate (which the common ſort deemeth to be the only life) and to ſtriue againſt the vanities of this World, and to embrace and follow an vpright kind of life, had vndoubtedly a place aſſigned for them in heauen and prepared by the great God, where they ſhould at length enjoy life and bliſſe eternall. This anſwer of the great doctor wonderfully ſatisfied the troubled mind of the yong Prince, foreſeeing as it were the approch of his owne end; and ſo ſtaying not any longer diſcourſe, forthwith ſet forwards toward his father, and making great haſt, came at length to his fathers campe, and not far off pitched his tents in the open field: But this his ſo haſty comming the more increaſed the ſuſpition in the mind of his wicked father: neither ſpared Ruſtan in the meane time with his crafty and ſubtile deuiſes to augment the ſame: for by a ſigne giuen he cauſed the Ianizaries and chiefe men in the army to go as if it had bin for honors ſake to meet Muſtapha; which they all without delay preſently did at his command, and ſo all together ſet forward. In the meane time he the moſt crafty varlet, with troubled countenance (for he could notably diſſemble) as a man halfe diſmaied came in haſte into Solymans pauilion, and falſly told him, That the Ianizaries and almoſt all the beſt ſouldiers of the army were of themſelues without leaue gon to meet Muſtapha, and that he feared what would enſue thereof. Which news ſo troubled the old tyrant, that he became pale for feare, and going out of his tent, and finding them gone, eaſily beleeued all to be true that the falſe Baſſa had told him. Neither wanted Muſtapha ſtrange warning of his end ſo neere at hand, for the third day before his ſetting forwards toward his father, falling aſleepe in the euening, he thought he ſaw his Prophet Mahomet in bright apparell to take him by the hand and lead him into a moſt pleaſant place, beautified with moſt glorious and ſtately palaces, and moſt delicat & pleaſant gardens; and pointing to euery thing with his finger, to ſay thus vnto him, Here reſt they for euer, which in this World haue led an vpright and godly life, following vertue, and deteſting vice: and after that turning his face to the other ſide, to haue ſhewed him two great and ſwift riuers, whereof the one boiled with water blacker than pitch, and in them appeared (as he thought) numbers of men wallowing and tumbling, ſome vp, ſome downe, crying horribly for mercy: And there (ſaid he) are puniſhed all ſuch as in this fraile life haue bin the malicious workers of iniquity: the chiefe of whom (as he ſaid) were Emperors, Kings, Princes, and other great men of the world. Muſtapha awaking, and troubled with this melancholy dreame, called vnto him his doctor: and hauing told him all the matter, asked him what the ſame might ſignifie? who ſtanding a great while in a muſe (for the Mahometans are exceeding ſuperſtitious, attributing much to dreams) full of ſorrow and griefe at length anſwered, That this viſion (for ſo it pleaſed him to terme it) was vndoubtedly to be feared, as preſaging vnto him the extreame perill of his life, and therefore requeſted him to haue great care both of his life and honor. But Muſtapha as he was of a notable ſpirit and courage, regarding nothing that anſwer, ſtoutly replied, What, ſhall I ſuffer my ſelfe to be terrified and ouercome with childiſh and vain feare? why rather haſte I not couragiouſly and reſolutely to my father? and ſo much the more boldly, becauſe I know aſſuredly I haue alwaies (as reaſon was) ſo reuerenced his Majeſty, that againſt his wil I neuer turned my eies or foot againſt his moſt royall ſeat, much leſſe affected his Empire, except the moſt high God had called him to a better life, neither then, without the general good liking & choice of the whole army, that ſo I might at length without murder, without bloud, without tyranny, well & juſtly reigne, and in loue and peace inuiolate liue with my brethren: for I haue ſet down with my ſelfe, and choſen, if it be my fathers pleaſure ſo, rather to die in his obedience, than reigning many yeares, to be reputed of all men, eſpecially my competitors, a rebell or traitor.

His talke with his Doctor.

Muſtapha commeth to his fathers campe.

The exceeding treachery of Ruſtan againſt Muſtapha.

The melancholy dreame of Muſtapha in comming to his father.

A Hauing thus ſaid, he came vnto his fathers camp, & pitching his tents (as we haue before ſaid) ſuted himſelfe all in white, in token of his innocency, and writing certaine letters (which the Turks when they are about to go to any place of danger, vſe to write, and alwaies to carry with them, for they are wonderfull fooliſh in their ſuperſtition) and putting them in his boſome, attended vpon with a few of his moſt truſty followers, came with great reuerence towards the tent of his father, fully reſolued to haue kiſſed his hand, as their vſuall manner is. But when he was come to the entrance of his tent, remembring that he had yet his dagger girt to him, he entred not vntill he had put it off; becauſe he would not come into his fathers ſight with any weapon, if happily ſo he might cleare himſelfe of his fathers needleſſe ſuſpition. So when he was come into the more inward roomes of the tent, he was with ſuch honour as belonged B to his ſtate cheerfully receiued by his fathers Eunuchs. But ſeeing nothing elſe prouided but one ſeat whereon to ſit himſelfe alone, he perplexed in mind, ſtood ſtill a while muſing; at length asked where the Emperor his father was? Whereunto they anſwered, That he ſhould by and by ſee him: and with that caſting his eie aſide, he ſaw ſeuen Muts (theſe are ſtrong men bereft of their ſpeech, whom the Turkiſh tyrants haue alwaies in readineſſe, the more ſecretly to execute their bloudy butchery) comming from the other ſide of the tent towards him: at whoſe ſight ſtrucken with a ſudden terrour, ſaid no more, but, Lo my death; and with that, ariſing was about to haue fled: but in vaine, for he was caught hold on by the eunuchs and Muts, and by force drawn to the place appointed for his death: where without further ſtay, the Muts caſt a bow-ſtring about his necke, he poore wretch ſtil ſtriuing, and requeſting that he might C ſpeake but two words to his father before he died. All which the murtherer (for no addition is ſufficient ſignificantly to expreſſe his vnnaturall villany) both heard and ſaw by a trauers from the other ſide of the tent: but was ſo far from being moued with compaſſion, that thinking it long till he were diſpatched, with a moſt terrible and cruell voice he rated the villains enured to bloud; ſaying, Will you neuer diſpatch that I bid you? well you neuer make an end of this traitor, for whom I haue not reſted one night theſe ten yeares in quiet? Which horrible commanding ſpeeches, yet thundering in their eares, thoſe butcherly Muts threw the poore innocent Prince vpon the ground, and with the helpe of the Eunuches forcecibly drawing the knotted bow-ſtring both waies, by the commandement of a moſt wicked father ſtrangled him. With like barbarous cruelty, he ſhortly after cauſed Mahomet his nephew (Muſtapha his ſonne) to be ſtrangled D alſo.

This vnnaturall and ſtrange murther committed, he preſently commanded the Baſſa of Amaſia Muſtapha's Lieutenant to be apprehended, and his head in his owne preſence to be ſtrucke off. Which done, he ſent for Tzihanger the Crooked, yet ignorant of all that was happened; and in ſporting wiſe, as if he had done a thing worth commendations, bid him go meet his brother Muſtapha: which thing Tzihanger with a merry and cheerefull countenance haſted to doe, as one glad of his brothers comming. But as ſoone as he came vnto the place where he ſaw his brother lying dead vpon the ground ſtrangled, it is not to be ſpoken how he was in minde tormented. He was ſcarcely come to the place where this deteſtible murther was committed, when his father ſent vnto him certaine of his ſeruants to offer vnto him all E Muſtapha's treaſure, horſes, ſeruants, jewels, tents, and withall the gouernment of the Prouince of Amaſia; but Tzihanger filled with extreame heauineſſe for the vnmercifull death of his welbeloued brother, ſpake vnto them in this ſort: Ah wicked and vngodly Caine, traitor (I may not ſay father) take thou now the treaſures, the horſes, the ſeruants, the jewels, and the Prouince of Muſtapha. How came it into thy wicked, cruell, and ſauage breaſt, ſo vngratiouſly and contrary to all humanity, I will not ſay the reuerence of thine owne bloud, to kill thy worthy, warlike, and noble ſonne, the mirrour of courteſie, and Prince of greateſt hope, the like of whom, the Othoman family neuer yet had, nor euer ſhall? I will therefore my ſelfe prouide that thou, nor none for thee ſhall euer hereafter in ſuch ſort ſhamefully triumph ouer a poore crooked wretch. And hauing thus much ſaid, ſtab'd himſelfe with his owne dagger into the body, whereof he in ſhort time died: Which ſo ſoone as it F came to the old Tigers eares, it is hard to ſay how much he grieued. His dead body was by his fathers commandement carried from Aleppo in Syria, to Conſtantinople, and afterwards honourably buried on the other ſide of the Hauen at Pera. For all this bloudy tragedy, his couetous minde was not ſo troubled, but that he could forthwith command all Muſtapha's treaſures and riches to be brought to his tent: which his ſouldiers in hope to haue the ſame giuen them for a prey, willingly haſted to performe. In the meane time the ſouldiers which were in Muſtapha's campe, not knowing what was become of their maſter, ſeeing ſuch a multitude of ſoldiers thruſting into their campe without all order, to repreſſe their tumultuous inſolency, ſtept out in their armour, and notably repulſed them, not without much bloudſhed.

A bloudy tumult betwixt the ſoldiers of Solyman and Muſtapha.

At length, the noiſe of this ſtir was heard by the reſt of the Kings ſouldiers, who ſeeing the tumult to increaſe more and more, ran in to helpe their fellowes, ſo that in ſhort time there began a hot skirmiſh and cruell fight on both ſides, inſomuch that two thouſand were ſlaine, and mo wounded: neither had the broile ſo ended, had not Achomat Baſſa a graue captaine, and for his long experience of no ſmall authority amongſt the ſouldiers, kept backe the Ianizaries, and ſtaied their fury; and turning likewiſe to Muſtapha's ſouldiers, by gentle and mild words and courteous perſuaſions, in this manner appeaſed their rage.

The tumult appeaſed by Achomates Baſſa.

What my brethren (ſaid he) will you now (degenerating from your antient loyalty, for which you haue beene for ſo many ages commended) impugne the command of the great Sultan our dread Soueraigne? Truely I cannot ſufficiently maruell what thing ſhould moue you, whom I haue hitherto proued to haue beene moſt worthy and valiant ſouldiers, in this ciuill conflict to draw thoſe weapons againſt your fellowes and brethren, which you haue moſt fortunatly vſed againſt the the enemies of the Othoman Kings: except you meane thereby to make your ſelues a joyfull ſpectacle vnto your enemies, who grieuing to ſee themſelues ouercome by your victorious weapons, may yet rejoyce among themſelues to ſee you turne the ſame one vpon another. Wherefore my ſonnes, for your antient honours ſake, be carefull that you do not by this your inſolency loſe the reputation of your wiſedome, loyalty, and valour; for which you haue hitherto beene aboue all others commended: reſerue theſe your weapons which you haue now too too much vſed among your fellowes, againſt your enemies, of whom you may get more praiſe and honour. This ſpeech of the old Baſſa, ſo millified the ſtout ſouldiers, that they freely permitted all that was in Muſtapha's tents to be carried to Solyman: but as ſoone as the death of Muſtapha was blowne into the eares of the Ianizaries and the reſt of the army in Solymans campe, another tumult roſe among them worſe than the firſt,

The Ianizaries vp in armes againſt Solyman for the vnworthy death of Muſtapha.

They were quickly all vp in armes againe, and with a great noiſe confuſed with teares and lamentation, as they were in rage and fury, brake violently into Solymans pauillion with their drawne ſwords: which ſtrucke the tyrant into ſuch a feare, that deſtitute of all counſell in himſelfe, he was about with the extreame perill of his life to haue fled: but being holden by by his friends, and making a vertue of neceſſity, vpon the ſudden aduentured to do that which at better leiſure he would ſcarcely haue thought vpon: for going forth out of his tent, but with a pale and wan countenance, he ſpake vnto the enraged ſouldiers thus: What broile is this? what ſturre: what ſo great inſolency? what meane your inflamed, fierce and angry lookes? know you not your Soueraigne? and him that hath power to command you? Haue you ſo reſolued to ſtaine the antient and inuincible honour of your ſelues and your anceſtours, with the bloud of your Lord and Emperour?

The ſtout ſpeech of Solyman to the Ianizaries.

The fierce anſwer of the Ianizaries to Solyman.

Whileſt he was yet thus ſpeaking, the ſouldiers boldly anſwered, That they denied not, but that he was the man whom they had many yeares before choſen for their Emperor: but in that they had by their owne valour got for him a large and mighty Empire, and in like manner preſerued it; that was therefore of them done, that he ſhould for the ſame gouerne them vertuouſly and juſtly, and not to lay his bloudy hands without diſcretion vpon euery juſt man, and moſt wickedly embrue himſelfe with innocent bloud: and that they came thither armed, they did it (as they ſaid) moued with juſt cauſe to reuenge the vnworthy death of guiltleſſe Muſtapha, and that for that matter, he had no juſt cauſe to be angry with them. Wherefore they required, that they might publikely cleere themſelues of the treaſon whereof they were accuſed by Muſtapha's enemies, and that the accuſer might be brought forth to juſtifie his accuſation: proteſting that they would neuer lay downe their weapons, vntill the accuſer made his appearance in judgement, and commenced his accuſation judicially, vpon paine to endure the like puniſhment if he failed in proofe.

Solyman yeeldeth vnto the Ianizaries.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, the hainouſneſſe of the late committed fact cauſed euery man to ſhed teares, ſo that Solyman himſelfe ſeemed to be ſorry for the murther ſo lately by himſelfe committed: wherefore he promiſed vnto the ſouldiers whatſoeuer they required, and did what he could to appeaſe their angry minds. For all that, they in the meane time, leſt he ſhould craftily ſlip away and deceiue them of that he had promiſed, and of the expectation of ſuch things as they had required, with a maruellous care and diligence all kept watch and ward.

A Solyman to appeaſe this fury of the Ianizaries, depriued Ruſtan Baſſa of all his honours, and tooke from him his ſeale whereof he had the keeping, and deliuered it to Achomates Baſſa. But Ruſtan worthily ſtrucken with feare and horrour, ſeeing himſelfe now in no ſafety in his owne tents, fled ſecretly to Achomates, asking his counſell what were beſt for him to do, and what courſe to take in ſo doubtfull and dangerous a caſe? To whom the Baſſa anſwered, that it were beſt for him to vſe the great Emperors aduiſe, and to do what he commanded. Which anſwer well ſatisfied Ruſtan: and ſo he which of late gaue other men acceſſe vnto the Emperour at his pleaſure, was now glad by his old acquaintance and friends to preſet this poore ſute, To know his pleaſure what he would haue him to do: from whom he receiued this anſwer, That he ſhould incontinently without further delay get him out of his ſight, and out of the campe: B which the Baſſa ſaid he could not conueniently do, being by his diſpleaſure and the ſouldiers rage diſfurniſhed of all things neceſſary for his departure. Whereunto Solyman ſent him anſwer againe, That he could giue him neither longer time nor delay, and that it were beſt for him without more ado to be gon for feare of further harme. Whereupon Ruſtan, guilty in conſcience of moſt horrible villany and treachery, accompanied but with eight of his moſt faithfull friends in ſtead of his late world of followers, poſted in haſt to Conſtantinople, and there (not without danger of his head) with Roxolana and other the complices and contriuers of the treaſon againſt Muſtapha, in great feare expected the euent of his fortune.

Ruſtan diſgraced by Solyman, flyeth to Conſtantinople.

This young Prince Muſtapha thus ſhamefully murthered by his own father, was for his rare vertues generally beloued of the Turks: but of the ſouldiers moſt for his martiall diſpoſition, C and readines for the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud. The opinion they had conceiued of him was ſuch, and their loue ſo great, that they neuer thought there was any in the Othoman family, of whom they expected ſo much for the enlarging of their Empire: inſomuch, that euer ſince, when in their priuat or publike actions they faile of any great hope, they vſe this prouerbe euen at this day taken from him, Gietti Sultan Muſtapha, Sultan Muſtapha is dead: as who ſhould ſay, our hope is all loſt. Achomates Baſſa the great champion of the Turks, a man of exceeding courage, not ignorant of the ſmall aſſurance of the great honors of that ſtate, at ſuch time as he receiued the ſeale from Solyman, boldly told him, That as he did then frankly beſtow it vpon him, ſo he would at one time or other to his no leſſe diſgrace take it from him: to whom Solyman ſolemnly promiſed with an oath, not to diſplace him ſo long as he liued. For all that, he D had not long enjoyed that honor, but that Solyman falling in diſlike with him, & willing again to promote Ruſtan Baſſa to that great honour, greater than which there was none in the Turks court, which by reaſon of his oath he could not do ſo long as Achomates liued; To ſaue his oath, and to prefer his ſon in law (whom he had indeed diſplaced only to pleaſe the tumultuous Ianizaries) reſolued to haue Achomates put to death. Of which his purpoſe Achomates altogether ignorant, and one morning after his wonted manner comming into the Diuano in all his honour, vpon the ſudden receiued word from Solyman, that he muſt preſently die, and forthwith was the hangman ready to haue ſtrangled him, as was giuen him in charge: whom the ſtout Baſſa thruſt from him with his hand, with countenance and cheere in ſhew no more troubled than if the matter had nothing concerned him. And looking a good while round about E him, eſpied at laſt an honeſt man whom he had many times before pleaſured, whom he moſt earneſtly requeſted for all the kindneſſe ſhewed vnto him, to do him that laſt fauor as to ſtrangle him with his owne hand, which ſhould be vnto him the greateſt good turne that he could poſſibly deuiſe, deteſting nothing more than to die vnder the hand of the executioner. Which thing, when he after much intreaty had vndertaken to performe, Achomates willed him, that he ſhould not at one twich ſtrangle him out right, but letting the bow-ſtring ſlacke againe, giue him leaue once to breath, and then to diſpatch him: which is requeſt was by his friend accordingly performed, and he in that ſort ſtrangled: wherein it ſeemeth that he was deſirous, firſt to taſt of death, and not to die all at once. Immediatly after whoſe death, Ruſtan Baſſa was again reſtored to his place of chiefe Viſier, and had the great ſeale deliuered vnto him: which honour he enjoyed about ſix yeares after, and ſo at laſt died of the dropſie. This was the end of theſe two great Baſſaes Achomates and Ruſtan, who in that time ſwaied that great Empire, vnder Solyman, and of whom we haue ſo much ſpoken. It is reported, that Solyman hauing appointed Achomates to die, ſhould ſay, It is better for his great heart once to die, than to die a thouſand times, in ſeeing his honour taken from him and beſtowed vpon another.

The miſerable end of Achomates the great Baſſa.

The

1554 The Turks gallies by the ſolicitation of the French before brought down into the Tuſcan G ſea, did much hame vpon the coaſts of Calabria and Sicilia in this yeare 1554, as they had the yeare before, and ſo did diuers yeares after. At which time alſo Pandulphus Contarenus the Venetian Admirall ſcouring alongſt the ſeas, carefully looking to the frontiers of the Venetian eſtate, chanced to meet with the Baſſa of Callipolis, who in the yeare before had rifled certaine Venetian Merchants; in reuenge of which injury he ſet vpon him, and after a great ſpoile made both of the Turks and their gallies, he ranſacked Dirrachium then one of the Turks port townes in Dalmatia.

1555 The next yeare 1555, the ſame Baſſa recouered his ſtrength, but not daring to be too buſie with the Venetians, ſurpriſed the Iſlands of Blumbis and Elba, ſubject to the Duke of Florence, and withall ſent letters to Solyman, to perſuade him to take vp armes againſt the Venetians, as they which had broken the league. H

At the ſame time, Haly the Baſſa of Buda by policy ſurpriſed the ſtrong caſtle of Baboza, in Hungary: and was in good hope by the like fineneſſe to haue taken the Towne and Caſtle of

1556 Zigeth, a place of great importance: but failing of his purpoſe, he came the next yeare 1556, with a great army, and the thirteenth day of Iune incamped before the towne, wherein was Gouernor Marcus Horwath a valiant Captaine, with a garriſon of notable ſouldiers. Shortly after he began a moſt terrible battery: during which time the Chriſtians ſallying out diuers times, ſlew many of his men; who for all that vſed ſuch diligence, that the twentieth of Iune they won the outtermoſt wall, and after fiue hot aſſaults were in hope at the ſixt to haue won the caſtle alſo: but the Chriſtians perceiuing the danger, reſolutely ſallied out, and hauing I ſlaine eight hundred of them, draue the reſt againe from the wall. Yet the Turks gaue it not ſo ouer, but with a great number of carts labored to haue filled vp the marriſh and ditches about the towne: which their attempt was by the induſtry of the defendants alſo defeated. The Baſſa perceiuing how hardly the towne would be won by force, attempted to haue perſuaded them to haue yeelded it vp by compoſition: but failing therein of his purpoſe, began againe the twelfth of Iuly to aſſault the city, which aſſault he maintained fiue daies together without intermiſſion, ſtill ſending in freſh men in ſtead of them that were wearied or ſlaine: yet was the city for all that by the valour of the Chriſtians notably defended. So when he had in vaine proued the vttermoſt of his forces, he raiſed his ſiege the one and twentieth day of Iuly and departed: but within ſix daies after, he returned from the city Quinque Eccleſiæ, and aſ- K ſaulted the city afreſh; but was at length glad to giue ouer the ſiege and be gone, when he had loſt of his beſt ſouldiers aboue two thouſand, and of the defendants ſlaine but an hundred and twenty. After his departure there was ten thouſand great ſhot found, wherewith he had battered the towne and the caſtle, which was for this time thus worthily defended. The Turks in the meane time after their wonted manner ceaſed not to do what harme they could in the Tuſcane ſea, and had again miſerably ſpoiled the Iſland of Corſica: for withſtanding of whom the Biſhop of Rome exacted of his people a great ſubſidue, and finely ſtript the Iewes of their mony, and ſeaſed vpon their rich Merchants goods in his territory. At whoſe earneſt ſute Solyman in their behalfe writ vnto the Biſhop as followeth: L

Moſt excellent and moſt mighty Lord of the Profeſſors of the Meſſias Ieſu, and Lord of Rome, the Almighty keepe thee. At ſuch time as thou ſhalt receiue our Seale, thou ſhalt vnderſtand by out Letters, that certaine Hebrewes haue come vnto vs, complaining that they are oppreſſed of thee with too grieuous exactions, when they come to trafficke at Ancona: This burthen I requeſt thee to take from them, and to reſtore againe vnto them their goods, that therby they may be able to pay to vs our Tribute: which if thou (as I hope thou wilt) ſhall do, thou ſhalt feele our fauour.  The ninth of March, Anno 1556.*

Haly Baſſa beſiegeth Zigeth againe.

Haly Baſſa grieued with the late repulſe he had receiued at Zigeth, came againe the next yeare, A yeare, and beſieged it, at which time king Ferdinand ſent Nicholaus Polwiler and the county Serinus with a power raiſed in Sueuia and Auſtria, to recouer Baboza, a caſtle betwixt Sigeth and Stiria, before ſurpriſed by the Turkes: of whoſe comming the Baſſa hauing intelligence, roſe with his army and departed from Sigeth, which he had for certaine moneths hardly beſieged, and not far from Baboza met with Polwiler and Serinus; who joyning battell with him, after a hard and ſharpe fight ouerthrew him and put him to flight. This victory with the comming downe of young Ferdinand, King Ferdinands ſonne, Archduke of Auſtria with new ſupplies, ſo terrified the Turks in that part of Hungary along the riuer Dranus, that they for feare forſooke Baboſa, Sammartin, San-Laurence, and diuers other ſmall caſtles which they had before taken, and fled to Quinque Eccleſiæ.

Haly Baſſa ouerthrowne.

B The Gouernour of Sigeth encouraged herewith, ſallying out with his garriſon, ſlew many of the Turks in their flight towards Quinque Eccleſiæ, and meeting by chance with a troupe of horſemen which were bringing the Turks pay, ouerthrew them, tooke the mony, and ſo with an exceeding rich prey returned to his caſtle. At which time alſo Adam the Gouernour of Rab, otherwiſe called Iauarinum, hauing burnt the ſuburbs of Alba-Regalis, and driuen away many thouſands of cattell, at a towne called Sian ouerthrew fiue hundred Turks, and as many fugitiue Chriſtians, and ſo with a great prey and little or no loſſe at all of his men, returned.

Henry the French King at the ſame time in warres with Philip King of Spaine, and troubled with the loſſe of his army ouerthrowne not farre from S. Quintins (at which time the Duke C Montmorencie Conſtable of France and Generall of the army, with his ſon and diuers other of the nobility of France were taken priſoners) by his Embaſſadour Michael Condignac ſolicited Solyman to haue by ſea inuaded Naples and Sicilia, ſo to haue withdrawne the Spaniſh forces out of France, to defend their owne frontiers. Which thing Solyman, offended with the inſolency of the Embaſſadour, refuſed to doe: yet neuertheleſſe commanded his aduenturers all alongſt the coaſt of Affricke, to infeſt thoſe ſeas, and to do what harme they could vpon the coaſt of Italy and Sicilia, which they ſo diligently performed, that the Viceroy of Sicilia was faine for defence of thoſe countries to lie in readineſſe with his gallies in the ports of Caieta and Naples.

Henry the French king ſoliciteth Solyman to inuade the king of Spaine his territories.

In the meane time the Guiſe, Lord Grand Prior of the Knights of S. Iohns in France (and D brother of Francis the Duke of Guiſe, Generall of the French Kings army in Italy, who vpon the ouerthrow receiued at S. Quintins, called out of Italy, ſhortly after tooke Calais) Admirall of the gallies of Malta, went out towards the Eaſt with foure gallies well appointed, to lie in wait for the Turks, and by fortune met with two great ſhips laded with the Turks merchandiſe, which he tooke; and by and by after, light vpon foure of the Turks gallies, with whom he had a great fight: yet at length hauing ſunke one of them and burnt another, he tooke the other two. After which victory returning towards Malta to haue repaired his gallies and cured his wounded men, he was met with foure other great gallies of the Turks: who deſirous to reuenge the loſſe of their fellowes, ſet vpon him, and he ſeeing now no remedy, but that he muſt needs fight couragiouſly, encountred them. But foraſmuch as he had in the two fights E before loſt ſome of his men, and 72 of the Knights in the gallies lay ſore wounded, he, by the counſell of the captaines retired towards Malta: but by the way one of his gallies was taken by the Turks, with 52 knights of the Order: yet with the reſt and the prizes before taken, he recouered the Iſland of Malta, where he ſtaied that Winter; and the next Spring ſailed into France to be pertakers of thoſe troubles, which beginning ſhortly after, haue but of late taken end.

The Guiſe, Lord Grand Prior in France, Admirall of Malta, taketh certaine of the Turkes gallies.

The immoderat fortune of the great Sultan Solyman, was not in any thing more contrary to his deſire, than in the proofe of thoſe his children, of whom the world held the greateſt expectation. Muſtapha his eldeſt ſon the mirrour of courteſie, and rare hope of the whole Turkiſh nation, the ſuſpitious tyrant had moſt vnnaturally cauſed to be murthered in his own preſence, F to the griefe of all his ſubjects in generall, as is before declared: poore Tzihanger was dead for ſorrow: and Mahometes his eldeſt ſonne by his beſt beloued the faire Roxolana, was departed this life alſo. So that now remained vnto him onely Selymus, the vnworthy heire of ſo great an Empire, and Bajazet his younger brother, the liuely image of his father, both men growne, and the ſonnes of the ſame Roxolana: but ſo far differing the one from the other both in feature of body and diſpoſition of mind, as if they had not bin of the ſame kindred and line. Selymus the elder brother moſt like vnto his mother, was in the ſecret determination of the aged Emperor his father appointed heire of that moſt mighty empire. Bajazet much reſembling his father, was on the other ſide ſtrongly ſupported by the care and entire loue of his mother: which whether it proceeded of a ſecret commiſeration of his ineuitable deſtiny, or that he had by loyalty or other means ſo won her fauor, is not knowne; but euery man ſaw, that if it had lien in her power, ſhe would vndoubtedly haue preferred him before his eldeſt brother Selymus, and haue placed him in the Empire: but ſhe muſt needs giue way to her old husbands will, firmly and irremoueably ſet down, that the Deſtinies ſo permitting, none ſhould reigne after him but his eldeſt ſon Selymus. Of which his purpoſe and reſolution Bajazet being not ignorant, began moſt circumſpectly to looke about him, if he could by any means fruſtrat that forcible neceſſity, and exchange his certaine deſtruction with an Empire: in which his deep and dangerous cogitations he was not a little comforted by the fauor & loue of Roxolana his mother, & of Ruſtan the great Baſſa his brother in law; who together had in any other matter bin able to haue ouerruled the aged Emperor. Whereupon he reſolutely ſet downe himſelfe, rather to end his daies by making proofe of his good or bad fortune, than vpon the death of his father (which by courſe of nature could not now be far off) to be as a ſacrifice baſely butchered by ſome vile hangman of his brothers. Bajazet ſo reſolued, and now already fallen out with his brother Selymus, took occaſion vpon the generall diſcontentment of the people and others, for the vnworthy death of Muſtapha their late joy, to begin thoſe ſtirs which he had before with himſelfe plotted, and ſo to make a head, wherunto he might afterward joine the body alſo: for why, that worthy Muſtapha had left behind him ſo great deſire of himſelfe, that now it wearied many to liue after him, they had ſo placed al the hope of their good fortune in him, vnto whom nothing was more deſirous than to reuenge the wrong don vnto him, or els to run the ſame bad fortune with him: other ſome guilty of the immoderat affection they had born vnto him yet liuing, and fearing to be called to giue an account thereof, thought any ſtate better and more aſſured than that wherein they preſently ſtood, and therefore ſought all occaſions of new ſtirs, and how to ſet all on a hurly burly: only a captain was wanting, Muſtapha could not be again reuiued, yet might he be ſtrongly ſuppoſed to liue. This deuice pleaſed Bajazet, as beſt fitting his purpoſe, being not ignorant of this diſpoſition of the people. Wherefore by certain of his moſt faithfull and truſty followers he found out a certaine obſcure fellow of a notable audacity, which ſhould take vpon him the name & perſon of Muſtapha, whoſe ſtature alſo and countenance and proportion of body differed not much from Muſtapha himſelfe: he, as if he had by chance eſcaped, firſt began to ſhew himſelfe in that part of Thracia, which is aboue Conſtantinople, and lieth toward Danubius, not far from the countries of Moldauia and Valachia, & was for that cauſe both fitteſt for rebellion, and alſo beſt ſtored with horſemen, who of all others moſt honored Muſtapha. Hither he comes as if it had bin from a long journy, ſlenderly accompanied, and as if he had bin deſirous at the firſt not to haue bin known; his followers being demanded (as it chanced) who it was, did rather fearefully giue them that asked occaſion to gheſſe, than plainly to tell them, that it was Muſtapha: neither did he himſelfe much deny it: wherby the people became more and more deſirous to know him. Which beginning thus laied, he afterward began to rejoice of his fortunat comming thither, and to giue God thanks for his ſafe arriuall there amongſt his friends: he tels them, That at ſuch time as he was ſent for by his father, he durſt not come in his ſight, or commit himſelfe vnto him in his fury, but by the counſell of his friends to haue with great promiſes perſuaded one that was maruellous like vnto himſelfe to goe in his ſtead: by whoſe danger he might make proofe of his fathers mind towards him: who before he was admitted to the ſpeech of his father, was without hearing miſerably ſtrangled, and ſo caſt out before his pauilion: at which time there was many (as he ſaid) which perceiued the deceit, but the greater part remained in errour, deceiued with the lineaments and countenance of the miſerable dead man, who was much altered with the terrible paines of death, and ſuppoſing it to haue bin him indeed that was ſlaine. Which thing as ſoone as hee vnderſtood, he thought it not good longer to ſtay, but preſently to fly and to prouide for his owne ſafety, and ſo flying with a few of his owne followers, thereby the more ſecretly and ſafely to eſcape; and hauing paſſed aboue Pontus by the people of Boſphorus, was now come thither, where he was in good hope to finde much helpe and comfort

A fort in the fidelity of his friends,whom he requeſted not now to forſake him, or to make leſſe account of him diſgraced by the malice of his ſtep-mother , than they had before in time of his proſperity, for that he was minded to reuenge the injury don vnto him, and by force of arms to defend himſelf. For what els had he now left; beeing by no other meanes preſerued but by the death of another man. That he had ſufficiently proued how his father ſtood affected toward him,and that he now liued by his miſtaking,not by his kindnes. The cauſe of all which his troubles was his ſtep-dame, who (as he ſaid) with her inchantments led the ſilly old man(now almoſt doting for age,and mad for loue)whither ſhe would at her pleaſure:and by her agent Ruſtan Baſſa forced him forward headlong into al kind of miſchief. But that God be thanked he wanted not friends, by whoſe helpe he would find a way out of theſe miſeries, B and take reuenge of his enemies : for why,he had as yet couragious hearts, and the Ianizaries with the greater part of his fathers family on his ſide; and that great multitudes of people would flock vnto him vpon bruit of his name; and that they which now mourned for him as dead(being in number many)would by heaps run to help him being aliue : ſo that they there preſent would but only curteouſly receiue him as a gueſt,and protect him now diſtreſſed,till ſuch time as his wel-willers and friends might repair vnto him. And this at laſt he gaue out not in ſecret, but openly to all men wherſoeuer he came. The ſame things did they alſo report, whom he made the people beleeue to haue bin the companions of his flight : which was alſo confirmed by diuers of good credit and authority,whom Bajazet had before dealt with to that purpoſe. So that a great number of men altogether vnknown to Bajazet,were therby ſeduced: C for this matter was ſo cunningly wrought,that many who had known Muſtapha aliue,& ſeen him ly dead before his fathers pauilion,yet liſted not greatly to beleeue that which they knew,but eaſily ſuffered themſelues to be perſuaded that this was the true Muſtapha. But the companions and followers of Muſtapha (in whoſe mindes the liuely countenance and reſemblance of him was fully ingrauen)nothing could deceiue, yet blinded partly with fear,partly with grief and deſire of reuenge, and wiſhing rather to aduenture any thing, than longer to liue without Muſtapha, were the firſt men that came to offer their ſeruice to this counterfeit Muſtapha,and would not ſuffer other men to doubt but that he was the true Muſtapha, which was falſly reported to haue bin ſlain. As for the deceiuer himſelf,he either kept with him, or entertained them that came,ſome with fair promiſes, ſome with curteous ſpeeches, & many D alſo with mony & rewards,which he made them beleeue he had reſerued of the reliques of his better fortune. For Bajazet had before notably prouided that he wanted nothing for countenancing of his credit. So within the ſpace of a few daies ſuch a multitude of men was reſorted vnto him as might almoſt haue made a whole army. When Solyman vpon the ſudden was aduertiſed by the fearful meſſengers and letters of the Sanzacks therabouts,what danger was like to enſue by the concourſe of ſo great a multitude of people to this counterfeit Muſtapha, he preſently ſuſpecting(as the truth was)that this was not don without the priuity of one of his ſons, thought it not a thing to be neglected; and therefore by his Letters reproued the Sanzacks,That they had ſuffered the matter to run ſo far, and had not in the beginning (as their duty was) ſuppreſſed the ſame. Grieuouſly threatning them , if they did not with all E ſpeed ſend vnto him in bonds that counterfeit companion and the reſt of his Complices:the which that it might be the eaſilier by them performed, he promiſed to ſend one of the chiefe Baſſa's,namely Partau Baſſa (who had maried the widow of Mahometes the eldeſt ſon of Roxolana, of whom we haue before remembred) and with him a ſtrong power of the ſoldiers of the Court. But if they would haue themſelues excuſed, they ſhould of themſelues diſpatch the matter before the comming of that aid. This Partau led after him certain ſquadrons of ſouldiers, not ſo many in number, as notable for their fidelity. For Solyman had cauſed the moſt faithful of his Colonels,Captains,and Corporals, to be culled out; wiſely doubting leſt his ſoldiers,either led with affection,or corrupted with reward,might take part with him againſt whom they were ſent. For the common ſort of Ianizaries ſtanding in ſuſpence at the fame of F Muſtapha,and expectation of ſome great nouelty,fauored that broil,and wiſhed all on a hurly-burly: neither was the matter indeed without danger. The Sanzacks after they had receiued this ſtreit charge from Solyman,conſidering how much it ſtood them vpon to make ſpeedy diſpatch, began now to incourage one another to beſtir themſelues, to make all the haſte poſſible, and with all their power on euery ſide to oppoſe themſelues againſt the attempts of this new ſound Muſtapha, laboring to ſtay ſuch as were comming vnto him, and to diſperſe ſuch as were already come, by ſhewing them the greatneſſe of the danger, and threatning them with all extremities. In the mean time Partau Baſſa came on with his army, and was not now far off: when (as in like caſe it often fals out in things not yet ſufficiently confirmed, and by celerity preuented) the ſoldiers of the counterfeit Muſtapha ſeeing themſelues beſet on euery ſide, began to fear, and firſt ſome few to ſlip away, but afterwards all without regard of ſhame or of their promiſe, to forſake their captain and fly euery man whither he thought beſt. The Captain ſeeking likewiſe to make ſhift for himſelf, was with the chief of his counſellors and followers taken by the Sanzacks and deliuered to the Baſſa, who with a ſtrong gard ſent them all in bonds to Conſtantinople: where Solyman by moſt exquiſit torments drew from them al the ſecret deuices of his yong ſon Bajazet; and that he had purpoſed after ſuch a head made by this ſuppoſed Muſtapha, as he thought conuenient, to haue vpon the ſudden ioyned himſelf with a great power, and ſo as ſhould beſt ſerue for his purpoſe, to haue gon directly to Conſtantinople, or els againſt his brother Selymus. But whilſt he goeth ſomewhat too ſlowly about his buſines, his vnripe counſels were by his fathers celerity oppreſſed. Of all which matter Solyman now thorowly aſſured, cauſed the ſuppoſed Muſtapha with his companions at midnight to be drowned in the ſea; thinking it not good to haue theſe things commonly known, and to haue his domeſtical wounds yet bleeding, laid open to the view of his neighbour princes. Neuertheles, being mightily offended with Bajazet for ſo great an iniury, he ceaſed not to caſt in his mind how to be reuenged vpon him, which his wife Roxolana a woman of great wiſdom was not ignorant of. Who after a few daies, at ſuch time as the old mans fury was ouerpaſt, falling of purpoſe into talk with him about the matter, ſhe laid together in her ſons behalf, and alledged the indiſcreetnes of his youth, the neceſſity of the fact, and the example of his anceſtors in like caſe, that it was ſo prouided for by nature, that euery man ſhould bee careful of himſelfe and his, and that euery man did indifferently ſhun death; that young men were by euill counſel eaſily ſeduced and made to forget their duty. That it were reaſon hee ſhould forgiue him his firſt fault; which if he amended, then was it a great gain for the father to haue ſaued his ſonne: but if he ſhould again fall into relapſe, there would not want time to puniſh him for both facts. And that if ſo be he would not pardon him for his owne ſake, hee would vouchſafe to pardon him for hers, intreating now for him for whom ſhe had before groaned, and not to be cruel vpon him, one of the pledges of their loue, in whom reſted the bloud of them both: for in what woful caſe ſhould ſhe be, if of thoſe two ſonnes (all that God had left her) the fathers ſeuerity ſhould bereaue her of the one. Wherfore ſhe requeſted him to moderat his anger, & to prefer his clemency before his iuſt indignation; foraſmuch as God himſelf of al power and might, did not alwaies deal with ſinners in ſeuerity, but for moſt part in mercy; wheras otherwiſe all mankind would not ſuffice his wrath. And would mercy in any place be more fitting, than in the father toward his child? She promiſed further, that Bajazet ſhould from thenceforth remain in dutifull obedience towards his Maieſty; and vpon his ſo great clemencie, to conuert the fear wherein he now liued, into a world of duty and deuotion. Honorable minds ſhe ſaid were retained with nothing more than with kindnes and curteſie; That the remembrance of that his fatherly forgiuenes ſhould be a ſtay vnto him, for euer doing the like again. At laſt, That ſhe would promiſe for him, and take vpon her, that he ſhould for euer afterwards ſatisfie his fatherly expectation in all kind of duty and loyalty. Which words mingled with tears and other womanly geſtures, ſo wrought with Solyman, being otherwiſe too much in her power, that he reſolued to forgiue the fault, yet ſo, that he ſhould come and ſubmit himſelf, and receiue from him his charge. This carefull mother foreſlowes no time, but by letters ſecretly aduertiſed Bajazet not to feare to come to his father at ſuch time as he ſhould be ſent for. Aſſuring him that there was no danger, for that his father was by her means appeaſed, and he again brought into his fauor. With which good newes Bajazet well comforted, reſolued to go at ſuch time as he was ſent for: yet ful of fear, and oftentimes looking back vnto his brother Muſtapha, whoſe dreadful example ſufficiently warned him, what a danger he aduentured himſelfe vnto. Yet he came vnto the place appointed for his parley, which was in a common Inne at a place called Careſtran, a few miles from the city of Conſtantinople. For ſuch is the ſuſpitious maner of the Turkiſh Tyrants of theſe times, not to ſuffer any of their ſons that bee men growne, to ſet their foot within the gates of Conſtantinople, Muſtapha and his companions drowned.

At Roxolana's requeſt Solymã pardoneth Bajazet.

Bajazet goes to his father in fear.

A nople, as dangerous for ſolliciting the ſoldiers of the Court, and ſo conſequently for altering the ſtate. Bajazet was no ſooner lighted from his horſe, but his fathers Gard was ready to receiue him, commanding him to lay aſide his ſword and dagger: which thing though it be a vſual matter in others that are admitted to the preſence of the Turkiſh Emperour, yet might it then in the mind of his guilty ſon raiſe a great fear. But his kind mother (who had before foreſeen in what fear and perplexity he would come) had conueied her ſelfe into a Chamber faſt by the entrance of the ſame houſe as Bajazet was to paſſe; where out of a little caſement couered with a thin linnen cloth ſhee called to him paſſing by, in theſe few words, Corcoma Oglan, Corcoma; which is as much to ſay, Fear not my ſonne, fear not. With which ſhort ſpeech Bajazet was not a little both comforted and incouraged. But as ſoon as he was come into his B fathers preſence, and had done his duty, Solyman commanded him to ſit down by him. Then began the grim Sir grieuouſly to reproue him of raſhnes and want of diſcretion in taking vp Arms, which he could not otherwiſe conceiue of but as taken vp againſt himſelf. And admit they were as he would haue it, and the beſt that he could make of it, taken vp againſt his elder brother, yet was it neuertheles a great preſumption and moſt wicked fact. Neither was there any want in him, but that the whole ſtate of the Mahometan Religion (which at this day reſteth vpon the Othoman family) had by his domeſtical diſcord been ſore ſhaken, and brought in perill of vtter ruin, to the great iniury, reproch, and contempt of his Majeſty, a moſt deteſtable and horrible crime, which could not but with condign puniſhment be reuenged. Yet for all that, he had determined to pardon him, and to ſhew himſelf rather a kind father, than a C ſeuere judge; ſo that he would from thenceforth leaue the care of future things to God: foraſmuch as none of theſe things are done by our appointment, but that kingdomes and Monarchies are beſtowed as it beſt pleaſeth him. So that if it were his deſtiny to enioy the Empire after his death, he ſhould be ſure therof, as of a thing that would of it ſelf come to him, and could not by any mans power be kept from him, as that which was by God ordained for him. But if it were otherwiſe appointed by God, then were it a mad thing for him to labour in vain to ſtriue againſt the wil of God, and as it were to fight with God. Wherfore he ought now (as one wel warned) to ceaſe to rage & ſtorm, and not moleſt his quiet brother, or trouble him his aged father: for that if he ſhould again fal and raiſe new ſtirres, it would aſſuredly fall vpon his own head, neither would any place of mercy be found for his ſecond offence; & that D he ſhould then find him not as now, his gentle father, but a moſt ſeuere and reuenging judge. Which when he had ſaid, and Bajazet had thereunto briefly anſwered as the time would permit, rather crauing pardon for his treſpaſſe, than excuſing that was not to be excuſed, and promiſing from henceforth to liue moſt loyally at his command; Solyman according to the manner of that nation called for drinke, which he commanded to be giuen to Bajazet, who not daring to refuſe it, although he had rather haue ſo done, dranke thereof what he thought good, doubting leſt that ſhould haue bin his laſt: of which fear his father forthwith deliuered him by drinking a good draught of the ſame cup. So Bajazet, though guilty, hauing with better ſucceſſe ſpoken with his father than had his brother Muſtapha, returned againe to the former place of his charge.

Solyman reproueth Baiazet of diſloyalty, and afterward pardoneth him.

Baiazet returneth vnto his Charge.

E This hapned in the yeare 1555, from which time Bajazet ſo long as Roxolana his mother liued, behaued himſelf with al dutifull & brotherly kindnes both towards his father & his brother; and that rather for to keep her fauor, and not to cut off the hope which he had only in her affection towards him, than for any confidence he had in his fathers kindneſſe, or for any loue he bare to his brother; the regard of her being the only thing that kept his fierce nature in quiet. But ſhe dead about two yeres after, he as a man bereft of all hope of long life, & diſcharged of all bonds of duty, fell to his former courſe, & began more grieuouſly than before, to reuiue the old grudges betwixt him & his brother, ſomtime ſeeking by ſecret practiſes to haue him made away, and other ſomtimes by open force entring into his prouince, which was not far off, there euill intreated ſome of his brothers followers as he light vpon, for their maF ſters ſake, omitting nothing which he thought might tend to the diſgrace of him whom of al other he wiſhed dead: he had alſo certain of his fauorits at Conſtantinople, by whom he cunningly wrought by all means to gain the loue of the ſoldiers of the court, and doubted not as occaſion ſerued to paſſe ouer thither himſelfe, and there to lurk in ſecret with ſuch as were of his faction, and priuy to his deſignements. Of all which things Solyman had knowledge, but eſpecially by letters from Selymus, wherin he was alſo aduertiſed to haue care of his own ſafety; G for that he was far deceiued, if he perceiued not that theſe preambles of Bajazets wicked intentions would at laſt turn vpon his head, who regarded neither God nor man, ſo that hee might alone reign: vnto whoſe vnruly deſires his fathers welfare was no leſſe a bar than was his brothers, and therfore through his ſides was his life ſhot at. Which treaſon had (as hee ſaid) bin of long time plotted, and now occaſion ſought to haue the ſame performed. Wherfore he ſhould take heed that he were not by ſuch trechery ouerwhelmed before he were aware therof. That for himſelf, he could eaſily bear with the injuries of his brother Bajazet, yet could not chuſe but be mooued with the greatnes of his fathers dangers. By which means Solymans hatred againſt Bajazet was more and more increaſed. Wherfore he by letters put him in remembrance of his duty, how curteouſly he had vſed him, and again what he had on his part promiſed: H that there would not alwaies be place for forgiuenes; that hee ſhould therefore ceaſe to wrong his brother, and trouble his father. That he had but a ſhort time to liue, and that after his death God would aſſigne each of them their fortune. But all this was to no purpoſe with Bajazet, fully ſet down reſolutely to haſard any thing, than as a beaſt to haue his throat cut by his brother: which thing he as plainly ſaw would betide him in the reign of Selymus, as if it had bin euen then in execution. Yet he anſwered to his fathers commands not impertinently, but his deeds agreed not with his ſayings, neither did hee alter any thing of his intended purpoſe. Which thing ſo ſoon as Solyman perceiued, he thought it beſt to take another courſe, and to remoue his ſons both farther from himſelf, and alſo farther one from another. Wherfore he gaue them to vnderſtand that it was his pleaſure, That both of them within a certaine I prefixed time ſhould paſſe out of their gouernments (Bajazet being then gouernor of Cutai, and Selymus of Magneſia) and that now Bajazet ſhould remoue to Amaſia, and Selymus to Iconium. Selymus was without imputation, and altogether in fauor with his father; yet becauſe no occaſion ſhould be giuen Bajazet to fal into extremities, if he ſhould haue bin remoued alone, Solyman to ſeem indifferent commanded them both to remoue. Vnto which command it was adjoined, That the farther they were one from another, they ſhould be ſo much the neerer in mind and brotherly loue: foraſmuch as neernes of dwelling of the Great did oftentimes hinder their good agreement, whilſt by forwardnes of officers many things are on both ſides don to the grieuing of their maſters. And that they ſhould in any caſe do as they were commanded; and that he which ſtayd longeſt, ſhould not be free from the ſuſpition of contempt. K Selymus made no long ſtay, as he that knew a great part of all this to be don for his ſake. But Bajazet hung back, and being gon a little on his way, complained of the vnlucky prouince of Amaſia, ſtained with the bloud of his late brother the noble Muſtapha, to be aſſigned vnto him as ominous; and that he could be better contented with any prouince whatſoeuer than that, where the deadly remembrance of the miſerable end of the neereſt to him in bloud, ſhould be euer before his eies, to the wounding of his heart. Wherfore he requeſted that he might at leaſt Winter in thoſe places, or els there from whence his brother was now of late departed: but Solyman would in no wiſe hearken vnto him. Now Selymus gon before certain days iourny, with ſuch troups as his father had ſent vnto him beſides his own, for feare of Bajazet, who yet ſtayd loitering and trifling on the time, ſuddenly returning and fetching a compas about, L ſhewed himſelfe at his brothers back, marching toward Pruſa in Bithynia, the antient ſeat of the Turkiſh Kings; which he did not without the priuity of his father, who liked not of the lingring of Bajazet: for what if he, hauing gained the good wil of the Ianizaries, ſhould haue gon either to Pruſa, or vnto Conſtantinople, what a danger might therby haue grown to Selymus, yea vnto the whole State in generall? In this common fear, Solyman though it beſt for Selymus there to ſtay, from whence they might moſt conueniently help one another, if Bajazet ſhould (as was feared) turn himſelf vpon either of them. Yet was not Selymus ſo ſtrong as to aduenture to join battell with his brother, whom he knew ready to put all vnto the haſard of one day. But when Bajazet (contrary to his expectation) ſaw Selymus behind him, and that he had got nothing by his long delay, but that his brother ſhould be the vndoubted heire of M the Empire if his father ſhould die, (which was then by reaſon of his ſickly conſtitution of body more and more feared) he writ vnto his father accuſing his brother, That hee could not more manifeſtly in any thing declare how maliciouſly he was affected towards him, than by taking that indirect courſe, which was to no other purpoſe but to aſpire to the Empire, and to Solyman remoueth his two ſons farther aſunder.

Bajazet delayeth his going to Amaſia.

A haue a ſhort cut ouer to Conſtantinople, if hee ſhould haue any newes of his fathers death, which he ſtil gaped after. Which his longing if his fathers longer life ſhould delay, then by the ſecret miniſters of his treaſon to diſpatch him, and by murdering of him to poſſeſſe himſelf of the empire: and yet neuertheles this man, as a moſt dutiful and obedient ſon, to bee of him much made of, and as it were put in his boſom. Wheras he on the contrary part meaning wel, into whoſe conceit neuer any ſuch thought came, but was euer at command, was not had in any regard, but caſt off and contemned; whoſe greateſt requeſt was but to ſhun an vnfortunat ominous prouince. Then conuerting his ſtile to prayers, he intreated his father to gratifie him with ſome other prouince, if it were that from which his brother was gon, or with any other whatſoeuer, ſo that it were more lucky than that of Amaſia. For anſwer whereof, hee B ſaid he would ſtay where he was, to the end that finding fauour in his requeſt, hee ſhould not haue need farther to retyre. But if he ſhould not obtain his requeſt, that then he was ready to go whitherſoeuer his father ſhould command. It was not altogether for nought, that Bajazet found fault with Amaſia; being the manner of the Turks, of the ſmalleſt things of all to diuine vpon the greateſt. But Solyman vnderſtood the matter otherwiſe, who not ignorant of his ſons tears, knew right well, that he in them ſought for nothing els but a more commodious place for him to raiſe new ſtirs in, than was Amaſia, ſo far diſtant from Conſtantinople. So Bajazet by many delaies did what he could to fruſtrat his fathers appointment, ceaſing not in the mean time to augment his ſtrength with new ſoldiers, to prouide armor, mony, & whatſoeuer els ſeruing for the defence of himſelf, and impugning of his brother. Which Solyman C took in no other part than as intended againſt his owne perſon: yet would he ſeem as not to haue any vnderſtanding of the matter. For why, the wary old Sir would not by taking knowledge therof, driue headlong his ſon, who was already running to faſt of himſelf. Beſides that, he was not ignorant that the eies of all Nations were bent vpon this diſcord of his two ſons; and therfore he deſired by all means, that theſe grudges might with as little ſtir as was poſſible be appeaſed. Wherfore he anſwered Bajazet curteouſly, that concerning his gouernment of Amaſia he could not alter it, as reſolutely ſet down as wel for his brother as himſelfe; and that therfore they ſhould do wel to go both to their appointed places, as he had before commanded.
As for the reſt, they ſhould be of good comfort, for that hee would take ſuch order as that neither of them ſhould haue iuſt cauſe to complaine. Partau Baſſa, the fourth of the D great Baſſa's of the Court, was appointed to go with this meſſage to Bajazet; and Mehemet third of the ſame great Baſſa's, with like charge to Selymus; becauſe the matter ſhould ſeem to be don with all indifferencie: and both theſe great men commaunded not to depart from them they were ſent vnto, before they were both come vnto the places of their gouernment wherunto they were aſſigned. Which Solyman wiſely did, to keep them both within the compas of duty, by the preſence of two ſuch graue Counſellors. Which thing Selymus tooke in good part, but BajaZet not ſo: who hauing reſolued with himſelfe to ſet all on a burly-burly, thought nothing more vnfit for his deſignes, than to haue one of his fathers greateſt Counſellors ſtill at his elbow as Cenſor of all his ſpeeches and doings: wherfore hauing curteouſly entertained him, and rewarded him according to his abilitie, he diſmiſſed him (though E vnwilling to depart) making this excuſe, That he would vſe him as his patron and defender with his father, foraſmuch as he had no other in Court to defend his cauſe; promiſing not to be vnto him an vnworthy or vnthankfull Client: and to carry word back again vnto his father, That he would aboue all things haue care of his command, if he might ſo do for his brother Selymus, whoſe injuries and trecheries he had much ado to brook. Partau the great Baſſa thus ſent away, aſſured Solyman what the very mind and purpoſe of his yonger ſon was. And albeit that BajaZet, to make it ſeem as if ſomthing had bin don by that embaſſage, made ſhew as if he would haue preſently gon toward Amaſia; yet Solyman neuertheles fearing the worſt, made all the preparation he could againſt him: commanding the Beglerbeg of Greece, although then ſick of the gout, to make haſt, and with his horſemen with all ſpeed to paſſe ouer to ayd F Selymus. And Mehemet Baſſa but lately returned, he ſent forthwith backe again to Selymus for the ſame purpoſe, with certain of the moſt truſty companies of the Ianizaries; and the old man in readines, made ſemblant as if he would himſelf in perſon haue gon ouer into Aſia. But the Ianizaries, and other ſoldiers of the court came with euill wil together, deteſting that Warre between the brethren, as altogether abhominable: for againſt whom ſhould they draw their Bajazet ſends Partau Baſſa back again.

Solyman preparing to go againſt Bajazet, finds the Ianizaries vnwilling.

ſwords? was it not againſt the Emperours ſons, and haply the heire of the empire? Wherſore this war might (as they ſaid) wel enough be let alone, as altogether vnneceſſary, and not they G to be inforced to imbrue their hands one in anothers bloud, and to pollute themſelues with ſuch impiety: as for that which Bajazet did, was to be holden excuſed, as proceeding from neceſſity.
Which ſpeeches of the Ianizaries being brought to Solymans ears, he forthwith declared them to the Muphti (who in all matters of doubt they flee vnto, as vnto a moſt ſacred Oracle) demanding of him, how he was to be intreated, who of himſelf preſumed whilſt hee yet liued, to leuy ſoldiers, raiſe an army, ranſack towns, & trouble the ſtate of the whole empire? and what alſo he deemed of them that were his followers and took part with him? and laſt of all, of them alſo that refuſed to bear arms againſt him, and ſaid that he had in ſo doing offended nothing? Wherunto the Muphti anſwered, That both the man and his partakers were all H worthy of death, and that ſuch as refuſed to take vp Arms againſt him, were as prophane and irreligious men to be accounted inteſtable. Which the great Prieſts anſwer was publiſhed vnto the people, and by the chiefe Chiaus ſent to Bajazet, to ſee if he might be therwith mooued.
Within a few daies after there came to Conſtantinople one of the Chiaus (whom Bajazet had intercepted, being ſent from Solyman to Selymus) by whom Bajazet gaue his father to vnderſtand, that he was in al duty his, and that he had not taken vp Arms againſt him, neither refuſed to be vnto him in all things obedient: but that he had to do only with his brother, and with him to fight for his life, by whoſe ſword he muſt die, or els he by his, for that a miſchief was to be by one of them performed. Which quarrel he was reſolued to try while he yet liued, and that therfore he ſhould do beſt not to meddle in the quarel, or giue aid to either. But I if ſo be he would needs (as the report was) paſſe ouer the ſea to aid Selymus, he ſhould not eaſily get him into his hands; for that he knew right well, if the worſt came, how to eſcape and ſaue himſelf, and would before he could get ouer into Aſia, make ſuch ſpoile with fire and ſword, as neuer had Tamerlane, or other the cruelleſt enemy that euer the Turks had. Which meſſage did not a little trouble Solyman; and withall it was reported, that the town of Axuar, where one of Selymus his ſons ruled as Sanzack, was already taken by Bajazet and ſhamefully ſacked. But Selymus hearing that his brother was gon toward Amaſia, and now on his way as far as Ancyra, being out of all ſuſpition of danger which hee feared vpon the way ſo long as his brother was yet lingring in thoſe quarters, haſted now towards Iconium, which was with a ſtrong gariſon kept for him. For amongſt other cares wherwith Solyman was vexed, it was not K the leaſt, that Bajazet intercepting Iconium, ſhould get into Syria, and from thence into Ægypt, an open country, and not yet thorowly eſtabliſhed vnder the Turkiſh gouernment; neither forgetful of the old gouernment of the Mamalukes, & therfore deſirous of change: from whence it would haue bin an hard matter to haue driuen Bajazet, eſpecially the Arabians being alwaies ready and at hand at euery light ſtir, where any hope of prey was. Out of which prouince alſo in caſe of extremity he might eaſily tranſport himſelf into one of the Chriſtian kingdoms. Solyman therfore took great care, that this paſſage which might ſeeme the laſt refuge of Bajazets deuices, might be ſtopped vp: and concerning the ſame, had giuen commandement vnto moſt of his Commanders in Aſia, to be alwaies in readines to aid Selymus whenſoeuer he ſhould call. With them Selymus lay incamped vnder the wals of Iconium, attending L euery ſtirring of Bajazet, reſoluing there to expect further aid from his father, & not by vntimely fight to commit his ſafety to the haſard of one doubtful battell. But Bajazet on the other ſide, not vnmindful what a matter he had taken in hand, ſlept not therupon, but firſt entertained a valiant ſort of horſmen which the Turks cal Chiurts, and are ſuppoſed to be of that people which were ſomtime called Gordij, men for their known valor famous. He yet lay in the plain and open fields by Ancyra, of the commodities of which city, which were indeed great, he made great vſe. In the caſtle therof he beſtowed his concubines and children: of the rich merchants he took vp mony, to be repaid with the vſe vpon the good ſucces of the War: and from thence he took whatſoeuer was needful for the arming and furniſhing of his men.
Beſides his own family, which was very great, and thoſe Chiurts which we ſpoke of, many repaired M vnto him, which in former time had bin beholden to his mother, to his ſiſter, & to Ruſtan the great Baſſa. Many alſo of the reliques of the valiant Muſtapha and Achomates the great Baſſa, valiant men and expert ſouldiers, who deſired to reuenge the vnworthy death of their Lords and Maſters euen with their owne. Neither was there wanting an exceeding rabblement

A rabblement of ſuch as weary of their preſent ſtate, deſired ſome new alteration and change.
The commiſeration alſo of the ſtate of the vnfortunat Bajazet, eaſily drew many to take part with him, whoſe whole truſt was in his valor:they fauored the young prince liuely repreſenting his father. When as in Selymus appeared no likenes of himſelf,but the expres liniaments of his mothers face and body,a woman whilſt ſhe liued generally hated of all the people. He went heauily,as ouercharged with his greaſie panch,blub cheeked,and exceeding red faced; ſo that the ſoldiers in ſport would ſay he was fed with green malt. He was altogether giuen to his eaſe,and ſpent his time in drunkennes and ſleep;neither was he curteous of ſpeech, nor willing to deſerue wel of any man:for he would not(as he ſaid)offend his father by being popular; ſo was he only of his father beloued,and of all other men hated. Of all kind of men hee B moſt diſliked them that ſet al their hope in a bountiful and courageous prince. The ſame ſoldiers were alſo wont to cal Bajazet, Softie, that is to ſay,a man giuen to quietnes and ſtudy:but after they ſaw him take vp arms,and for the ſafety of himſelf and his children ready to aduenture any thing,they began to admire him as a man of valour and courage,and to ask amongſt themſelues, Why his father ſhould reiect him of ſuch worth,the expreſſe image of himſelf, and prefer before him that gorbellied ſluggard,in whom no ſpark of his fathers valor was to be ſeen? This his entring into arms was no fault,being therunto by neceſſity inforced. For, had not Selymus their grandfather don the like? whereof no better example could be found, whom the force of neceſſity conſtrained not only to take vp arms againſt his brother,but alſo by haſtning the death of his father;and by ſo doing purchaſed vnto himſelf and his poſterity C the empire:which ſo gotten,if Solyman did not vniuſtly poſſeſſe,why might not his ſon vſe the ſame courſe?why ſhould he ſo rigorouſly reuenge that in his ſonne, that was ſo lawfull in the grandfather? Although there was,as they ſaid,great difference betwixt that Selymus and this Bajazet; for that this man intended no harm againſt his father, but wiſhed him long to liue: neither yet againſt his brother,if he might by his leaue but liue, if he would but once ceaſe to do him wrong. That it was alwaies accounted lawfull to repel force by force, and to ſhun preſent death,if the deſtinies would ſo permit. By ſuch affections and motions Bajazets forces daily increaſed:which being now grown almoſt to the greatnes of a ful army, he thought it not beſt to vſe longer delay,but to march forthwith againſt his brother to fight with him one battel for his life,ſtate and empire:accounting it ſome commendation(though in vaine) D to haue attempted ſo great an enterpriſe. His purpoſe was, as Solyman feared,to get into Syria: which if he could bring to paſſe,he then doubted not of the reſt. Selymus ſtrengthned with his fathers power,lay waiting for his comming before Iconium, wel appointed of al warlike prouiſion:his army was exceeding ſtrong,and in it many notable commanders, martiall men of great experience whom his father had ioyned vnto him; who all lay couered with their great ordnance,planted in places moſt conuenient. But Bajazet nothing terrified therwith, as ſoon as he came within ſight of his brothers Army, incouraged his ſoldiers in few words to play the men,for that now was come the time they wiſhed for,& place for them to ſhew their valor in: Wherfore they ſhould ſhew themſelues courageous and valiant,and he would make them all rich and fortunat. He told them,that their fortune was now in their owne hands,to E frame it euery man as he would himſelfe; ſo that if any of them were weary of their preſent ſtate,there was the field wherin they might exchange it with better, and therin lay down the miſery of their former liues. That of him they ſhould if they ouercame,expect riches,promotions, honors,and whatſoeuer els,the rewards of valiant men. That with the victory of one battel,all their deſires ſhould be ſatisfied,were they neuer ſo great:which victory was by the valor that reſted in them to be gotten, and his brothers Army, the heartleſſe followers of a heartleſſe captain,ouerthrown:as for his fathers ſoldiers that were with his brother,they were in body preſent,but in mind altogether on his ſide. That it was only Selymus that withſtood his welfare and their felicity; whom they ſhould therfore valiantly ſeek for in field as their common enemy:and not to be afraid of his multitude:foraſmuch as victory was to be gained F not by number,but by valor: and the moſt mighty God of heauen and earth was ſtil preſent, not with the moſt,but with the beſt. Beſides that,he willed them to remember,with what a cruell enemy they were to fight, who thirſted after nothing more than their bloud. And to conclude,he willed them all not to looke vpon his words,but his deeds; and ſayd, If as you ſhall ſee me fighting for your profit,you ſhall likewiſe fight for myne honor, I dare then aſſure Bajazet & his quarrel generally fauoured of the ſoldiers.

ſure you of the victory. Which ſaid, he with great courage charged the enemy, and fighting himſelf a long time among the formoſt, and there performing all the parts of a valiant ſoldier G and worthy Captain, was for his notable valor no leſſe commended of his enemies than of his own ſoldiers. The battell was bloudy and terrible, and many fell on both ſides: but after that they with wonderfull obſtinacy had a great while fought with doubtful victory, ſo that forty thouſand Turks lay there did vpon the ground; at length the victory began to incline to that ſide wheron ſtood the greater ſtrength, the iuſter cauſe, and better counſel. Many of the enemies being ſlain, & many of his own people alſo loſt, Bajazet was inforced to retyre; which he did ſo leiſurely, and without ſhew of any fear, that it ſeemed to the beholders, he had welneer as wel gained as loſt the field. Neither durſt Selymus purſue him, but ſtood ſtil faſt in the ſame place, neuer more glad of any thing than to ſee his brothers back. But Bajazet after hee H had in contempt of his fathers command, thus run his own courſe, and ſatisfied his own deſire, though diſappointed of his purpoſe, and not able to perform the journey by him intended into Syria, turned now his courſe, and began in good earneſt to go to Amaſia his appointed prouince.

The battell betwixt Selymus and Bajazet. Forty thouſand Turks ſlain.

Solyman ſpeedily aduertiſed of the euent of this battel, forthwith paſſed ouer into Aſia: for as the great Baſſa's his counſellors thought it not conuenient for him to go ouer the ſtreight before the victory; ſo after it was certainly known, they thought it not good longer to ſtay, leſt the ouerthrow of Baiazet might giue occaſion to ſuch as ſecretly fauored his quarrel, to ſhew themſelues, and ſo to raiſe greater troubles. Beſides that, the fame of his paſſage ouer would (as they ſaid) much auail both to the diſcouragement of BajaZet, and the terrifying of all his friends; and therfore it was by them thought good, haſtily to purſue him, now ouerthrowne, I and not to ſuffer him to gather courage by the example of his grandfather Selymus, Solymans father, who had bin more terribly vanquiſhed than when hee ſtood in his own ſtrength, and and might ſeem by that meanes eſpecially to haue preuailed, for that he was at firſt vnfortunatly ouerthrown. Neither were theſe things without reaſon foreſeen; for it is almoſt incredible, what admiration and loue this battel (though vnfortunat) did gain Bajazet; men wondred that he durſt with ſo ſmall a power, and as it were but a handfull of men, incounter with his brother far better appointed, and alſo ſupported by his fathers ſtrength; neither fearing the great diſaduantage of the place, nor the fury of the artillery: and to haue behaued himſelfe in the battel not like a yong ſoldier, but like an old expert commander. Selimus might at his pleaſure boaſt of himſelf (as they ſaid) to his father for the victory; but Bajazet was the man that K deſerued to ouercome: and that Selymus might to any thing aſcribe the victory, rather than to his own valor.

Theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches, as they made Bajazet gratious among the people generally, ſo doubled they his fathers cares, and increaſed his hatred, to wiſh him the rather dead. For why, he was reſolutely ſet down, not to leaue any other heir of the empire than Selymus his eldeſt ſon, always loial and obedient to him: wheras the other he abhorred as ſtubborn & rebellious, gaping after the empire whilſt he yet liued; of whom he was therfore ſo much the more to ſtand in dread, by how much he was reputed to be of more valor, and for the aid he had now ſo openly giuen to Selymus. For theſe cauſes he paſſed ouer the ſtreit into Aſia, with purpoſe, L not to go farre from the ſea coaſt, but as it were afar off with his fauourable aſpect to countenance Selymus his proceedings: doubting by comming too neere with his Army, to indanger himſelf by the ſudden reuolt of the Ianizaries, which he aboue all things feared.

Auger. Busb. Epiſt. 5. legat. Turcicæ.

I my ſelf (ſaith the author of this hiſtory) ſaw him departing out of Conſtantinople the firſt of Iune, Anno 1559, when as within a few daies after, I my ſelfe was alſo ſent for thither: for the Baſſa's thought it not amiſſe to haue me in the camp, and to vſe me curteouſly as their friend; for which cauſe I was aſſigned to lodge in an Inne in a village neer to the camp, where I lay very wel. The Turks lay in the fields round about: but lying there three months, I had good leiſure and opportunitie to ſee the manner of their Camp, and in part to know the order of their martial diſcipline. So I attyring my ſelf in ſuch apparell as the Chriſtians commonly M vſe in thoſe parts, went vp and downe with one or two companions at my pleaſure vnknowne.
Firſt I ſaw the ſouldiers of all ſorts moſt orderly placed; and that, which he would ſcarſly beleeue that knoweth the manner of our war, there was in euery place great ſilence, & as a man may ſay, dumb quietneſſe; no brawling, no inſolencie, no not ſo much as a word or laugh-

A laughter paſſing in ſport or drunkenneſſe. Beſides that wonderfull cleanlines,no dunghils,no excrements that might offend either their eies or noſe,for all ſuch things the Turks do either bury or carry them far out of ſight. They themſelues ſo oft as they are inforced to diſcharge the burthen of nature,dig an hole with a ſpade and bury it, ſo is all their camp without filth.
There was not to be ſeen any drinking or feaſting,no dicing(the great ſhame of our wars) the loſſe of mony or time at cards and dice,the Turks know not.I met only with a rough Hungarian and his companion,a ſoldier, who heauy himſelf, to the Lute rather houled than ſung a doleful ditty,containing the laſt words of a fellow of his dying of his wounds vpon the green banke of Danubius ; wherein he requeſteth the riuer,becauſe it ran to the place where he was born,to carry news to his friends and countrymen,that he died an honorable death,and not vnreuenged, B for the increaſe of his religion,and honor of his country:wherunto his fellows ſighing, bare a foot, O happy and thrice happy wight, would Fortune with thee change we might. For the Turks are of opinion, That no mens ſoules go more ſpeedily to heauen, than of ſuch valiant men as die in battell,for whoſe welfare their maidens daily make prayers and vowes. I would alſo needs go through their butchery, where their beaſts were killed, to ſee what fleſh was to be ſold ; where I ſaw but foure, or at moſt fiue weathers hanging ready dreſſed, and that was the butchery for the Ianizaries,which I deemed to be in that camp not fewer than foure thouſand.
I maruelled that ſo little fleſh ſhould ſuffice ſo many men:but I was anſwered, That few of them did eat fleſh, for the moſt part of them had their victuals tranſported from Conſtantinople.
Then I demanding what it was,they ſhewed me a Ianizarie ſitting by,who in an earthen C diſh had pilled a turnep,an onion,a head of garlick,a parſnep,and a cucumber, all ſauced with ſalt & vineger,or more truly to ſay,with hunger;whereon he fed as ſauorly,as if they had bin feaſants or partridges:his drink was the common drinke of all liuing creatures,euen faire water.By which frugall kind of diet,they prouide both for the health of their bodies,and the ſparing of their purſe:and that I maruelled the more at,it was the time that their great faſt, or to ſpeake after our faſhion,their Lent was at hand : at which time with vs Chriſtians, euen in well ordered cities,much more in camps,all rings with playing,dancing,ſinging,crying,quaffing, carouſing,and in briefe,with madding & phrenſie.So that it is not vainly reported, That a Turke ſent about that time Embaſſador into Germany,comming home,reported, That the Chriſtians on certain daies did ryot, and became mad,vntill they,beſprinkled with a certain D kind of aſhes in the Church, came to themſelues againe,and ſo recouered ; and that it was a wonderful thing to ſee,how much they were changed by the efficacy of that remedy,that they ſeemed not to be the ſame men : meaning indeed the diſordered manner of the Chriſtians at Shrouetide, and the Ceremonies vſed on Aſhwedneſday:Which thing they to whom it was told, ſo much the more maruelled at, for that the Turks haue many medicines which cauſe madnes,but few or none which preſently eaſeth the ſame. And they vpon thoſe daies that go before their great faſts,change nothing of their wonted maner of life to the worſe:but rather contrariwiſe prepare themſelues to abſtinence, by taking ſomwhat from their vſuall fare, the better to endure the ſudden change of their faſt:which they ſo preciſely obſerue,that on their faſting daies they will not ſo much as taſt a cup of water,or waſh their mouths with water all E the day long,before the ſtars appeare in the ſky:which maketh their faſts, eſpecially in Summer when the daies be long and hot,to be vnto them very tedious.

The opinion the Turks haue of them that die in their wars.

Whiles I thus lay in the camp,there came vnto me one Albertus a learned man with certain Preſents from the emperor to Solyman,which were certain gilt plate;and a moſt curious clock, which was carried vpon an Elephant like a caſtle;and ſome crowns to be diſperſed among the Baſſaes : which Solyman would needs haue preſented to him in the campe in the ſight of the whole army,to make it the better known what friendſhip was between him and the Emperor, and that he needed not to feare any danger from the Chriſtian Princes.

Preſents ſent from the Emperor Ferdinand to Solyman.

But to returne againe to Bajazet,from whom we haue a while digreſſed : he after the battel at Iconium,had retired himſelfe to Amaſia,the place of his gouernment,as though he would F haue now there quietly liued,if his father would ſo giue him leaue. He had now ſatisfied his youthfull deſires & griefe, and ſeemed willing from thenceforth to ſatisfie his fathers better expectation:and therfore ceaſed not by letters & fit men to proue his fathers minde. Neither did Solyman ſhew himſelf ſtrange from ſuch a reconciliation:at firſt he eaſily gaue the meſſengers audience,read his ſons letters,& courteouſly returned anſwer ; ſo that it was commonly reported

reported in the camp, that the father & the ſon would agree, and that the old man would pardon the youthfull pranke already paſt, ſo that he would from thenceforth remaine dutifull. But all this was by the counſel of the Baſſa's, nothing but deep diſſimulation in the crafty old ſire, vntill he had ſhut vp Bajazet, and ſo got him aliue into his hand: for it was feared, leſt he deſpairing of pardon, ſhould with ſuch a power break into the borders of Perſia (now the only place left for his refuge) as might preuent the watchfull diligence of his lieutenants vpon thoſe frontiers: whom Solyman charged by continuall letters ſo to ſtop all the paſſages into Perſia, as that there ſhould not be any crany for Bajazet to fly out by. In the mean time, if any came within his reach that were ſuſpected to haue taken part with Bajazet, or fauored his proceedings, thoſe he cauſed to be tortured & ſecretly made away, and among them ſome whom Bajazet had of purpoſe ſent to excuſe themſelues. For Solyman fearing leſt Tamas the Perſian King (more mindfull of his old quarrels than of the late inforced peace) ſhould hardly with much ado ſuffer his ſon to be got out of his hands if he ſhould fly thither, and ſo again raiſe a long & dangerous war; did therfore what he poſſibly might to oppreſſe him before he ſhould come thither. Which his purpoſe although it was couered with al ſecrecy, yet was it not hidden from ſome of Bajazet his friends, by whom he was oftentimes warned not to truſt his father, but to beware of treaſon, and in any caſe ſpeedily to prouide for his owne ſafety. But Solyman thinking he had now ſo prouided as that he could by no means eſcape, and happily the more to deceiue his ſon, appointed to return with his army to Conſtantinople the day after their Eaſter day. But Bajazet vpon the very feaſt day, hauing performed the ſolemnities therof, commanded al things to be truſſed vp at Amaſia, and ſo ſet forward vpon his vnfortunat journy towards Perſia; knowing right wel that he went to the antient enemy of the Othoman family, but yet fully reſoluing to proue any mans mercy, rather than to fall into the hands of his angry father. Now were they all ſet forward, except ſuch weak ſouls as were not thought able to endure the labor of ſo long a journy: among whom was left Solyman, Bajazets yongeſt ſon, but then newly born; which guiltleſſe babe with his mother Bajazet thought better to leaue to the mercy of his grandfather, than to take him with him, a poor companion of his wofull and miſerable flight; whom Solyman, as yet vncertain of his fathers fortune, commaunded to be nurſed at Pruſa. Baiazet ſo gon from Amaſia, vſed ſuch celerity in his trauell, that almoſt in euery place he preuented the fame of his comming, and lighted vpon many that were appointed to ſtay his paſſage, before they were aware of him. The Baſſa of Sebaſtia he thus deceiued: There was two waies, wherof one of them being intercepted, would greatly hinder his journy, and that the Baſſa had already taken. Wherfore he ſent certain as if they had bin fugitiues, to tel the Baſſa that he was already gon the other way. Which the Baſſa beleeuing, left the place he had before taken, and riſing with all his power ſpeedily to purſue him the other way, whereby it was told him that he was gon, left that way free and open for him to paſſe by.

The Baſſa of Erzirum he alſo deceiued by another not much vnlike ſhift. From whome when he was not far diſtant, and knowing that in paſſing his Country he was to indure great danger, he ſet vpon him with a wyle, ſending vnto him certain of his followers with commendations: who afterwards lamentably complaining of the yong princes calamity, to moue the Baſſa to pitty, at laſt requeſted that he would giue him leaue to ſhoo his horſes in his territorie; telling him that he came vnprouided of all things, and therefore was deſirous in that fruitful country to refreſh his horſes a day or two, and to new ſhoo them. Wherunto the Baſſa curteouſly anſwered, That he would not let him to take whatſoeuer he needed. But whether it was for the compaſſion that he had vpon the ſtate of Bajazet, or for the ſecret loue he bare him, or that he thought by that means the eaſilier to intrap him, is vncertain; and haply preuented by Bajazets quick ſpeed, had not as yet ſufficient time to draw his ſoldiers together. He ſent alſo to Bajazet certain ſmal preſents, ſeeming to be glad of his welfare and comming. Who neuertheles kept on his way, reſting no part of the day, and but a little of the night. The Baſſa of Erzirum vnderſtanding that Bajazet came ſtil on, made what haſt he could alſo, and ioyned his power with the reſt of the Baſſa's which followed after: for many Baſſa's & Sanzacks hearing that Bajazet was fled from Amaſia, purſued faſt after him, being charged by Solyman, vpon pain of their heads to bring him back either aliue or dead: but all in vain, by reaſon of his ſpeedy departure, & for that he made more haſt to fly, than they did to follow. Yet it coſt no

A man dearer than this Baſſa of Erzirum of whom we haue now ſpoken, whom Solyman for this cauſe diſplaced and Selymus afterwards ſlew, with two of his ſons young ſtriplings, whom hee before in deſpight ſhamefully abuſed againſt nature. Yea Selymus himſelf and Mahomet the great Baſſa, with the Beglerbeg of Grecia, followed alſo after Bajazet, though it were afar off.
This his departure grieued Solyman aboue meaſure, aſſuring himſelf (as the truth was) that he was fled into Perſia: wherwith he was ſo much moued, that he could ſcarſly contain himſelfe, but would needs haue gon with his whole power in all haſt againſt the Perſian, to haue terrified him at hand from relieuing his rebellious ſon. But theſe his raging fits his graue Counſellors moderated, by declaring vnto him what danger he ſhould aduenture himſelf vnto, by reaſon of the doubtfull faith of his beſt ſoldiers: and what if Bajazet (as he was a deſperat and B ſudden man) ſhould in the mean time turn about aboue Pontus and the fens of Mœtis, and ſo fetching a compas come to Conſtantinople, and proclaiming a general liberty in his abſence poſſeſſe himſelf of the empire. By which wholeſome perſuaſion Solyman ſtaid his ſo haſty a journy. But Bajazet all the way as he went writ on the gates & dores, that he would giue double pay to all ſuch as ſhould follow him: which cauſed Solymans captains to haue their owne ſoldiers in diſtruſt, and the more, for that they might oftentimes hear among them ſpeeches of great good wil and loue toward Bajazet.

Bajazet hardly purſued.

After long flying, he was at length come to the riuer Araxis, which ſeparates the Turkiſh kingdom from the Perſian: which hauing paſſed ouer, and yet not ſo in ſafety, he left certaine of his followers vpon the bank of the riuer, to keep the Sanzacks (who ſtill eagerly purſued C him) from paſſing ouer. Whom the Sanzacks eaſily repulſed, and ſo paſſing the riuer, entred a great way into the Perſian kingdom, vntil ſuch time as they were met by certain of the Nobility of Perſia with great troups of horſmen; who demanding what they meant, by that their purſuit, and what they ſought for in another mans kingdom, were anſwerd by the Turks, that they purſued their kings fugitiue ſon. To whom the Perſians replied, That they did not wel, contrary to the league with their lord & maſter, to come in arms beyond the bounds of their own kingdom: and that there was a ſtrong league betwixt king Tamas and Solyman, which it behooued them to regard. As for Bajazet, their king would conſider what was conuenient for him to do, and not in that point forget himſelf: in the mean time they ſhould doe well to get them out of that country wherin they had nothing to do. Wherupon the Turkes forthwith D left this purſuit and departed.

But by and by came meſſengers from the Perſian king to Bajazet, to ſalute him, and to demand the cauſe of his comming, and alſo to ſee what ſtrength he brought with him, which as ſome account was about 20000. To whom Bajazet declared, That he by his brothers injurie & fathers hard dealing driuen out of his country, was fled vnto the ſacred majeſty of the Perſian king, as his moſt aſſured refuge; who as he wel hoped, in compaſſion of mans inſtability, would not reject him ſo diſtreſſed, and otherwiſe deſtitute of all help. Wherunto the Perſian anſwered, That he had don very vnwiſely to come to him that was in league and amity with his father; whereof one Condition was, That they ſhould account the enemies of the one the enemies of the other, and the friends of the one, the friends of the other. Which Law to E break he counted a thing vtterly vnlawful. Neuertheles ſeeing the matter was ſo fallen out, he was welcom as vnto his friend, who in his behalf would leaue nothing vnattempted to reconcile him to his father, which he diſpaired not to bring to paſſe. So Bajazet meeteth with the Perſian king, but in an euill houre, although at their firſt greeting there was great welcome, friendly countenance, chearfull lookes, mutuall kindnes, often conference, and great feaſting one of another: things wherby the ſecret thoughts of hollow hearts are beſt concealed. There was alſo a motion made of a ſtreiter bond of allyance, and one of the Perſian kings daughters promiſed to Orchanes one of Bajazets ſons; and he put in hope that the Perſian king would neuer reſt in quiet vntill Solyman had made him Gouernour either of Meſopotamia, Babylon, or Erzirum (which gouernments were by the Perſians greatly extolled) and that he might there F liue without fear of his brother, far from him and his father alſo: where if any thing ſhould fal out otherwiſe than well, he might haue his brother the Perſian King as a ſure refuge to retire vnto, and ſo ſafe from all danger. Which ſpeeches were haply giuen out of purpoſe to auert Bajazet his thoughts from the feeling of the preſent danger. Who ſeemed vnto himſelf ſo aſſured of the loue and friendſhip of Tamas the Perſian King, that at ſuch time as hee ſent his Embaſſadors to Conſtantinople, for a reconciliation to be made betwixt Solyman & him, G (as was commonly ſuppoſed) he willed the ſame Embaſſadour to tel his father, that he had loſt a father at Conſtantinople, and found another in Perſia. But whether the Perſian dealt ſincerely in this behalf for Bajazet by his Embaſſadors, which were many, may well be doubted.

Like it was, that there was more feined ſhew of double diligence, than of any true meaning therin; and rather to feel Solymans mind, than to do the poor diſtreſſed Prince any good: and the rather, for that in the mean time all things were ſeriouſly plotted that might tend to his deſtruction. Which were no ſooner grown to their full ripenes, but there was of purpoſe a motion made, That ſuch a multitude as followed this yong prince lay ſo cloſe together, that there was not in one place victual ſufficient for them: and that it was therſore more conuenient to haue them billeted in the country therabout; which would be more commodious as H Tamas in feare of Bajazet. well for the better victualling of them, as for diuers other purpoſes alſo. Truth was, that Tamas the Perſian King, far vnlike his noble father Iſmael, ſtood in doubt leſt he brought vp a ſerpent in his boſom. Yet there were many which thought, that it was not the Perſians minde at firſt to haue deſtroyed Bajazet, but to haue bin therunto inforced by the practiſe of ſome of his familiars and followers: who not regarding the curteſie of the Perſian king, nor the laws of hoſpitalitie, perſuaded Bajazet to thruſt him out of his kingdom. Wherof there was many euident tokens; and among other things it was told King Tamas, that one of Bajazets chiefeſt Captains ſhould ſay, What mean we? why ſtay we to kil this heretical King, and to poſſeſſe his kingdom? for we ſhal no doubt by his trechery all come to deſtruction. And that vpon ſuch occaſion the King was conſtrained to condiſcend to a deuiſe more neceſſary than honorable. I Bajazet had no great power, but moſt of them were valiant men, and ſouldiers of great experience, ready to aduenture vpon any thing; of whom the Perſian not without cauſe ſtood in ſome fear. He knew his kingdom to be neither antient, nor yet wel aſſured, as gotten by his father by a counterfeit ſhew of a reformed religion: and who could aſſure him, but that among ſo many Nations ouer whom he lorded, but that there were many weary of the preſent ſtate, and ſo deſired nouelties? vnto whom nothing could chance more fitting than the comming of Bajazet, a noble and valiant yong gentleman, and that more was, deſperatly ſet: and as yet he himſelf might of right rather ſeem in the power of his gueſt, than hee in his; and that therfore he was to alter the matter, and not longer to entertain him as his gueſt, but to coupe him vp as a moſt dangerous wild beaſt: which to do, the eaſieſt way was to diſperſe his power, K and ſo to take him vnawares. For that he could not without much bloudſhed be openly taken in the middeſt of his ſtrength, eſpecially by the dainty Perſian, of long time not vſed to War, and as yet not come together; againſt Baiazets ſoldiers, men of great actiuity and experience.
So was the matter cunningly imparted to him for the diſperſing of his ſouldiers, & all the commodities to inſue therof alledged. Which Bajazet might not wel gainſay, although many of his wiſe followers (men of great reach) did ſhrewdly ſuſpect the ſequell. But what could he refuſe, vpon whom neceſſity lay ſo heauy; where no hope was left; where hee liued as it pleaſed another man; and that again too, where once to doubt of the fidelity of his hoſt might be imputed to him for the greateſt trechery. So theſe moſt valiant ſouldiers, the poor grief, as many report, taken as he was ſitting merrily at dinner at the kings table. The Perſian king ſeemed to haue foreſeen much in this his hard dealing with Bajazet: as that if he, being a valiant and couragious yong prince, and much better ſoldier than his brother, ſhould haue ſucceeded his father in the empire, much trouble and peril might haue growne thereby both to himſelf and his kingdome: and that it ſtood farre better with the ſafety of his eſtate that Selymus (a man wholly giuen to voluptuouſnes and eaſe) ſhould reign ouer the Turks: in M whoſe time he might as it were promiſe vnto himſelf all peace and ſecurity. And therefore it was thought that he would neuer let Bajazet go aliue out of his hand, but rather make him away in priſon, as if he had there died for melancholy and grief. Well he was aſſured, that after he had ſlain his Followers, and impriſoned himſelfe and his ſonnes, hee would neuer bee

A friends with him that had ſo notably wronged him. Bajazet thus ſhamefully impriſoned, meſſengers ran continually too and fro betwixt the two old Princes Solyman and Tamas. Amongſt the reſt, the Perſian King ſent a ſolemne Embaſſadour vnto the Turke with Preſents, namely, curious tents, coſtly carpets, an Alcoran containing the miſteries of their ſuperſtition, and certaine ſtrange beaſts. The cauſe of his comming was pretended to be for a reconciliation to be made betweene Solyman and his Sonne; which Embaſſador was honourably entertained and feaſted by his great Baſſa's. Now was poore Bajazet in ſmall hope of life, his cruell father ſtill crauing to haue him deliuered into his hands to be ſlain: and the Perſian yet denying to deliuer him, and ſeeming to defend him, but not (as was thought) altogether faithfully. Solyman left no means vnattempted to haue wrung him from the Perſian; ſomtimes he ſpake him faire, B putting him in mind of his league, wherein it was agreed, That they ſhould both haue the ſame friends and the ſame enemies: otherwhile he terrified him with great words, and denouncing of war, except he would deliuer him his ſonne: he furniſhed with ſtrong garriſons all the frontiers of his dominion towards Perſia; he filled all Meſopotamia and the bankes of the riuer Euphrates with ſouldiers, eſpecially with them of his owne guard, and ſuch as he had before vſed in the battell againſt Bajazet; ouer whom commanded Mehemet Baſſa the third of the Viſier Baſſa's, and Selymus the Beglerbeg of Græce (for Selymus was ſoone weary of the field, and ſo betime returned home:) he alſo incited the Georgian people to take vp armes againſt the Perſians: who wiſely anſwered, That they had not ſuch confidence in their own ſtrength, as to prouoke King Tamas; but let Solyman himſelfe come with his army, and whey they ſaw C him preſent in the field, then they knew what they had to do, and that he ſhould then well ſee that they wanted neither diſcretion nor valour. And becauſe he would leaue nothing vnproued, he made ſhew as if he would in perſon himſelfe haue gone to Aleppo in Syria, and ſo haue on that ſide inuaded the Perſian: neither was the Perſian King altogether out of feare, hauing to his coſt many times proued what Solyman was able to do. But the vnwillingneſſe of the ſouldiers, and their minds altogether eſtranged from that war, eaſily ſtaied the raging Turke: they deteſted that war, and forſooke their enſignes, a great number of whom (eſpecially horſemen) without leaue of their Captains returned to Conſtantinople: and being commanded againe to the campe, went indeed, but with ſuch countenance and cheere as well declared how they were affected, and what they would do if occaſion ſerued for them to reuolt.

The Perſiā king ſendeth Embaſſadors with preſēts to Solymā.

D For which cauſe, after that Solyman perceiued that Bajazet could not aliue be got from the Perſian (excuſing himſelfe by feare of reuenge by him whom he had ſo grieuouſly offended, if he ſhould by any meanes eſcape) he thought it beſt to follow that which was next, and to haue him there ſlaine; which he was in good hope to compaſſe, and the rather, for that the Perſian had but lately written vnto him, That he could not but much maruell to ſee him deale ſo ſlenderly in a matter of ſo great importance: That he on his part had ſent him diuers embaſſadors; & that he on the other ſide had ſent him nothing but common meſſengers with papers, which cauſed him to thinke that he made no great account of the matter: wherefore he ſhould doe well to ſend vnto him men of account and place, with whom he might confer and conclude alſo according to the weightineſſe and exigence of the cauſe: beſides that, he was (as he ſaid) E not a little in his debt, for that Bajazet and his followers had beene vnto him no ſmall charge before he could get him into his power: all which it was good reaſon he ſhould haue conſideration of. Whereby Solyman perceiued, that mony was the thing the Perſian King ſought after; and therfore rather than he would in an vnfit time of his life intangle himſelfe in a dangerous and vnneceſſary war, he determined by the counſell of his Baſſa's, rather with money than with the ſword to fight with the Perſian king. Hereupon was Haſſan Aga (one of the chief gentlemen of his chamber) appointed embaſſador into Perſia, with whom was joined the Baſſa of Maras, a man both for his age and place, reuerend: who departing with a large commiſſion almoſt in the depth of Winter, with great ſpeed and wonderfull toile by thoſe long and difficult waies, arriued at laſt at Caſbin the ſeat of the Perſian King, hauing by the way loſt diuers F of their ſeruants & followers. Being come to the Court, the firſt thing they deſired was to ſee Bajazet, whom they found ſhut vp in a cloſe priſon, pale and wan as a man forlorne, with his haire and beard ſo long and ouergrowne, as that he was not to be knowne before he was new trimmed; which done, then appeared the liuely reſemblance of his wonted countenance and fauor, ſo that Haſſan very well knew him to be him: for he had been brought vp with him of a childe in the Court, and for this cauſe eſpecially had Solyman ſent him thither to be aſſured G that it was he. At length after long diſcourſe and conferance betweene the King and the Embaſſadors, it was agreed vpon, that the king ſhould receiue from Solyman full recompence of all the charges he had been at, and of the harmes by him ſuſtained ſince the comming of Bajazet into Perſia, with ſuch further reward as ſo great a good turne deſerued: which things performed, that then it ſhould be in Solymans power to haue Bajazet made away. With this news Haſſan poſteth to his maſter at Conſtantinople, who forthwith cauſed the promiſed reward, together with ſuch charges as the Perſian King demanded, to be made ready, and with a ſafe conuoy to be ſent vnto the borders of Perſia, where they were of the Perſians receiued. Preſently after returned Haſſan the appointed executioner of the vnfortunat Bajazet: for ſo Solyman had ſtreitly charged him to ſtrangle him with his owne hands. Which thing this new made hangman H accordingly performed, and with a bow-ſtring ſtrangled the vnfortunate Prince; who is reported to haue requeſted of the executioner, that he might but ſee his chilnren before he died, and take of them his laſt farewell: which poore requeſt could not be granted, but he forthwith commanded to die. This was the wofull end of the vnlucky attempts of Bajazet, a Prince of far more worth than was Selymus his brother, who in ſeeking to ſhun the death he feared, haſted the ſame before his time. Such as was the fathers end was alſo the end of his foure ſons, Omer, Amurat, Selym, and Muhomet: of whom the three eldeſt were ſtrangled at Caſbin with their father, whoſe dead bodies together with his, were ſolemnly brought to Sebaſtia, and there buried. The yongeſt but new borne left at Amaſia, and ſent by his grandfather to Pruſa (as is before ſaid) to be there nurſed, was now vpon the death of his father commanded I by his ſaid grandfather to be ſtrangled alſo. The Eunuch ſent by Solyman to haue done the deed, and loth to do it himſelfe, tooke with him one of the porters of the Court, a deſperat and otherwiſe a hard hearted Ruffian, a man thought fit to haue performed any villany: he comming into the chamber where the childe lay, and fitting the bow-ſtring to the childes necke to haue ſtrengled him, the innocent babe ſmiled vpon him, and lifting it ſelfe vp as well as it could, with open armes offered to haue imbraced the villaine about the necke and kiſſed him. Which guiltleſſe ſimplicity ſo wounded the ſtony hearted man, that he was not able to perfomre the intended butchery of the poore ſimple child, but fel down in a ſwoune and there lay for dead. The Eunuch ſtanding without the doore maruelling at his long ſtay, goes in, & finding the ruffian lying along vpon the ground, with cruell hand performed that the other K could not find in his heart to do, and ſo ſtrangled the guiltleſſe childe as had bin giuen him in charge. Whereby it euidently appeared, that it was not the mercy or compaſſion of Solyman that ſo long cauſed the guiltleſſe infant to be ſpared, but rather the opinion generally receiued amongſt the Turks, who meaſuring all things by the good or bad ſucceſſe, referre all things that fall out well, vnto God as the author thereof, be they neuer ſo vngratiouſly begun: and therfore ſo long as it was yet vncertain what ſucceſſe the attempts of Bajazet would haue, Solyman ſpared the infant, leſt vpon his fathers good hap he might ſeem to haue ſtriuen againſt the will of God. But now that his father was dead, and his quarrel by the euill ſucceſſe therof condemned as it were by the ſentence of the Almighty, he thought it not good longer to ſuffer him to liue, leſt of an euill Bird might come an euill Chicke. I had ſometime (ſaith the L reporter of this Hiſtory) great reaſoning with my Chiaus about this matter: for falling into talke with him of Bajazet, he began bitterly to enuigh againſt him for taking vp armes againſt his brother. Wherunto (ſaith this Author) I replied, That in my opinion he was worthy both to be pittied and pardoned, for as much as he was of neceſſity inforced either to take vp arms, or elſe ſhortly after to yeeld himſelfe to the ſlaughter. But he ſtill exclaiming againſt him, I ſaid vnto him, You blame poore Bajazet of great wickedneſſe for bearing armes againſt his brother: but Selymus, Solymans father you blame not, who vpon like occaſion tooke vp armes both againſt his father and his brethren; yet he therin did nothing amiſſe, nor in your judgement blame worthy. And rightly, (ſaith the Chiaus) for the euent of the matter ſheweth ſufficiently, that that which he did was done by the appointment of God, and that he was from M Heauen predeſtinated thereunto: whereas in Bajazet the euent ſheweth the cleane contrary.

So that which falleth out well, be it by neuer ſo wicked means compaſſed or brought to paſſe, they take it as done according to the will of God; but if it fall otherwiſe, the judge it as a thing condemned by God himſelfe; depending wholly vpon the good or bad euent of things,

A things, and therefore judging them to be well done, or otherwiſe.

Charles the emperor reſigneth the Empire to his brother Ferdinand, and ſhortly after dieth.

This yeare 1558, Charles the fifth that noble Emperor (of whom we haue in the courſe of this Hiſtory ſo often ſpoken) who weary of the World, had two yeares before deliuered all his hereditary kingdomes and principalities to his ſon Philip, did now the 24 of February, on which day he was borne, by his Embaſſadors ſolemnly ſent for that purpoſe, reſigne that Empire with all the honors and titles thereof vnto his brother King Ferdinand, requeſting the Princes Electors to confirme the ſame vnto him, which they did the thirteenth of March next following. So liuing as a priuat gentleman in that ſolitary life whereunto he had to the wonder of the World certaine yeares before retired himſelfe from all worldly affaires, the 21 day of September following died of a feauer, when he had liued 58 yeares, and thereof reigned B 39: a man no doubt to be worthily accounted amongſt the greateſt Chriſtian Emperors that liued before him. About which time died alſo his two ſiſters, Mary the Queene of Hungary, and Elenor the French Queene, both Ladies of great honour.

The Chriſtian Princes ſet out a fleet for the recouery of Tripolis in Barbary.

The Knights of Malta, who of long had beene ſuters to the great Biſhop and the King of Spaine, for the recouery of Tripolis in Barbary, about nine yeares before taken from them by the Turks; at which time they alſo ſurpriſed the Iſland of Zerbi vpon the coaſt of Barbary betwixt Tripolis and Tunes, from whence they much troubled the Chriſtians trauelling by thoſe ſeas: had now at length ſo much preuailed, that the King commanded a great fleet to be now forthwith made ready in September in the yeare 1559, to meet together in Sicilia, and from thence to go directly againſt the enemy by Malta. Vnto which fleet, the great Biſhop, C the Duke of Florence, and the Knights of Malta, with many other valiant men out of diuers parts of Chriſtendome, joyned their forces alſo; ſo that at length there was a hundred gallies and ſhips met together vnder the conduct of Andreas Gonzaga the Generall. But whilſt this fleet from diuers places was long in comming thither, the Duke of Medina Cœli came before with part of the fleet to Malta, and in the hauen of Marza Moxet expected the comming of the reſt, who about the end of the yeare came thither. But whileſt they were wintered expecting the Spring, many of the ſouldiers fell ſicke and died. At length the time of the yeare fit for their ſetting forward being come, the Captaines conſulted among themſelues, Whether they ſhould firſt ſet vpon Tripolis, or the Iſland of Zerbi, otherwiſe called Mening. The Knights of Malta being of opinion, that it were better firſt to beſiege Tripolis, and that D with all ſpeed, before Dragut ſhould come thither to furniſh it with ſouldiers and prouiſion. Others thought it better firſt to inuade the Iſland of Zerbi, where the army might be relieued with plenty of all things neceſſary, and from whence they might at all times of danger in ſafety retire; and from thence afterwards as time ſhould ſerue, to go to Tripolis. Which vnfortunate counſell was by the greater part agreed vpon. Wherefore in February the yeare following they departed from Malta, and ſailed directly to Zerbi. In the meane time Dragut the moſt famous pyrat at that time amongſt the Turks, and Gouernor of Tripolis, was come thither with eight hundred of the Turks Ianizaries, and had notably ſtrengthned the city with men, victual, and new fortifications; and preſently ſent meſſengers to Solyman at Conſtantinople, to certifie him of the arriual of the Chriſtian fleet in Affrick. But the Chriſtians comming E to the Iſland of Zerbi, were at the firſt landing encountered by the Moores, whom they repulſed and ſo at pleaſure landed. This Iſland is not far from the maine, here and there full of bogs and mariſhes, other riuer hath it none, and in the middeſt is ſomewhat hilly. It was inhabited with about 30000 men, which dwelt in low cottages, ſimply apparelled: yet is the Iſland reaſonable fertile, yeelding dates, oliues, barley, mill, and ſuch like. When the Chriſtians were there landed, they ſent for Carauanus a poore King amongſt the Moores (from whom Dragut had before taken that Iſland) to vſe his counſell for the better proceeding in that war. In the meane time they agreed with 8000 men to beſiege the ſtrongeſt caſtle in the Iſland: in going whereunto, the Spaniards went formoſt, the Germans next, and laſt of all the Italians. By the way as they went they light vpon 10000 Moores which lay in ambuſh in a wood, to haue F vpon the ſudden ſet vpon them vnawares; but being diſcouered, and 700 of them ſlain in skirmiſh by the Spaniards, the reſt fled. So comming to the caſtle they planted their battery, and laid hard ſiege vnto it. The Captaine of the caſtle finding himſelfe too weake long to hold out, fled ſecretly with his Turks, leauing the caſtle for the Moores to defend; who vpon condition that they might in ſafety depart, yeelded the Caſtle to the Spaniards: for keeping whereof, Varona and Cerda two Spaniſh Captains were there left with their companies. Whileſt G theſe things were in doing, Carauanus the Moore King came to the campe of the Chriſtians and there talked with the Generall; in whoſe hoary countenance reſted a reuerend Maieſty: his apparell was after the Moores faſhion of white linnen, with him came alſo the King of Tunes his ſon. In talking with the Generall his manner was to ſit flat vpon the ground, and wiſely diſcourſed how the Turks were to be remoued out of Affricke. But in the middeſt of theſe diſcourſes, when ſuch a thing was leaſt feared, ſuddenly a pinnace brought newes from ſea, That Piall Baſſa the Turks great Admiral was comming thither with a great fleet of eighty fiue gallies, and that mo were daily repairing vnto him on euery ſide. Which was indeed true: for Solyman vnderſtanding from Dragut the Arch-pyrat, that Iſland to be by the Chriſtians now poſſeſſed and fortified, thought it not (in his ſo great power & flouriſhing eſtate) to ſtand H with his honor to ſuffer, but rather to giue aid vnto the Moores of that Iſland, a people agreeing in religion with himſelfe: and therfore commanded Piall Baſſa his Admiral to take in hand that expedition. Who therupon rigged vp a great fleet wel appointed & ſtrongly manned with a number of the Turks beſt and moſt approued ſouldiers, as well Ianizaries as others: yet all both doubtfull and fearefull of the long journey, as alſo the fame of the enemies with whom they were to incounter: for why, the Turks had conceiued a great opinion of the valour of the Spaniards, as knowing great wars both of antient and later times to haue been by that nation (to the immortall praiſe therof) moſt happily performed: they remembred Charles the fift, and daily heard much of King Philip, the heire both of his fathers vertues and kingdomes; which made them ſo careful, that many of them before their ſetting forth (as in times of greateſt dander) I made their wils, and ſo departed from Conſtantinople, taking their leaue of their friends, as if they ſhould neuer haue thither returned again. So that all the city was in a confuſed feare:

neither was there any man, whether he went or ſtaid, that hung not in ſuſpence with the doubtfull expectation of the euent of that war. Howbeit Piall with his great fleet, with long ſailing and a proſperous wind was at length come welneere as far as Malta, and knowledge thereof (as aforeſaid) giuen vnto the Chriſtian fleet at Zerbi. With which vnexpected news the Chriſtians there were not a little troubled: neuertheleſſe they fortified the caſtle with new fortifications and bulwarks, and fell to agreement with the principall man amongſt the Moores of the Iſland, who commanded the reſt, and had before pluckt downe the enſignes of Dragut, and ſet vp the King of Spaines) that he would yearely pay vnto the King of Spaine (as he had before K vnto Dragut) ſix thouſand crownes, one camel, foure Oſtriches, foure Sparrow-hawkes, and foure blew Faulcons: a tribute fit for ſuch an Iſland.

Piall Baſſa Solymans Admirall ſent to remoue the Chriſtians out of Zerbi.

But ſhortly after, viz. the ninth of May, the Great maſter of Malta by another pinnace gaue the Chriſtians at Zerbi again to vnderſtand, That the Turks fleet was euen now at hand, and already departed from the Iſland of Gozo, well appointed and ſtrongly manned: and that therefore he aduiſed them with ſpeed to hoiſe ſaile, & to get them to ſome place of more ſafety, or els to come to him to Malta, for feare of being by ſo great a power of the Turks ſuddenly oppreſſed.
Whereupon Iohn Andreas Auria the Admirall ſent vnto the Generall, requeſting him to come abord, that ſo they might before the comming of the Turks fleet, retire themſelues to ſome place of more aſſurance. But he for all that ſtaid ſtill at the caſtle, where the Chriſtians L had built foure ſtrong bulwarks: whereof they had named one Auria's, another Gonzaga's, the third the Viceroy's, and the fourth the Knights, not yet all perfectly finiſhed: as for the caſtle it ſelfe they called it Philip Alcazer, by the name of the King. But whileſt the Generall is thus buſie, and vainly hopeth to keepe both his caſtle and his ſhips, he the next day deſcrying from far the comming of the Turks great fleet, haſted with the Admirall to be gone: and putting twice at ſea, was both times by a contrary wind driuen againe into the hauen, ſo that he and the Admirall had much ado in time to get them into the caſtle: for the wind was ſo fauourable for the Turks, and brought them ſo faſt on, that the Chriſtians diſmaied with their ſudden comming, knew not well what to do, or which way to turne themſelues. But by good hap, the greater part of the ſhips and 14 gallies were got out and gone the night before, and the M Great Maſter had in Aprill called home his gallies, wherewith and ten others of his owne he afterwards defended the frontiers of his Iſland. As for the reſt of the fleet that ſtaied for the Generall and the Admirall, ſome few gallies eſcaped by flight, otherſome ran themſelues aground, ten of which were preſently taken by the Turks, as were the reſt alſo that were left, although

A although they for a while did what they might to haue ſaued themſelues. The night following, the Viceroy and the Admirall ſecretly ſtole out of the caſtle, and ſo by good fortune in two ſmall frigots fled to Malta. Caranamus alſo the Moore King, with the Prince of Tunes, got them away into the maine. Gonſaga the Viceroy departing from Malta to Sicilia, prouided as he might for the ſafety of that country. Auria in the mean time gathered together the remainder of the diſperſed fleet, hauing loſt in this vnfortunat expedition ſeuenty gallies, with a great part of the ſhips.

Now in the caſtle was left as Generall, Don Aluarus de Sandes, a valiant gentleman of great ſpirit and long experience, with fiue thouſand footmen, ſome Germans, ſome Italians, but for the moſt part Spaniards, beſides a thouſand other that were no ſoldiers. So that the Turks be-
B ginning to beſiege the ſame the ſeuenteenth of May, were by them many times notably encountered, and in their aſſaults repulſed. Vnto this ſiege at length came Dragut the pyrat, who with fifteene great pieces which he brought with him from Tripolis, encreaſed the fury of the Turks battery. Neither were the Chriſtians in the mean time wanting vnto themſelues, hauing in the caſtle forty great pieces of artillery, wherewith they ſlew a number of the Turks and Moores: and ſometimes ſallying out, fought with them hand to hand; and hauing ſlaine and wounded many, retired againe into the caſtle. In this manner the ſiege continued three moneths with many an hot and deſperat skirmiſh: during which time, nothing more troubled the defendants than thirſt in that hot & dry climat and intemperat time of the yere: for why, in the caſtle there was but one great ciſterne, which although it yeelded ſome good ſtore of water, yet was it not enough to ſuffice ſo great a multitude, but was by meaſure ſtill ſparingly C giuen out to the ſoldiers ſo far as it would ſerue, no man hauing more allowed him than would ſuffice to keep him aliue: the quantity whereof ſome augmented by diſtilling of the ſame water, and mingling it with their allowance, and ſo wel eaſed their thirſt, vntil ſuch time as hauing ſpent all their wood they wanted that poore helpe alſo. There might a man haue ſeene many poore ſoules lying vpon the ground halfe dead, gaping and ſtil crying out nothing but Water, water; into whoſe dry mouths, if any man vpon compaſſion vouchſafed to poure a little water, they as men reuiued therewith would preſently ſit vp, vntil that for thirſt they fell downe againe, and ſo at length as men roſted gaue vp the ghoſt. Thus many died daily, beſide them whom the chance of warre and other diſeaſes without helpe conſumed in ſo great a diſtreſſe.
D Don Aluarus the Gouernor conſidering the great extremity they were now brought vnto, attempted with Don Sanchius de Leyua Admirall of the Neapolitan gallies, Belingerius de Requeſenes Admirall of the Sicilian gallies, & ſome others, by night to haue eſcaped away into a gally which lay vnder the caſtle, but in doing thereof were perceiued by the Turks, and ſo all taken. Whereupon ſuch ſoldiers as ſickeneſſe and the enemies ſword had yet left aliue, pinched with extreame neceſſity, forſaken of their beſt captaines, and out of all hope of reliefe alſo, couenanting their liues only with the enemy, yeelded themſelues into moſt miſerable captiuity. In this vnfortunat expedition periſhed about eighteene thouſand Chriſtians, ſome with ſickneſſe, ſome drowned, but moſt ſlaine, beſide the loſſe of a great part of the fleet alſo.

The Caſtle of Zerbi yeelded vnto the Turks.

Of this victory Piall ſent news by one of his gallies to Conſtantinople, which for the more E manifeſting thereof, dragged at the poupe thereof a great enſigne of the Chriſtians, with the picture of Chriſt crucified therein. Which was no ſooner come into the hauen, but that the rumor of the ouerthrow of the Chriſtians was forthwith blowne thorow the whole city, the Turks exceedingly rejoycing one with another for the news of ſo great a victory: yea many of them not ſo contented, came by heaps to the gate of the houſe where the emperor Ferdinands embaſſador lay, & there meeting with his ſeruants, by way of deriſion asked them, if they had any brethren, kinſemen, or friends, in the Spaniſh fleet at Zerbi; for if you haue (ſaid they) you ſhall ſhortly ſee them here. Beſides that, they with many words moſt inſolently bragged of their own valor, & ſcorned the cowardiſe of the Chriſtians, asking who were able to withſtand them, now that the Spaniard was alſo ouercome. Al which with much more the embaſſadors F men with great griefe were inforced to heare, but there was no remedy, ſeeing God had ſo appointed it. Shortly after, in September, the victorious fleet returned to Conſtantinople, dragging with it the priſoners, ſpoiles, and gallies of the Chriſtians, a ſight no leſſe pleaſant vnto the Turks, than heauy vnto the Chriſtians: and that night it lay at anker neer vnto the rocks in the face of the city, with the greater pomp and glory to come the next day into the hauen. the Chriſtian captiues (before almoſt ſtarued with hunger) were brought to the court: many of whom could ſcarce ſtand vpon their legs; ſome others for weakenes fell down and fainted, and otherſome died out right: they were all ſcornefully led in triumph, with their armes diſordered and ſcornefully put vpon them: the Turks in the meane time inſulting round about them, promiſing vnto themſelues the Empire of the whole world: and vainly asking, What enemy they were to feare, now that the Spaniard was ouercome. Aluarus Sandes, as chiefe of al the priſoners, being brought into the Diuano before the Viſier Baſſa's, and demanded by Ruſtan Baſſa, What his maſter meant, being not able to defend his own, to inuade other mens? anſwered, That it beſeemed not him to judge theron; and himſelfe to haue done but his duty, with ſuch I faithfulnes as was meet to put in execution what he was commanded by his lord, although he had no good fortune therein. After that, he beſought the Baſſa's vpon his knee, to ſpeake for him vnto Solyman, for that he had at home a poore wife, with certain ſmall children, for whom he requeſted him to ſpare him. Wherunto Ruſtan Baſſa (contrary to his manner) courteouſly anſwered, his ſoueraigne to be of a mild and gentle nature, and that he was in good hope his pardon might be of him obtained: ſo was he commanded away vnto Caradines his caſtle, towards the blacke ſea. But he was not gone far, but that he was called backe againe, for that the great Chamberlain, a man in great credit with Solyman, had not as yet ſeen him: for which cauſe he was ſent for backe againe; wherwith he was not a little troubled, fearing leſt the Baſſa's hauing changed their minds, would haue put him to death. The reſt of the captiues of the better K ſort were committed to the caſtle of Pera, and amongſt them Don Sanchius de Leyua, with his two baſe ſonnes, and alſo Don Billingerius Requeſenes: which two great men, with Don Aluarus de Sandes, were neuertheleſſe afterwards with much ado and almoſt beyond all hope, at the requeſt of the Emperour, and by the dexterity of his Embaſſadour, by Solyman ſet at liberty; although he had before denied them vnto Saluiat the French Kings Embaſſador, who had bin an earneſt interceſſor for them. Yet before they were deliuered out of priſon, the Muphti or Turks great prieſt was asked his opinion, Whether it were lawfull, for a greater number of Turks to exchange a few Chriſtian captiues (for the Embaſſador beſide the rewards he had promiſed vnto the Baſſa's to further the matter, had alſo vndertaken, that forty common priſoners of the Turks ſhould be ſet at liberty for them) whereunto the Muphti anſwered, That the Doctors L of their law were of diuers opinions concerning that queſtion, ſome ſaying that it was lawfull, and ſome not; howbeit as then it was by him reſolued vpon vnto the more fauourable part, and the exchange allowed.

There were among the priſoners taken at Zerbi, beſides theſe noblemen of whom we haue before ſpoken, two other noble gentlemen right honourably borne, Don Iohn of Cardona, Don Billinger his ſon in law, and Don Gaſto the Duke of Medina his ſon, to whom yet but a youth his father neuertheleſſe had giuen an honourable place in the army. Of theſe two Don Iohn had wiſely taken order for a great ſumme of mony to be left in the Iſland of Chio, by the way as the Turks fleet went to Conſtantinople, from whence he afterward in ſafety got into Spaine.
But Gaſto was by Piall Baſſa (vpon hope of a great ranſome) purpoſely hid out of the way, M which had like to haue wrought his deſtruction: for Solyman hauing gotten an inckling therof by the inſtigation of Ruſtan, laboured for nothing more than to haue Gaſto found out, ſo to haue a more juſt occaſion for the putting of Piall to death, being taken tardy in ſo maniſeſt a fault. But all that labour was ſpent in vaine, Gaſto being by death taken away, but whether by

A the plague (as ſome report) or by Piall his meanes (as it were more like) leſt the truth ſhould be found out, is vncertaine. But certaine it was, that being with great care ſought for by the Duke his fathers ſeruants, he could neuer be heard of more: ſo that it was thought Piall for the ſafegard of his owne life, not to haue ſpared Gaſto his priſoners life. Who neuertheleſſe for a long time liued in great feare, and not daring to come to Conſtantinople, tooke occaſion with a few gallies to wander about amongſt the Iſlands of Ægeum, as if he had there ſomething to do: but indeed ſo ſhunning the ſight of his angry Lord, for feare he ſhould haue been compelled in bonds to haue anſwered the matter. Vntill at length he appeaſed at the requeſt of Suleiman Baſſa (the Eunuch and Solymans great Chamberlaine) and of Selymus, Solymans ſon, granted him his pardon in theſe words well worth the marking, out of the mouth of an Infidell B Prince: Well haue he from me pardon and forgiueneſſe for ſo great an offence: but let God the moſt iuſt reuenger of all villanies take of him due puniſhment after this life. So fully he ſeemed to be perſuaded that no euill deed ought to remaine without puniſhment, either in this life or in the life to come.

Piall in diſgrace with Solyman, ſhunneth to come to Conſtantinople.

There was in this expedition a Colonell of the Turks well acquainted with Busbequius the Emperors Embaſſador, then lying at Conſtantinople: into whoſe hands in that diſcomfiture of the Chriſtians, by chance was come the Imperiall enſigne of the gallies of Naples; wherein within the compaſſe of an Eagle, were contained the armes of all the Prouinces belonging to the kingdome of Spaine. Which faire enſigne the Embaſſador vnderſtanding him to purpoſe to giue for a Preſent vnto Solyman, thought good to preuent the matter, and to get it from him: which he eaſily obtained, by ſending him two ſutes of ſilke (ſuch as the Turks make C reckoning of) for it: ſo prouiding that one of the Imperiall enſignes of Charles the fift, ſhould not to the eternall remembrance of that ouerthrow, remaine ſtill with the enemies of the Chriſtian Religion. This ſo miſerable a calamity receiued by the Chriſtians at Zerbi, made that Iſland, before little or nothing ſpoken of, to be euer ſince famous.

One of the imperiall enſignes of Charles the fift redeemed from the Turke.

About this time to end this vnfortunat yeare withall, the 25 day of Nouember died Andreas Auria (that ſecond Neptune) being ninety foure yeares old: a man in his time of great fame, and of the greateſt Princes of that age had in no ſmall reputation, but eſpecially of Charles the fifth, in whoſe ſeruice he did much for the benefit of the Chriſtian commonweale, being for moſt part imploied in his greateſt wars againſt the Turks and Moores. Yet amongſt all the D notable things done to his immortall glory, the kindeneſſe by him ſhewed vnto his natiue country was greateſt; which oppreſſed by the French, he ſet at liberty: and when he might haue taken vpon him the ſole gouernment thereof (as had diuers others before him) moderating his deſires, and reſpecting the only good thereof, appeaſed the great diſſention that had of long reigned therein; and eſtabliſhed ſuch a forme of gouernment, confirmed with ſo good and wholeſome lawes and orders (no mans liberty infringed) as that it hath euer ſince to his eternall praiſe, in great wealth, ſtate, and liberty, thereby flouriſhed. Vnto whoſe remembrance (for that we haue before of him much ſpoken in the courſe of this Hiſtory) I thought it not amiſſe to ioyne the liuely counterfeit of his reuerend aged countenance, by nature framed anſwerable vnto his noble vertues.

The death of the noble Andreas Auria.

As Genoa did me beget, ſo I preſerv'd the ſame:
 And ſeruing vnder Charles the fifth, exalted haue my name.
A terrour to the Turks I was, I brought the pyrats low:
 And ſpoiling the Barbarian coaſt, made them my force to know.
Faire Tunes and ſtrong Aphrodiſe, both by my help were won:
 And Corone in Morea, by me was ouerrun.
So hauing ſpent ninety foure yeares in treading honours trace:
 Full fraught with honour and with yeares, I ended haue my race.

A great ſhipwracke.

Ferdinand the Emperour, hauing with long ſute and much intreating obtained peace of Solyman,

A lyman, and being now well ſtricken in yeares, and carefull both of the ſtate of the Empire and of the aduancement of his poſterity, began to deale with the Princes Electors for a choice to be made of a King of the Romans; who after his death might without the trouble of Germany, ſucceed him in the Empire: commending vnto them his ſon Maximilian, a Prince of great hope, then King of Bohemia. Whereupon an aſſembly of the Princes Electors was appointed to be holden at Franckford: who there meeting at the appointed time, with generall con-ſent the 24 day of Nouember in the yeare 1562, choſe Maximilian the Emperors ſon King of the Romans, and with all the accuſtomed ſolemnities crowned him: who alſo the yeare after was at Presburg the eight of September with much ſolemnity crowned King of Hungary.
Vnto this ſolemne aſſembly of the Empire at Franckford, Solyman the Turkiſh Emperor ſent B Ibrahim Baſſa, otherwiſe called Abraham Strozza (a Polonian borne, of whom we haue before ſpoken) his Embaſſador with preſents and letters to Ferdinand the Emperor, to confirme the peace for eight yeares betwixt them before concluded; who the ſeuenteenth day of Nouember in preſence of the Emperour, the King of the Romans, and all the Princes Electors, had audience: where after much glorious ſpeech in ſetting forth his maſters greatneſſe, with his loue towards the Emperour and his ſon the new choſen King, as wiſhing vnto them all happineſſe, he deliuered his letters of credence vnto the Emperor: the coppy wherof I haue not thought amiſſe here to ſet downe, for that therein is notably to be ſeene the moſt inſolent pride of that barbarous Prince, and miſerable eſtate of the rent kingdome of Hungary, diuided as it were at his pleaſure betwixt him and the Emperour.

Maximilian choſen King of the Romans, & after crowned King of Hungary.

Solyman by his embaſſador confirmeth a peace with Ferdinand the emperor for eight yeares.

bounds of Africa, whom God hath appointed a mighty warriour in the edge of the ſword: amongſt whoſe moſt mighty kingdomes the impregnable caſtle of Ceſaraa is reputed for the leaſt, and in whoſe heredita-henceforth for the whole ſpace of eight yeares ſhall be betwixt vs on both parts to be continued a new, true, and firme league: of which agreement, peace, and confederation, Theſe ſhall be the conditions. Firſt, That* F *you our beloued ſhall be bound to ſend yearely to our Court as a pledge of this league thirty thouſand Hun-Solymans proud Letters to the Emperor Ferdinand.

whether they be in the hither part of Hungary, or on the further ſide of Teiſſe: All which for all that, by law of armes belong vnto vs. And the ſame King Iohns ſonne in time of this eight yeares league ſhall G be alſo bound in ſuch ſort to performe vnto vs his obedience, as that from henceforth it ſhall not be lawfull for him to vſe any war or hoſtility againſt you, neither to trouble your ſubjects with fire or ſword, nor to ſurpriſe your Cities, Caſtles, or Townes; or by violence to take away or exact of your people or ſubjects, their ſheepe, their cattell, their goods, mony or reuenewes. We alſo our ſelues ſhall haue no right, nor take occaſion to driue away your people, to burne your countries, or carry away any captiues: but rather in this eight yeares ſpace religiouſly keepe peace and concord with you. And vnder theſe conditions of peace ſhall alſo be comprehended Michael Balaſcus, Nicholas Bathor, with all their goods and territories, and diuers other ſuch like, which ſhall be ſubject vnto you and King Iohns ſonne. To be briefe, if happily any of yours or King Iohns ſonnes ſubjects ſhall haue now before in time of warre thruſt one another out H of his goods, lands, or poſſeſſions, whereof new quarrels or diſcord may ariſe; We well and decree, that all ſuch controuerſies, quarrels, and claimes ſhall be deferred vntill this definite time of the league be expired.
Beſide, if by chance any diſſention ſhall hereafter ariſe betwixt vs about our juriſdiction, which can by no meanes be compoſed and ordered; We will that yours ſhall in the meane time remaine as yours, and ours as ours; all contention and enmity ſet apart: alſo many Townes ſcituate here and there by Danubius and Tatta, ſhall be ſuffered to vſe the ſame law they did in former time; ſo that the ſouldiers which are yet in garriſon in the Caſtle of Tatta, ſhall haue no right to infeſt or vexe thoſe townes ſcituate neere vnto Danubius. Furthermore, if after this peace concluded, any of your Noblemen or Gentlemen ſhall fortune to haue any of our Noblemen by reuolt or other occaſion whatſoeuer, captiues, they ſhall diſmiſſe them and ſet them at liberty, to returne vnto their friends freely without hurt or ranſome; that ſo the concord and peace begun betwixt vs, may be the more firmely kept, and our ſubjects liue in more ſecurity. All and I euery one of theſe things we grant and promiſe to be of vs from henceforth vntill the end of the aforeſaid eight yeares, without all fraud or guile religiouſly obſerued and kept: and for that purpoſe haue cauſed theſe our letters of this peace and confederation to be publiſhed from our royall pallace: and moreouer, haue not onely prouided, that the coppy of the ſame ſhould together with our edict be proclaimed to all and euery the Generalls, Captaines, Lieutenants, of our armies both by ſea and land, in all the parts of our Empire, and to all our mercenary ſouldiers, but haue alſo ſtreightly commanded, that it ſhall be firmely and ſincerely kept. We will alſo, that this agreement of peace and amity ſhall comprehend and concerne our two chiefe Gouernours or Voyuods of Valachia and Moldauia, ſo that none of your people of Hungary, Crabatia, Sclauonia, or other your Countries or Iſlands whatſoeuer, ſhall in any ſort be moleſted or grieued by our ſubjects. And if it ſhall fortune that ſome ſhall on your part out of their Caſtles ſet vpon our ſubjects, K or by force take away their goods, the ſame men ſhall in any caſe be bound to make thereof reſtitution.
Alſo if any ſhall fly from vs, and carry away with them the mony or goods of their Maſters whom they ſerued, or if the like ſhall be done by any of yours flying to vs, then the ſame goods on both parts are to be of right demanded and recouered againe, and the fugitiues to the example of others to be corrected and puniſhed: foraſmuch as fugitiues goods of right appertaine vnto their Lords and Maſters. Furthermore, it ſhall be lawfull for your Captaines and commanders to fortifie or build Caſtles, Cities, or Townes, in the borders of Hungary, and to put into the ſame victuall, armour, and ſuch like, but ſo, that they doe none of theſe things out of their owne limits. And during the time of this league, it ſhall not be lawfull to take or carry away any of your ſubjects priſoners either in Hungary or in other places of your juriſdiction: L which for all that, if it ſhall by any chance happen, that then ſuch captiues (without delay) be ſuffered ſafely to returne home againe. Furthermore, whatſoeuer Chriſtian ſhall haue any buſineſſe to do in our magnificent court or any part of our dominions, as are Embaſſadors, officers, ſeruants, and ſuch others: vnto all theſe we not only grant and permit, that they may come and goe about their buſineſſe, and ſo againe depart from our court or prouinces; but alſo haue willed and commanded, them to be well and courteouſly entreated by our ſubjects, and furthered with the interpretation of our language. And if it ſhall fortune any contention or diſcord to ariſe betwixt our ſubjects on either ſide, about the bounds and limits of Lands, or other ſuch like cauſes: ſuch controuerſies we will to be decided and determined by diſcreet and indifferent men on both parts, and the authors of ſuch diſcord and variance, to be puniſhed as ſuſpected perſons and breakers of the league. We alſo prohibite thoſe skirmiſhes or combats, which were wont to be ſometimes on both ſides made vpon the borders. And deſire, that the forme of this league and peace, and M euery article thereof, may be publikely read and ſet vp in ſundry places of your Dominions; and commandement giuen, that they may with due obedience and reuerence be obſerued and kept. Which we likewiſe haue

A haue now before promiſed faithfully and aſſuredly to performe: and your Embaſſador whom a few moneths agone you ſent vnto vs, in your name requeſting the ſame of vs, and hath with earneſt praiers moued vs, by Imperiall oath and theſe Letters of credence to witneſſe, that we did ratifie and confirme the ſame; as if we our ſelues ſhould ſpeake to you in preſence. Wherefore we haue giuen vnto him theſe our Letters of Pacification to you directed, that your Generals, ſouldiers, and ſubjects, may be bound alſo to obſerue and keepe all theſe things: wherefore, ſo long as nothing contrary to this league ſhall be done on your part; ſo long in like maner all theſe articles of peace ſhall be of me excepted and aſſured. For witneſſe & confirmation whereof I ſweare this oath; By the true and liuing Creator of heauen and earth, by the true ſignes of our great and reuerend Prophet, by my Imperiall power, and by my true faith; that nothing contrary or re-pugning vnto the aforeſaid articles, conditions, and promiſes of the eight yeares league agreed vpon be-B twixt vs, ſhall be attempted or done by any our Gouernors, Generals, or Voyuods, &c. Commanding more- ouer, all our ſworne Gouernors of our moſt mighty Empire in Valachia and Moldauia, and King Stephen himſelfe, and others which haue the Gouernment of our Empire confining vpon you, That they all and eue-ry of them as well as our ſelues, ſhall juſtly, faithfully, and religiouſly accept, reuerence, and keepe theſe conditions of peace, towards your ſubjects, cities, caſtles, townes, and other things appertaining to you; and in the leaſt things not to hurt, injury, or wrong any your ſubjects. In briefe, we ſhall as far as our part concerneth vs, giue vnto this moſt mighty and great new made loue and friendſhip; ſo great honour, reue-rence, and authority, that that which may euen in the leaſt things be had, ſhall not on our part be wanting.
In token whereof we haue ſuffered certaine Chriſtian captiues, whom by your Embaſſador you requeſted to haue ſet at liberty, franckely to returne vnto you without ranſome; out of which captiuity they could C neuer haue beene redeemed, if in regard of this our amity and friendſhip we had not granted them liber- ty: truſting that you will in like ſort ſet at liberty ſuch of ours as you haue captiues. Giuen at our Impe-riall Palace and ſeat in the moſt mighty City of Conſtantinople, the firſt day of September, in the yeare of our great and reuerend Prophet 969.

The ſame Embaſſador after he had deliuered theſe letters, preſented vnto the Emperor the gifts he had brought from his great Maſter: which was two great cups of naturall Cryſtall curiouſly wrought and ſet with ſtones of great price; a couragious Turky horſe with a ſaddle and trappings wrought with gold, and ſet with pretious ſtones, and garniſhed with chaines of pure gold; and foure of the faireſt camels that were to be got in all Conſtantinople. In deli-D uering of which Preſents the Baſſa made his excuſe, that the horſe and camels had loſt their beauty, being with foure moneths trauell from Conſtantinople, growne ſomewhat leane and weary.

Preſents from Solyman to the Emperour Ferdinand.

This peace thus concluded betwixt the Emperour Ferdinand and Solyman, held firme vntill the death of Ferdinand, who about two yeres after in the yere 1564 vpon S. Iames his day died, being ſixty yeres old: whereof he reigned as Emperor not full ſeuen yeares. In whoſe place ſucceeded Maximilian his ſon, before choſen King of the Romans. But immediatly after the death of Ferdinand, the Captaines on the frontiers of that part of Hungary which was holden for the Emperour on the one ſide, and the Turks Captaines with the Vayuod of Tranſylua-nia on the other ſide, weary of their eaſe, began contrary to the forme of the League, to ſur-E priſe ſtrong holds and townes one in anothers confines, whereof enſued much trouble: The author whereof was Melchior Balas the Emperours lieuetenant in that part of Hungary which bordereth vpon Tranſyluania, who firſt ſurpriſed certaine townes vpon the frontiers thereabouts: in reuenge whereof, the Vayuod ſuddenly ſet vpon Sackmar a towne in the Emperors Territory, which he tooke, and therein Balas his wife and children. In deſpight whereof Ba-
